In the following list AV indicates that the coin is of gold, \( R \) of silver, \( E \) of copper, 1\( E \) first bronze Roman, 2\( E \) second bronze Roman, 3\( E \) third bronze Roman. The weight of all gold and silver coins is given, with the exception of the aurei and denarii, which are for the most part of nearly the same weight respectively. When a coin has been reduced or enlarged in the drawing, the diameter of the original coin is given in the last column, the numbers in which refer to the subjoined scale; those which have no numbers affixed to them are of the same size in the drawing as the originals.

OCEANUS.

1720, especially the latter, to which we may add that of Hase, subjoined to the Valerius Maximus in Lemaire's edition of the Latin classics, 8vo. Paris, 1823, and containing the commentaries of both Scheffer and Oudemorp. No MS. having been employed since the time of Aldus, all the alterations introduced from time to time into the text are purely conjectural.

We have translations into French by George de la Bouthièvre, 8vo. Lyons, 1555, and by Victor Vergor, 12mo. Paris, 1823, and into Italian by Damiano Maraffi, 8vo. Lione, 1554. The first and last of the above contain also translations of the three books by Polydore Virgil on the same topic. [W. R.]

OBSI'DIUS. 1. The commander of a Frenavian troop of horse, serving under the consul Levisinus in the campaign against Pyrrhus B.C. 290, distinguished himself in the battle fought at the river Siris in that year, by the daring attempt which he made upon the king's life. He unhorsed Pyrrhus, but was killed by the personal attendants of the king. He is called Oclusus ('όκλα-κος) in Plutarch, Oulisius Vulsinius ('Οκλασκος Οβλί-σινιος) in Dionysius, but Obsidius in Florus. (Flor. i. 18. § 7; Plut. Pyrrh. 16; Dionys. xviii. 2-4.)

2. Discovered in Aethiopia the stone which was named after Obsidius (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 26. § 67). The name Obsidius Rufus occurs in inscriptions, but is not mentioned elsewhere.

OBU'I'TRO'NIUS SABI'NIUS, was quaestor aemil. in A.D. 37, when Nero transferred the charge of the public documents from the quaestors to the praefectus. He was slain by Galba, in Spain, on his accession to the regal throne, A.D. 68. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 28; Hist. i. 37.)

OCA'LEIA ('Οκαλέια), a daughter of Mantineus, and wife of Abas, by whom she became the mother of Acrius and Proetus. (Apollod. ii. 2. § 1.) The Scholiast of Euripides (Orest. 953) calls her Agaia. [L. S.]

O'C'IIA, a vestal virgin, who died in the reign of Tiberius, A.D. 19, after discharging the duties of her priesthood for the long period of fifty-seven years. (Tac. Ann. ii. 58.)

OCE'ANIDES. [ΝΥΜΦΑΙΩΝ.]

OCE'ANUS (,True), the god of the river Oceanus, by which, according to the most ancient notions of the Greeks, the whole earth was surrounded. An account of this river belongs to mythical geography, and we shall here confine ourselves to describing the place which Oceanus holds in the ancient cosmogony. In the Homeric poems he appears as a mighty god, who yields to none in power, and whose existence is stated in the following lines. (II. xi. 240; v. 191; xxi. 195.)

Homer does not mention his parentage, but calls Tethys his wife, by whom he had three daughters, Theis, Eurynome and Perse. (II. xiv. 302, xviii. 398, Od. x. 139.) His palace is placed somewhere in the west (II. xiv. 303, &c.), and there he and Tethys brought up Hera, who was conveyed to them at the time when Zeus was engaged in the struggle with the Titans. Hesiod (Theog. 133, 337, &c., 349, &c.) calls Oceanus a son of Uranus and Gaea, the eldest of the Titans, and the husband of Tethys, by whom he begot 3000 rivers, and as many Oceanides, of whom Hesiod mentions only the eldest. (Comp. Apollod. iii. 8. § 1, 10. § 1.) This poet (Theog. 282) also speaks of sources of Oceanus. Representations of the god are seen on imperial coins of Tyre and Alexandria. (Hirt, Mythol. Bilderd. p. 149.) [L. S.]

OCE'LLA, LI'VIUS. [Galba, emperor, p. 206, b.]

OCELLA, SERVIUS, respecting whom Caelius tells Cicero that he was detected in adultery twice within three days. (Cic. ad Fam. viii. 17, ii. 13.) This Ocella seems to be the same person as Cicero speaks of more than once during the civil wars. (Ad Att. x. 10, 13, 17.)

OCELLA'TAE, sisters and vestal virgins, to whom the emperor, Domitian, gave the choice of the mode of their death, when they were proved to have been unfaithful to their vow of chastity. (Suet. Dom. 8.)

OCELLA'NIA, LI'VIA. [Galba, p. 206, b.]

OCELLUS or OCYLLUS ('Οκέλους, 'Οκυλ-λος), a Lacedaemonian, was one of the three ambassadors who happened to be at Athens when Spoplarias invaded Attica, in B.C. 378. They were apprehended as having been privy to his design, but were released on their pointing out the groundlessness of the suspicion, and on their assurances that the Spartan government would be found to look with disapproval on the attempt of Sphodrias. In B.C. 369, we find Ocellus again at Athens, as one of the ambassadors who were negotiating an alliance between the Athenians and Spartans against Thebes. (Xen. Hell. v. 4. §§ 22, &c., vi. §§ 33, &c.; comp. Dio. xx. 29, 63; Plut. Philop. 14.) [E. E.]

OCELLUS Lu'I'NAUS ('Οκελούς Λουκανός), as his name implies, was a Lucanian, and a Pythagorean in some sense. There were attributed to him a work, Ἡδ Νῆμον, or on Law; πελα-βα-κεῖα καὶ οἰκοδομία, on Kingly Rule and Piety; and πελά τῆς τῶν παντὸς φύσεως, on the Nature of the Whole, which last is extant, though whether it is a genuine work is doubtful, or, at least, much disputed.

Ocellus is mentioned in a letter from Archyta to Plato, which is preserved by Diogenes Laërtius. (viii. 80), and in this letter the works above mentioned are enumerated. If the letter of Archyta is genuine, it proves that Ocellus lived some time before Archyta, for it speaks of the descendants of Ocellus. Nothing is said in the letter about Ocellus being a Pythagorean. Lucian (Pro Lapsu, &c. vol. i. p. 729, ed. Hemst.) speaks of Ocellus and Archyta as acquainted with Pythagoras, but we know that Archyta lived at least a hundred years after Pythagoras, and Lucian's historical facts are seldom to be relied on. Ocellus is mentioned by still later writers, but their evidence determines nothing as to his period.

As a Lacedaemonian, Ocellus would write in the Doric dialect, and as the work attributed to him is in the Ionic, this has been made a ground for impugning its genuineness; but so far from being an argument against the genuineness of the work, this is in its favour, and only shows that some copyist had altered the dialect. Besides this, the fragments from this work, which Stoebaeus cites, are in the Doric dialect. It is, however, always a doubtful matter as to early works, which are first mentioned by writers a much later period, whether they are really genuine. If the existing work is not genuine we must suppose that when it was fabricated the original was lost. It is also possible that it is a kind of new modelled edition of the original; and it is also possible that the extant work is the original itself, which the brevity and simple close reasoning render a probable conclusion.

This small treatise is divided into four chapters. The first chapter shows that the whole (τὸ μὲν, or ὁ κόσμος) had no beginning, and will have no end. He maintains that it is consistent with his views of the Cosmos that men have always existed, but he admits that the earth is subject to great revolutions, that Greece (Hellas) has often been and will be barbarous, and that it has sustained great physical changes. The object of the sexual instinct, he says, is not pleasure, but the procreation of children and the permanence of the human race. Accordingly, the commerce of the sexes should be regulated by decency, moderation, and congruity in the male and female, in order that healthy beings may be produced, and that families may be happy; for families compose states, and if the parts are unsound, so will the whole be. The book appears to be a fragment. The physical philosophy is crude and worthless, but the fundamental ideas are clearly conceived and happily expressed.

The best editions are by A. F. W. Rudolph, Leipzig, 1801—8, with copious notes and commentaries, and by Mullach; the latter edition bears the title, "Aristotelis de Melissae, Xenophane et Gorgia Disputationes cum Eleaticorum philosophorum fragmentis, et Ocelli Locani, qui fertur, de universa natura libello." Berlin, 1846. There is another good edition by Butenex, Paris, 1768; three vols. 12mo. An edition was published at Berlin, 1762, 8vo., by the Marquis d'Argens, with a French translation, and a good commentary. Ocellus was translated into English by Thomas Taylor, 1831, 8vo. [G. L.]

O'CHIMUS (Ο'ΧΙΜΟΣ), a Rhodian king, a son of Helios and Rhodes. He was married to the nymph Hegetoria, and the father of Cydippe, who married Ochimus' brother Cercaphus. (Diod. v. 56, 57; Plut. Quaest. Graec. 27.) [L. S.]

OCHUS. [ARAXERXES III.]

OCNUS, a son of Tiberius and Manto, and the reputed founder of the town of Mantua, though according to others he was a brother or a son of Auletes, and the founder of Cesena in Gaul. (Serv. ad Aen. x. 196.) [L. S.]

O'CREA, C. LU'SCIIUS, a senator mentioned by Cicero in his speech for Roscius, the actor (c. 14).

OCRISIA or OCLI'SIA, the mother of Servius Tullius, according to the old Roman legends. She was one of the captives taken at the conquest of Coriuncanum by the Romans, and in consequence of her beauty and modesty was given by Tarquinius as a handmaid to his queen, Tanaquil. One day, in the royal palace, when she was presenting some cakes as an offering to the household genius, she saw in the fire the genitale of a man. Tanaquil commanded her to dress herself as a bride, and to shut herself up alone in the chapel, in which the miracle had occurred. Thereupon she became pregnant by a god, whom some regarded as the Lar of the house, others as Vulcan. The offspring of this connexion was Servius Tullius. The more prosaic account represents her as having been first the wife of Spurius Tullius in Coriuncanum or at Tibur, and relates that after she was carried to Rome she married one of the clients of Tarquinius Priscus, and became by him the mother of Servius Tullius.

(Dionys. iv. 1, 2; Ov. Fast. vi. 625, &c.; Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 27. s. 70; Festus, s. v. Nōthum; Plut. de Fort. Rom. 10; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. i. p. 364.)

OCTACILIUS. [OTACILIUS.]

OCTAVE/NUS, a Roman jurist, who is cited by Valens (Dig. 36. tit. 1. s. 67), by Pomponius, who couples him with Aristo (Dig. 40. tit. 5. s. 20), and by Paulus, who joins him with Proculus (Dig. 18. tit. 6. s. 8), from which we may conclude that he lived after the time of Tiberius. It has been conjectured that he wrote on the Lex Julia et Tiberiana. His passages alleged in proof of this (Dig. 23. tit. 2. s. 44, 40. tit. 0. s. 32) are not decisive. He is also quoted by Ulpian and others. [G. L.]

OCTAVIA, 1. The elder daughter of C. Octavius, praetor, b. c. 61, by his first wife, Ancharia, and half-sister of the emperor, Augustus. (Suet. Aug. 4.) Plutarch erroneously makes this Octavia the wife of Marcellus and of M. Antonius.

2. The younger daughter of C. Octavius, by his second wife, Atia, and own sister of the emperor, Augustus, was married first to C. Marcellus, consul, b. c. 50, and subsequently to the triumvir, M. Antonius. (Suet. I. c.) Plutarch (Anton. 31), as has been remarked above, makes the elder Octavia the wife of the triumvir; and he has lately found a supporter of his opinion in Weichert (De Cassio Parnassii, p. 349, &c.), though some modern scholars, adopting the views of Perizonius, have decided in favour of the authority of Suetonius. The question is fully discussed by Drummann (Geschichte Roms, vol. iv. p. 225), who adheres, on good reasons as it appears to us, to the opinion of Perizonius; but for the arguments adduced on each side the question we must refer the reader to Drummann.

Octavia had been married to Marcellus before the year b. c. 54, for Julius Caesar, who was her great uncle, was anxious to divorce her from Marcellus that she might marry Pompey, who had then just lost his wife, Julia, the only daughter of Caesar. (Suet. Caes. 27.) Pompey, however, declined the proposal, and Octavia's husband continued to be one of the warmest opponents of Caesar. [MARCELLUS, No. 14.] But after the battle of Pharsalia he sued for and easily obtained the forgiveness of the conqueror; and Octavia appears to have lived quietly with her husband at Rome till the assassination of the dictator in b. c. 44. She lost her husband towards the latter end of b. c. 41; and as Fulvia, the wife of Antony, died about the same time, Octavius and Antony, who had lately been at variance, cemented their reconciliation by the marriage of Octavia to Antony. Octavia was at the time pregnant by her former husband, but the senate passed a decree by which she was permitted to marry at once. This marriage caused the greatest joy among all classes, and especially in the army, and was regarded as a harbinger of a lasting peace. Octavianus was warmly attached to his sister, and she possessed all the charms, accomplishments and virtues likely to fascinate the affections and secure a lasting influence over the mind of a husband. Her beauty was universally allowed to be superior to that of Cleopatra, and her virtue was such as to excite even admiration in an age of growing licentiousness and corruption. Plutarch only expresses the feelings of her contemporaries when he calls her χρυσή Σω-

On Cleopatra sent and her house's to Rome, was brought down by Jupiter her husband's building. and of Perseus, the king of Macedonia. [Octavius, No. 3.] The former was built by Augustus, in the name of his sister, whence some writers speak of it as the work of the emperor, and others as the work of Octavia. It lay between the Circus Flaminius and the theatre of Marcellus, occupying the same site as the porticus which was built by Q. Caecilius Metellus, after his triumph over Macedonia, in b. c. 146 [Metellus, No. 5], and enclosing, as the porticus of Metellus had done, the two temples of Jupiter Stator and of Juno. The Porticus Octaviani contained a public library, which frequently served as a place of meeting for the senate, and is hence called Carus Octavia. The whole suite of buildings is sometimes termed Octaviae Opera. It contained a vast number of statues, paintings, and other valuable works of art, but they were all destroyed, together with the library, by the fire which consumed the building in the reign of Titus (Dion Cass. lixv. 24). There is some doubt as to the time at which Augustus built the Porticus Octaviae. It is usually stated, on the authority of Dion Cassius (xlix. 43), that the building was erected by Octavius, after the victory over the Dalmatians, in b. c. 33; but this appears to be a mistake; for Vitruvius, who certainly did not write his work so early as this year, still speaks (iii. 2. § 8, ed. Schneider) of the Porticus Metelli, and we learn from Plutarch (Marc. 30) that the dedication at all events of the Porticus did not take place till after the death of M. Marcellus in b. c. 23. (Veil. 3. The daughter of the emperor Claudius, by his third wife, the notorious Valeria Messalina, was born about A. D. 42; since Tacitus, speaking of her death in A. D. 62, says that she was then in the twentieth year of her age. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 64.) She was called Octavia after her great-grandmother, the sister of Augustus [No. 2]. As early as the year 48, Octavia was betrothed by Claudius to L. Silanus, a youth of distinguished family and much beloved by the people; but Agrippina, who had secured the affections of the weak-minded Claudius, resolved to prevent the marriage, in order that Claudia might marry Domitius, afterwards the emperor Nero. She had no difficulty in rendering Silanus an object of suspicion to Claudius; and as Silanus saw that he was doomed, he put an end to his life at the beginning of the following year (A. D. 49), on the very day on which Claudius was married to Agrippina. Octavia was now betrothed to the young Domitius, but the marriage did not take place till A. D. 53, the year before the death of Claudius, when Nero, as he was now called, having been adopted by Claudius, was only sixteen years of age, and Octavia but eleven. (Tac. Ann. xii. 58.) Suetonius, with less probability, places the marriage still earlier (Ner. 7). Nero from the first never liked his wife, and soon after his succession ceased to pay her any attention. He was first captivated by a freedwoman of the name of Acte, who shortly after had to give way to Poppaea Sabina, the wife of Otho, who was afterwards emperor. Of the latter he was so enamoured that he resolved to recognize her as his legal wife; and accordingly in A. D. 62 he divorced Octavia on the alleged ground of sterility, and in sixteen days after married Poppaea. But Poppaea, not satisfied with obtaining the place of Octavia, induced one of the servants of the latter to accuse her of adultery with a slave; but most of her slaves when put to the torture persisted in maintaining the innocence of their mistress. Notwithstanding this she was ordered to leave the city and retire to Campania, where she was placed under the surveillance of soldiers; but in consequence of the complaints and murmurs of the people, Nero recalled her to Rome. The people celebrated her return with the most unbounded joy, which, however, only sealed her ruin. Poppaea again worked upon the passions and the fears of her husband; Anicius was induced to confess that he had been the partaker of Octavia; and the unhappy girl was thereupon removed to the little island of Pandataria, where she was shortly after put to death. The scene of her death is painted by the masterly hand of Tacitus. She feared to die; and as her terror was so great that the blood would not flow from her veins after they were opened, she was carried into a bath and stifled by the vapour. It is even added that her head was cut off and sent to Rome to glut the vengeance of Poppaea. Her untimely end excited general commiseration. (Tac. Ann. xi. 32, xii. 2—9, 58, xiii. 12, xiv. 60—64; Suet. Claud. 27, Ner. 7, 35; Dion Cass. Ix. 31, 39, Ixi. 7, Ixi. 13.) Octavia is the heroine of a tragedy, found among the works of Seneca, but the author of which was more probably Lucius Mesterus. See Octavia Prætexta. Carissimo Materno vicissat. solidit F. family. In consequence of the intermarriages in this family, part of this stemma repeats a portion of the stemma in Vol. I. p. 430, and also of the stemma of the Drusi given in Vol. I. p. 1076; but it is thought better for the sake of clearness to make this repetition.

There are a few other persons of the name of Octavius, who were not descended from Cn. Octavius Rufus, or whose descent cannot be traced. Most of the gens was commanded by new owners when they are given, namely, Balbus, Ligur, Marsius, Naso: those who have no cognomens are given under Octavius after the descendants of Cn. Octavius Rufus.

OCTAVIANUS. [Augustus.]

OCTAVIANUS. 1. Cn. Octavius Rufus, quæstor about b. c. 230, may be regarded as the founder of the family. [Octavia Gens.] Suctonius calls him Cæius; but this is probably a mistake, as Drumnann has remarked, since the name of his eldest son was Cneius, and it was the rule among the Romans for the eldest son to inherit the praenomen of his father. (Suet. Aug. 2.)

2. Cn. Octavius, son of the preceding, was plebeian aedile in b. c. 206 with Sp. Lucertius, and was with him elected to the praetorship for the following year, b. c. 205. Octavius obtained Sardinia as his province, and captured off the island eighty Carthaginian ships of burden. In the following year, b. c. 204, he handed over the province to his successor Th. Claudius, but his imperium was extended for another year, and he was commanded by the senate to keep watch over the coasts in those parts with a fleet of forty ships. He was also employed in this year in carrying to the Roman army in Africa supplies of provisions and clothes. Next year, b. c. 203, his command was again prolonged, and the protection of the coasts of Sardinia was again entrusted to him; and while he was employed, as he had been in the preceding year, in carrying supplies to Africa, he was surprised off the coast of Africa by a fearful storm, which destroyed the greater part of his fleet, consisting of 200 transport vessels and 30 ships of war. Octavius himself, with the ships of war, obtained shelter under the promontory of Apollo. Octavius was present at the battle of Zama, in b. c. 202, and Scipio placed so much confidence in him that he commanded him after the battle to march upon Carthage with the land forces, while he himself blockaded the harbour with the fleet. In b. c. 201 Octavius returned with part of the fleet to Italy, and handed over to the proconsul, M. Valerius Laevinus, thirty-eight ships for the prosecution of the war against Philip of Macedon. But he was not long allowed to remain inactive. In b. c. 200 he was sent into Africa as one of the three ambassadors to Carthage, Masinissa, and Vermina, the son of Syphax. In b. c. 194 he was one of the commissioners for founding a colony at Croton in Southern Italy, and two years afterwards, in b. c. 192, just before the breaking out of the war with Antiochus the Great, he was sent into Greece in order to support the Roman interests in those parts. (Liv. xxviii. 36, 46, xxix. 13, 36, xxx. 2, 24, 36, xxxi. 3, 11, xxxii. 43, xxxv. 23, xxxvi. 16.)

3. Cn. Octavius, son of No. 2. In the winter of b. c. 170 he was sent into Greece as ambassador, with C. Popillius Laenas, and on his return to Rome in 169, he was elected one of the decemviri sacrorum. He was praetor in b. c. 168, and had as his province the command of the fleet in the war against Perseus. After the defeat of Perseus at Pydna, by the consul Aemilius Paulus, Octavius sailed to Samothrace, where the king had taken refuge. Perseus surrendered himself to Octavius, who thereupon conducted him to the consuls at Amphipolis. In the following year, 167, Octavius sailed to Rome with the booty which had been gained in the war, and on the 1st December in that year, he obtained the honour of a naval triumph. (Liv. xlii. 17, xlv. 18, 21, 35, xlv. 5, 6, 33; Polyb. xxvii. 3, 5; Vell. Pat. i. 9; Plut. Aemil. Paull. 26; Plin. ii. N. xxxiv. 3, s. 7; Festus, s. v. Octavius.)

The wealth which Octavius had obtained in Greece enabled him to live in great splendour on his return to Rome. He built a magnificent house on the Palatine, which, according to Cicero (de Off. i. 39), contributed to his election to the consuls'hip, and he also erected a beautiful porticus, which is spoken of below. He was consul with T. Manlius Torquatus in b. c. 165, being the first member of his family who obtained this dignity. In b. c. 162 Octavius was sent with two colleagues into Syria, which was in a state of great confusion in consequence of the contentions for the guardianship of the young king Antiochus V.; and the Romans therefore considered it a favourable opportunity for enforcing the terms of the peace made with Antiochus the Great, by which the Syrian monarchs were prevented from having a fleet and rearing elephants. But this embassy cost Octavius his life, for he was assassinated in the gymnasium at Laodicea, by a Syrian Greek of the name of Lep- tines, at the instigation, as was supposed, of Lysias, the guardian of the young king. [Lep- tines.] A statue of Octavius was placed on the rostra at Rome, where it was in the time of Cicero. (Terent. Heecr. titul.; Cic. de Fin. i. 7, Philipp. ix. 2; Obsequ. 72; Polyb. xxxi. 12, 13, 19—21; Ap- pian, Syr. 46; Plin. ii. N. xxxiv. 6. s. 11, who confounds the last embassy of Octavius with a different one: comp. Laenas, No. 5.)

The porticus erected by Cn. Octavius was called Porticus Octaviae, and must be carefully distin- guished from the Porticus Octaviana, built by Au- gustus in the name of his sister. [Octavia, No. 2.]

The former was near the theatre of Pompey, on the Flaminiancirce. It contained two rows of columns of the Corinthian order with brazen capitals, and was hence also called the Porticus Corinthi- this. It was rebuilt by Augustus, who allowed it to retain its ancient name, but it appears to have been destroyed, or to have perished in some way, before the time of Pliny, as he speaks of it only from what he had read. (Vell. Pat. ii. 1; Festus, s. v. Octavia; Plin. ii. N. xxxiv. 3. s. 7; Monumentum Ancyranum, p. 32. i. 43, &c., ed. Franzius, Berol. 1845; Müller, Praefatio ad Festum, p. xxix.; Becker, Römisch. Alterthüm. vol. i. p. 617.)

4. Cn. Octavius, son of No. 3, was consul b. c. 128, and was accustomed to speak in the courts of justice. (Cic. de Orat. i. 36.)

5. M. Octavius, may be, as Drumnann has stated, a younger son of No. 3, so far as the time at which he lived is concerned, but no ancient writer speaks of him as his son. It would appear from Obsequens (c. 130) that he bore the surname of Caeceum, but the reading is perhaps faulty. He was the colleague of Tib. Gracchus in the tribunate of the plebs, n. c. 133, and opposed his tribunitian veto to the passing of the agrarian law. The history of his opposition, and the way in which he was in consequence deposed from his office by Tib. Gracchus, are fully detailed in the life of the latter. [Vol. II. p. 292, a.] Octavius is naturally either praised or blamed according to the different views entertained by persons of the laws of Gracchus. Cicero (Brut. 25) calls Octavius civis in rebus op- timis constantissimus, and praises him for his skill in speaking. We learn from Plutarch that Octavius was a personal friend of Gracchus, and that it was with considerable reluctance that the nobles persuaded him to oppose his friend, but to this course he was probably also prompted by possessing a large tract of public land. Plutarch likewise adds that though Octavius and Gracchus opposed one another with great earnestness and rivalry, yet they are said never to have uttered a disparaging word against one another. (Plut. Tib. Gracch. 10.) Dion Cassius, on the contrary, says (Dio. 67, ed. Reimarus) that Octavius opposed Gracchus of his own accord, through jealousy springing from their relationship to one another: and that they were related in some way or may also have inferred from Octavius the objections of Plutarch (C. Gracch. 14), from which we learn that C. Gracchus dropped a measure directed against Octavius at the request of his mother Octavia.

6. CN. OCTAVIUS, son of No. 4. He was one of the staunch supporters of the aristocratical party, which was perhaps the reason that he failed in obtaining the aedilship. (Cic. pro Plaeno. 21.) He was consul in n. c. 87 with L. Cornelius Cinna, the year after the consulsiphip of Sulla and the banishment of Marius and his leading partisans. Sulla was now absent in Greece, engaged in the war against Mithridates, and upon Octavius, therefore, devolved the support of the interests of his party. Immediately after Sulla's departure from Italy, Cinna attempted to obtain the power for the Mari- rian party by incorporating the new Italian citizens among the thirty-five tribes. Octavius offered the most vehement resistance, and, in the contentions which ensued, he displayed an amount of activity for which previously credit had not been given him. (Cic. Brut. 47.) But from words the two parties soon came to blows. A dreadful conflict took place in the forum, and Cinna was driven out of the city with great slaughter. The senate followed up their victory by depriving Cinna of his consulsiphip, and appointing L. Cornelius Merula in his stead. But Cinna soon collected a considerable army, with which he marched against Rome, and Marius, as soon as he heard of these changes, re- turned from Africa and levied some troops, with which he likewise proceeded against the city. The soldiers of Octavius seem to have had no confidence in their general, and therefore offered to place themselves under the command of Metellus Pius, who had been summoned to Rome by the senate. (Metell. No. 10.) But when Metellus refused to take the command, and numbers of the soldiers therefore deserted to the enemy, the senate had no other course left them but submission. Metellus fled from the city, and the friends of Oc- tavius begged him to do the same; but, trusting to the promises of Marius and Cinna, and still more to the assurances of the diviners, that he would suffer no harm, he remained in Rome, de- claring that being consul he would not abandon his country. Accordingly, when the troops of Marius and Cinna began to march into the city, he stationed himself on the Janiculum, with the soldiers that still remained faithful to him, and there, seated on his curule throne, was killed by Censorinus, who had been sent for that purpose by the victorious party. His head was cut off and suspended on the rostra. This is the account of Appian, but the manner of his death is related somewhat different- ly by Plutarch. Octavius seems, upon the whole, to have been an upright man, but he was very superstitious, slow in action and in council, and did not possess remarkable abilities of any kind. (Appian, B. C. i. 64, 68—71; Plut. Mar. 41, 42; Val. Max. i. 6; § 10; Dion Cass. Fragm. 117, 118, ed. Reimarus; Liv. Epit. 79, 80; Flor. iii. 21 § 9; Cic. in Cat. iii. 10, de Harsequ. Resp. 24, Philipp. xiii. 1, xiv. 8, Tuscud. v. 19, pro Sest. 36, de Divin. i. 2, de Nat. Deor. i. 5.)

7. M. OCTAVIUS, described by Cicero as Cn. f., must be the younger son of No. 4. In his tribu- nate of the plebs, the year of which is not stated, he brought forward a law for raising the price at which corn was sold to the people by the Fermen- tarius, C. Gracchus, since it was found that the treasury was quite drained by the law of Grac- chus. Cicero attributes the enactment of the law to the influence and eloquence of Octavius, although he adds that he was, properly speaking, not an orator. (Cic. de Off. ii. 21, Brut. 62.) This M. Octavius should be carefully distinguished from the M. Octavius who was the colleague of Tib. Gracchus. [See No. 5.]

8. L. OCTAVIUS CN. F. CN. N. (Fasti Capit.), the son of No. 6, was consul n. c. 75 with C. Au- relius Cotta. He died in b. c. 74, as proconsul of Cilicia, and was succeeded in the command of the province by L. Lucullus. (Cic. Ferr. i. 50, iii. 7; Obsequ. 121; Plut. Lucull. 6.) Many writers confound this L. Octavius with L. Octavius Dabulus, the jurist. [Balbus, p. 436.]

9. CN. OCTAVIUS M. F. CN. N. (Fasti Capit.), son of No. 7, was consul b. c. 76, with C. Scri- boniuns Curio. He is described as a man of a mild temper, and was kept in the background by the consequence of which he appears to have lost the use of his feet. As an orator he was of little account. (Cic. Brut. 60, 62, de Fin. ii. 28; Sall. Hist. ii. p. 205, ed. Gerl. min.; Obsequ. 121.)

10. M. OCTAVIUS CN. P. M. N. (Cic. ad Fam. viii. 2 § 2), the son of No. 9. He was a friend of Ap. Claudius Pulcher, consul b. c. 54, and accompanied the latter into Cilicia, but left the province before Claudius in order to become a candidate for the aedilship. He was curule aedile b. c. 50 along with M. Caelius; and as both of them were friends of Cicero, they begged the orator, as he was then in Cilicia, to send them panthers for the games they had to exhibit. (Cic. ad Fam. iii. 4, ad Att. v. 21, vi. 1 § 21.) On the breaking out of the civil war in b. c. 49, Octavius, true to the heredi- tary principles of his family, espoused the aris- tocratical party. He was appointed, along with L. Scriboniuns Libo, to the command of the Libur- nian and Achaean fleets, serving as legate to M. Bibulus, who had the supreme command of the Pompeian fleet. He and Libo did good service to the cause; they defeated Dolabella on the Illyrian coast, and compelled C. Antonius to surrender at the island of Corica (Caes. B. C. iii. 5; Dion Cass.)

xli. 40; Florus, iv. 2, § 31; Oros. vi. 15.) Octavius afterwards proceeded to attack the town of Salonae in Dalmatia, but was repulsed with considerable loss, and thereupon joined Pompey at Dyrtrachium. After the battle of Pharsalia, Octavius, who still possessed a considerable fleet, set sail for Illyricum with the hope of securing it for the Pompeian party. At first he met with great success, and defeated Gabinius, who had been sent by Caesar into Illyricum with reinforcements for the army, which was already there; but he was soon afterwards driven out of the country (B. c. 47) by Cornificius and Vatinus, and compelled to fly to Africa, where the Pompeian party were making a stand. (Hirt. B. Alex. 42—46; Dion Cass. xiii. 11.) After the battle of Thapsus (B. c. 46), Octavius was in the neighbourhood of Utica in command of two legions, and claimed to have the supreme command with Cato. (Plut. Cat. min. 65.) He is not mentioned again till the battle of Actium (B. c. 31), when he commanded along with M. Insteius the middle of Antony's fleet. (Plut. Ant. 63.)

11. C. Octavius, the younger son of No. 1, and the ancestor of Augustus, remained a simple Roman eques, without attempting to rise any higher in the state. (Suet. Aug. 2; Vell. Pat. ii. 59.)

12. C. Octavius, son of the preceding, and great-grandfather of Augustus, lived in the time of the second Punic war, in which he served as a tribune of the soldiers. He was present at the battle of Cannae (B. c. 216), and was one of the few who survived the engagement. When the Carthaginians were forcing into the lesser Roman camp, Octavius and another tribune, Sempronius Tuditanus, cut their way through the enemy, with a few soldiers, and arrived in safety at Carthamus. (Frontin. Strat. iv. 5 § 7; comp. Liv. xxii. 52.) Octavius also served in Sicily under the praetor L. Aemilius Papus (B. c. 205), but what part he took in the other campaigns in the war is not mentioned. When M. Antonius wished to throw contempt upon Augustus, he called this C. Octavius a freedman and a rope-maker (restio), but whether he or his family ever had any thing to do with a manufactory of ropes, is quite uncertain. (Suet. Aug. 1.)

13. C. Octavius, son of the preceding, and father of Augustus, lived quietly at his villa at Velitrae, content with the municipal honours of his native town, and not aspiring to the dignities of the Roman state. He possessed considerable property, which he probably augmented by money-lending, since Antonius and Cassius Parmenides called Augustus the grandson of a banker or money-lender. (Suet. Aug. 2, § 4, 6.)

14. C. Octavius, son of the preceding and father of Augustus, was likewise said by the enemies of Augustus to have been a money-lender, and to have been employed in the Campus Martius as one of the agents for bribing the voters. But there is probably no truth in these reports. The riches left him by his father enabled him, without difficulty, to obtain the public offices at Rome, although he was the first of his family who had aspired to them. We learn from an inscription, which is given below, that he was successively tribune of the soldiers twice, quaestor, plebeian sede with C. Teranius, judex quassionum, and praetor. Of his history up to the time of his prætorship we have no further information; we are only told that he filled the previous dignities with great credit to himself and obtained a reputation for integrity, ability, and uprightness. Velleius Paterculus characterizes him (ii. 59) as gravis, sanctus, innocens, and dives, and adds that the estimation in which he was held gained for him, in marriage, Atia, the daughter of Julia, who was the sister of Julius Caesar. Thus, although a nephew of Augustus, he was chosen first praetor in B. c. 61, and discharged the duties of his office with an admirable manner that Cicero recommends him as a model to his brother Quintus. (Cic. ad Qu. F. i. 1. § 7.) In the following year he succeeded C. Antonius in the government of Macedonia, with the title of proconsul, and on his way to his province he cut to pieces, in the Thrinian district, in consequence of orders from the senate, a body of runaway slaves, who had been gathered together for Catiline, and had previously belonged to the army of Spartacus. He administered the affairs of his province with equal integrity and energy. The manner in which he treated the provincials was again recommended by Cicero as an example to his brother Quintus. He routed the Bessi and some other Thracian tribes, who had disturbed the peace of the province, and received in consequence the title of imperator from his troops. He returned to Italy at the latter end of B. c. 59, in full expectation of being elected to the consulship, but he died suddenly at the beginning of the following year, B. c. 58, at Nola, in Campania, in the very same room in which Augustus afterwards breathed his last. Octavius was married twice, first to Ancharia, by whom he had one daughter [Ancharia], and secondly to Atia, by whom he had a daughter and a son [Atia]. His second wife, and his three children, survived him. (Suet. Aug. 3, § 4; Nicol. Damasc. Vit. August. c. 2, ed. Orelli; Vell. Pat. ii. 59; Cic. ad Att. ii. 1, ad Qu. F. i. § 7, ii. § 7, Philipp. iii. 6; Tac. Ann. i. 9.) The following is the inscription which has been above referred to:—

16. C. Octavius, the younger daughter of No. 14, by Atia. [OCTAVIA, No. 2.]

17. C. Octavius, the son of No. 14, by Atia, was subsequently called C. Julius Caesar Octavianus, in consequence of his adoption by his great-uncle, C. Julius Caesar. The senate, at a later period, conferred upon him the title of Augustus, under which name his life is given. [AUGUSTUS.]

18. CN. OCTAVIUS RUFUS, quaestor, B. c. 107, was sent into Africa with pay for the army of Marius, and returned to Rome, accompanied by the ambassadors, whom Bocchus sent to the senate. (Sall. Jug. 104.) The cognomen in most of the MSS. of Sallust is Iustus, for which, however, we ought probably to read Rufus, as the former cognomen is unknown in the Octavia gens. From the fact that this Cn. Octavius filled the office of quaestor, it is not impossible that he may be the same Cn. Octavius, who was consul B. c. 67. [See above, No. 6.]

19. L. Octavius, a legate of Pompey in the war against the pirates, B. c. 67, was sent by Pompey into Crete to receive the submission of the Cretan towns, and to supersede Q. Metellus Creticus in the command of the island. (Dion Cass. xxxvi. 1, 2; Plut. Pompe. 29.) For further details see Metellus, No. 23, p. 1064.

20. L. OCTAVIUS, detected in adultery by C. Memmius, and punished by him. (Val. Max. vi. 1, § 13.)

21. P. OCTAVIUS, a noted epicure in the reign of Tiberius, who outbid even Apicius in the sum which he gave for a mullet that Tiberius had ordered to be sold. (Sene. Epist. 95.)

22. OCTAVIUS GAEZICUS, one of the generals of Sertorius, in Spain, distinguished himself in the first battle fought between Pompey and Sertorius, near the town of Lauron, B. C. 76. He afterwards joined the conspiracy of M. Perperna, by which Sertorius perished, B. C. 72. (Frontin. Strat. ii. 5, § 31; Plut. Sert. 26.)

23. M. OCTAVIUS LAENAS CUNTIANUS, one of the distinguished men who supplanted the judges on behalf of M. Scaurus, B. C. 54. (Ascon. in Scaur. p. 29, ed. Orelli.)

24. OCTAVIUS LAENAS, curator of the aqueducts in Rome, in the reigns of Tiberius and Caligula from A. D. 34 to A. D. 38. (Frontin. Aqaua. § 102.)

25. SER. OCTAVIUS LAENAS PONTIANUS, consul with M. Antonius Rufinus, in the reign of Hadrian, A. D. 131. (Fasti.)

26. OCTAVIUS RUFUS was a friend of the younger Pliny, who addresses two letters to him, in which he presses Octavius to publish the poems he had composed. (Plin. Ep. i. 7, ii. 10.) In another letter (ix. 38) Pliny praises a work of one Rufus, who may, perhaps, be the same as this Octavius.

O CY'PETE (Σαυρώνης), the name of two mythical beings, one a Danaid, and the other a Harpy. (Apollod. ii. 1, § 5; Hes. Theog. 267.) [L. S.]

OCYRHOE. (Οξιροΐ). 1. One of the daughters of Oceana and Tethys. (Hes. Theog. 360; Hom. Hymn. in Cor. 420; Paus. iv. 30. § 3.)

ODATIS (Οδάτης), daughter of Omartes, a Cretan king. According to a story recorded by Chares of Mytilene (ap. Ath. xiii. p. 575), Odatis and Zariadres (king of the country between the Caspian gates and the Tanais) fell mutually in love from the sight of another's image in a dream. But Omartes, having no son, wished his daughter to marry one of his own relatives or near friends. He therefore summoned them all to a banquet, whereon he desired Odatis to fill a cup with wine, and present it to whomsoever she chose for her husband. Meanwhile, however, Zariadres had received notice from her of her father's intentions, and, being engaged in a military expedition near the banks of the Tanais, he set out with only one attendant, and, having travelled a distance of 800 stadia, arrived in the banquet-hall of Omartes, disguised in a Sceytian dress, just as Odatis, reluctantly and in tears, was mixing the wine at the board where the goblets stood. Advancing close to her side, he whispered, "Odatis, I am here at thy desire, I, Zariadres." Looking up, she recognised with joy the beautiful youth of her dream, and placed the cup in his hands. Immediately he seized and bore her off to his chariot; and so the lovers escaped, favoured by the sympathising attendants of the palace, who, when Omartes ordered them to pursue the fugitives, professed ignorance of the way they had taken. This love story, we are told, was most popular in Asia, and a favourite subject for paintings; and Odatis was a prevalent female name in noble families. [E. E.]

ODENATHUS, the husband of the heroic Zenobia [Zenobia], according to Zosimus, was of a noble family of Palmyra, according to Procop- pius [Persic. ii. 5) the prince of a Sarmatian tribe dwelling upon the banks of the Euphrates, according to Agathias (lib. iv.) of humble origin. He is said to have been a friend of Trebellius Pollio in his old age, and to have been one of the thirty tyrants [see AURSOUS], but unlike the great majority of these usurpers, desires to be considered as the saviour rather than the destroyer of the Roman power. At the moment when all seemed lost in the East, in consequence of the capture of Valerian, and the dispersion of his army, Odenathus having collected a powerful force marched boldly against the victorious Sapor, whom he drove out of Syria, recovered Nisibis, together with all Mesopotamia, captured the harem of the Persian monarch, and pursued him up to the very walls of Ctesiphon. Returning loaded with plunder, he next turned his arms against Quietus, son of Macrianus, and shut up the pretended in Emessa, where he perished upon the capture of the city. In gratitude for these important services, Gallienus bestowed upon his ally the title of Augustus, and acknowledged him as a colleague in the empire, but Odenathus did not long enjoy his well-earned dignity, for he was slain by the domestic treachery of his cousin, or perhaps by Macenius, not without the consent, it is said, of Zenobia, about the year A. D. 266. Little is known with regard to the history of this warlike Arab, except the naked facts detailed above, and that from his earliest years he took great delight in the chase, and willingly endured the severest hardships. ODITES, the name of two mythical beings, one a centaur, and the other an Ethiopian, who was slain by Clymenna at the wedding of Perseus. (Ov. Met. xii. 457, v. 97.) [L. S.]

O'DIUS (Οδίους). 1. The chief of the Hal- zones, assisted the Trojans against the Greeks, but was slain by Agamemnon. (Hom. II. ii. 856, v. 38; Strab. xvi. p. 551.)

2. A herald in the camp of the Greeks at Troy, (Hom. II. ix. 170.) [L. S.]

ODOACER (Οδόακρος), King of Italy, from A. D. 493 to 496. He was the son of one Edeco, who was undoubtedly the same Edeco who was minister of Attila and his ambassador at Constantinople. Odoacer had a brother, Onulf, who likewise became conspicuous. It appears that Odoacer was by origin a Scyrrus, and that after the dis- persion of the Scyrris by the East Goths, he was chosen the chief of the remnants of that broken tribe, but he is also called a Rugian, an Hernilian, and a king of the Turcilli, perhaps because he was in after years at the head of an army composed of those nations. His father Edecon having been slain in the battle with the East Goths, where the power of the Scyrii was broken (about 463), Odoacer, now at the head of the reduced tribe, led the life of a robber in Pannonia and Noricum, but finally entered the imperial guard at Rome and rose to the rank of regent. In 475 Orestes had his son Romulius Augustulus chosen emperor of Rome. The countless hordes of barbarians of all nations, with the aid of which Orestes had accomplished his object, demanded in reward one third of the soil of Italy to be divided among them. When Orestes declined to comply with their wishes, Odoacer turned the discontent of the mercenaries to his own profit, and promised to allot to them the desired portion of Italy, if they would assist him to wrest the whole from the nominal emperor Romulus Augustulus and his father Orestes, a condition which the majority of those reckless warriors readily accepted. Thus arose a war between Odoacer and Orestes. The latter, after suffering some defeats, retired within the walls of Pavia; but Odoacer took the town by assault, made Orestes prisoner, and put him to death. St. Epiphanius, bishop of Pavia, who was present at the siege, whence his life by Enno-dius becomes an important source for the history of these times. Paul, the brother of Orestes, was slain at Ravenna. Romulus Augustulus was now deposed and banished by the victor, who henceforth reigned over Italy with the title of king, for he never assumed that of emperor (476). With the deposition of Romulus Augustulus, the Roman empire in the West came to an end. [AUGUSTULI.]

In order to establish himself the better on the throne, Odoacer sent ambassadors to the emperor Zeno, requesting the latter to grant him the title of patrician, and acknowledge him as regent of the diocese of Italy. Pleased with the seeming submissiveness of the conqueror of that country, Zeno granted the request, though after some hesitation. Odoacer took up his residence at Ravenna, and, according to his promise, divided one third of the soil of Italy among his followers, a measure which was perhaps less cruel towards the Italians than it would appear, since the country was depopulated, and many estates without an owner and lying waste. On the whole, Odoacer, who was the first barbarian that sat on the throne of Italy, was a wise, well-disposed, and energetic ruler, and knew how to establish order within and peace without his dominions, as far as the miserable moral condition of the Romans, the reckless spirit of their barbarian masters, and the daring rap-cacity of their neighbours were compatible with a settled state of things. Among his measures at home we may mention the re-establishment of the consulate as a proof of his wisdom, as his intention was to reconcile the remains of the old Romans to the new government. Odoacer reunited Dalmatia with the Kingdom of Italy after a sharp contest, with which he employed both a fleet and an army. He also made a successful campaign in 487 against the Ruggians, who endeavoured to make themselves independent in Noricum: their king Feletheus (Pheba or Fava) and many of their nobles were taken prisoners, and the rest yielded to his rule. Unfortunately for him there rose among the barbarians beyond the Alps a man still greater than Odoacer, Theodoric, king of the East Goths, who, secretly, and perhaps openly, supported by the emperor Zeno, resolved to wrest Italy from him, and establish the Gothic power at Rome. The-doric opened his first campaign in 489, and in a bloody battle foiled his rival on the banks of the Isontius (Isen) on the 28th of August, (489). Odoacer, retreating, offered a second battle at Vernalia, but again lost the day, whereupon he hastened to Rome in order to pernuide its inhabitants to rise for his defence. But the Romans, preferring to stand their own chance in the conflict, shut the gates of the city at his approach, and Odoacer consequently retraced his steps into Northern Italy, and threw himself into Ravenna. Thence he sailed out, defeated the van of the Gothic army, and compelled Theodoric to seek refuge within the walls of Pavia, but the Gothic king soon succeeded in rallying his forces, and vanquished Odoacer a third time in a decisive battle on the river Adda (490). Odoacer again took refuge in Ravenna, and Theodoric laid siege to that city, while his lieutenants gradually reduced the whole kingdom of Italy. After an obocate defence of nearly three years Odoacer at last capitulated, and an hour before his departure he and Theodoric should be joint kings of Italy: the treaty was confirmed by oaths taken by both parties (27th of February, 493). Theodoric, however, soon broke his oath; and on the 5th of March following, Odoacer was murdered by the hand, or command, of his more fortunate rival. Theodoric succeeded him as sole king of Italy. [PH. P.]

ODYSSEUS (Οδύσσεως), or, as the Latin writers call him, Ulysses, Ulyxes or Ulises, one of the principal Greek heroes in the Trojan war. According to the Homeric account, he was the grandson of Aeacus, and a son of Laërtes and Anticleia, the daughter of Icarius, and brother of Citrene. He was married to Penelope, the daughter of Icarius, by whom he became the father of Telemachus, Areius or Ptol-iphorus was likewise a son of his by Penelope; and that further, by Circe he became the father of Agrias, Latinus, Telemonus and Casmephy, and by Calypso of Nausithous and Nausionus or Aunus, Telemonus and Telephus, and lastly by Eurybates of Leontophen, Doryclus and Euryp-alus, (Hes. Theog. 1003, &c.; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1796; Schol. ad Lycol. p. 795; Parthen. Erot. 3; Paus. viii. 12. § 3; Serv. ad Aen. iii. 171.) According to an Italian tradition Odysseus was by Circe the father of Remus, Antias and Ardeas. (Dionys. i. 72.) The name Odysseus is said to signify the angry (Hom. Od. xix. 406, &c.), and among the Tyrrhenians he is said to
When Odysseus was a young man, he went to see his grandfather Autolycus near the foot of Mount Parnassus. There, while engaged in the chase, he was wounded by a boar in his knee, by the scar of which he was subsequently recognized by Euryclea. Laden with rich presents, he returned from the palace of his grandfather to Ithaca. (Hom. Od. xix. 413, &c.) Even at that age he is described as distinguished for his courage, his knowledge of navigation, his eloquence and skill as a negotiator; for, on one occasion, when the Messenians had carried off some sheep from Ithaca, Laërtes sent him to Messene to demand reparation. He there met with Iphitus, who was seeking the horses stolen from him, and who gave him the famous bow of Eurytus. This bow Odysseus used only in Ithaca, regarding it as too great a treasure to be employed in the field, and it was so strong that none of the suitors was able to handle it. (Od. xxii. 14, &c.) On one occasion he went to the Thesprotian Ephyra, to fetch from Ilus, the son of Mermur, poison for his arrows; but as he could not get it there, he afterwards obtained it from Anchialus of Taphus. (Od. i. 239, &c.) Some accounts also state that he went to the horses slain by the suitors of Helen, and that he is said to have advised Tyndareus to make the suitors swear, that they would defend the chosen bridegroom against any one that should insult him on Helen's account. Tyndareus, to show him his gratitude, persuaded his brother Icarius to give Penelope in marriage to Odysseus; or, according to others, Odysseus gained her by conquering his competitors in the footrace. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 9; Paus. iii. 12. § 2.) But Homer mentions nothing of all this, and he states that Agamemnon, who visited him in Ithaca, prevailed upon him only with great difficulty to join the Greeks in their expedition against Troy. (Od. xxiv. 116, &c.) Other traditions relate that he was visited by Menelaus and Agamemnon, and that more especially Palamedes induced him to join the Greeks. For when Palamedes came, it is said, Odysseus pretended to be mad: he yoked an ass and an ox to a plough, and began to sow. Palamedes, to test his reason, ordered him to plough the plough, whereupon the father could not continue to play his part. He stopped the plough, and was obliged to undertake the fulfilment of the promise he had made when he was one of the suitors of Helen. (Tzetz. ad Lyce. 818.) This occurrence is said to have been the cause of his hatred of Palamedes. (Hygin. Fab. 95.) Being now himself gained for the undertaking, he contrived to discover Achilles, who was concealed among the daughters of king Lycomedes, and without whom, according to a prophecy of Calchas, the expedition against Troy could not be undertaken. (Apollod. iii. 13. § 8; comp. Achilles.) Before, however, the Greeks set out against Troy, Odysseus, in conjunction with Menelaus (and Palamedes, Dict. Cret. i. 4.), went to Troy, where he was hospitably received, for the purpose of inducing the Trojans by amiable means to restore Helen and her treasures. (ll. ii. 205, &c.)

When the Greeks were assembled in the port of Aulis, he joined them with twelve ships and men from Cephallenia, Ithaca, Neriton, Crocylea, Zacynthus, Samos, and the coast of Epeirus (ll. ii. 303, 631, &c.). When Agamemnon was unwilling to sacrifice Iphigeneia to Artemis, and the Greeks were in great difficulty, Odysseus, feigning anger, threatened to return home, but went to Mycenae, and induced Clytaemnestra by various pretences to send Iphigeneia to Aulis (Dict. Cret. i. 20; comp. Eurip. Iphik. Aul. 100, &c.). On his voyage to Troy he went as anot in Lesbos with Philemonides, the king of the island, and conquered him (Od. iv. 342). According to others, Odysseus and Diomedes slew him by a stratagem. During the siege of Troy he distinguished himself as a valiant and undaunted warrior (ll. iv. 494, v. 677, vii. 168, x. 396, 404, &c. xiv. 82), but more particularly as a cunning, prudent, and eloquent spy and negotiator, and many instances are related in which he was of the greatest service to the Greeks by these powers. Several distinguished Trojans fell by his hand. After the death of Achilles he contended for his armour with the Telamonian Ajax, and gained the prize (Od. xi. 545; Ov. Met. xiii. init.). He is said by some to have devised the stratagem of the wooden horse (Philost. Her. x. 12), and he was one of the heroes that were concealed in its belly, and prevented them answering Helen, that they might not be discovered (Od. iv. 280, viii. 494, xi. 525). When the horse was opened he and Menelaus got in, and were conducted to the house of Deiphobus, where he conquered in the fearful struggle (Od. viii. 517.). He is also said to have taken part in carrying off the palladium. (Virg. Aen. ii. 164.)

But no part of his adventures is so celebrated in ancient story as his wanderings after the destruction of Troy, and his ultimate return to Ithaca, which form the subject of the Homeric poem called after him the Odyssey. After the taking of Troy one portion of the Greeks sailed away, and another with Agamemnon remained behind on the Trojan coast. Odysseus at first joined the former, but when he had sailed as far as Tenedos, he returned to Agamemnon (Od. iii. 169). Afterwards, however, he determined to sail home, but was thrown by a storm upon the coast of Ismarus, a town of the Cieones, in Thrace, north of the island of Lemnos. He there ravaged and plundered the town, and was not satisfied to induce his men to depart in time, the Cieones having invited the Trojans from the interior, and slew 72 of his companions (Od. ix. 39, &c.). From thence he was driven by a north wind towards Maleia and to the Lotophagi on the coast of Libya. Some of his companions were so much delighted with the taste of the lotos that they wanted to remain in the country, but Odysseus compelled them to embark again, and continued his voyage (Od. ix. 67, 84, 94, &c.). In one day he reached the goat-island, situated north of the country of the Lotophagi (Od. ix. 116). He there left behind twelve ships, and with one he sailed to the neighbouring island of the Cyclops (the western coast of Sicily), where with twelve companions he entered the cave of the Cyclops Polyphemus, a son of Poseidon and Thoosa. This giant devoured one after another six of the companions of Odysseus, and kept the unfortunate Odysseus and the six others as prisoners in his cave. In order to save himself Odysseus contrived to make the monster drunk with wine, and then with a burning pole deprived him of his one eye. He now succeeded in making his escape with his friends, by concealing himself and then under the bodies of the sheep which the Cyclops let out of his cave; and Odysseus, with a part of the flock, reached his ship. The Cyclops implored his father Poseidon to take vengeance upon Odysseus, and henceforward the god of the sea pursued the wandering king with implacable enmity (Od. i. 68, &c. ix. 172—542). Others represent Poseidon as angry with Odysseus on account of the death of Palamedes (Philost. Her. ii. 29; comp. Palamedes). On his further voyage he arrived at the island of Aeolus, probably in the south of Sicily, where he stayed one month, and is said to have been welcomed by Aeolus, the daughter of Aeolus (Parthen. Erot. 2). On his departure Aeolus provided him with a bag of winds, which were to carry him home, but his companions, without Odysseus' knowing it, opened the bag, and the winds escaped, whereupon the ships were driven back to the island of Aeolus, who was indignant and refused all further assistance (Od. x. i. &c.). After a voyage of six days he arrived at Telepylos, the city of Lamus, in which Antiphates ruled over the Laestrygones, a sort of cannibals. This place must probably be sought somewhere in the north of Sicily. Odysseus escaped from them with only one ship (x. 80, &c.), and his fate now carried him to a western island, Aeaea, inhabited by the sorceress Circe. A part of his people was sent to explore the island, but they were changed by Circe into swine. Eurylochus alone escaped, and brought the sad news to Odysseus, who, when he was hastening to the assistance of his friends, was instructed by Hermes by what means he could resist the magic powers of Circe. He succeeded in liberating his companions, who were again changed into men, and were most hospitably treated by the sorceress. When at length Odysseus begged for leave to depart, Circe desired him to descend into Hades and to consult the seer Teiresias (x. 135, &c.). He now sailed westward right across the river Oceanus, and having landed on the other side in the country of the Cimmerians, where Helios does not shine, he entered Hades, and consulted Teiresias about the manner in which he might reach his native island. Teiresias informed him of the danger and difficulties arising from the anger of Poseidon, but gave him hope that all would yet turn out well. If Odysseus and his companions would leave the herds of Helios in Thrinacia uninjured (Od. xi.). Odysseus now returned to Aeaea, where Circe again treated the strangers kindly, told them of the dangers that yet awaited them, and of the means of escaping (xii. 1, &c.). The wind which she sent with them carried them to the island of the Seirens, somewhere near the west coast of Italy. The Seirens sat on the shore, and with their sweet voices attracted all that passed by, and then destroyed them. Odysseus, in order to escape the danger, filled the ears of his companions with wax, and fastened himself to the mast of his ship, until he was out of the reach of the Seirens' song (xii. 39, &c. 166, &c.). Hereupon his ship came between Scylla and Charybdis, two rocks between Thrinacia and Italy. As the ship passed between them, Scylla, the monster inhabiting the rock of the same name, carried off and devoured six of the companions of Odysseus (xii. 73, &c. 235, &c.). From thence he came to Thrinacian, the island of Helios, who there kept his sacred herds of oxen. Odysseus, mindful of the advice of Teiresias and Circe, wanted to pass by, but his companions compelled him to land. He made them swear not to touch any of the cattle; but as they were detained in the island by storms, and as they were hungry, they killed the finest of the oxen while Odysseus was asleep. After some days the storm abated, and they sailed away, but soon another storm came on, and their ship was destroyed by Zeus with a flash of lightning. All were drowned with the exception of Odysseus, who saved himself by means of the mast and planks, and was driven by the wind again towards Scylla and Charybdis. But he skilfully avoided them after ten days, when he reached the woody island of Ogygia, inhabited by the nymph Calypso (xii. 127, &c. 260, &c.). She received him with kindness, and desired him to marry her, promising immortality and eternal youth, if he would consent, and forget Ithaca. But he could not overcome his longing after his own home (i. 51, 58, iv. 82, &c. 555, &c. vii. 244, &c. ix. 28, 34). Athens, who had always been the protectress of Odysseus, induced Zeus to promise that Odysseus, notwithstanding the anger of Poseidon, should one day return to his native island, and take vengeance on the suitors of Penelope (i. 48, &c. v. 23, xiii. 131, comp. xiii. 300, &c.). Hermes carried to Calypso the command of Zeus to dismiss Odysseus. The nymph obeyed, and taught him how to build a raft, on which, after a stay of eight years with her, he left the island (v. 140, &c. 234, 263). In eighteen days he came in sight of Scheria, the island of the Phaeacians, when Poseidon, who had received him, sent a storm, which cast him off the raft. On the advice of Leucothea, and with her and Athena's assistance, he reached Scheria by dint of swimming (v. 278, &c. 445, vi. 170). The exhausted hero slept on the shore, until he was awoken by the voices of maidens. He found Nausicaa, the daughter of king Alcinous and Arete; she gave him clothing and allowed him to follow her to the town, where he was kindly received by her parents. He was honoured with feasts and contests, and the minstrel Demodocus sang of the fall of Troy, which moved Odysseus to tears, and being questioned about the cause of his emotion, he related his whole history. At length he was honoured with presents and sent home in a ship. One night as he had fallen asleep in his ship, it reached the coast of Ithaca; the Phaeacians who had accompanied him, carried him and his presents on shore, and left him. He had now been away from Ithaca for twenty years, and when he awoke he did not recognise his native land, for Athena, that he might not be recognised, had enveloped him in a cloud. As he was lamenting his fate the goddess informed him where he was, concealed his presents, and advised him how to take vengeance upon the enemies of his house. During his absence his father Leàrtes, bowed down by grief and old age, had withdrawn into the country, his mother Anticleia had died of sorrow, his son Telemachus had grown up to manhood, and his wife Penelope had rejected all the offers that had been made to her by the importunate suitors from the neighbouring islands (Od. i. 130, &c. xiii. 336, &c. xv. 335, &c. xvi. 106, &c.). During the last three years of Odysseus' absence more than a hundred nobles of Ithaca, Same, Dulichium, and Zancynthus had been suing for the hand of Penelope, and in their visits to her house had treated all that it contained as if it had been their own (i. 246, OEAGRUS.

OEAGRUS (Ofayros), a king of Thrade, and father of Orpheus and Linus (Apollod. i. 3. § 2; Orph. Argon. 73; Os. 16. 484). Hence the sisters of Orpheus are called Oegrides, in the sense of the Muses. (Mosch. iii. 37.) [L.S.]

Oeax (Oaez), a son of Nauplius and Clymene, and brother of Palamedes and Nausimond (Apollod. iii. 1. in fin. iii. 2. § 2; Eurip. Orest. 432). [L.S.]

OEBALUS (Oebalos). 1. A son of Cynortas, and husband of Gorgophone, by whom he became the father of Tyndareos, Peirene, and Arene, was king of Sparta, where he was afterwards honoured with an heroum (Paus. iii. 3. § 3, 15. § 7, ii. 2. § 3, iv. 2. § 3). According to others he was a son of Perieres and a grandson of Cynortas, and was married to the nymph Bateia, by whom he had several children (Apollod. iii. 10. § 4; Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 447). The patronymic Oebealides is not only applied to his descendants, but to the Spartan Cyrus sent by him. Hence Oebyagas is an epithet or surname of Hyacinthus, Castor, Pollux and Helena (Os. Ih. 590, Fast. v. 705, Her. xvi. 126.)

2. A son of Telen by a nymph of the stream Schethus, near Naples. Telen, originally a king of the Teleboans, had come from the island of Taphos to Capreae, in Italy; and Oebeles settled in Campania. (Virg. Aen. vii. 734, with Serv. note.) [L.S.]

OEBARES (Oldampys). 1. A Persian, an officer of Cyrus. According to Ctesias (ap. Phot. Bibl. 72), when Astyages was taken at Ecbatana, whether he had fled from Cyrus, Oebeles threw him into chains, from which, however, Cyrus released him. Ctesias further tells us that, at the siege of Sardis, Oebeles advised Cyrus to terrify the citizens by images of Persians placed on high poles and made to look like gigantic soldiers, and that the fear thus caused mainly led to the capture of the town. When Cyrus sent Oebeles to court from his satrapy (the country of the Ban-canii), Oebeles instigated the messenger to leave the old king to perish in a desert place, and, when the deed was discovered, starved himself to death to avoid the vengeance of Amytis (Astyages's daughter), in spite of all the assurances of protection which Cyrus gave him.

2. A groom of Dareius Hystaspis. According to Herodotus, when the seven consorts, after slaying Smerdis, had decided on the continuation of monarchy, they agreed to ride forth together at sunrise, and to acknowledge as king any one of their number whose horse should be the first to neigh. Oebeles, by a stratagem, caused the horse of Dareius to neigh before the rest, and thus secured the throne for his master. (Herod. iii. 84—87.)

3. Son of Megabazus, was viceroy of Dascyleium, in Bithynia. He received the submission of the Cyzicenes to Dareius Hystaspis, about B.C. 524. (Herod. vi. 33; comp. Aesch. Pers. 390, ed. Schitz.) [E.E.]

OEBOTAS (Olbesarios), the son of Oenias, of Dyme in Achaia, was victorious in the foot-race at Olympia, in the sixth Olympiad, n. c. 756. His countrymen, however, having conferred upon him no distinguished mark of honour, although he was the first Achaean who had gained an Olympic victory, he implored upon them the curse that no Achaean should ever again conquer in the games; and, in fact, for three hundred years, not a single OEAGRUS. xiii. 377, xiv. 90, xvi. 247). That he might be able to take vengeance upon them, it was necessary that he should not be recognised, in order to avail himself of any favourable moment that might present itself. Athena accordingly metamorphosed him into an unsightly beggar, in which appearance he was kindly treated by Eumaeus, the swineherd, a faithful servant of his house (xiii. 70, &c. xiv.). While he was staying with Eumaeus, his son Telemachus returned from Sparta and Pylos, whither he had gone to obtain information concerning his father. Odysseus made himself known to him, and with him deliberated upon the plan of revenge (xvi. 187, &c. 300). In the disguise of a beggar he accompanied Telemachus and Eumaeus to the town; on his arrival he was abused and insulted by the goat-herd Melanthus and the suitors, who even tried to kill Telemachus; but his old dog and his nurse Eurycele recognised him, and Penelope received him kindly.

The plan of revenge was now carried into effect. Penelope, with great difficulty, was made to promise her hand to him who should conquer the others in shooting with the bow of Odysseus. As none of the suitors was able to manage it, Odysseus himself took it up, and having ordered all the doors to be shut, and all arms to be removed, he began his contest with the suitors, in which he was supported by Athena, his son, and some faithful servants. All fell by his hands, the faithless male and female servants as well as the suitors; the minstrel and Medon, the herald, alone were saved (xxii.). Odysseus now made himself known to Penelope, and went to see his aged father. In the meantime the report of the death of the suitors was spread abroad, and their relatives now rose in arms against Odysseus; but Athena, who assumed the appearance of Mentor, brought about a reconciliation between the people and the king (xxiii. xxv.).

It has already been remarked that in the Homeric poems, Odysseus is represented as a prudent, cunning, inventive and eloquent man, but at the same time as a brave, bold, and persevering warrior, whose courage no misfortune or calamity could subdue, but later poets describe him as a cowardly, deceitful, and intriguing personage (Virg. Aen. ii. 164; Os. Mit. xiii. 6, &c.; Philostr. Her. ii. 20). Respecting the last period of his life the Homeric poems give us no information, except the prophecy of Teiresias, who promised him a painless death in a happy old age (Od. xi. 119); but later writers give us different accounts. According to one, Telegonus, the son of Odysseus by Circe, was sent out by his mother to seek his father. A storm cast him upon Ithaca, which he began to plunder in order to obtain provisions. Odysseus and Telemachus attacked him, but he slew Odysseus, and his body was afterwards carried to Aeaea (Hygin. Fab. 127; Dict. Cret. vi. 15; Horat. Carm. iii. 29. 8). According to some Circe called Odysseus to life again, or on his arrival in Tyrrhenia, he was burnt on Mount Perge (Tzet. ad Lyc. 795, &c.). In works of art Odysseus was commonly represented as a sailor, wearing the semi-oval cap of a sailor. (Plin. H. N. x. x xxv. 36; Paus. x. 26. § 1, 29. § 2; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 304.) [L.S.]

OEAGRUS (Ofayros) a tragic actor at Athens, who appears to have been particularly successful in the character of Niobe. (Arist. Vesp. 579; Schol. ad loc.) [E.E.] Achaean was among the victors. At length the Achaeanas consulted the Delphic oracle, and, in obedience to its response, they erected a statue of Oebotias in the Altis at Olympia, Ol. 80. B.C. 460; soon after which a victory was gained in the boys' foot-race, by Sostratus of Pellenae. Hence the custom was established for the Achaean athletes to sacrifice to Oebotias before engaging in an Olympic contest, and, when victorious, to crown his statue. (Paus. viii. 17. §§ 6, 7, 13, 14. Bekker ; comp. vi. 3. § 8.)

OECUMENIUS (Olycouvénous), a Greek commentator on various parts of the New Testament. Of this writer scarcely anything is known; even the time in which he lived is not ascertained. He is cited very often in a MS. Catena in Epistolos Pauli, formerly in the Coislinian library at Paris, which Montfaucon (Biblioth. Coislin. cod. xlvii. p. 62) ascribes to the tenth century; and, as in his own Commentaries Oecumenius has cited Photius, who belongs to the latter half of the ninth century, 1ardner is perhaps correct (Credib. bk. i. c. clx.) in assigning him to the year 950. Cave's date (A.D. 960) is somewhat too late. He may rely on Montfaucon's judgment of the age of the Coislinian MS. Dupin places him in the eleventh century, later than Theophylact, which appears to be altogether too late. In a MS. cited by Montfaucon (ib. cod. cxxv. p. 277) he is styled bishop of Tricca in Thessaly. The following commentaries are, or have been, ascribed to Oecumenius:—

1. Commentaria in Sacrorum sanctissimae divinae liturgiae sanctissimae version. By Maximus Flaccus, bishop of Thessalonica. This version has been printed several times. It is of great antiquity, and may be well here to correct the statement given elsewhere [EUYTHYMIUS], that this commentary has been published only in Latin. The Greek text was published by C. F. Matthaei, in 3 vols. 8vo., Leipzig, 1792. Comparatively few copies of the edition of Hen- tenius, in the original form, appear to have got abroad, and few writers appear to have been aware of its real date (1543), and of its having borne the name of Oecumenius on the title-page. The editor of the Oxford edition of Cave's Historia litteraria (1740—43), in a note, and Lardner in his Credibility, notice that Le Long had, in his Bibliotheca Sacra, ascribed a Commentary on the Gospels to Oecumenius; but they evidently knew not which was the work referred to. Fabricius merely observes that some had conjecturally ascribed the Commentary of Euthymius to Oecumenius. Hamburger, with more sagacity, inferred from the Admonitio of Hentenius, which indeed speaks plainly enough, that the work had been issued in 1543, and probably under the name of Oecumenius; but Matthaei gravely disputes the correctness of his deduction. (See Harles, not. i. ad Fabric. vol. viii. p. 344.) A copy of the work in its original form, and with the date 1543, is in the library of the British Museum. It is to be observed that the ascription of this commentary, either to Oecumenius or Euthymius, rests only on internal evidence. In one MS. it bears the name of Nicetas of Serme, or, as he is usually termed, Nicetas of Heraclea; in another of Theophy- lact. The authorship of Euthymius is inferred from the resemblance of the work to his Commentary on the Psalms. The editor of Cave states that Oecumenius himself refers in a pas- sage in his commentary on St. Paul's Epistles, Ad Hebros, § 6, to a commentary which he had written on the Gospels, but we have not been able to find the place. 2. Ευθυμίου εἰς τὰς Ἐπιστολὰς Σαρκολόσ εὐκαίρια (v. Commentarii in Acta Apostolorum), compiled from the earlier Greek fathers, especially Chrysostom, with many additions by the compiler. 3. Commentarii in olim Epistolæ Pauli omnes, of similar character to the Commentary on the Acts of the Apostles. 4. Commentarii in olim Epistolæ Pauli omnes, of similar character to the Commentary on the Acts of the Apostles. 5. E. τῆς Ἡσυχίας ἑρμηνευμάτων. In Joannis Apo- calypsin. These various commentaries have been published. Those on the Acts and the Epistles, in editions of the Pauline and the Johannine, were published by Donatus, together with the Commentary of Arethas of Caesarea on the Apocalypse, fol. Ve- rona, 1532. They were again published at Paris, 2 vols. fol. 1631. A Latin version of these Commentaries of the Acts and Epistles, and of Arethas on the Apocalypse, by Hentenius, was published at Antwerp, fol. 1545. This version was reprinted, 4to. Frankfort, 1610; and with the Greek text of Oecu- menius and Arethas in the Parisian edition of 1631. Another Latin version, by Felicianus, of the Commentaries on the Acts and the Catholic Epistles, was published, 8vo. Basel, 1552, and Venice, 1556; and one by Maximus Florentinus of the Commentary on the Epistles of Paul, 2 vols. 8vo. Basel, 1553. The Commentary on the Apocalypse has been lately published with a Catena in Catholicos Epistolos, and another Commentary on the Apocalypse, compiled from those of Andrea and Arethas of Caesarea, and of Oecumenius, by J. A. Cramer, 8vo. Oxford, 1840. The preeminent of this commentary of Oecu- menius on the Apocalypse had been previously published by Montfaucon (Biblioth. Coislin. p. 277) with a Latin version. The title of Oecu- menius to the authorship of the Commentaries on the Acts and the Epistles is doubted by Possesino on the authority of Fronto Ducaeus, who regarded Oecumenius simply as one of the writers from whom the work had been compiled; but Hentenius has shown good reason for believing him to be the author. Sixtus Senensis speaks of a Commentary of Oecumenius on the Pentateuch; but nothing is known of such a work: Sixtus refers to some no- tice of it by Oecumenius himself in his Commentary on the Hebrews. Oecumenius has the reputation of a judicious commentator, careful in compilation, modest in offering his own judgment, and neat in expression. (Hentenius, Proleg. ad Oecumen. OEDIPUS.

OEDIPUS (Olvius), the son of Laius and Iocaste of Thebes. The tragic fate of this hero is more celebrated than that of any other legendary personage on account of the frequent use which the tragic poets have made of it in their handwritings; also underwent various changes and embellishments; but the common story is as follows. Laius, a son of Labdacus, was king of Thebes, and husband of Iocaste, a daughter of Meneceus (or Creon, Dion. iv. 64), and sister of Creon. As Laius had no issue, he consulted the oracle, which informed him that if a son should be born to him he would lose his life by the hand of his own child. When, therefore, at length Iocaste gave birth to a son, they pierced his feet, bound them together, and then exposed the child on Mount Cithaeron. There he was found by a shepherd of king Polybus of Corinth, and he was called from his swollen feet Oedipus. When he was brought to the palace, the king and his wife Merope (or Periboea, Apollod. iii. 5. § 7) brought him up as their own child. Once, however, Oedipus was taunted by a Corinthian with not being the king's son, whereupon he himself went to Delphi to consult the oracle. The answer he there obtained was that he should slay his father and commit incest with his own mother. Thinking that Polybus was his father, he resolved not to return to Corinth; but on his road between Delphi and Daulis he met his real father Laius, and as Polyphontes (or Polyphetes, or Polypoetes, Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 39), the charioteer of Laius, wanted to push him out of the way, a scuffle ensued in which Oedipus slew both Laius and Polyphontes, and one part of the oracle was fulfilled. The two corpses are said to have been buried on the same spot by Damasistratus, king of Ptolemae (Apollod. iii. 5. § 8; Paus. x. 5. § 2). In the mean time the celebrated Sphinx had appeared in the neighbourhood of Thebes. She had settled on a rock, and put a riddle to every Theban that passed by, and whoever was unable to solve it was killed by the monster. This calamity induced the Thebans to make known that whoever should deliver the country of it should be made king, and receive Iocaste as his wife. Oedipus was one of those that came forward, and when he approached the Sphinx she gave the riddle as follows: "A being with four feet has two feet and three feet, and only one voice; but its feet vary, and when it has most it is weakest." Oedipus solved the riddle by saying that it was man, and the Sphinx thereupon threw herself from the rock. Oedipus now obtained the kingdom of Thebes, and married his mother, by whom he became the father of Eteocles, Polynices, Antigone, and Ismene. In consequence of this incestuous alliance of which no one was aware, the country of Thebes was visited by a plague, and the oracle ordered that the murderer of Laius should be expelled. Oedipus accordingly pronounced a solemn curse upon the unknown murderer, and declared him an exile; but when he endeavoured to discover him, he was informed by the seer Teiresias that he himself was both the parricide and the husband of his mother. Iocaste now hung herself, and Oedipus put out his own eyes (Apollod. iii. 5. § 8; Soph. Oed. Tym. 447.713.731.774, &c.). From this point traditions again differ, for according to some, Oedipus in his blindness was expelled from Thebes by his sons and brother-in-law, Creon, who undertook the government, and he was guided and accompanied by Antigone in his exile to Attica; but according to others he was imprisoned by his sons at Thebes, in order that his disgrace might remain concealed from the eyes of the world. The father now cursed his son, and Oedipus alternately, but became involved in a dispute, in consequence of which they fought in single combat, and slew each other. Hereupon Creon succeeded to the throne, and expelled Oedipus. After long wanderings Oedipus arrived in the grove of the Eumenides, near Colonus, in Attica; he was there honoured by Theseus in his misfortunes, and, according to an oracle, the Eumenides removed him from the earth, and no one was allowed to approach his tomb (Soph. Oed. Col. 1661, &c.; Eurip. Phoen. init.; Apollod. iii. 5. § 8; Diod. iv. 64; Hygin. Fab. 67). According to Homer, Oedipus, tormented by the Erinyes of his mother, continued to reign at Thebes after her death; he fell in battle, and was honoured at Thebes with funeral solemnities (Od. xi. 270, &c., II. xxiii. 679). Some traditions mention Euryganeia as the mother of the four children of Oedipus above-mentioned (Paus. ix. 5. § 8; Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 63), and previous to his connection with her, he is said to have been the father of Phрастor and Laonuptus by Iocaste, and to have in the end married Astymedusa, a daughter of Sthenelus (Schol. ad Eurip. l. c.). Oedipus himself is sometimes called a son of Laius by Eurydice, and is said to have been thrown in a chest into the sea when yet an infant, to have been carried by the waves to the coast of Sicyon, to have been received by Polybus, and afterwards to have been blinded by him (Schol. ad Eur. Phoen. 13, 26). His tomb was shown at Athens, where he also had an heroum. (Paus. i. 23. § 7, 30, in fin.) [L. S.]

OENANTHE (Olavdav), mother of Agathocles, the infamous minister of Ptolemy Philopator, and Agathoclea, his equally infamous mistress. Oenanthé seems to have introduced her children to the king, and through them she possessed, until his death, the greatest influence in the government. When, after the accession of the young Epiphanes, the people rose up against Agathoclea and her party, Oenanthé fled for refuge to the Thesmophorion (the temple of Demeter and Persephone), and here she implored the aid of the goddesses with superstitious entreaties, and drove away with threats and curses some noble ladies who had come to console her. On the next day she was dragged from the altar, and, having been brought naked on horseback into the stadium, was delivered up, with the rest of the family of Agathocles, to the fury of the multitude, by whom they were torn in pieces. (Polyb. xiv. 11, xv. 29, 33; Plut. Cest. 33; Just. xxx. 2; Athen. vi. p. 251, e.) [E. E.]

OENEUS (Oevus). 1. One of the sons of Aegeus. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 8.)

2. A son of Pandion, and one of the eponymous heroes at Athens. (Paus. i. 5. § 2.)

3. A son of Portheus, brother of Agris and Mela, and husband of Alcмен, by whom he became the father of Tydeus and Meleager, and was thus the grandfather of Diomedes. He was king of Pleuron and Calydon in Aetolia (Hom. Il. v. 813, ix. 543, xiv. 115, &c.). According to the tragic poets he was a son of Porthaon and Euryte, and besides the two brothers mentioned above, Alca-thous, Laocoon, Leucopeira, and Sterope, are likewise called his brothers and sister (Apollod. i. 7. § 10; Apollon. Rhod. i. 192; Hygin. Fab. 14). His children are said to have been Teuses, whom he himself killed, Thyeus (Pheres), Clymenus, Periphas, Agelaus, Meleager, Gorgo, Eurymede, Melanippe, Mothone, and Deianeira (Apollod. i. 8. § 1; Paus. iv. 35. § 1; Anton. Lib. 2). His second wife was Melanippe, the daughter of Hippounous, and by her he is said to have become the father of Tydeus, who according to others was his son by his own daughter Gorgo (Apollod. i. 8. § 4, &c.; Diod. iv. 35; comp. Tydeus). He is said to have been deprived of his kingdom by the sons of Agrius, who imprisoned him and ill used him. But he was subsequently avenged by Diomedes, who slew Agrius and his sons, and restored the kingdom either to Oeneus himself, or to his son-in-law Andraemon, as Oeneus was too old. Diomedes took his grandfather with him to Peloponnesus, but some of the sons who lay in ambush, slew the old man, near the altar of Telephus in Arcadia. Diomedes buried his body at Argos, and named the town of Oenoe after him (Apollod. i. 8. § 5, &c.; Anton. Lib. 37; Diod. iv. 65). According to others Oeneus lived to a very old age with Diomedes at Argos, and died a natural death (Paus. ii. 25. § 2). Homer knows nothing of all this; he merely relates that Oeneus once neglected to sacrifice to Artemis, in consequence of which she sent a monstrous bear into the territory of Calydon, which was hunted by Meleager (II. ix. 532, &c.). The hero Bellerophon was hospitably received by him, and received a costly girdle as a present from him (vi. 216, &c.). At the time of the Trojan war the race of Oeneus had become extinct, and hence Those, the son of Andraemon, the son-in-law of Oeneus, led the Aetolians against Troy (ii. 638, &c.). [L.S.]

OENIAS, a Greek painter, of whom nothing more is known than that he painted a family group, synagenion. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 11. s. 40. § 31.) [D.S.]

OENOATIS (Ονοατής), a surname of Artemis, who was worshipped at Oenoe in Arcolis. (Euryp. Hec. For. 574.) [L.S.]

O'NOE (Ονόη). 1. The name given by Antoninus Liberalis (16) to a person commonly called Genna. [Gerana].

2. A sister of Epocus, from which the Attic demus of Oenoe was believed to have derived its name. (Paus. i. 33, in fin.)

3. An Arcadian nymph, who is said to have been one of those that brought up the infant Zeus. (Paus. viii. 47. § 2.) [L.S.]

OENOMARCHUS (Ονομαρχος), of Andros, one of the numerous pupils of Herodice Atticus, did not possess any great athlete, and was fond of the florid style of eloquence, which received the name of the Ionic or Asiatic. (Philost. Vii. Soph. ii. 18.)

OENOMAUS (Ονόμαος), a son of Ares and Harpina, the daughter of Asopus, and husband of the Pleiad Sterope, by whom he became the father of Hippodameia, was king of Pisa in Elis (Apollod. iii. 10. § 1; Paus. v. 10. § 22, 22. § 5, vi. 21. § 6). According to others he was a son of Ares and Sterope (Schol. ad Hom. Il. xviii. 486; Hygin. Fab. 84, 159), or a son of Alaxon (Paus. v. i. 5, §) or of Hypercucus and Sterope (Tzetza. ad Lyc. 149). An oracle had declared that he should die if his daughter should marry, and he therefore made it a condition that those who came forward as suitors for Hippodameia's hand should contend with himself in the chariot-race, and he who conquered should receive her, whereas those that were conquered should suffer death. The race-course extended from Pisa to the altar of Poseidon, on the Corinthian isthmus. At the moment when a suitor started with Hippodameia, Oenomaus sacrificed a ram to Zeus at Pisa, and then armed himself and hastened with his swift chariot and four horses, guided by himself, after the suitor. He thus overtook many a lover, whom he put to death, until Pelops, the son of Tantalus, came to Pisa. Pelops bribed Mytilus, and using the horses which he had received from Poseidon, he succeeded in reaching the goal before Oenomaus, who in despair made away with himself. Thus Pelops obtained Hippodameia and the kingdom of Pisa (Diod. iv. 73; Hygin. Fab. 84; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 732, ad Pind. Ol. i. 114; Ov. 1b. 365, &c.). There are some variations in this story, as e. g. that Oenomaus was himself in love with his daughter, and for this reason slew her lovers (Tzetza. ad Lyc. 156; Hygin. Fab. 232). Mytilus also is said to have loved her, and as she wished to possess Pelops, she persuaded Mytilus to take the nails out of the wheels of her father's chariot; and as Oenomaus was breathing his last he pronounced a curse upon Mytilus, and this curse had its desired effect, for as Pelops refused to give to Mytilus the reward he had promised, or as Mytilus had attempted to dishonour Hippodameia, Pelops thrust him down from Cape Gænæus. But Mytilus, while dying, likewise pronounced a curse upon the house of Pelops, which was afterwards the cause of the fatal occurrences in the life of Atreus and Thyestes (Tzetza. ad Lyc. 156). All the suitors that had been killed by Oenomaus, were buried in one common tomb (Paus. vi. 21. § 6, &c.). The tomb of Oenomaus himself was shown on the river Cladeus in Elis (vi. 21. § 3). His house was destroyed by lightning, and only one pillar of it remained standing (v. 20. § 3, 14. § 8; comp. v. 17. § 4, 10. § 2; Soph. Elect. 504, &c.; Voëcker, Mythol. des Oepelìk. Or. p. 361). [L. S.]

OENOMAUS (Ονόμαος), of Gadara, a cynic philosopher, who flourished in the reign of Hadrian, or somewhat later, but before Porphyry. (Synecell. p. 349, b.; Suid. s. e.) He was one of those later cynics whose philosophy consisted not so much in any definite system of doctrine, as in a free and unrestrained tone of thought and life. Thus the emperor Julian charges him with sensuality and profaneness; and his sarcasms upon the old cynic doctrines have led some to suppose, but without reason, that he belonged to some other sect. (Julian, Orat. vi. p. 199, vii. p. 209, ed. Spanheim.) Suidas mentions, as his works, Πέραν Κυνάδων, Πελοτα, Πέλ τις καθ 'Οκταρνον Φιλοσοφια, Πελοτα, Πέλ τις καθ 'Οκταρνον Φιλοσοφια, Πελοτα, Πέλ τις καθ 'Οκταρνον Φιλοσοφια, Πελοτα, Πέλ τις καθ 'Οκταρνον Φιλοσοφια. This list, however, does not include the work which is best known to us, namely, his exposure of the oracles, which is sometimes entitled Κατα των χρηστηρίων, but the proper title seems to have been Γονητων Φωάδ, i. e. Αειθολος Πραστηγιτώματος. Considerable extracts from this work are preserved

OENOPIDES (Oinoiphés), a distinguished astronomer and mathematician, a native of Chios.
Plato (Eratosth. c. 1) mentions him in conjunction with Anaxagoras, from which it has been concluded that he was a contemporary of the latter. It may have been so, but there is nothing else to confirm the conjecture. He is spoken of in connection with Pythagoras and his followers, so that he seems to have been regarded as a Pythagorean. Oenopides derived most of his astronomical knowledge from the priests and astronomers of Egypt, with whom he lived for some time. Diodorus (i. 98) mentions in particular that he derived from this source his knowledge of the obliquity of the ecliptic, the discovery of which he is said to have claimed (in the treatise de Plac. Phil. ii. 12, ascribed to Plutarch, Aelian (V. H. x. 7) attributes to Oenopides the invention of the cycle of fifty-nine years for bringing the lunar and solar years into accordance,
of which Censorinus (c. 19) makes Philolaus to have been the originator. The length of the solar year was fixed by Oenopides at 365 days, and somewhat less than nine hours. (As Censorinus expresses it, the fifty-ninth part of twenty-two days.) Oenopides set up at Olympia a brazen tablet containing an explanation of his cycle. He had a notion that the milky-way was the original path of the sun, from which he had been frightened into his present path by the spectacle of the banquet of Thystes. (Achilles Tatius, Isag. in Aret. c. 24.) Proclus, in his commentary on Euclid, attributes to Oenopides the discovery of the twelfth and twenty-third propositions of the first book of Euclid, and the quadrature of the meniscus. Oenopides is also mentioned more than once by Sextus Empiricus, (Hypot. iii. 4, adv. Math. p. 367.) He had a theory of his own about the rise of the Nile, which was this, that in the summer the waters beneath the earth are cold, in the winter warm; a fact which he said was proved by the temperature of deep wells. So that in the winter the heat shut up in the earth carries off the greater part of the moisture, while there are no rains in Egypt. In the summer, on the contrary, the moisture is no longer carried off in that way, so that there is enough to fill the bed of the Nile and cause it to overflow. Diodorus
(i. 41) objects to that theory, that other rivers of Libya, which correspond in position and direction to the Nile, are not so affected. (Fabric. Bibl.
Graec. vol. i. p. 860; Ideler, Handbuch der Chrono-tologie, vol. i. p. 302, [C. P. M.]

OENÖPION (Ooonion), a son of Dionysus and husband of the nymph Helice, by whom he became the father of Thalus, Euanthes, Melas, Salagus, Athamas, and Merope, Aepore or Haero (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iii. 996; Paus. viii. 4. § 6; Parthen. Eroth. 20). Some writers call Oeno-pi a son of Rhadamantys by Ariadne, and a brother of Staphylus (Plut. Theb. 20); and Servius (Ad Aen. i. 559; comp. x. 763) also calls him the father of Orion. From Crete he emigrated with his sons to Chios, which Rhadamantys had assigned to him as his habitation (Paus. vii. 4. § 6; Diod. v. 79). While he was king of Chios, he received a visit from the giant Orion, who for a long time sued for the hand of Merope. Once Orion being intoxicated violated Merope, in consequence of which Oenopion blinded him and expelled him from his island. Orion, however, went to Lemnos, where Hephaestus gave him to Cedalion as a guide, or according to others stole a boy whom he carried on his shoulders, and who told him the roads. Orion was afterwards cured of his blindness, and returned to Chios to take vengeance on Oenopion. But the latter was not to be found in Chios, for his friends had concealed him in the earth, so that Orion, unable to discover him, went to Crete (Apollod. i. 4. § 3; Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii.
34; Eustath. Catast. 32; Eustath. ad Hom. in 1623). The tomb of Oenopion continued to be shown at Chios even in the days of Pausanias (vii.
5. § 6; comp. Orion; Völcker, Mythol. des Japet.
Genoth. p. 112, &c.).

OENÖTROPAE (Ooortonp), that is, the changers of or into wine, was the name of the three or four daughters of king Anius in Delos, because they had received from Dionysus the power of changing water into wine, and any thing else they chose into corn and olives (Tzetza. ad Lyce. 759).
When Agamemnon heard this, he wanted to carry them off by force from their father, that they might provide for the army of the Greeks at Troy; but they implored Dionysus for assistance, and were accordingly metamorphosed into doves. (Ov. Met.
xii. 649; Serv. ad Aen. iii. 80.)

OENO’TRUS (Oonetup), the youngest son of Lycaon who emigrated with a colony from Arcadia to Italy, and called the district in which he settled, after himself, Oenotria (Paus. viii. 3.
§ 2; Virg. Aen. i. 532, iii. 152, vii. 85; Strab. vi.
p. 253, &c.). According to Varro, he was a king of the Sabines, and not a Pelasgian, and his brother was called Italus (Serv. ad Aen. i. 536). According to Dionysus (i. 11, &c. i. 1), Oenotrus was accompanied by his brother Peucetius, and landed in the bay of Ausonia. (O.L.

OEOBAZUS (Ooebazus). 1. A Persian, who, when Dareus Hystaspis was on the point of marching from Susa on his Scythian expedition, besought him to leave behind with him one of his three sons, all of whom were serving in the army. Dareus promised that, and if Oeoazus was a friend and preferred some moderator was asked, he would leave him all three. He then ordered them all to be put to death. (Her. iv. 48; comp. vii. 39, 39; Senee. de Iro., iii. 16, 17.)

2. Father of Siromites, who led the Parianians in the Greek expedition of Xerxes. (Her. vii. 68.)

3. A noble Persian, who, when the Greek fleet arrived in the Hellespont after the battle of Mycale (n. c. 479), fled from Carthia to Sestus, as the place of all most strongly fortified. Sestus was besieged by the Athenians under Xanthippus, and, on the famine becoming unendurable, Oebazus, with most of the Persians, made his escape from the town; but he fell into the hands of the Apsinthian Thracians, and was sacrificed by them to Pleistoeus, one of their gods (Her. ix. 115, 118, 119). [E.E.]

OECLUS (Οηκλος), a son of Poseidon by Asca, who in conjunction with the Aleandos, is said to have built the town of Asca in Boeotia. (Paus. ix. 29 § 1.)

OEOLYKOS (Οηκλωκος), a son of Theras of Sparta, and brother of Aegeus, wasHonoured at Sparta with an heroum. (Herod. iv. 149; Paus. iii. 15 § 6.) [L.S.]

OEONUS (Οηκωνος), a son of Licymnius of Midea in Argolis, was the first victor at Olympia, in the foot-race. (Pind. Ol. xi. 76, ã.; Apollod. ii. 7 § 3; Paus. iii. 15 § 3.) He is said to have been killed at Sparta by the sons of Hippocoon, but was avenged by Heracles, whose kinsman he was, and was honoured with a monument near the temple of Heraclis. (Paus. l. c.) [L.S.]

OESALCES, brother of Galan, king of the Numidian tribe of the Massilians, whom he succeeded on the throne, according to the Numidian law of inheritance. He was at the time of very advanced age, when the conjecture of Bentley is now confirmed by manuscript authorities.

OFELLA, Q. LUCRETIUS, originally belonged to the Marian party, but deserted to Sulla; and although he had not hitherto distinguished himself in any way (Dion Cass. xxxiv. Fragm. 134), Sulla appointed him to the command of the army employed in the blockade of Praeneste, where the younger Marius had taken refuge in B.c. 82. Praeneste was obliged to surrender in the course of the year, and the younger Marius put an end to his own life. Relying on these services, Ofella became a candidate for the consulship in the following year, although he had not yet been either quaestor or praetor, thus acting in defiance of Sulla's law De Magistratibus. Sulla at first attempted to dissuade him from becoming a candidate; but as he persisted in his purpose, and entered the forum supported by a large party, Sulla sent a centurion to kill him in the middle of the forum, and informed the people that he had commanded the execution of Ofella, because he refused to obey his commands. After saying this, Sulla told them the following tale, which is preserved by Appian:—"The lice were very troublesome to a countryman, as he was ploughing. Twice he stopped his ploughing, and purged his jacket. But he was still bitten; and in order that he might not be hindered in his work, he burnt the jacket. And I advise those who have been twice humbled not to make fire necessary the third time." (Appian, B. C. i. 88, 94, 101; Plint. Sull. 29, 33; Liv. Epit. 88, 89; Vell. Pat. ii. 27, who erroneously says that Ofella had been praetor.) The name of the centurion that put Ofella to death was L. Bellius. He was afterwards brought to trial for this murder by Julius Caesar and condemned. (Ascon. in Top. Cand. p. 92, ed. Orelli; Dion Cass. xxxvii. 10.) The orator, who is characterised by Cicero (Brut. 48) as continitus aptior quam judicem, is probably the same as the subject of this article, though the name in Cicero is corrupt.

OFELLUS. [OFELLA.]

OFILIUS or OFELLIUS. The name occurs in inscriptions in both forms; but in writers we generally find Ofilius.

1. OFILIUS CALAVIUS, a Campanian in the time of the Samnite wars. [Calavius, No. 3.]
2. OFILIUS (Οηκηλιος), as he is called by Appian (B. C. v. 128), a tribune of the soldiers in the army of Octavian, b.c. 38.
3. M. OFILIUS HILARUS, whose painless death is recorded at length by Pliny. (H. N. viii. 53, 54.)

4. OFELLIUS (Οηκηλλιος), a philosopher mentioned by Arrian (Epict. iii. 22 § 27).

OFULIUS, A., a Roman jurist, is named by Pomponius (Dig. 1. tit. 2. s. 2. § 44) gaining Aulus Ofilius, but the praenomen Gaius appears to be some blunder of a copyist. Ofilius was one of the pupils of Servius Sulpicius, and the master of Tubero, Capito and Labo. He was a friend of Cicero, who, on one occasion, cites his opinion as opposed to that of Trebatius (ad Fam. vii. 21, ad Att. xiii. 37). He was also a friend of the Dictator Caesar. Ofilius belonged to the equestrian order, but he obtained a high reputation for legal knowledge. "He wrote," says Pomponius (Dig. 1. tit. 2. s. 2. § 44), "many treatises on the Jus Civile," among which De Legibus seniorum (magistrorum), and De Jurisdictione. The fifth book of his Jus Partitum is cited (Dig. 82, s. 55), and the sixteenth book of a work on actions (33. 9. s. 3. §§ 5, 8), and a treatise addressed to Atticus (50. tit. 16. s. 234. § 2), who is probably T. Pomponius Atticus. Ofilius is often cited in the Digest. "Ofilius," says Pomponius, "edictum praetoris primus diligenter composuit," which probably means an arrangement of the edictal law, like the later work of Julian, or it might be a commentary upon it. Caesar had conceived a design of arranging the Jus Civile, to which his connection with Ofilius may have contributed. (Zimmerm. Geschichte des Röm. Privatrechts; Puchta. Cursus, loc. vol. i. p. 427; Grotius, Vit. Jurisconsulti. [G.L.]) OGO/A (Ογοα), the Carian name of Zeus at Mycala, in whose temple a sea-wave was seen from time to time. (Paus. viii. 10. § 3.) Strabo (xiv. p. 659) calls the god of Mycala, in the Carian dialect, Osogo.

OGULNIA GENS, plebeian, is most known through one of its members being the proposer of the law, which opened the two great ecclesiastical corporations to the plebeians. The first and only person in this gens who obtained the consulship is Q. Ogulnius Gallius, who was consul b.c. 269. Gallius is the only cognomen of the Ogulni: the others, who have no surname, are given below.

OGYGUS.

The annexed coin belongs to this gens, but by whom it was struck is uncertain. The names on the obverse, Q. OGVL. CAR. VER., are those of triumvirs of the mint, and are probably abbreviations of Q. Ognulius, Carullius, and Verginius or Virgilius.

COIN OF OGLNIA GENS.

OGULNIUS. 1, 2. Q. and Cn. Ognulni, tribunes of the plebs, B.C. 300, proposed and carried a law by which the number of the pontiffs was increased from four to eight, and that of the augurs from four to nine, and which enacted that four of the pontiffs and five of the augurs should be taken from the plebs. (Liv. x. 6—9.) Besides these eight pontiffs there was the pontifex maximus, who is generally not included when the number of pontiffs is spoken of. The pontifex maximus continued to be a patrician down to B.C. 254, when Tit. Corancenius was the first plebeian who was invested with this dignity.

In B.C. 296 Q. and Cn. Ognulni were carule aediles. They prosecuted several persons for violating the usury laws; and with the money accruing from the fines inflicted in consequence they executed many public works (Liv. x. 23). The name of Cn. Ognulni does not occur again after this year.

In B.C. 294 Q. Ognulni was sent at the head of an embassy to Epidaurus, in order to fetch Aesculapius to Rome, that the plague might be stayed which had been raging in the city for more than two years. The legend relates that, upon the arrival of the ambassadors at Epidaurus, the god in the form of a gigantic serpent issued from the sanctuary, and settled in the cabin of Q. Ognulni. (Val. Max. i. 8 § 2 ; Aur. Vict. de Vir. Ill. 22 ; Liv. Epit. 11 ; Oros. iii. 22 ; Or. Met. xvi. 622, &c.) In B.C. 275 Q. Ognulni was again employed on an embassy, being one of the three ambassadors sent by the senate to Podemey Philadelphiaus, who had sought the friendship and alliance of the Romans in consequence of their conquest of Pyrrhus. The ambassadors were received with great distinction at the Egyptian court, and loaded with presents. These they were obliged to accept; but the golden crowns which had been given them, they placed on the heads of the king's statues; and the other presents they deposited in the treasury immediately upon their arrival at Rome, but the senate restored them to them. (Val. Max. iv. 3, § 9 ; Justin. xviii. 3 ; Dion Cass. Fragm. 147, with the note of Fabricius.)

3. M. Ognulni was sent into Etruria with P. Aquilius in B.C. 219, in order to purchase corn to be sent to Tarentum. (Liv. xxvii. 3.)

4. M. Ognulni, tribune of the soldiers in the second legion, fell in battle against the Boii, B.C. 196. (Liv. xxviii. 36.)

OGY'GUS or OGY'GES (2γύγης), is sometimes called a Boeotian autocrat, and sometimes a son of Boeotus, and king of the Hectenes, and the first ruler of the territory of Thebes, which was called after him Ogygia. In his reign the waters of lake Copais rose above its banks, and inundated the whole valley of Boeotia. This flood is usually called after him the Ogygian. (Paus. ix. 5, § 1 ; Apollon. Rhod. iii. 1177 ; Serv. ad Verg. Aen. vi. 41.) The name of Ogyges is also connected with Attic story, for in Attica too an Ogygian flood is mentioned, and he is described as the father of the Attic hero Eleans. He was the father of Daeia, the daughter of Oceanus. (Paus. i. 38. § 7.) In the Boeotian tradition he was the father of Alalcomenias, Thelkinoe and Aulis (Suid. s. v. Παραδίκη ; Paus. ix. 33. § 4.) Polybius (iv. 1) and Strabo (viii. 384) call Ogyges the last king of Achaia, and some traditions even described him as an Egyptian king. (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 1206.)

OICLES or OICLEUS (Οϊκήλης, Οϊκελός), a son of Antiphates, grandson of Melampus and father of Amaryan, of Argos. (Hom. Od. xv. 241, &c.) Diodorus (iv. 32) on the other hand, calls him a son of Amaryan, and Pausanias (vi. 17. § 4), a son of Mantius, the brother of Antiphates. Oicles accompanied Hercules on his expedition against Laomedon of Troy, and was there slain in battle. (Apollod. ii. 6. § 4 ; Diod. iv. 92.) According to other traditions he returned from that expedition and settled in Arcadia, where he was visited by his grandson Alcaeus, and where in later times his tomb was shown. (Apollod. iii. 7. § 5 ; Paus. viii. 36. § 4.)

OILEUS (ΟΪλέως). 1. A Trojan, charioteer of Bianor, was slain by Agamemnon. (Hom. Il. xi. 93.)

2. A son of Hodeodocus and Laomone, grandson of Cynus, and great-grandson of Opus, was a king of the Locrians, and married to Eriopis, by whom he became the father of Ajax, who is hence called Olyfides or Olyiades. Oileus was also the father of Medon by Rhene. (Hom. Il. ii. 527, 728, xiii. 697, 712 ; Propert. iv. 1. 117.) He is also mentioned among the Argonauts. (Apollod. v. 10. § 8 ; Apollon. Rhod. i. 74 ; Orph. Argen. 191.)

O'LIBADES (ΟΛΙΦάδης), the painter of a picture in the senate-house of the Five Hundred, in the Cenaeicum, at Athens, representing Calipus, the commander of the army which repulsed the invading Gauls under Brennus, at Thermopylae, B.C. 279. (Paus. i. 3. § 4. s. 5.)

OLEN (Ολήν), a mythical personage, who is represented as the earliest Greek lyric poet, and the first author of sacred hymns in hexameter verse. He is closely connected with the worship of Apollo, of whom, in one legend, he was made the prophet. His connection with Apollo is also marked by the statement of the Delphian poetess Boco, who represents him as a Hyperborcean, and one of the establishments of oracles; but the more common story made him a native of Lycia. In either case, his coming from the extreme part of the Pelagian world to Delos intimates the distant origin of the Ionian worship of Apollo, to which, and not to the Dorian, Olen properly belongs. His name, according to Welcker (Euripus und Komedien, p. 35), signifies simply the flute-player. Of the ancient hymns, which went under his name, Pausanias mentions those to Here, to Achaena, and to Elleithyia; the last was in celebration of the birth of Apollo and Artemis. (Herod. iv. 35 ; Paus. i. 18. § 5, ii. 13. § 3, v. 7. § 8, ix. 27. § 2, x. 7. § 8; Callim. Hymn. in Del.}
OLOPHERNES.

OLENNIUS, one of the chief centurions (e primipilarius), was placed about A. D. 28 over the Frisii, whom Drusus had subdued. (Tac. Ann. iv. 72.)

O'LENIUS. (Δανεις.) 1. A son of Hephaestus, and father of the nymphs Aege and Helice, who brought up Zeus, and from whom the town of Olenus in Aetolia was believed to have derived its name. (Hygin. Post. Astr. 13; Steph. Byz. s. v.)

3. A person living on Mount Ida, who was supposed to take upon himself the punishment which his wife had deserved by her pride of her beauty, and was metamorphosed along with her into stone, (Ov. Met. x. 68, &c.) [L. S.]

T. O'LILIUS, the father of Poppaea Sabina, was put to death at the latter end of the reign of Tiberius on account of his intimacy with Sejanus. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 45.)

OLOPHERNES or OROPHENES (Ολοφέρνης, Ορόφερνης, Ορόφερνης). 1. Son of Ariannes I., brother of Ariarathes I., and father of Ariarathes II., kings of Cappadocia. He was much beloved by his brother, who advanced him to the highest posts, and sent him to aid Artaxerxes III. (Ochus) in his subjugation of Egypt, B. C. 350. From this expedition Olophernes returned home, loaded by the Persian king with great rewards for his services, and died in his native land. His brother Ariarathes I. called his eldest son of the same name. He left also a younger son, named Aryses or Aryss. (Diod. Ecl. 3; Phot. Bibl. 244.)

2. One of the two supposititious sons whom Antiochus I. at first imposed upon her husband, Ariarathes IV., king of Cappadocia. On the birth, however, of a real son, named Mithridates (afterwards Ariarathes V.), Olophernes, that he might not set up pretensions to the throne, was sent away into Ionia, where he does not appear to have improved his morals. When Ariarathes V. refused to marry the sister of Demetrius Soter, the latter supported the claims of Olophernes to the crown of Cappadocia. Olophernes, however, entered into a conspiracy with the people of Antioch to dethrone Demetrius, who, having discovered the design, threw him into chains, but spared his life that he might still keep Ariarathes in alarm with his pretensions. In B. C. 157, when Ariarathes had been deposed, and had fled to Rome, Olophernes sent thither two unscrupulous ambassadors (Timothoeus and Digenes) to join the emissaries of Demetrius in opposing his (so called) brother. According to Appian the Romans decided that the two claimants should share the throne between them. We are told, however, that Olophernes did not hold the kingdom long, and that his reign was signalized by a departure from the more simple customs of his ancestors, and by the introduction of systematic debauchery, like that of the Ionians. To supply his lavish extravagance, he oppressed and pillaged his subjects, putting many to death, and confiscating their property. Four hundred talents he deposited with the citizens of Priene, as a resource in case of a reverse of fortune, and these they afterwards restored to him. We read also that, when his affairs were on the decline, and he became alarmed lest his soldiers should mutiny, if their arrears remained unpaid, he plundered a very ancient temple of Zeus, to which great sanctity was attached, to enable him to satisfy their demands. (Diod. Ecl. 3, Exe. de Virt. et Vit. p. 588, &c.; Phot. l. c.; Polyb. xxxii. 20; App. Syr. 47; Liv. Epit. xlvi.; Just. xxxv. 1; Athen. x. p. 440, b; Dalechamp and Casaub. ad loc.; Ael. V. H. ii. 41; see above, Vol. I. p. 284.) [E. E.]

O'LORUS or O'ROLUS (Ολορούς, Ορόλος). 1. A King of Thrace, whose daughter Hegepsiyya, was married to Miltiades (Herod. vi. 39, 41; Marcellin. Vit. Thuc.)

2. Apparently grandson of the above, and son of Hegepsiyya, was probably the offspring of a second marriage contracted by her after the death of Miltiades. This Olorus was the father of Thucydides, the historian (Thuc. iv. 104; Marcellin. Vit. Thuc.; Suidas, s. v. Δρυκάνδης). [E. E.]

OLTHACUS (Ολθακός), a chief of the Scythian tribe of the Dandarians, who served in the army of Mithridates the Great, and enjoyed a high place in the favour of that prince, but subsequently deserted to the Romans. This was, however, according to Plutarch, a mere feint, for the purpose of obtaining access to Lucullus, and thus effecting his assassination; but being accidentally foiled in this project, he again returned to the camp of Mithridates. (Plut. Lucull. 16.) Appian, who also relates the same story (Mithr. 79), writes the name Olohas. [E. H. B.]

OLYBRIUS, ANICIUS (Ολυβρίος), Roman emperor in A. D. 472, was a descendant of the ancient and noble family of the Anicians. Down to his time Rome was settled in the elderly and powerful hands of Genserici and the accession of Avitus, and went to Constantinople. In 464, he was made consul; and in the same year, or some time previously, married Placidia, the daughter of the emperor Valentinian III., the same princess who had been a captive of Genserici. It appears that Olybrius stood on very intimate terms with that king of the Vandals, who was active in helping him to the imperial crown of Italy. In 472, during the troubles occasioned by the dissensions between the Western emperor Anemius and the powerful patrician Ricimer, Olybrius was sent to Italy by Zeno under the pretext of assisting Anemius; but his real motive was to seize the supreme power, a scheme in which he was openly assisted by Genserici, and secretly by the emperor Zeno, who, it appears, stood in fear of Olybrius on account of his connections with the king of the Vandals. Instead, therefore, of promoting the interest of Anemius, he entered into negotiations with Ricimer, and ere long he was proclaimed emperor by a strong faction, with the connivance of Ricimer, to whom the imperial power was of more value than the imperial title. Anemius, however, was still in Rome, and enjoyed popularity. When Ricimer came to attack him, Anemius, supported by Gothic auxiliaries under Gelimer, made a stout resistance, till at last the besieger gained the city in consequence of his victory at the bridge of Hadrian. Rome was once more plundered, and Anemius was murdered by order of Ricimer (11th July, 472). Olybrius was now recognised as emperor without any opposition, and could exercise his power free from any control, since immediately after this catastrophe, Ricimer was attacked by a violent distemper which carried him off a few weeks afterwards. The only act of Olybrius during his short reign, which is recorded in history, is the raising of Gundobaldus, the nephew of Ricimer, to the patrician dignity. Olybrius died a natural death, as it appears, on the 23d of October 472, after a short and peaceful reign of three months and thirteen days. He left a daughter, Juliana Anicia, by his wife Placidia. His successor was Glycerius. (Marcellinus Comes, Cassiodorus, Victor, Chronicus; Chron. Alex., Chron. Paschali; Ennodius, Vita Epiph. p. 380; Evagrius, ii. 10; Procop. Vandal. i. 57; Zonar. vol. i. p. 40; Malchus, p. 53; Priscus in Excip. Legat. p. 74; Theophylact, vol. ii. 102, in the Paris ed.; Jornandes, De Reb. Goth. p. 128, ed. Lindenborg.) [W. P.]

Olymnius (Ολυμνίος), a physician of Alexandria, whose date is unknown, the author of a work on Critical Days, to be found in MS. in the king's library at Paris. (See Cramer's Anecd. Graec. Paris. vol. i. p. 394.) [W. A. G.]

Olymniacus, physician. [Ολυμνιακος.]

Olympos (Ολύμπος). 1. Wife of Philip II., king of Macedonia, and mother of Alexander the Great. She was the daughter of Neoptolemus I., king of Epirus, through whom she traced her descent to Pyrrhus, the son of Achilles. (Justin. vii. 6. § 10; Plut. Alex. 2; Dio. xix. 51; Paus. i. 11. § 1; Theopomp. fr. 232, ed. Didot.) Her temper, naturally vehement and passionate, led her to engage with wild enthusiasm in all the mystic rites and orgies of the Orphic and Bacchanalian worship; and it is said that she used to be on one of these occasions that Philip first met her at Samothrace, and became enamoured of her. (Plut. l. c.; Himerius ap. Phot. p. 367, a.) But it was not till some time after the accession of the latter to the throne of Macedonia, B. c. 359, that their nuptials took place. (Justin. l. c.) The marvellous stories circulated at a subsequent period of the circumstances connected with the birth of Alexander, B. c. 356, and which gave rise to, or rather were invented in support of, the idea that the latter was the son of Ammon and not of Philip, are too well known to require further notice. (Plut. Alex. 2, 3; Paus. iv. 14. § 7; Justin. xl. 11, xii. 16; Lucian. Alex. 7; Arr. Anab. iv. 10. § 3.)

Plutarch and Justin absurdly ascribe to these suspicions the estrangement that subsequently arose between Philip and Olympias, for which the numerous amours of the former, and the passionate and jealousy character of the latter are amply sufficient to account. It is certain that the birth of their second child Cleopatra was subsequent to that of Alexander; nor was it until many years after that event that the marriage of Philip with Cleopatra, the niece of Attalus (B. c. 337), led to an open rupture between him and Olympias. The latter took refuge at the court of her brother Alexander, king of Epirus, whom she stimulated to engage in war with Macedonia, at the same time that she continued to foment the intrigues of her son and his partisans at the court of Philip. She appears to have been the prime mover of the scheme for the marriage of Alexander with the daughter of Pixodarus, which gave especial offence to Philip; and it was even generally believed that she lent her countenance and support to the assassination of the king by Pausianias, B. c. 336. It is, however, hardly credible that she evinced her approbation of that deed in the open manner asserted by some writers. (Plut. Alex. 2, 9, 10; Justin. ix. 5, 7 xi. 11; Athen. xiii. p. 557, c.)

After the death of Philip she returned to Macedonia, where she enjoyed the highest consideration and influence through the affection and filial reverence of Alexander; of which she soon after took an unworthy advantage by availing herself of the absence of the young king to put to death her rival Cleopatra, together with her infant daughter; an act of cruelty which excited the vehement indignation of Alexander. (Plut. Alex. 10; Justin. ix. 7; Paus. vii. 7. § 7.) It is, indeed, a remarkable trait in the character of the latter that while he was throughout his life conspicuous for his warm attachment to his mother, he did not allow himself to be blinded to her faults: during his campaigns in Asia he maintained a constant correspondence with her, and lost no opportunity of showing her respect and attention; but her frequent complaints and representations against his personal friends, especially Herhaesten, remained unheeded, and he strictly forbade her to interfere in political affairs, or encroach upon the province of Antipater in the government of Macedonia. In this respect, however, his injunctions were ineffectual: Olympias and Antipater were continually engaged in the bitterest feuds, and their letters to Alexander in Asia were uniformly filled with complaints and recriminations against each other. Whether the representations of Olympias concerning the ambitious character and dangerous designs of the regent had really produced any effect upon the mind of the king, or that he deemed it best to put an end to these bickerings and jealousies by the separation of the parties, it is certain that Craterus had been appointed to succeed Antipater in the regency of Macedonia, while the latter was to conduct an army of fresh levies to Babylon, when the death of Alexander himself (B. c. 323) caused an entire change of arrangements. (Arr. Anab. viii. 12; Plut. Alex. 39, 68; Dio. xxvii. 32, 114, 118; Justin. xii. 14.) By that event Antipater was placed in the undisputed control of affairs in Macedonia and Greece, and Olympias deemed it prudent to withdraw herself beyond the sphere of his power: she accordingly took refuge in Epirus, where she urged her cousin Aeneides to join the league of the Greeks against Antipater. (Paus. l. xi. 7. § 3.) But the Epirotes refused to follow their king, and the victory of Antipater and Craterus over their confederates for a time crushed the hopes of Olympias. Her restless ambition and her bitter hatred of the Macedonian regent soon prompted her to fresh schemes. Leonnatus, in whom she had hoped to raise up a rival to Antipater, had fallen in the Lusitan war (Leonnatus), and she now turned her views towards Perdiccas, to whom she offered the hand of her daughter Cleopatra, in order to withdraw him from his projected union with Nicaea, the daughter of Antipater. (Arrian, ap. Phot. p. 70, a.) Perdiccas, however, did not judge it prudent as yet to break off the proposed alliance, though he secretly determined to marry Cleopatra: but his death in Egypt the following year (B. c. 321), put an end to all hopes from that quarter. Olympias, in consequence, continued to live, as it were, in exile in Epirus until the death of her old enemy Antipater (B. c. 319) presented a new opening to her ambition. Her very name, as the mother of Alexander, still carried much weight with the Macedonians, and her alliance was now eagerly courted by the new regent Polyperchon, who stood in need of her support against Cassander; and he sent her an honourable embassy, imploring her to return to Macedonia, and undertake the charge of the young prince Alexander, the son of Roxann. She, however, followed the advice of Eumenes, that she should remain in Epirus until the fortune of the war was decided, and contented herself with interposing the weight of her name and authority in favour of Polyperchon in Greece, and of Eumenes in Asia. (Diod. xviii. 49, 57, 58, 62, 63.) For a time, indeed, fortune appeared to be unfavourable: the disasters of Polyperchon in Greece, and the alliance concluded by Eurydice with Cassander, gave a decided preponderance to the opposite party. But in n. c. 317, Olympias determined to take a more vigorous part in the contest, and took the field in person, together with Polyperchon, at the head of an army furnished by the king of Epirus. Eurydice met them with equal daring; but when the mother of Alexander appeared on the field, surrounded by a train in bacchanalian style, the Macedonians at once declared in her favour, and Eurydice, abandoned by her own troops, fled to Amphipolis, where she soon after fell into the hands of her implacable rival, and was put to death, together with her unfortunate husband, the puppet king Arrhidæus [Eurydice].

Not content with this unnecessary act of cruelty, Olympias followed up her vengeance by the execution of Nicanor, the brother of Cassander, as well as of an hundred of his leading partisans among the Macedonian nobles, and even wreaked her fury upon the lifeless remains of his brother Iliias. (Diod. xix. 11; Justin, xiv. 5; Athen. xiii. p. 560, f; Paus. i. 11, § 4; Plut. Alex. 77; Ael. P. F. XII. xiii. 35.) But her sanguinary triumph was of short duration: her cruelties alienated the minds of the Macedonians, and Cassander, who was at that time in the Peloponnesse, hastened to raise the siege of Tegana, in which he was engaged, and turn-his arms against Macedonia. Olympias on his approach threw herself (together with Roxana and the young Alexander) into Pydna, where she trusted to be able to hold out until Polyperchon or Aeneides should come to her relief; but Cassander succeeded in cutting off all succours from without, and kept the city closely blockaded both by sea and land throughout the winter. At length in the spring of 316, after suffering the utmost extremities of famine, Olympias was compelled by the increasing discontent of the garrison to surrender to Cassander, stipulating only that her life should be spared. But notwithstanding this promise, the conqueror caused her to be arraigned before the assembly of the Macedonians for her late executions, and condemned to death without being allowed a hearing. Olympias in vain protested against the sentence, and demanded to be heard in her own defence. Cassander feared the effect which her personal appearance might produce, and despatched a body of soldiers to put her to death. Even these men, awed by her daring and majestic carriage, hesitated to fulfil their orders, but the friends of the Macedonians whom she had so lately put to death, rushed in and despatched her with many wounds. She met her fate with a fortitude and dignity worthy of the mother of Alexander. Cassander is said to have denied the rites of sepulture to her remains. (Diod. xix. 35, 36, 49—51; Justin. xiv. 6; Paus. ix. 7, § 2; Polyaen. iv. xi. 3; Aelian. H. N. xii. 6; Euseb. Arm. p. 155.) Of her character it is unnecessary to speak, after the events above related: she was certainly not without something of the grandeur and loftiness of spirit which distinguished her son, but her ungovernable passions led her to acts of sanguinary cruelty that must for ever disgrace her name. Her life was made the subject of a separate biography by Amyntianus, a writer in the reign of M. Aurelius. (Plut. Bibl. p. 97, a.)

2. Daughter of Pyrrhus king of Epirus, and wife of his own brother Alexander II. After his death she assumed the regency of the kingdom on behalf of her two sons, Pyrrhus and Ptolemy; and in order to strengthen herself against the Aetolians gave her daughter Pthia in marriage to Demetrius II. king of Macedonia. By this alliance she secured herself in the possession of the sovereignty, which she continued to administer till her sons were grown up to manhood, when she resigned it into the hands of Pyrrhus. But the deaths of that prince and his brother Ptolemy followed in quick succession, and Olympias herself died of grief for her double loss. (Justin. xxxviiii. 3.) Such is Justin's statement: according to another account Olympias had poisoned a Leucadian damsel named Tigris, to whom her son Pyrrhus was attached, and was herself poisoned by him in revenge. (Athen. xiii. p. 588, f; Heliadip. ap. Plut. p. 330, a.)

3. Daughter of Polyceitus of Larissa, was the wife of Demetrias, a surname the Handsome, by whom she became the mother of Antigonus I. of Macedon, afterwards king of Macedonia. (Euseb. Arm. p. 161.)

OLYMIAS, a female painter, of whom Pliny knew nothing more than that she instructed Auto- bulus. (H. N. xxxvi. 11, s. 40. § 43.)

OLYMPICUS (Ολυμπικός), sometimes called Olympiaceus, but probably incorrectly, a physician of Miletus, who belonged to the sect of the Metho- diæ, though he did not embrace all their doctrines. (Gal. Introd. c. 4, vol. iv. p. 684.) He was the tutor of Apollonius of Cyprus (Galen, De Meth. Med. i. 7, vol. x. p. 54), and therefore lived in the first century after Christ. Galen does not appear to have thought very highly of him, as he calls him "a frivolous (ἀνατυχώτας) person" (Iat. p. 53), and criticizes severely his definition of the words νυκτα and φαντα. (Iat. pp. 54, &c. 67, &c.) [W. A. G.]

OLYMPION (Ολυμπιών), an ambassador sent by Gentius, the Illyrian king to Perses, in B.C. 168. (Polib. xxii. 2, 3; Liv. xiv. 23.) [GENIUS; PERSEUS.]

OLYMPIODORUS RUS (Ολυμπιόδορος), historical. 1. An Athenian, son of Lampion. He commanded a body of 500 picked Athenian troops at the battle of Platea. When the Megarians were being hard pressed by the Persian cavalry before the general engagement, this body of Athenians undertook to relieve them, a service from which all the other Greeks shrank. (Herod. ix. 21; Plut. Aristid. p. 327, a.)

2. An Athenian, against whom a law-suit was brought by his brother-in-law, Callistratus, respecting an inheritance left by a man named Conon. Demosthenes wrote the speech κατὰ Ολυμπιό- δορον for Callistratus on this occasion. The particulars of the dispute are detailed in the speech, to which the reader is referred.

3. An Athenian general and statesman of considerable ability. When Cassander made his attempt upon Athens in B.C. 293, Olympiodorus sailed to Aetolia, and induced the Aetolians to send assistance to Athens; and Cassander was compelled to withdraw his forces. Shortly afterwards, when Elatea, which had been conquered by Cassander, revolted from him, it was mainly through Olympiodorus that it was enabled to hold out against his troops. Subsequently, in B.C. 288, when Demetrius was stripped of his kingdom by Lysimachus and Pyrrhus, a small number of the Athenians, with Olympiodorus at their head, marched to the city of the Macedonian garrison which Demetrius had posted in Athens in the fortress of the Museum after his conquest of the city, and which still remained faithful to him. The Athenians readily joined Olympiodorus and his confederates, and the Museum was carried by storm. Peiraeus and Munychia were also recovered, and Olympiodorus, at the head of a small body of troops which he raised at Eiusu, put to flight a body of troops in the service of Demetrius, who were ravaging the plain. Demetrius invested Athens, but was compelled by the approach of Pyrrhus to raise the siege, and shortly afterwards crossed over to Asia Minor. It was probably this Olympiodorus who was archon eponymus in B.C. 294. There was a statue of him on the Acropolis. (Paus. i. 25, § 2. i. 29, § 13. x. 18, § 7, x. 34. § 8.)

OLYMPIODORUS ('Ολυμπιόδωρος), literary.

1. A writer mentioned by Pliny amongst those who had drawn materials for the 12th book of his Natural History.

2. A disciple of Theophrastus, with whom was deposited one of the copies of his will. (Diog. Laërt. v. 57.)

3. An historical writer, a native of Thebes in Egypt, who lived in the fifth century after Christ. He wrote a work in 22 books, entitled Ιστορικοῖ άλγον, which comprised the history of the Western empire under the reign of Honorius, from A.D. 407 to October, A.D. 425 (Clinton, Fast. Rom. anno 425). Olympiodorus took up the history from about the point at which Eunapius had ended. (EUNAPIUS.)

The original work of Olympiodorus is lost, but an abridgment of it has been preserved by Photius (Cod. 69), who describes the style of the work as being clear, but without force or vigour, loose, and descending to vulgarity, so as not to merit being called a history. Of this Photius thinks that the author himself was proud, and that for this reason he spoke of his work as being not a history, but a collection of materials for a history (διά συγγραφῆς). It was dedicated to the emperor Theodosius II. Olympiodorus seems to have had better qualifications as a statesman than as a writer; and in various missions and embassies amongst barbarian states he rendered important services to the empire, for which the highest honours were conferred upon him by the Roman senate (Photius, Cod. 214, p. 171, ed. Bekker). He was sent by Honorius on an embassy to the Huns, probably to Hungary. After the death of Honorius Olympiodorus removed to Byzantium, to the court of the emperor Theodosius. Hierocles dedicated to this Olympiodorus his work on providence and Ἠγερκλεῖς, the groundwork or idea of which he professes to have derived from him. Photius states that Olympiodorus was a φιλόσοφος, that is, an alchemist. It has been supposed that this statement has arisen from a confusion between this and some other man of the same name. But Photius distinctly makes the statement on the authority of Olympiodorus himself (ἀσ αδρός φιλόσοφος). It appears, from what Photius has preserved of his writings, that he was a heathen.

The abridgment by Photius has been several times published: by Phil. Labbeens, in his Elogie Histor. de Rebus Byzant. ; by Sylburg, in his Collect. Scriptorum Hist. Rom. Minorum; by Andreas Schottus, in his Elogio Historiconum de Rebus Byzantinis; and in conjunction with Dzippus, Eunapius, and other historical fragments, by Niebuhr, Bonn, 1829. (Fabric. Bibli. Graec. vol. x. pp. 632, 703.)

4. A peripatetic philosopher, who taught at Alexandria, where Proclus was one of his pupils and speedily attracted the attention of Olympiodorus, who was so much attached to him that he wished to bestraw his daughters to him. Owing to the rapidity of his utterance and the difficulty of the subjects on which he treated, he was understood very few. When his lectures were concluded, Proclus used to repeat the topics treated of in them for the benefit of those pupils who were slower in catching the meaning of their master. Olympiodorus had the reputation of being an elegant man and a profound thinker. Nothing of his has come down to us in a written form. (Marinus, Vita Procli, c. 9; Suidas, s. v.; Fabric. Bibli. Graec. vol. x. p. 629.)

5. A philosopher of the Platonic school, a contemporary of Isidorus of Pelusium, whom in one of his letters (ii. 256) reproaches him for neglecting the precepts of Plato, and spending an indolent life. (Fabric. Bibli. Graec. vol. iii. p. 180.)

6. The last philosopher of any celebrity in the Neo-Platonic school of Alexandria. He lived in the first half of the sixth century after Christ, in the reign of the emperor Justinian. He was a younger contemporary, and possibly a pupil, of Damascius; the partiality which he uniformly shows for him, and the preference which he gives him even above Proclus, seem to indicate this. Our knowledge of Olympiodorus is derived from those works of his which have come down to us. From a passage in his scholia to the Alcibiades Prior of Plato, Creuzer has acutely inferred that he taught before the Athenian school was finally suppressed by Justinian, that is, before A.D. 539; though the conlications to which the philosophers were being subjected are alluded to. And in various other passages the philosophy of Proclus and Damascius is spoken of as still in existence. From what we have of the productions of Olympiodorus he appears to have been an acute and clear thinker, and, if not strikingly original, far from being a mere copyist, though he follows Damascius pretty closely. He was a man of extensive reading, and a great deal of valuable matter from the lost writings of other philosophers, as Iamblichus, Syrianus, Damascius, and others, with historical and mythological notices, have come down to us through him at second hand. In his sketches of the general plan and object of the dialogues of Plato, and of their dramatic construction and the characters introduced, he exhibited great ability. A great deal that is valuable is also to be found in his analyses of the philosophical expressions of Plato. His style, as might have been expected, is marked by several of the solemnities of his age, but exhibits in the main a constant endeavour after purity and accuracy. His scholia, as we have them, were put into a written form by his pupils, from notes which they took of his lectures, and are distributed into παρεις, or lessons. The inscriptions which precede the scholia state that they were written by Hermogenes. Joseph Scaliger, who published the scholia, was of opinion that they probably account for many of the defects of style observable in Olympiodorus. Of his compositions there have come down to us a life of Plato; a polemical work against Strato (in MS. at Munich); and scholia on the Gorgias, Philebus, Phaedo, and Alcibiades I. of Plato. Whether these were all the works of Plato on which he commented, or not, we do not know. The life of Plato was published in Wetstein's edition of Diogenes Laërtius, in 1692, from the posthumous papers of Is. Casaubon. It was again published by Etwall, in his edition of three of Plato's dialogues, Lond. 1771; and by Fischer, in his edition of some dialogues of Plato, Leipzig, 1783. Some of the more important scholia on the Phaedo were published by Nathan Forster, Oxford, 1792; by Fischer (c. c.) and in a more complete form, by Muxotides and Stallbaum, in their Αντιγ. Ευκρίνου διδασκαλία, Venice, 1816. The scholia on the Gorgias were published by Routh, in his edition of the Euthydemus and Gorgias, Oxford, 1784; those to the Philebus by Stallbaum, in his edition of Plato, Leipzig, 1826; those on the Alcibiades by Creuzer, Frankfort, 1821. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 631.)

7. An Aristotelic philosopher, the author of a commentary on the Meteorologica of Aristotle, which is still extant. He himself (p. 37, 6) speaks of Alexandria as his residence, and (p. 12, 6) mentions the comet which appeared in the 281st year of the Diocletian era (A. D. 553), so that the period when he is fixed to have lived is the latter half of the sixth century after Christ. His work, like the scholia of the Neo-Platonic philosopher of the same name, is divided into παρεις; from which it would seem that the Aristotelic philosophy was taught at Alexandria even after the Neo-Platonic school had become extinct. Like Simplicius, to whom, however, he is inferior, he endeavours to reconcile Plato and Aristotle. Of Proclus he speaks with great admiration, stying him δικτος; but his great authority is Ammonius. His commentary was published by the sons of Aldus, at Venice, 1551. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 628, &c., who gives a list of the authors quoted by him.)

8. Surnamed Dicacon or Monachus, an ecclesiastic who lived in the sixth century. He sustained the office of deacons in Alexandria. He is mentioned with commendation by Anastasius Sinaita, who flourished not later than A. D. 680—700. He wrote commentaries on the books of Job, Ezra, Jeremiah, and Ecclesiastes. The notes on Job, entitled Οιςοτατα in Librum Ieremiae, were published in a Latin translation by Paulus Comitius, Venice, 1587; and, with those on Jeremiah, in the Catena Patrum Graecorum. The commentary on Ecclesiastes was published in Greek in the Αποκατωομ Νεωομουνικαι Bibliothecae Patrum, Paris, 1624. Latin translations of it have been several times published. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 627; Hoffmann, Lex. Bibl. vol. ii. p. 158.)

OLYMPIUS. 25

OLYMPIOSTHENES (Olympiouσθενησ), a sculptor, whose country is unknown, made three of the statues of the Muses, which were set up on Mt. Helicon, and the other six of which were made by Cephisodotus and Strongylion. (Paus. ix. 30. § 1.) It may safely be inferred that the three artists were contemporary; but, looking only at the passage of Pausanias, it is doubtful whether the elder or the younger Cephisodotus is meant. It appears, however, from other evidence that Strongylion was a contemporary of Praxiteles, and therefore of the elder Cephisodotus. [STRONGY-]

L. S.] According to this, the date of Olympio-thenes would be about b. c. 370. [P. S.]

OLYMPIUS (Ολυμπίος), the Olympian, occurs as a surname of Zeus (Hom. H. i. 353), Heracles (Herod. ii. 44), the Muses (Olympiades, H. ii. 491), and in general of all the gods that were believed to live in Olympus, in contradistinction from the gods of the lower world. (H. i. 399; comp. Paus. i. 18. § 7, v. 14. § 6, vi. 20. § 2.)

OLYMPIUS (Ολυμπίος), a lawyer, born probably at Tralles in Lydia, in the sixth century after Christ. His father's name was Stephanus, who was a physician (Alex. Trall. De Medici. iv. 1, p. 198); one of his brothers was the physician Alexander Trallianus; another the architect and mathematician Anthemius; and Agathias mentions (Hist. v. p. 149, ed. 1669) that his other two brothers, Metrodorus and Dioscorus, were both emiinent in their several professions. [W. A. G.]

OLYMPIUS NEMESIS'ANUS. [NEMES-IANUS.]

OLYMPUS (Ολυμπός). 1. A teacher of Zeus, af-after whom the god is said to have been called the Olympian. (Diod. iii. 73.)

2. The father of Marsyas. (Apollod. i. 4. § 82.)

3. A disciple of Marsyas, and a celebrated flute-player of Phrygia. For a further account of this personage, who is closely connected with the historical Olympus, see the following article.

4. The father of Cius, from whom Mount Olym-pus in Mycia was believed to have received its name. (Schol. ad Theocr. xiii. 30.)

5. A son of Heracles by Euboea. (Apollod. ii.
7. § 8.)

6. Olympus, the abode of the gods also requires a few words of comment in this place. Mount Olympus is situated in the north-east of Thessaly, and is about 6,000 feet high; on its summit which rises above the clouds of heaven, and is itself cloudless, Hephaestus had built a town with gates, which was inhabited by Zeus and the other gods. (Od. vi. 42, H. xi. 76.) The palace of Zeus contained an assembly-hall, in which met not only the gods of Olympus, but those also who dwelt on the earth or in the sea. (H. xx. 5.) This celestial mount must indeed be distinguished from heaven; but as the gods lived in the city which rose above the clouds and into heaven, they lived at the same time in heaven, and the gates of the celestial city were at the same time regarded as the gates of heaven. (H. v. 749, § 6.)

OLYMPUS (Ολυμπός), the physician in ordinary to Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, who aided her in committing suicide, b. c. 30, and afterwards published an account of her death. (Plut. Anton. c. 82.) [W. A. G.]

OLYMPUS (Ολυμπός), musicians. Suidas

distinguishes three Greek musicians of this name, of whom the first is mythical, and the last historical: the second probably owes his existence only to some mistake of Suidas, or the writer whom he copied, since Plutarch who is a much better authority only recognizes two musicians of the name; both of whom are connected with the auletic music, which had its origin in Phrygia. (Plut. de Mus. p. 1133, d. e.)

1. The elder Olympus belongs to the mythical genealogy of Mysian and Phrygian flute-players—Hyagnis, Maryas, Olympus—to each of whom the invention of the flute was ascribed, and under whose names we have the mythical representation of the contest between the Phrygian auletic and the Greek citharodeic music: some writers made him the father (instead of son, or disciple, and favourite of Maryas), but the genealogy given above was that more generally received. Olympus was said to have been a native of Mysia, and he was an aulete in the Trojan war. The compositions ascribed to him were νομοὶ ἑς τόδε Ἰνδος, that is, old melodies appropriated to the worship of particular gods, the origin of which was so ancient as to be unknown, like those which were attributed to Olen and Philammon. Olympus not unfrequently appears on works of art, as a boy, sometimes instructed by Maryas, and sometimes as witnessing and lamenting his fate. (Suid. s. v.; Plut. de Mus. pp. 1132, e., 1133, e.; Apollod. i. 4 § 2; Hyg. Fab. 165, 273; Ovid, Metam. vi. 393, Eleg. iii. 3; MARYSAS.) It may fairly be assumed that this elder and mythical Olympus was invented through some mistake respecting the younger and really historical Olympus. (Respecting this confusion, see Müller, History of Greek Literature, p. 156.)

2. The true Olympus was a Phrygian, and perhaps belonged to a family of native musicians, since he was said to be descended from the first Olympus. Müller supposes that there was an hereditary race of flute-players at the festivals of the Phrygian Mother of the Gods, who claimed a descent from the mythical Olympus. He is placed by Plutarch at the head of auletic music, as Terpander stood at the head of the citharodeic: and on account of his inventions in the art, Plutarch even assigns to him, rather than to Terpander, the honour of being the father of Greek music, ἀρχηγός τῆς Ἑλληνικῆς καὶ καλῆς μουσικῆς (De Mus. pp. 1133, e., 1133, c.). With respect to his age, Suidas places him under a king Midas, son of Gordius; but this tells us nothing, for these were alternately the names of all the Phrygian kings to the time of Croesus. Müller places him, for satisfactory reasons, after Terpander and before Thalestris, that is, between the 30th and 40th Olympiads, b. c. 660—620. Though a Phrygian by origin, Olympus must be reckoned among the Greek musicians; for all the accounts make Greece the scene of his auletic activity, and his subjects Greek; and he had Greek disciples, such as Cates and Hienax. (Plut. de Mus. pp. 1133, e., 1140, d.; Poll. iv. 79.) In fact, he may, be considered as having naturalized in Greece the music of the flute, which had previously been almost peculiar to Phrygia. This species of music admitted of much greater variations than that of the lyre; and, accordingly, several new inventions are ascribed to Olympus. The greatest of his inventions was that of the third system, or genus, of music, the Enharmonic, for an explanation of which see Dict. of Ant. s. v. Music.

Of the particular tunes (ψῦμοι) ascribed to him, the most important was the Ἀρχιάλιος νόμος, a mournful and passionate strain, of the rhythm of which we are enabled to form an idea from a passage in the Orestes of Euripides, which was set to it, as the passage itself tells us. A dirge, also, in honour of the slain Python, was said to have been played by Olympus, at Delphi, on the flute, and in the Lydian style. Aristophanes mentions a mournful strain, set to more flute than one (ξυναλα), as well known at Athens under the name of Olympus. (Equit. 9; comp. Schol. and Brunck's note.) But it can hardly be supposed that his music was all mournful; the name in honour of Athena, at least, must have been of a different character. Some ancient writers ascribe to him the Nomos Orthios, which Herodotus attributes to Arion.

Olympus was a great inventor in rhythm as well as in music. To him are assigned two existing species of rhythm, the ιτός, in which the names and times are equal (as in the Dactyl and Anapaest), and the διάδος, in which the eidos is twice the length of the thesis (as in the Iambus and Trochee), he added a third, the μαύλον, in which the length of the eidos is equal to two short syllables, and that of the thesis to three, as in the Cretic foot (υ υ υ), the Paean (υ υ υ υ, &c.), and the Bacchic foot (υ γ), though there is some doubt whether the last form was used by Olympus.

There is no mention of any poems composed by Olympus. It is argued by some writers that the inseparable connection between the earliest compositions in music and poetry forbids the supposition that he composed music without words. Without entering into this difficult and extensive question, it is enough to observe that, whatever words may have been originally connected with his music, they were superseded by the compositions of later poets. Of the lyric poets who adapted their compositions to the names of Olympus, the chief was Steischorus of Himera. (Plut. de Mus. passim; Müller, Ulrici, Bode, and a very elaborate article by Ritschl, in Ersch and Gruber's Encyclopädie.)

OLYPUS (Ολυμπός), a statuary, whose country is unknown, and respecting whose date it can only be said that he lived later than the 80th Olympiad, b. c. 460 (Οἰκοτάς). He made the statue at Olympia of the pancratist Xenophon, the son of Menephyus, of Aegium of Achaea. (Paus. vi. 3 § 5. s. 14.)

OLYNTHIOUS, an architect, who is said to have assisted Cleomenes in the building of Alexandria. (Jul. Valer. de R. G. Alex. i. 21, 23; Müller, Archäol. d. Kunst, § 149, n. 2.)

OLYNTHUS (Ολυνθός), a son of Hercules and Bobs, from whom the Thracian town of Olynthus, and the river Olynthus near the Chalcidian town of Zeus-Daimon, were believed to have received their name. (Steph. Byz. s. v.; Athen. viii. p. 354; Conon, Narrat. 4, where another person of the same name is mentioned.)

OMA'DIUS (Ομαδίου), that is, the flesh-eater, a surname of Dionysus, to whom human sacrifices were offered in Chios and Tenedos. (Orph. Hymn. 51. 7; Porphyry. de Aitia, ii. 55.)

OMIAS (Ομίας), a Lacedaemonian, was the chief of the ten commissioners who were sent to Philip V., king of Macedon, then at Tegae (b. c. 220), to give assurances of fidelity, and to represent the recent tumult at Sparta, in which the ONATAS.

Ephor Adeimantus and others of the Macedonian party had been murdered, as having originated with Adeimantus himself. Philip, having heard Omis and his colleagues, rejected the advice of some of his counsellors, to deal severely with Sparta, and sent Petrearus, one of his friends, to accompany the commissioners back, and to exhort the Lacedaemonians to abide steadfastly by their alliance with him. (Polyb. iv. 22—25.) [E. E.]

O'MBRIMUS. [OBRIMUS.]

O'MBRIUS ('Ομβρίους), i.e. the min-giver, a surname of Zeus, under which he had an altar on Mount Hymettus in Attica. (Paus. i. 32. § 3; comp. Hes. Op. et Di. 357, 620.) [L. S.]

O'MPHALE ('Ομφάλη), a daughter of the Lydian King Jareus, and wife of Thoas, after whose death he undertook the government herself. When Heracles, in consequence of the murder of Iphitus, was ill of a serious disease, and received the oracle that he could not be released unless he served some one for wages for the space of three years, Hermes, accordingly, sold Heracles to Omphale, by whom he became the father of several children. (Apollod. i. 9, § 19, ii. 6. §§ 3, 4; Soph. Trach. 253; Dionys. i. 28; Lucian, Dial. Deor. xiii. 2; comp. Heracles.) [L. S.]

OMPHALION ('Ομφαλίων), painter, was originally the slave, and afterwards the disciple, of Nicias, the son of Nicomedes. He painted the walls of the temple of Messene with figures of personages celebrated in the mythological legends of Messenia. (Paus. iv. 31. § 9 s. 11, 12.) [P. S.]

ONAEUS ('Οναέους), a statuary of an unknown time and country, who, with his brother Thylacius and their sons, made the statue of Zeus, which the Megarians dedicated at Olympia. (Paus. v. 23. § 4. 5.) [P. S.]

ONASIAS. [ONATAS.]

ONASIMIDES ('Ονασιμίδης), a statuary, who made a statue of Dionysus, of solid bronze, which Pausanias saw at Thbes. (Paus. ix. 12. § 3. s. 4.) [P. S.]

ONASIMUS ('Ονασίμους), son of Apines, was an historian, or rather a sophist, of Cyprus or Sparta, in the time of the emperor Constantine the Great. He wrote many works, some of which, bearing on the art of rhetoric, are enumerated by Suidas. (Suid. s. v. Ἀψίς, Ὀνασίμους.) [E. E.]

O'NASUS ('Ονασός), the author of a work on the Amazons, entitled Αμαζόνις or Αμαζονίας, which was supposed by Heyne (ad Apollod. ii. 3. § 9) and others to have been an epic poem; but it has been observed by Welcker (Episkeuo Cylmas, p. 320) and Grote (Hist. of Greece, vol. i. p. 308), that we may infer from the rationalising tendency of the citation from it (Schol. ad Theoc. xiii. 46; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhode. i. 1207, 1236), that it was in prose.

ONATAS ('Ονατας) of Aegina, the son of Micon, was a distinguished statuary and painter, contemporary with Polygnotus, Ageladas, and Hegias. From the various notices of him it may be collected that he flourished down to about Ol. 80, b. c. 460, that is, in the age immediately preceding that of Phidias. It is uncertain whether his father Micon was the great painter of that name.

The works of Onatas are frequently described by Pausanias, who is, however, the only ancient writer who mentions him, with the exception of a single epigram in the Greek anthology. Pausanias also says that, though he called himself an Aeginetan on his works, he was inferior to none of the artists from Daedalus and the Attic school (v. 24. § 7 s. 13; Τὰν δὲ Ὄνατας τούτων ἦμων, καὶ τέχνης ἡ ἀνάλυμα ὡστα Αἰγιναῖος, οὔδενος ὑπερήφανος τῶν ἀδιάδεικτον τε καὶ ἀγαθηροτέρων τῶν Ἀττικῶν). Pausanias mentions the following works of Onatas:—

1. A bronze statue of Heracles, on a bronze base, dedicated at Olympia by the Thasians. The statue was ten cubits high: in the right hand was a club, in the left a bow: and it bore the following inscription (Paus. l. c.):—

'Tὸς μὲν με Μίκωνος Ὄνατας ἔφετέλεσεν, Αἰθός ἐν Αἰγίνῃ δωμάτῳ ναυσίων.'

2. An Apollo at Pergamum, equally admired for its size and its art (viii. 42. § 4. 7.). This statue was in all probability different from that of Apollo Bouaius, attended by Eileithyia, on which we have an epigram by Antipater. (Anth. Pal. ii. 238; Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 14.)

3. A Hermes, carrying a ram under his wings, wearing a helmet on his head, and clad in a chiton and chlamys. It was dedicated at Olympia by the people of Pheneus in Arcadia; and the inscription stated that it was made by Onatas the Aeginetan, in conjunction with Calliteles, whom Pausanias takes for a son or disciple of Onatas (v. 27. § 8. 8.).

4. A bronze statue of the Black Demeter with the horse's head, whose legend is related by Pausanias (vii. 42.). The seat of the legend was a cave in Mount Elaeus, near Phigileia, which the Phigileians had consecrated to the goddess, and had dedicated in it a wooden image, like a woman, except that it had the head and mane of a horse, and figures of dragons and other wild beasts were growing out about the head: it was clothed in a tunic down to the feet; and bore on the right hand a dolphin, and on the left a dove. This wooden image having been burnt at some unknown period, it was not only not replaced, but the worship of the goddess was neglected; until the Phigileians, warned by the failure of their crops, and instructed by a Pythonian oracle, employed Onatas to make a bronze statue of the goddess; in the execution of which he was assisted somewhat by a picture or a wooden copy of the old image, but still more by dreams. (Paus. l. c.) This story is one of several indications of the thoroughly archaic style of the works of Onatas.

Passing from the statues of gods to those of men and heroes, we have

5. The bronze statues of the Grecian heroes casting lots to determine which of them should accept the challenge of Hector. (Hom. II. vii. 175—184.) The group was dedicated at Olympia by the Achaeans in common. It consisted originally of ten figures; but when Pausanias saw it, there were only nine, the statue of Ulysses having been carried to Rome by Nero. The chiefstains, armed with spears and shields, stood together near the great temple, and opposite to them, on a separate base, stood Nestor, holding the helmet into which the lots had been thrown. The name of Agamemmon was inscribed on his statue, in letters from right to left. The other statues bore no names; but one, distinguished by a cock upon the shield, was attributed by Pausanias to Idomeneus; and on the inside of the shield of this statue was the following inscription:—

ONCUS.

Pollià mēν ἄλλα σοφοῦ τοινματα καὶ τὸν Ὄνοστα Ἑργόν, δι' Ἀλύη γεννάτο παῖδα Μίκων.

There is no authority for ascribing to Onatas more than this one statute in the group. (Paus. v. 25. § 5. s. 8—10.)

6. The bronze chariot, with a figure of a man in it, which was dedicated at Olympia by Deinomenes, the son of Hieron, in memory of his father's victories. On each side of the chariot were riding-horses, with figures of boys upon them; these were made by Calamis. (Paus. vi. 12. § 1, viii. 42. § 4. s. 8.) This work is one authority for the date of Onatas, since Hieron died b. c. 467.

7. A group dedicated at Delphi by the Tarentines, being the tithe of the booty taken by them in a war with the Peucetii. The statues, which were the work of Onatas and Calyntus (but the passage is here corrupt), represented horse and foot soldiers intermixed; and, the king of the Iapygians, and the ally of the Peucetians, was seen prostrate, as if slain in the battle, and standing over him were the hero Tams and the Lacedaemonian Phalanthus, near whom was a dolphin. (Paus. x. 13. § 5. s. 10.)

Onatas was a painter, as well as a statuary; but only one of his works is mentioned: this one, however, forms another authority for his date, and proves the estimation in which he was held; for he was employed in conjunction with Polygnotus to decorate the temple in which this picture was painted. The temple was that of Athena Areia at Plateaee, and the picture, which was painted on one of the walls of the portico (prouas), represented the expedition of the Argive chiefstems against Thebes; Euryganeia, the mother of Eucles and Polyneices (according to the tradition which Pausanias followed), was introduced into the picture, lamenting the mutual fratricide of her sons. (Paus. ix. 4. § 1. s. 2, 5. § 8. § 11.) It should be observed, however, that in the second passage the MSS. have 'Onassis, which Synhurg corrected into 'Onatas, on the authority of the first passage; see also Müller, Agestica, p. 107: but Bekker and Dindorf, on the contrary, correct the former passage by the latter, and read 'Onassis in both.

The scattered information of Pausanias respecting Onatas has been critically gathered up by Müller and Thiersch. Rathgeber has managed to extend the subject over thirty columns of Ersch and Gruber's Enzyklopädie. [P. S.]

ONATAS, a Pythagorean philosopher of Croton, from whose work, Πρὸ Σεοῦ καὶ Σελαο, some extracts are preserved by Stobaeus. (Ecl. Phys. i. 33, p. 92, &c., ed. Heeren.)

ONCA ('Ονκα), a surname of Athena, which she derived from the town of Oncae in Boeotia, where she had a sanctuary. (Aeschyl. Sept. 186, 489; Paus. ix. 12. § 2; Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 1062.)

ONASCÈTUS ('Ονασκέτος), a surname of Apollo, derived from Onesium on the river Ladon in Arcadia, where he had a temple. (Paus. viii. 25. § 5, &c.)

ONCHOΣΤΗΣ ('Ονχοστής), a son of Poseidon, and founder of the town of Onchestus, where the Onchestian Poseidon had a temple and a statue. (Paus. ix. 26. § 3; Steph. Byz. s. v.; Hom. II. ii. 506.) Another tradition called this Onchestus a son of Boeotus. [L. S.]

ONCUS ('Ονκος), a son of Apollo, and founder of Onesium in Arcadia. Demeter, after being tmorphosed into a horse, mixed among his herds, and gave him the horse Arion, of which she was the mother by Poseidon. (Paus. vii. 25. § 4, &c.; comp. Stephh. Byz. s. v.)

ONÉROS ('Ονέρος), a personification of dream, and in the plural of dreams. According to Homer Dreams dwell on the dark shores of the western Oceanus (Od. xxiv. 12), and the deceitful dreams come through an ivory gate, while the true ones issue from a gate made of horn. (Od. xix. 562, &c.) Hesiod (Theog. 212) calls dreams the children of night, and Ovid (Met. xi. 633), who calls them children of Sleep, mentions three of them by name, viz. Morpheus, Icean or Phobetor, and Phantastus. Euripides called them sons of Gaia, and conceived them as genii with black wings.

ONÉSÍAS ('Ονέσιας), a gem engraver, whose name appears on a beautiful intaglio, representing a young Hercules, crowned with laurel, and on another gem, representing a girl playing the cithara, both in the Florentine collection. (Stosch. Pières Gravées, No. 46; Brnci, tav. 89.) [P. S.]

ONESÍCRITUS ('Ονεσίκριτος), a Greek historical writer, who accompanied Alexander on his campaigns in Asia, and wrote a history of them, which is frequently cited by later authors. He is called by some authorities a native of Astypalaea, by others of Aegina (Diog. Laërt. vi. 75, 84; Arr. Ind. 18; Aelian, H. N. xvi. 39): it was probably to this island origin that he was indebted for the skill in nautical matters which afterwards proved so advantageous to him. He must have been already advanced in years, as we are told that he had two sons grown up to manhood, when his attention was accidentally attracted to the philosophy of Diogenes the Cynic, of which he became an ardent votary, so as to have obtained a name of eminence among the disciples of that master. (Diog. Laërt. i. 9; Plut. Alex. 65.) We have no account of the circumstances which led him to accompany Alexander into Asia, nor does it appear in what capacity he attended on the conqueror; but during the expedition into India he was sent by the king to hold a conference with the Indian philosophers or Gymnosophists, the details of which have been transmitted to us from his own account of the interview. (Strab. xv. p. 715; Plut. Alex. 65.) When Alexander constructed his fleet on the Hydaspes, he appointed Onesicritus to the important station of pilot of the king's ship, or chief pilot of the fleet (ἀρχιπλοηγός), a post which he held not only during the descent of the Indus, but throughout the long and perilous voyage from the mouth of that river to the Persian gulf. In this capacity he discharged his duties so much to the satisfaction of Alexander that, on his arrival at Susa, he was rewarded by that monarch with a crown of gold, at the same time as Nearchus. (Arr. Anat. vii. 1. § 2; viii. § 5; 9, Ind. 18; Curt. vii. 20. § 3, x. 1. § 10; Plut. Alex. 66, de Port. Alex. p. 331, f.) Yet Arrian blames him for want of judgment, and on one occasion expressly ascribes the safety of the fleet to the firmness of Nearchus in overruling his advice. (Arr. Anat. vii. 20. Ind. 32.) We know nothing of his subsequent fortunes; but from an anecdote related by Plutarch it seems probable that he attached himself to Lysimachus, and it was perhaps at the court of that monarch that he composed his historical work (Plut. Alex. 46), though, on the other hand, a passage of Lucian (Quomodo hist. conscr. c. 40), might lead us to infer that this was at least commenced during the lifetime of Alexander himself.

We learn from Diogenes Laërtius (vi. 84) that the history of Onesicritus comprised the whole life of Alexander, including his youth and education (πῶς Ἀλέξανδρος ἠχήση); but it is most frequently cited in regard to the campaigns of that prince in Asia, or to the geographical description of the countries that he visited. Though an eye-witness of much of what he described, it appears that he intermixed many fables and falsehoods with his narrative, so that he early fell into discredit as an authority. Strabo is especially severe upon him, and calls him "Οὐδε Ἀλέξανδρον μάλλον ἢ τῶν παραδόντων ἁρχικύρητης." (xxv. p. 698, comp. ii. p. 70.) Plutarch cites him as one of those who related the fable of the visit of the Amazons to Alexander, for which he was justly ridiculed by Lysimachus (Alex. 46), and Arrian accuses him of falsely representing himself as the commander of the fleet, when he was in truth only the pilot. (Anod. vi. 2. § 6; comp. Suid. s. v. Νεάρχως.) Anius Gallus (ii. 4) even associates him with Aristes of Proconnesus, and other purely fabulous writers. But it is clear that these censures are overcharged; and though some of the statements cited from him are certainly gross exaggerations (see for instance Strab. xv. p. 698; Aelian. H. N. xvi. 23, xvii. 6), his work appears to have contained much valuable information concerning the remote countries for the first time laid open by the expedition of Alexander. In particular he was the first author that mentioned the island of Taprobane. (Strab. xv. p. 691; Plin. H. N. vi. 24.) He is said to have imitated Xenophon in his style, though he fell short of him as a copy does of the original. (Diog. Laërt. vi. 84; Suid. s. v. Όνησικρήτως.) Some authors have held that besides this general history, Onesicritus had composed a separate Paralipon, or narrative of the voyage, in which he bore so prominent a part: but Geier has shown that there is no foundation for such a supposition: and it seems certain that Pliny, whose words might lead to such an inference (H. N. vi. 23 (26)), had in fact used only an extract from the work of Onesicritus, abridged or condensed by Juba. Still less reason is there to infer (with Meier in Ersch and Gruber, Encycl. sect. iii. pt. ii. p. 457) that he wrote a history of the early kings of Persia, because we find him cited by Lucian (Macrob. 14) concerning the age of Cyrus.

[Ε. Η. Β.]

ΟΝΕΣΙΛΟΣ (Ο'νησιλος), of Salamis in Cyprus, the son of Chersis, grandson of Sironmus, and great-grandson of Evelthon. He had frequently urged his brother Gorgus, who was king of Salamis in Cyprus, to desert from the Persians; but as he was unable to persuade him to do so, he finally drove him from the city, and set up the standard of revolt with the Ionians, in b. c. 499. Gorgus fled to the Persians; Onesilus became king of Salamis, and persuaded all the other cities in Cyprus, with the exception of Amathus, to renounce their allegiance to the Persians. Thereupon Onesilus laid siege to Amathus; and as Dareius sent a large force to its relief under the command of Artybias, Onesilus begged aid of the Ionians. They readily complied with his request; and in the following year, b. c. 498, two battles were fought between the contending parties, one by sea, in which the Ionians defeated the Phoenician fleet, and the other by land, in which the Cyprians were beaten by the Persians. Onesilus fell in the battle; his head was cut off by the inhabitants of Amathus, and hung over their city-gates. At a later period, however, an oracle commanded them to take down his head and bury it, and also to offer sacrifices to him as a hero. (Herod. v. 104, 108—110.) [GORUS, No. 2.]

ΟΝΕΣΙΜΟΣ, the son of Python, a Macedonian noble, who passed over to the Romans, when Perseus resolved to declare war against the latter, b. c. 169, and received in consequence magnificent rewards from the senate. (Liv. xiv. 16.)

ΟΝΕΣΙΤΩΡ, ΟΝΕΣΙΤΥΡΟΣ (Ο'νησιτωρ, Ο'νησιτυρος) The Greek Anthology contains ten epigrams, inscribed Ονεσιτωρ in the Vatican MS.; but, as the heading of the sixth and seventh is Ονεσιτωρ Κορνίου, and that of the ninth Ονεσιτωρ Βεκαντου, it would seem that there were two poets of the name; but concerning neither of them have we any further information. Brunck even suspected the correctness of the name altogether; and thought it might be a mistake for Όνεσιτωρ, but this supposition is founded on no evidence. Wine, love, and music are the subjects of the epigrams, which are distinguished by no particular beauty. (Brunck, Anál. vol. ii. p. 289; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. iii. p. 3, vol. xiii. p. 926; Fabric, Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. 483.)

ΟΝΕΣΙΜΟΣ, the name of two mythical personages, one a priest of Zeus on Mount Ida (Hom. II. xvi. 605), and the other the father of Phrontis, the steersman of Menelaus. (Paus. x. 25. § 2.)

ΟΝΟΜΑΚΛΗΣ (Ο'νομακλης), an Athenian, was joined with Phrynichus and Scironides, b. c. 412, in the command of an Athenian and Argive force, which, after a battle with the Milesians, who were supported by Chalcideus and Tissaphernes, prepared to besiege Milletus, but on the arrival of the Peloponnesian and Sicilian fleet, sailed away to Samos, by the advice of Phrynichus. Shortly after, in the same year, when the Athenians at Samos had been reinforced, Onomakes was sent with part of the armament, and with Strombichides and Exeetmon for his colleagues, to act against Chios (Thuc. viii. 25—27, 30, 33, 34, 38, 40, 55, 61). It was probably the same Onomakes who was afterwards one of the thirty tyrants, in b. c. 404 (Xen. Hell. ii. 3. § 2). We find mention made also of another Onomakes, who, together with Archepletemus, was involved in the condemnation of Antiphon (Anod. Vit. Thuc.) A Spartan of the same name is recorded by Xenophon (Hell. ii. 3. § 10) as ephor ἐπανόμως, in the eighth year of the Peloponnesian war. [Ε. Ε.]

ΟΝΟΜΑΚΡΙΤΟΣ (Ο'νομακρητος), an Athenian, who occupies an interesting position in the history of the early Greek religious poetry. Herodotus calls him χρηματολόγον τε καὶ διάλεκτον χρημάτων τῶν Μουσών, and informs us that he had enjoyed the patronage of Hipparchus, until he was detected by Losus of Hermione (the dithyrambic poet) in making an interpolation in an fifty-ninth Orphic Hymn the Graces addressed thus:—

Θυγατέρες Ζεύς τε καὶ Εὐδομήθα Βαθυάμπουλος, ἀγάλητα τε, θάλεια, καὶ Εὐφροσύνη πολυδή.

Some writers have hastily taken this as a proof that the true author of the still extant Orphic hymns was Onomacritus, or else, as others more cautiously put it, that Onomacritus was one of the authors of them, and that this hymn at least is to be ascribed to him. It proves, if anything, the direct contrary of this; for, had the hymn in question borne the name of Orpheus in the time of Pausanias, he would have so quoted it, to say nothing of the difference between the name Eurynome in Pausanias and Eunomia in the hymn. The truth is that the date of the extant Orphic hymns is centuries later than the time of Onomacritus [Orpheus]. That Onomacritus, however, did publish poems under the name of Orpheus, as well as Musaeus, is probable from several testimonies, among which is that of Aristotle, who held that there never was such a poet as Orpheus, and that the poems known under his name were fabricated partly by Cercops, and partly by Onomacritus. (Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 38; Philon. ad Aristot., de Anim. i. 5; Suid. s. v. Ορφεύς; Schol. ad Aristotel. Panath. p. 165; Sext. Empir. Pyrrh. Hypotyp. iii. 4; Euseb. Praep. Evang. x. 4; Tatian. adv. Graec. 62.)

From these statements it appears that the literary character of Onomarchus must be regarded as quite subordinate to his religious position; that he was not a poet who cultivated the art for its own sake, but a priest, who availed himself of the ancient religious poems for the support of the worship to which he was attached. Of what character that worship was, may be seen from the statement of Pausanias, that "Onomarchus, taking from Homer the name of the Titans, composed (or, established, οἰκεῖον) ordeals to Dionysus, and represented in his poems (ἐνάρθησε) the Titans as the authors of the sufferings of Dionysus." (Paus. viii. 37. § 4. 5.) Here we have, in fact, the great Orphic myth of Dionysus Zagreus, whose worship it thus seems was either established or re-arranged by Onomarchus, who must therefore be regarded as one of the chief leaders of the Orphic theology, and the Orphic societies. [Orpheus.] Some modern writers, as Ulrici, think it probable that Onomarchus was the real author of the Orphic Theogony, to which others again assign a still earlier date. (Grote, History of Greece, vol. i. pp. 23, 29.)

There is an obscure reference in Aristotle (Polit. ii. 9) to "Onomarchus, a Locran," the first distinguished legislator, who practised gymnastic exercises in Crete, and travelled abroad on account of the art of divination, and who was a contemporary of Theseus. (See Hoeckh, Crela, vol. iii. pp. 318, &c.)

For further remarks on the literary and religious position of Onomarchus, see the Histories of Greek Literature by Müller, Bernhardt, Ulrici, and Bode; Müller, Proleg. zu einer Wissenschaftlichen Mythologie; Lobeck, Aglaophamus, and Ritschl, in Ersch and Gruber's Encyclopädie. [P. S.]

ONOMARCHUS (Ονομαρχος), general of the Phocians in the Sacred War, was brother of Philomelus and son of Theoctimus (Did. xvi. 56, 61; Paul. x. 2. § 2; but see Arist. Pol. v. 4, and ONOMASTUS. Thirlwall's Greeces, vol. v. p. 275, not.). He commanded a division of the Phocian army under Philomelus, in the action at Tithorea, in which the latter perished; and after the battle gathered together the remains of the Phocian army, with which he effected his retreat to Delphi. An assembly of the people was now held, in which Onomarchus strongly urged the prosecution of the war, in opposition to the counsels of the more moderate party, and succeeded in obtaining his own nomination to the chief command in the place of Philomelus, p. c. 333. He was, however, far from imitating the moderation of his predecessor: he confiscated the property of all those who were opposed to him, and squandered without scruple the sacred treasures of Delphi. The latter enabled him not only to assemble and maintain a large body of mercenary troops, but to spend large sums in bribing many of the leading persons in the hostile states; by which means he succeeded in prevailing on the Thessalians to abandon their allies, and take up a neutral position. Thus freed from his most formidable antagonists, he was more than a match for his remaining foes. He now invaded Locris, took the town of Thronium, and compelled that of Amphissa to submit; ravaged the Dorian Tetrapolis, and then turned his arms against Boeotia, where he took Orchomenus and laid siege to Chaeroneia, but was compelled to retreat without effecting anything more. His assistance was now requested by Lycophron, tyrant of Pheneus, who was attacked by Philip, king of Macedonia; and he at first sent his brother Phyllus into Thessaly with an army of 7000 men. But Phyllus having been defeated by Philip, Onomarchus marched with his whole forces to the support of Lycophron, defeated Philip in two successive battles, and drove him out of Thessaly. He next turned his arms a second time against the Boeotians, whom he defeated in a battle, and took the city of Coroneia, when he was recalled once more to the assistance of Lycophron, against Philip, who had again invaded Thessaly. Onomarchus hastened to support his ally with an army of 20,000 foot and 500 horse, but was met by Philip at the head of a force still more numerous, and a pitched battle ensued, in which the superiority of the Thessalian cavalry decided the victory in favour of the king. Onomarchus himself, with many of the fugitives, plunged into the sea in hopes to reach by swimming the Athenian ships under Chares, which were lying off the shore, but perished in the waves, or, according to Pausanias, by the darts of his own soldiers. His body fell into the hands of Philip, who caused it to be crucified, as a punishment for his sacrilege. His death took place in b. c. 332 (Diod. xvi. 31—33, 35, 56, 61; Paus. x. 2 § 5; Justin. viii. 1. 2; Poly. ii. 36; Ephor. fr. 153, ed. Ditot.; Ors. ii. 12; Wesseling, ad Diod. xvi. 33; Dem. de Fals. Leg. p. 443). We are told that Onomarchus was a man of luxurious habits, and that he made use of the sacred treasures, not only for the purposes of the state, but to minister to his own pleasures (Theopomp. op. Athen. xiii. p. 605); but it is difficult to know what value to attach to such statements; the religious character assumed by the enemies of the Phocians having led them to load with obloquy the memory of all the leaders of that people. [E. H. B.]

ONOMASTUS ('Oγομαστος), a confidential officer of Philip V. of Macedon, for whom he held the government of the sea-coast of Thrace, and whose instrument he was, together with CASSANDER [No. 4], in the massacre of the Maronites. Appius Claudius, and the other Roman commissioners, required that Philip should send Onomastus and Cassander to Rome to be examined about the massacre; whereupon the king despatched Cassander, and had him poisoned on the way, but persisted in declaring that Onomastus had not been in or near Maroneia at the time; the fact being (as Polybius and Livy tell us) that he was too deep in the royal secrets to be trusted at Rome. We hear again of Onomastus as one of the two assessors of Philip at the private trial of DEMETRIUS, for the alleged attempt on his life by his brother Perseus, b. c. 182. (Polyb. xxiii. 13, 14; Liv. xxxix. 84, x1. 8.) [E. E.]

ONOSANDER (Oνοσανδρός), the author of a celebrated work on military tactics, entitled Στρατηγικά λόγος, which is still extant. All subsequent Greek and Roman writers on the same subject made this work their text-book (the emperors Mauricius and Leon did little more than express in the corrupt style of their age what they found in Onosander, whom Leon calls Onosander), and it is even still held in considerable estimation. Count Moritz of Saxony professed to have derived great benefit from the perusal of a translation of it. Onosander appears to have lived about the middle of the first century after Christ. His work is dedicated to Q. Veranius, who is generally supposed to be identical with the Q. Veranius Nepos who was consul in a. d. 49. Onosander also remarks in his preface that his work was written in time of peace. It might very well have been written, therefore, between a. d. 49 and a. d. 59. If the consul of a. d. 49 was the person to whom the work was dedicated, it would agree very well with all the other data, that this Veranius accompanied Didius Gallus into Britain, and died before the expiration of a year.

Onosander was a disciple of the Platonic school of philosophy, and, according to Suidas, besides his work on tactics, wrote one Περὶ στρατηγικῶν (unless, as some suppose, the words τακτικά περὶ στρατηγικῶν in Suidas are a description of one and the same work, the one still extant), and a commentary on the Republic of Plato. The two latter have perished. In his style he imitated Xenophon with some success. Nothing further is known of his personal history. It is conjectured that he must himself have been engaged in military service.

OPELIUS DIADUMENIANUS. [Diadumenianus.]
OPHELII ON ('Ophelion). 1. An Athenian comic poet, probably of the Middle Comedy, of whom Suidas says that Athenaeus, in his second book, mentions the following as being his plays:—

Δευκαλίων, Κάλλαυρως, Κένταυρος, Σάτυρος, Μοναστρότος, or rather, according to the emendation of Toup, Μοναστρότος. The last three of these titles are elsewhere assigned by Suidas to Phrynicus. In the second book of Athenaeus, which Suidas quotes, none of the titles are mentioned, but Ophelion is thrice quoted, without the name of the play referred to (Athen. ii. pp. 43 f., 66, d. 67, a.) ; and, in the third book, Athenaeus quotes the Callaischorus, and alludes (§ 380), which Suidas does not mention (iii. p. 106, n.). The reasons for assigning him to the Middle Comedy are, the reference to Plato in Athen. ii. p. 66, d., and the statement that he used some verses which were also found in Eubulus (Athen. ii. p. 43, f., where the name of Ophelion is rightly substituted by Porson for that of Philetas). Who may have been the Callaischorus, whose name formed the title of one of his plays, we cannot tell; but if he was the same as the Callaischorus, who formed the subject of one of the plays of Theopompus, the date of Ophelion would be fixed by the 100th Olympiad, B.C. 380. There is, perhaps, one more reference to Ophelion, again corrupted into Philetas, in Hesychius, s.v. Θ'οις, (Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. i. p. 415, vol. iii. p. 389; Porph., ad Menand. pp. x. xi.)

2. A Peripatetic philosopher, the slave and disc. of Lycon (Diog. Laert. v. 723). [P. S.]

OPHELION ('Ophelion). 1. A painter of a unknown time and country, on whose pictures of Pan and Aërope there are epigrams in the Greek Anthology. (Anth. Pal. vi. 315, 316; Brunn, Anal. vol. ii. p. 382.)

2. A sculptor, the son of Aristodices, was the maker of a statue of Sextus Pompeius, in the Royal Museum of Paris. (Clarae, Catal. No. 150.) [P. S.]

OPHELIAS (Ophelias), king or ruler of Cyrene, was a native of Pella in Macedonia: his father's name was Seleucus. He appears to have accompanied Alexander during his expedition in Asia, but his name is first mentioned as commanding one of the triremes of the fleet of that monarch on the Indus, B.C. 327. (Arrian, Ind. 16.) After the death of the Macedonian king, he followed the fortunes of Ptolemy, by whom he was sent, in B.C. 322, at the head of a considerable army, to take advantage of the civil war which had broken out in the Cyrenaican. (Thimbron.) This object he successfully accomplished, totally defeated Thimbron and the party that supported him, and established the supremacy of Egypt over Cyrene itself and its dependencies. But shortly after, the civil dissensions having broken out again led Ptolemy himself to repair to Cyrene, which he this time appears to have reduced to complete subjection. (Diod. xviii. 21; Arrian, ap. Phot. p. 70, a.) The subsequent operations of Ophelias are involved in great obscurity. It seems certain that he was still left by Ptolemy at this time in the government of Cyrene, which he probably continued to hold on behalf of the Egyptian king until about the year B.C. 313: but no mention is found in his name given account of Diodorus (xviii. 79) of the revolt of the Cyrenaeans in that year, which was suppressed by Agis, the general of Ptolemy. Yet it cannot have been long after that he availed himself of the continued disaffection of that people towards Egypt to assume the government of Cyrene as an independent state. The continual wars in which Ptolemy was engaged against Antigonus, and the natural difficulties of assailing Cyrene, secured him against invasion; and he appears to have continued in undisputed possession of the country for near five years. (Paus. i. 6. § 8; Droysen, Hellenism, vol. i. pp. 414, 417.) The power to which Ophelias had thus attained, and the strong mercenary force which he was able to bring into the field, caused Agathocles, during his expedition in Africa (a.c. 328) to turn his attention towards the new ruler of Cyrene as likely to prove an useful ally against the Carthaginians. In order to gain him over he promised to cede to him whatever conquests their combined forces might make in Africa, reserving to himself only the possession of Sicily. The ambition of Ophelias was thus aroused: he put himself at the head of a powerful army, and notwithstanding all the natural obstacles which presented themselves on his route, succeeded in reaching the Carthaginian territories after a toilsome and perilous march of more than two months' duration. He was received by his new ally with every demonstration of friendship, and the two armies encamped near each other: but not many days had elapsed when Agathocles took an opportunity treacherously to surprise the camp of the Cyrenaeans, and Ophelias himself perished in the confusion. His troops, thus left without a leader, joined the standard of Sertorius. (Diod. iv. 42; Justin. 7. Oros. iv. 6; Poly. v. 3. § 4; Suid. s. e. Οφελίας.) Justin styles Ophelias "rex Cyrenaenum," but it seems improbable that he had really assumed the regal title. He was married to an Athenian, Eurydice, the daughter of Miltiades, and appears to have maintained friendly relations with Athens. (Diod. xx. 40; Plut. Demet. 14.) [E. H. B.]

OPHELTEES (Οφελτέες). 1. A son of Lycurgus, who was killed by a snake at Nemea, as his nurse Hyppiyle had left him alone. (Apollod. i. 9. § 14; Paus. i. 15. § 3; comp. ADRASTUS.)

2. One of the Tyrrenians who wanted to carry off Dionysus, and were therefore metamorphosed into dolphins. (Hygin. Fug. 134.)

3. The son of Peneleus and father of Damasichthon, king of Thebes. (Paus. ix. 5. § 8.) [L.S.]

OPHION (Οφιων), a Titan, was married to Euryone, with whom he shared the supremacy previous to the reign of Cronus and Rhea; but being conquered by the latter, he and Euryone were thrown into Oceanus or Tartarus. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 503, &c.; Teetza, ad Lyc. 1191.) There are two other mythical beings of the same name. (Ov. Met. xii. 245; Claudian. Rapt. Pros. iii. 348.) [L. S.]

OPILTIUS. [Opiliius.]

OPILTIUS, AURELIUS, the freedman of an Epicurean, taught at Rome, first philosophy, then rhetoric, and, finally, grammar, and is placed by Suetonius next in order to Saevius Nicano (Nicano.). He gave up his school upon the condemnation of Rutilius Rufus, whom he accompanied to Smyrna, and there the two friends grew old together in the enjoyment of each other's society. He composed several learned works upon various subjects; one of these in particular, divided into nine parts, and named Musea, is referred to by A. Gellius (i. 25), who quotes from it an explanation of the word Induciae, accompanied by a most foolish derivation. To another piece termed Pinae an acrostic was prefixed on his own name which he there gave as Opillius. (Sueton. de *Iul. de Mental. 5; Lersch, Sprachphilosophie der Alten. iii. p. 150.)

OPIMIUS.

COIN OF THE OPIMIA GENS.

OPIMIUS. 1. C. Opimius Pansa, quaestor b.c. 294, was killed in the quaestorium or quaestor's tent, in an attack made by the Samnites upon the Roman camp. (Liv. xiii. 32.)

2. Q. Opimius Q. f. Q. n., was consul b.c. 154, with L. Postumius Albinus. Opimius in his consulship carried on war with the Oxybii and Deciatae, Ligurian tribes on the northern side of the Alps, who had attacked the territory of Massilia, the allies of the Roman people, and had laid waste the towns of Antipolis and Nican, which belonged to Massilia. Opimius subdued these people without any difficulty, and obtained in consequence the honour of a triumph. (Polyb. xxxii. 5, 7, 8; *Liv. Epit. 47; Fasti Capitol.; Osebus. 76.) This Opimius seems to have been a man of as little principle as his son, and was notorious in his youth for his riotous living. Lucullus described him as "formosus homo et famosus" (Nonius, iv. s. v. Pansa, p. 638, ed. Gothofred.), and Cicero speaks of him as "qui adolescentem male ausisset." (De Orat. ii. 68, fn.). In the same passage Cicero relates a joke of Opimius.

3. L. Opimius Q. f. Q. n., son of the preceding, was praetor b.c. 125, in which year he marched against Fregellae, which had risen in revolt, in order to obtain the Roman franchise. The town was betrayed to Opimius by one of its citizens, Q. Nu- mitorius Pullus, and severe vengeance was taken upon the inhabitants. (*Liv. Epit. 60; Cie. De Invent. ii. 34; Anton. in Pison. p. 17, ed. Orelli; Vell. Pat. ii. 6; Plut. C. Gracch. 3.) Opimius belonged to the high aristocratic party, and possessed great influence in the senate. He was one of the most violent and, at the same time, one of the most formidable opponents of C. Gracchus; and accordingly when he first became a candidate for the consulship, C. Gracchus used all his influence with the people to induce them to prefer C. Fannius Strabo in his stead. (Plut. C. Gracch. 11.) Gracchus succeeded in his object, and Fannius was consul in b.c. 122; but he was unable to prevent the election of Opimius for the following year, and had only rendered the latter a still bitterer enemy by the affront he had put upon him. Opimius's colleague was Q. Fabius Maximus Allobrogicus. The history of the consulship of Opimius, b.c. 121, is the last of the life of C. Gracchus. It is only necessary to state here in detail how Opimius entered, with all the zeal of an unscrupulous partisan and the animosity of a personal enemy, into the measures which the senate adopted to crush Gracchus, and forced on matters to an open rupture. As soon as he was armed by the senate with the well-known decree, "That the consuls should take care that the republic suffered no injury," he resolved to make away with Gracchus, and succeeded, as is related in the life of the latter. Opimius and his party abused their victory most savagely, and are said to have killed more than three thousand persons. [For details see Vol. ii. pp. 197, 198, and the authorities there quoted.]

In the following year, b.c. 120, Opimius was accused by Q. Decius, tribune of the plebs, of having put Roman citizens to death without a trial. He was defended by the consul, C. Papiarius Carbo, who had formerly belonged to the party of Grac- chus, but had gone over to that of the aristocracy. Although the judges now belonged to the equestrian order by one of the laws of Gracchus, they were too much terrified by the events of the preceding year to condemn the person who had been the prime mover in them, and accordingly acquitted the accused. (*Liv. Epit. 61; Cie. de Orat. ii. 25.) Opimius thus escaped for the present, but his vengefulness and corruption brought him before the judges again a few years afterwards, when he met with a different fate. He had been at the head of the commission which was sent into Africa in b.c. 112, in order to divide the dominions of Micipsa between Jugurtha and Adherbal, and had allowed himself to be bribed by Jugurtha, to assign to him the better part of the country. This scandalous conduct had passed unnoticed at the time; but when the defeat of the Roman army, through the misconduct of Albinus, in b.c. 109, had roused the indignation of the Roman people, the tribune, C. Mamilius Liternatus, brought forward a bill for inquiry into the conduct of all those who had received bribes from Jugurtha. By this law Opimius was condemned along with many others of the leading members of the aristocracy. He went into exile to Dyrrhachium in Epirus, where he lived for some years, hated and insulted by the people, and where he eventually died in great poverty. *He richly deserved his punishment, and met with a due recompense for his cruel and ferocious conduct towards C. Gracchus and his party. Cicero, on the contrary, who, after his consulship, had identified himself with the aristocratic party, frequently laments the fate of Opimius, and complains of the cruelty shown towards a man who had conferred such signal services upon his country as the conquest of Fregellae and the destruction of Gracchus. He calls him the saviour of the commonwealth, and characterises his condemnation as a blot upon the Roman dominion, and a disgrace to the Roman people. (Sull. Jug. 16, 40; Veil. Pat. ii. 7; Plut. C. Gracch. 16; Cic. pro Plane. 26, Brut. 34, in Fison. 39, pro Sest. 67; Schol. Bub. pro Sest. p. 311, ed. Orelli.)

The year in which Opimius was consul (n. c. 121) was remarkable for the extraordinary heat of the autumn, and thus the vintage of this year was of an unprecedented quality. This wine long remained celebrated as the Vinum Opimianum, and was preserved for an almost incredible space of time. Cicero speaks of it as in existence when he wrote his Brutus, eighty-five years after the consularship of Opimius (Brut. 83). Velleius Paterculus, who wrote in the reign of Tiberius, says (ii. 7) that none of this wine was then in existence; but Pliny, who published his work in the reign of Vespasian, makes mention of its existence even in his day, two hundred years afterwards. It was reduced, he says, to the consistence of rough honey; and, like other very old wines, was so strong, and harsh, and bitter, as to be undrinkable until largely diluted with water. (Plin. H. N. xiv. 4. 6; Dict. of Ant. s. v. Vinum.)

4. L. Opimius, served in the army of L. Luatius Catalus, consul b. c. 102, and obtained great credit by a Sabinian, who had challenged him (Amphelius, c. 22).

5. Q. Opimius L. F. Q. n. was brought to trial before Verres in his praetorship (b. c. 74), on the plea that he had interceded against the Lex Cornelii, when he was tribune in the preceding year (b. c. 75); but, in reality, because he had in his tribunate opposed the wishes of some Roman noble. He was condemned by Verres, and deprived of all his property. It appears from the Pseudo-Aconius that Opimius had in his tribunate supported the law of the consul C. Aurelius Cotta, which restored to the tribunes the right of being elected to the other magistracies of the state after the tribunate, of which privilege they had been deprived by a Lex Cornelia of the dictator Sulla. (Cic. Verr. i. 60; Pseudo-Acon. in Verr. p. 200, ed. Orelli.)

6. Opimius, is mentioned as one of the judges by Cicero (ad Att. iv. 6, § 6) in b. c. 54. The word which follows Opimius, being either his cognomen or the name of his tribe, is corrupt. (See Orelli, ad loc.) This Opimius may be the same as the following.

7. M. Opimius, praefect of the cavalry in the army of Metellus Scipio, the father-in-law of Pompey, was taken prisoner by Cn. Domitius Calvinus, b. c. 48. (Cass. B. C. iii. 38.)

8. Opimius, a poor man mentioned by Horace (Sat. ii. 3. 124), of whom nothing is known.

OPIS. [Urbs.]

O’PITER, an old Roman pnenomen, given to a person born after the death of his father, but in the lifetime of his grandfather. (Festus, p. 184, ed. Müller; Val. Max. de Nom. Res. 12; Placidus, p. 491.) We find this pnenomen in the Virginia Gens, for instance.

L. OPITE’RNIIUS, a Faliscan, a priest of Baco, and one of the prime movers in the introduction of the worship of this god into Rome b. c. 186. (Liv. xxxix. 17.)

OPLACUS. [Obsdium.]

OPPIA. 1. A Vestal virgin, put to death in b. c. 483 for violation of her vow of chastity. (Liv. ii. 42.)

2. Vestia Oppia, a woman of Atella in Campania, resided at Capua during the second Punic war, and is said to have daily offered up sacrifices for the success of the Romans, while Capua was in the hands of the Carthaginians. She was accordingly rewarded by the Romans in b. c. 210, when the city fell into their power. (Liv. xxvi. 39, 34.)

3. The wife of L. Minidius or Mindius. (Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 23.) [MINIDIIUS.]

O’PPIA GENs, plebeian. This gens belonged to the tribus Terentina, and was one of considerable antiquity, and some importance even in early times, since a member of it, Sp. Oppius Cornicen, was one of the second decemviri, b. c. 450. We even read of a Vestal virgin of the name of Oppia as early as b. c. 483 (Liv. ii. 43), but it is difficult to believe that a plebeian could have filled this dignity at so early a period. None of the Oppii, however, ever obtained the consulsiphip, although the name occurs at intervals in Roman history from the time of the second decemviri to that of the early emperors. [Compare however Oppius, No. 19.] The principal cognomina in this gens are Ca pito, Cornicen or Cornicenus, and Salinator; but most of the Oppii had no surname. Those of Oppius and Capito and Salinator are given below. [OPPIUs.] On coins we find the surnames Capito and Salinator.

OPPIA’NICUS, the name of three persons, two of whom play a prominent part in the oration of Cicero for Cluentius. 1. Statius Albius Oppianicus, was accused by his step-son A. Cluentius of having attempted to procure his death by poisoning, b. c. 74, and was condemned. 2. Oppianicus, the son of the preceding, accused Cluentius himself in b. c. 66, of three distinct acts of poisoning. 3. C. Oppianicus, the brother of No. 1, said to have been poisoned by him (Cic. pro Cluent. 11). A full account of the two trials is given under CLUENTIUS.

OPPIA’NUS, a person to whom M. Varro wrote a letter, which is referred to by A. Gallius (xiv. 7).

OPPIA’NUS (Όππιάνος). Under this name there are extant two Greek hexameter poems, one on fishing, Aσφονδυς, and the other on hunting, Κυνηγεύς; as also a prose paraphrase of a third poem on hawking, Άγουρκα. These were, till towards the end of the last century, universally attributed to the same person; an opinion which not only made it impossible to reconcile with each other all the passages relating to Oppian that are to be found in ancient writers, but also rendered contradictory the evidence derived from the perusal of the poems themselves. At length, in the year 1776, J. G. Schneider in his first edition of these poems threw out the conjecture that they were not written by the same individual, but by two persons of the same name, who have been constantly confounded together; an hypothesis, which, if not absolutely free from objection, certainly removes so many difficulties, and moreover affords so convenient a mode of introducing various facts and remarks which would otherwise be incon- sistent and contradictory, that it will be adopted on this occasion. The chief (if not the only) objection to Schneider’s conjecture arises from its novelty, from its positively contradicting some ancient authorities, and from the strong negative fact that for nearly sixteen hundred years no writer had found any trace of more than one poet of the name of Oppian. But the weight of this antecedent difficulty is probably more than counter-balanced by the internal evidence in favour of Schneider's hypothesis; and with respect to the ancient testimonies to be adduced on either side, it will be seen that he pays at least as much deference to them as do those who embrace the opposite opinion. The chief reason in favour of his opinion is the fact that the author of the "Halieutica" was not born at the same place as the author of the "Cynegetica," an argument which some persons have vainly attempted to overthrow by altering the text of the latter poem. The other, which is scarcely less convincing, though not so evident to everybody's comprehension, arises from the difference of style and language observable in the two poems, which is so great as to render it morally impossible that they could have been written by the same person: for, though it may be said that this difference only shows that the author improved in writing by practice, this answer will not bear examination, as in the first place the inferior poem (viz. the "Cynegetica") was written after, not before, the other; and secondly, the author is commonly said to have died at the early age of thirty, which scarcely affords sufficient time for so great an alteration and improvement to have taken place. The points relating to each poem separately will therefore be first mentioned, and afterwards some historical facts commonly related concerning one of the authors, though it is difficult to determine which.

I. The writer of the "Halieutica," "Aleinuk, is said by (probably) all authorities to have been born in Cilicia, though they are not so well agreed as to whether he was a contemporary of the author of an anonymous Greek Life of Oppian says it was either Corycus or Anazarba, Suidas says Corycus, and this is probably confirmed by Oppian himself, in the following passage:

"Ανθέους δὲ πρώτα περίφορα πειθός θύρη, Οὐρα χειμέρας ειρωκόλου εντύνοραι Πάτηρ ευναήτες ὑπὲρ Ἀρπηνδίων αἵρεσις. ὁσπίό σ᾽ Ἰεράνιοι πόλει, ναυαλικοὺς ἐντοῦ Καρυόκτονα, νοαούς καὶ θαυμάστην Ἐλείσαναν. (ii. 205, &c.)"

This passage, however, can hardly be fairly said to determine the point, for (as to show the uncertainty of almost everything relating to Oppian) while Schneider considers that it proves that the poet was born at Corycus, Fabricius and others have adduced it as evidence to show that he was not. Respecting his date, there has been equal difference of opinion. Athenaeus says (i. p. 13) he lived shortly before his own time, and Atheneaeus flourished, according to Mr. Clinton ("Fusti Rom. A. D. 194"), about the end of the second century. This testimony may be considered as almost conclusive with respect to Oppian's date, though it has been attempted to evade it, either by placing Athenaeus more than thirty years later, or by considering the passage in question to be a spurious interpolation. It is also confirmed by Eusebius ("Chron. ap. S. Hieron. vol. viii. p. 729, ed. Veron. 1736") and Syncellus ("Chron. vet. pp. 352, 353, ed. Paris. 1652"), who place Oppian in the year 1711 (or 1713), and by Suidas, who says he lived in the reign of "Marcus Antoninus," i.e. not Caracalla, as Kuster and others suppose, but M. Aurelius Antoninus, A. D. 161—180. If the date here assigned to Oppian be correct, the emperor to whom the "Halieutica" are dedicated, and who is called (i. 3) "γαίς ἐπιταυρος, Αὐτωνία, will be M. Aurelius; the allusions to his son (i. 65, 78, ii. 683, iv. 5, v. 45) will refer to Commodus; and the poem may be supposed to have been written after A. D. 177, which is the year when the latter was admitted to a participation of the imperial dignity. If the writer of the "Halieutica" was supposed to have lived under Caracalla, the name "Antoninus" will certainly suit emperor perfectly well, as the appellation "Aurelius Antoninus" was conferred upon him when he was appointed Caesar by his father, A. D. 196. (Clinton's "Fusti Rom.") But if we examine the other passages above referred to, the difficulty of applying them to Caracalla will be at once apparent, as that emperor (as far as we learn from history) had no son,—though some persons have even gone so far as to conjecture that he must have had one, because Oppian alludes to him! (Schneider's first ed. p. 346.) The "Halieutica" consist of about 3500 hexameter lines, divided into five books, of which the first two treat of the natural history of fishes, and the other three of the art of fishing. The author displays in parts considerable zoological knowledge, but inserts also several fables and absurdities, which are merely so much poetical ornament, but as grave matter of fact. In respect, however, he was not more credulous than most of his contemporaries, and many of his stories are copied by Aelian and later writers.

The following zoological points in the poem are perhaps the most worthy of notice. He mentions (i. 217, &c.) the story of the remora, or sucker (κερατόνδρα) being able to stop a ship when under full sail by sticking to the keel, and reproves the incredulity of those who doubt its truth (cf. Plut. "Sympos. ii. 7"); he was aware of the peculiarity of the cœlancanth, or hermit-crab (καρπακῦδα), which is provided with no shell of its own, but seizes upon the first empty one that it can find (i. 320, &c.); he gives a beautiful and correct description of the nautilus (i. 333, &c.); he says that the murena, or lamprey, copulates with land-scorpions, which, for the time, lay aside their venom (i. 554, &c.); he notices (ii. 56, &c. and iii. 149, &c.) the dangerousness occasioned by the touch of the torpedo (βατόες); and the black fluid emitted by the sepia, or cuttle-fish, by means of which it escapes its pursuers (iii. 156, &c.); he says that a fish called "sargus" copulates with goats, and that it is caught by the fisherman's dressing himself up in a goat's skin, and so enticing it on shore (iv. 308, &c.); he several times mentions the dolphin, calls it, for its swiftness and beauty, the king among fishes, as the eagle among birds, the lion among beasts, and the serpent among reptiles (ii. 533, &c.), and relates (v. 448, &c.) an anecdote, somewhat similar to those mentioned by Pliny ("H. N. ix. 8"); and which he says happened about his own time, of a dolphin that was so fond of a little boy that it used to come to him whenever he called it by its name, and suffered him to ride upon its back, and at last was supposed to have pined away with grief on account of his death. (Penn. Cyclop. s. e.) In point of style and language, as well as poetical embellishment, the "Halieutica" are so much superior to the "Cynegetica," that Schneider (as we have seen) considers this fact to furnish one of the strongest proofs in favour of his hypothesis; and it is probable that the greater part of the praise that has been bestowed upon Oppian in a poetical point of view should be considered as referring to this poem only. A paraphrase of the "Halieutica" in Greek prose, bearing the name of Euteneius, is still in existence in several European libraries, but has never been published. (See Lapic. Bibb. Vindob. vol. ii. p. 260, &c. vii. 488, &c. ed. Kollari.) The two poems attributed to Oppian have generally been published together. The only separate edition of the Greek text of the "Halieutica" is the "editio princeps," by Phil. Junta, Florent. 1515, 8vo., a book that is valuable not only for its rarity, but also for the correctness of the text. A Latin translation in hexameter verse by Laur. Lippibus was published in 1476, 4to. Florent. (of which not uncommon volume a particular account is given by Dibdin in his Biblioth. Spec. vol. ii. p. 183), and several times reprinted. It was translated into English verse by — Diaper and J. Jones, Oxford, 1723; into French by J. M. Lines, Paris, 8vo. 1817, and into Italian by A. M. Salvini, Firenze, 8vo. 1728.

II. The author of the "Cynegetica," Ὄππιανος, was a native of Apamea or Pella in Syria, as he himself plainly tells us in the following passage, where, speaking of the river Orontes, he says:—

Ἀδύνατος ἐν μακραίοις ἑπαρχίαίοις θείοις, Ἀλέν ἄδειμνον καὶ τέχνης ἐγγύς δέδομαι,

Χέρων ὢμοί καὶ νήσιον, ἑίμην πάλιν, βατι χείλειον. (ii. 125, &c.)

And again, after speaking of the temple of Memnon in the neighbourhood of Apamea, he proceeds:—

Ἀλλὰ τὰ μὲν κατὰ κόμον ἄλογον εὐρεῖ κάλλαν,

Πάτρης ἡμέτρης ἐρατή Πυλπληθία μολῷτ. (ii. 156.)

In order to avoid the conclusion to which these passages lead respecting the birth-place of their author, it has been proposed to alter in the former, ἑίμην into ἐθήν, and, in the latter, ἡμέτρησις into ἡμέτρητος; but these emendations, which are purely conjectural, have not been received into the text by any but the proposer. The author addresses his poem to the emperor Caracalla, whom he calls (i. 5) and the tenth and eleventh lines have been brought forward as a presumptive evidence that he wrote it after Caracalla had been associated with his father in the empire, A. d. 198, and before the death of the latter, A. d. 211.

The "Cynegetica" consist of about 2100 hexameter lines, divided into four books. The last of these is imperfect, and perhaps a fifth book may also have been lost, as the anonymous author of the Life of Oppian says the poem consisted of that number of books, though Suidas mentions only four. There is probably an allusion in this poem to the "Halieutica" (i. 77—80), which has been thought to imply that both poems were written by the same person; but this is not the necessary explanation of the passage in question, which may merely mean (as Schneider suggests) that the writer of the "Cynegetica" was acquainted with the other poem, and meant his own to be a sort of continuation of it. It has also been supposed that in two other passages (i. 27, 31) the author alludes to some of his own earlier poems. There are certainly several points of similitude between this poem and the "Halieutica": for here, too, the author's knowledge of natural history appears to have been quite equal to that of his contemporaries (though not without numerous fables), while the accuracy of some of his descriptions has been often noticed. The following zoological points are perhaps the most interesting. He says expressly that the tusks of the elephant are not teeth, but horns (ii. 491, &c.), and mentions a report that these animals are able to speak (ii. 540); he states that there is no such thing as a "female rhinoceros, but that all these animals are of the male sex (ii. 560); that the lioness when pregnant for the first time brings forth five whoels at the birth, the second time four, the next three, then two, and lastly only one (ii. 58); that the bear brings forth her cubs half-formed and licks them into shape (ii. 159); that so great is the equality between the wolf and the lamb, that even after death if two drums be made of their hides, the wolf's hide will put to silence the lamb's (iii. 282); that the hyaenas annually change their sex (iii. 288); that the boar's teeth contain fire inside them (iii. 379); that the ichneumon leaps down the throat of the crocodile, while lying asleep with its mouth wide open, and devours its viscera (iii. 407). He thinks it necessary to state expressly that it is not true that there are no male tigers (iii. 357). He gives a very spirited description of the giraffe (iii. 461), "the exactness of which," says Mr. Holme (Trans. of the Ashmolean Society, vol. ii.), "is in some points remarkable; particularly in the observation that the so-called horns do not consist of horny substance (ὅβοτ κέρας κεφαλήν), and in the allusion to the pencils of hair (δέκτακα κεφαλιά) with which they are tipped." He adds, "That the animal must have been seen alive by Oppian is evident from his remark on the brilliancy of the eyes and the balking motion of the hinder limbs" (Penn. Cyclop.). In style, language, and poetical merit, the "Cynegetica" are far inferior to the "Halieutica." Schneider, indeed, calls the poem "durum, inconsummata, forma total incompositum, et saepissime ab ingenio, usu, et analogia Graeci sermonis abhorrente" (Pref. to second ed. p. xiv.), and thinks that when Dan. Heinsius spoke of the Latinisms that deformed Oppian's style (Dissert. de Nonni "Dionys." ap. P. Cunn. Animadvers. p. 196), he was alluding especially to the "Cynegetica." The earliest edition of the Greek text of this poem, apart from the "Halieutica," appeared in 1549, 4to. Paris, ap. Vascosanum. It was also published by Belin de Baulu, Argentor. 1768, large 8vo, Gr. et Lat., with learned notes, too often deformed by personal controversy with Schneider. The editor intended to publish the "Halieutica" in a second volume, but of this only forty pages were printed, which are rarely to be met with. It was translated into Latin verse by Joannes Bodinus, Paris, 1553, 4to;
and also by David Peifer, whose translation was made in 1555, but first published in Schneider's second edition, Lips. 1813. There is a French translation by Florent Chrestien, Paris, 1575, 4to., and by Belin de Ballu, Straub. 1797, 8vo.; an English version of the first book by J. Mawer, Lond. 1736, 8vo.; and a German one by S. H. Lieberkühn, Leipzig. 1755, 8vo. An anonymous Greek prose paraphrase of part of the poem was published by Andr. Mustoxyes and Dem. Schinas, in their "Συλλογή Αρωματικών Ανεκδότων Σκηνών," Venice 1817, 8vo., which is probably the same as that which is commonly attributed to Euteneius (see Lambeck, Biblioth. Vindob. l. c.). The earliest edition of both poems is the Aldine, Venet. 1517, 8vo., containing the Greek text, with the Latin translation of the "Hалиeутика," by Laur. Lippius. The most complete edition that has hitherto been published is that by J. G. Schneider, Argent. 1776, 8vo. Gr. et Lat., with copious and learned notes, containing also a Greek paraphrase of the "Изютица" that will be mentioned below. The editor published some additional notes and observations in his "Analectia Critica," Francol. 1777, 8vo. fasc. i. p. 31, &c. This edition was executed when Schneider was a young man, in conjunction with Brunck, who assisted him in the "Cynegeticæ" and accordingly it exhibits many bold corrections of the text, which he withdrew in his second edition, published in 1813, Lips. 8vo. This edition is unfinished, and contains only the Greek text of the two poems, Peifer's Latin translation of the "Cynegeticæ," mentioned above, some short notes relating to the text, and a preface, in which Schneider repeats his conviction that the "Halieutica" and "Cynegeticæ" were written by two different persons, and replies to the objections of Belin de Ballu. The last edition of the two poems is that published by F. Didot, together with N. Cander and Marcellus Sidetes, in his collection of Greek classical authors, Paris, large 8vo. 1846, edited by F. S. Lehrs. It contains a Latin prose translation and the Greek paraphrase of the "Изютица," but (it is believed) is at present unfinished. A Latin translation of both poems was published in 1555, Paris, 4to., that of the "Halieutica" in verse by Laur. Lippius, and that of the "Cynegeticæ" in prose, by Aëd. Turnebus; and an Italian translation of both poems by A. M. Salvini was published in 1773 by Firenze, 8vo. 1813.

III. If we assume that there were two poets of the name of Oppian, there are two other questions relating to them that require to be examined into: 1. To which are we to refer the biographical particulars contained in the anonymous Greek Life of Oppian? and 2. Which, if either, was the author of the poem on hawking, "Ηησυγάδα."

1. The Greek Life states that Oppian was a native of Cilicia, and that his father's name was Agesilus, and his mother's Zenodota. He received an excellent education in all the liberal sciences, especially music, geometry, and grammar, under the personal superintendence of his father, who was one of the principal persons in his native city, and who suffered himself to be so engrossed by his philosophical studies, that, when on one occasion the emperor Severus visited his city, he neglected to pay his respects to him along with the other chief magistrates of the place. For this offence Agesilus was banished to the island of Melita, and was accompanied in his exile by his son, who was then about thirty years of age. Here Oppian wrote (or perhaps rather finished) his poems, which he took to Rome after the death of Severus, A. D. 211, and presented to his son "Antoninus" (i. e. Caracalla), or, according to Sozomen (Hist. Eccles. præf.), to Severus himself. The emperor is said to have been so much pleased with the poems, that he not only reprieved, at his request, the sentence of his father's banishment, but also presented him with a piece of gold (σταφή χρυσοῦ, or νόμισμα χρυ- σον, probably about fifteen shillings and sixpence) for each verse that he composed. Shortly after his return to his native country he died of some pestilential disease, at the early age of thirty. His countrymen raised a monument in his honour, and inscribed on it five verses (which are preserved), which lament his early death, and allude to his poems, but not in such definite terms as to enable us to decide which are the poems intended. The anonymous biographer does not mention the "Halieutica," but only the "Cynegeticæ" and "Изютица."

It is quite clear (if the hypothesis adopted in this article be correct) that the whole of these particulars cannot apply to either of the poets of the name of Oppian, nor, perhaps, is it possible to decide for certain how they are to be apportioned to each. Probably the epitaph and the early death belong to the Cilian, that is, to the author of the "Halieutica," and the anecdote respecting the "golden verses" may relate to the other poet.

2. With respect to the poem on hawking, "Ηησυγάδα," if it is to be attributed to either of the Oppians, it probably belongs to the younger; but Schneider considers that it is more probably the work of Dionysius. The poem itself, which is said to have consisted of five books, is no longer extant, but there is a Greek prose paraphrase of three books by Euteneius. This was first published with a Latin translation by Eras. Windigius, Hafniae, 1702, 8vo., and is inserted in Schneider's former edition, and in Didot's. The first book treats of tame birds and birds of prey; the second of waterfowls; and the third of the various modes of catching birds. Of the poetical merits of the work, as it no longer exists in the form of a poem, it is scarcely possible to judge. (See Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. t. p. 590, &c. ed. Hallès; J. G. Schneider's preface and notes to his first edition, and the preface to his second; Hoffmann's Lex. Bibliograph. art. "Oppianus," by F. Ritter, in Ersh and Graber's Εγκυκλοπαίδια.)

W. A. G. OPPIANUS. SEVIIUS, a wealthy Roman of Cæsarian, whose dying advice to his two sons, Aulus and Tiberius, is related by Horace. (Sat. ii. 1. 168, &c.)

O'PPIUS. 1. M. Oppius, was elected, with Sext. Manilias, as the commander of the soldiers, in their accession to the Aventine during the second decemvirate, b. c. 449 (Liv. iii. 51; Dionys. xi. 43, 44).

2. C. Oppius, was elected one of the tribunes of the plebs on the overthrow of the second decemvirate, b. c. 449 (Liv. iii. 54).

3. C. Oppius, one of the plebs, b. c. 213, in the middle of the second Punic war, carried a law to curtail the expenses and luxuries of Roman women. It enacted that no woman should have more than half an ounce of gold, nor wear a dress of different colours, nor ride in a carriage in the city, or in any town, or within a mile of it, unless on account of public sacrifices. This law was repealed in b.c. 185, notwithstanding the vehement opposition of Oppius. (Liv. xxv. 8; Val. Max. ix. 1. § 3; Tac. Ann. iii. 33, 34.)

4. C. Oppius, a praefect of the allies, was sent by the consul P. Aelius Paetus, in b.c. 201, with some raw levies to attack the territories of the Boii, but was cut off by the enemy with a large number of his men (Liv. xxxii. 2).

5. L. Oppius, tribune of the plebs, b.c. 197 (Liv. xxxii. 28), is probably the same as L. Oppius Salinator [No. 6], though Livy omits his praenomen.

6. L. Oppius Salinator, plebeian aedile, b.c. 193, was sent in the following year to convey a fleet of twenty ships to Sicily. He was praetor in b.c. 191, and obtained Sardinia as his province. (Liv. xxxiv. 23, 24, xxxvi. 2).

7. Q. Oppius, one of the Roman generals in the Mithridatic war, b.c. 88. He is called proconsul in the Epitome of Livy, from which we infer that he had been praetor, and was afterwards sent, as was frequently the case, with the title of proconsul to take the command of an army. He had possession of the city of Laodicea in Phrygia, near the river Lyceu; but when Mithridates had conquered the whole of the surrounding country, the inhabitants of Laodicea gave up Oppius to the king on the promise of their receiving pardon by so doing. Mithridates did no injury to Oppius, but carried him with him in his various campaigns, exhibiting to the people of Asia a Roman general as a prisoner. Mithridates subsequently surrendered him to Sulla. (Liv. Epit. 78; Athen. v. p. 213 a; Appian, Mithr. 17, 20, 112.)

8. Oppius, stated by an ancient scholar to have been praetor in Achaia, and to have been accused at the instigation of Verres. We may therefore place his praetorship about b.c. 90. (Schol. in Cic. Verr. p. 369; Pseudo-Ascon. in Cic. Verr. pp. 128, 171, ed. Orelli.)

9. P. Oppius, was quaestor in Bithynia to M. Aurelius Cotta, who was consul in b.c. 74, and who remained in Bithynia for the next three or four years. Oppius appears to have appropriated to his own use many of the supplies intended for the troops; and when he was charged with this by Cotta, he forgot himself so far as to draw his sword upon the proconsul. Cotta accordingly dismissed him from the province, and sent a letter to the senate, in which he formally accused Oppius of malversation, and of making an attempt upon the life of his imperator. He was brought to trial in b.c. 69, and was defended by Cicero. The speech which Cicero delivered in his favour is lost, but it seems to have been of considerable merit, as it is referred to several times by Quintilian. (Dion Cass. xxxvi. 23; Quintil. vi. 10. § 12; Sall. Hist. iii. p. 210. ed. Gerseh; Cic. Frugm. vol. iv. p. 444, ed. Orelli; Drummann, Geschichte Romas, vol. v. p. 343.)

Together with Cornelius Balbus, with whose name that of Oppius is usually coupled, he managed most of Caesar's private affairs, and was well acquainted with all his plans and wishes. In the time of A. Gellius (xvii. 9) there was extant a collection of Caesar's letters to Oppius and Balbus, written in a kind of cipher. The regard which Caesar had for Oppius is shown by an anecdot related both by Plutarch (Caes. 17) and Suetonius (Caes. 72), who tell us, that when Caesar with his retinue was on one occasion taken by a storm and compelled to take refuge in a poor peasant's hut, which contained only a single chimney, and that hardly large enough for one person, he made Oppius, who was in delicate health, sleep in the hut, while he and the rest of his friends slept in the porch. On the breaking out of the civil war in b.c. 49, the name of Oppius often occurs in Cicero's letters. Oppius and Balbus had frequent correspondence with Cicero, in which they endeavoured to quiet his apprehensions as to Caesar's designs, and used all their efforts to persuade him to espouse the cause of the latter. There is in the collection of Cicero's letters a letter written to him in the joint names of Oppius and Balbus, accompanied by a letter of Caesar's to them, in which the great Roman at the very commencement of the civil war promises to use his victory with moderation, and says that he will try to overcome his enemies by mercy and kindness, a promise which he felt deeply bound to the end of his life. (Cic. ad Att. i. 7; comp. ad Att. ix. 13, ad Fam. ii. 16, ad Att. xi. 17, 18, xii. 19.) To the death of Caesar, Oppius continued to hold the same place in his favour and esteem, and in the year before his death we read that Oppius and Balbus had the management and control of all affairs at Rome during the absence of the dictator in Spain, though the government of the city was nominally in the hands of M. Lepidus as magister equitum. (Cic. ad Fam. vi. 8, 19.) After the death of the dictator, Oppius espoused the cause of the young Octavian, and exhorted Cicero to do the same (ad Att. xvi. 15).

Oppius was the author of several works, which are referred to by the ancient writers, but all of which have perished. The authorship of the histories of the Alexandrine, African, and Spanish wars was a disputed point as early as the time of Suetonius, some assigning them to Oppius and others to Hirtius. (Suet. Caes. 56.) But the similarity in style between the Alexandrine war and the last book of the Commentaries on the Gallic war, leads to the conclusion that the former, at all events, was the work of Hirtius. The book on the African war may have been written by Oppius, to whom it is confidently assigned by Niebuhr, who remarks, "that the work is very instructive and highly trustworthy, but that the language is quite different from that of the work on the Alexandrine war; there is a certain mannerism about it, and it is on the whole less beautiful." (Lectures on Roman History, vol. v. p. 47.) Oppius also wrote the lives of several of the most distinguished Romans. The following are expressly mentioned as his composition: 1. A Life of Scipio Africanus the elder. (Cherisius, p. 119, ed. Putschius; Gell. vii. 1.) 2. A Life of Cassius. (Cherisius, l.c.) 3. A Life of Marius. (Plin. H. N. xi. 43. § 104.) 4. A Life of Pompey, quoted by Plutarch (Pomp. 10), who observes, "that the most intimate friends of C. Julius Caesar, together with Cornelius Balbus, with whose name that of Oppius is usually coupled, he managed most of Caesar's private affairs, and was well acquainted with all his plans and wishes. In the time of A. Gellius (xvii. 9) there was extant a collection of Caesar's letters to Oppius and Balbus, written in a kind of cipher. The regard which Caesar had for Oppius is shown by an anecdot related both by Plutarch (Caes. 17) and Suetonius (Caes. 72), who tell us, that when Caesar
OPIUS.

11. L. OPPUS, a Roman eques, was a witness on behalf of Flaccus, whom Cicero defended in B.C. 59. (Cic. pro Flacc. 13.) He is probably the same as the L. Oppius, M. f., whom Cicero recommended to Quintus Gallius, and whom he calls *homo miti familiaris, and familiarissimus (ad Fam. xiii. 43), and also the same as the L. Oppius, whom Cicero recommended to Q. Philonius, proconsul in Asia, B.C. 54 (ad Fam. xiii. 73, 74).

12. P. or SP. OPPUS, praetor, h.c. 44. (Cic. Philipp. iii. 10.)

13. M. OPPUS, was proscribed together with his father in B.C. 43. The father was unable to leave the city of his own accord on account of his great feebleness through old age, but his son carried him on his shoulders and reached Sicily with him in safety. This instance of filial piety excited such admiration among the people, that he was afterwards elected aedile; and as he had not sufficient property to discharge the duties of the office, the people contributed the requisite money for the purpose, and on his death further testified their affection towards him by burying him in the Campus Martius. (Appian, B. C. iv. 41 ; Dion Cass. xlviii. 53.) He is often said to be the same as the M. Oppius mentioned in B.C. 33 by Oppius in a letter to his son (ad Att. viii. 11, B) "vigilans homo et industrius," but the modern editions have M. Eppius and not M. Oppius.

14. M. OPPUS CAPITO, occurs on the coins of M. Antonius, struck about B.C. 40, as praeproctor and praefectus classis. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 264.) He may be the same as the Oppius Capito, a man of praetorian rank, of whom Pliny (H. N. vii. 13. s. 15) relates that he had a scirrhus in his stomach.

15. OPPUS CHARAES, sometimes but erroneously called CARES, a Latin grammarian, who taught in the province of Gallia togata towards the end of the republic, and continued his instructions to extreme old age, when he had lost not only the power of movement, but even of sight. (Suet. de Ill. Gramm. 3.) This grammarian may be the Oppius, whose work De Silvestrius Arboribus is referred to by Macrobius. (Saturn. ii. 14. 15.) Oppius is also quoted by Festus (p. 193 in a letter to his pupil) in explanation of the meaning of the word ordoxias.

16. OPPUS GALLUS, whose scandalous treatment by M. Popilius is related by Valerius Maximus (viii. 8. § 9).

17. OPPUS STATTIANUS, legate of M. Antonius in his unfortunate campaign against the Parthians in B.C. 36. When Antonius hastened forward to besiege Phraatna, he left Oppius with two legions and the baggage to follow him; but Oppius was surprised by the enemy, and he and all his men were cut to pieces. (Dion Cass. xlix. 23, 44 ; Plut. Ant. 39.)

18. OPPUS SABINUS, a man of consular rank, was sent against the Dacians in the reign of Domitian, and perished in the expedition. (Eutrop. vii. 29 ; Suet. Dom. 6.) The name, however, does not occur in any of the consular fasti, whence some have proposed to read Appius, instead of Oppius in Eutropius and Suetonius.

19. Q. OPPUS, known only from the annexed coin, cannot be identified with certainty with any of the persons previously mentioned. The reason, after the name of q. oppius may signify either praeator or praefectus. The obverse represents the head of Venus, and the reverse Victory: the coin was probably struck in one of the provinces. (Eckhel vol. v. pp. 264, 265.)

COIN OF Q. OPPUS.

OPS, a female Roman divinity of plenty and fertility, as is indicated by her name, which is connected with opinus, opulentus, inops, and copius. (Fest. p. 186, &c. ed. Muller.) She was regarded as the wife of Saturnus, and, accordingly, as the protectress of every thing connected with agriculture. Her abode was in the earth, and hence those who invoked her, or made vows to her, used to touch the ground (Macrobi. Sat. i. 10), and, as she was believed to give to human beings both their place of abode and their food, newly-born children were recommended to her care. (August. de Civ. Dei, iv. 11, 21.) Her worship was intimately connected with that of her husband Saturnus, for she had both temples and festivals in common with him; she had, however, also a separate sanctuary on the Capitol, and in the vicus jugarius, not far from the temple of Saturnus, she had an altar in common with Ceres. (Liv. xxxix. 22 ; P. Vict. Reg. Urb. viii.) The festivals of Ops are called Opolis and Opiscovisia, from her surname Conisave, connected with the verb serere, to sow. (Fest. l. c. ; Macrobi. Sat. i. 10, 12.)

OPISIUS, had previously been praetor, and was one of the accusers of Titius Sabinus in A. D. 28, on account of the friendship of the latter with Germanicus. (Tac. Ann. iv. 68, 71.)

OPTATIANUS. [PORPHYRIUS].

OPTATUS ELPERTITIUS, praefectus classis in the reign of Claudius, brought the scar or char fish (serot) from the Carpathian sea, and scattered them along the coasts of Latium and Campania. For Elpertius Gellenius proposed to read el libertas ejus. (Plin. H. N. ix. 17, s. 29.) Macrobius calls this Oppatus, Octavius. (Macrobi. Saturn. ii. 12.) OPTATUS, bishop of Milevi in Numidia, and hence distinguished by the epithet Milevitanae, flourished under the emperors Valentinian and Valens, and must have been alive at least as late as A. D. 384, if the passage (ii. 3) be genuine in which mention is made of pope Siricius, who in that year succeeded Damasus in the Roman see. Of his personal history we know nothing except that he was by birth a gentile, and that he is classed by St. Augustine with Cyprian, Lactantius, Victorinus, and Hilarius, as one who came forth from Egypt (i.e. from the bondage of paganism) laden with the treasures of learning and eloquence.

He published a controversial treatise, still extant, entitled De Societate Domestorum adversus Parmenianum, comprised, as we gather from the introduction and are expressly told by Jerome, in six books. Upon this testimony, which is fully confirmed by internal evidence, the seventh book now found in our copies has been deservedly pronounced spurious by the best judges, although some scholars still maintain that it ought to be regarded as an appendix added by the author himself upon a revision of his work. It is certainly not a modern forgery, and was very probably composed, as Dupin suggests, by some African, as a supplement, not long after the publication of the original.

Optatus addresses his production to Parmenianus, the Donatist bishop of Carthage, in reply to an attack made by that prelate upon the Catholics, and explains at the outset the method he intends to pursue in refuting his opponent. The object of the first book is, to ascertain what class of persons may justly be branded as tritubrid and schismatics, the former being the term uniformly applied by the Donatists to their antagonists; of the second, to account for the Church, and to prove it is to be found; of the third, to prove that some acts of violence and cruelty on the part of the soldiery had not been committed by the orders or with the approbation of the Catholics; of the fourth, to point out who is really to be accounted the Sinner, whose sacrifice God rejects, from whose union we must flee; of the fifth, to inquire into the nature of baptism; of the sixth, to expose the errors and projects of the Donatists. This performance was long held in such high estimation on account of the learning, acuteness, and orthodoxy displayed, not only in reference to the particular points under discussion, but upon many general questions of doctrine and discipline, that the author was esteemed worthy of the honours of canonization, his festival being celebrated on the fourth of June. Even now the book must be regarded as a valuable contribution to the ecclesiastical history of the fourth century, and constitutes our principal source of information with regard to the origin and progress of the heresy which distracted Africa for three hundred years. [Donatus.] The language is tolerably pure, and the style is for the most part lofty and energetic, but not unfrequently becomes turgid and harsh, while it is uniformly destitute of all grace or polish. The allegorical interpretations of Scripture constantly introduced are singularly fantastic, and the sentiments expressed with regard to free-will would in modern times be pronounced decidedly Arminian. Optatus refers in the course of his arguments (i. 14) to certain state papers and other public documents, which he had subjoined in support of the statements contained in the body of the work. These have disappeared, but in the best editions we find a copious and important collection of "pieces justificatives," collected from various sources, which throw much curious light not only upon the struggles of the Donatists, but upon the practice of ancient courts and the forms of accusation employed.

Of the epistles and other pieces noticed by Tri- themius no trace remains.

The Editio Princeps of the six books of Optatus was printed by F. Behem (apud S. Victorin prope Magnantum), fol. 1549, under the inspection of Joannes Cochlaeus, from a MS. belonging to the Hospital of St. Nicolas near Treves. The text which here appears under a very corrupt and mutilated form was corrected in a multitude of passages by Balduinus, from a single new MS. (Paris, 8vo. 1653, with the seventh book added in small type), and afterwards from two additional codices (Paris, 8vo. 1659). The second of these impressions remained the standard until the appearance of the elaborate edition by Dupin, printed at Paris, fol. 1700, reprinted at Amsterdam, fol. 1701, and at Antwerp, fol. 1702, the last being in point of arrangement the best of the three, which are very far superior to all others. That of Meric Casaubon (8vo. Lond. 1631) is of no particular value, that of L'Aubespine, bishop of Orleans (fol. Par. 1631) is altogether worthless. Galland, in his Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. v. p. 462 (fol. Venet. 1769), has followed the text of Dupin, selected the most important of his critical notes, adopted his distribution of the "Monumenta Vetera ad Donatistarum Historiam pertinentia," and brought together much useful matter in his Prolegomena, cap. xviii. p. xxix. (Hieronym. de Viris Ill. 110; Honor. i. 3; Trithem. 76; Augustin. de Doctrin. Carit. ii. 40; Lardner. Dictionary of Gospel History, c. v.; Funcins, de L. L. legis. Sext. c. x. § 56—63; Schönenamn. Bibl. Patr. Lat. vol. i. p. 16; Bihur, Geschichte der Röm. Litt. suppl. band. 2te Abtheil, § 65.) [W. R.]

OPUS ('Orówz). 1. A son of Zeus and Pro- togeneia, the daughter of Deucalion, was king of the Epeians, and father of Cambyse or Protogeneia. (Pind. Ol. ix. 85, &c. with the Schol.)

2. A son of Locrus or Zeus by Cambyse, and a grandson of No. 1. (Pind. Ol. i. c.; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 277.) From him a portion of the Locri derived their name Opuntii. [L. S.]

ORATA or AURATA, C. SERGIUS, was a contemporary of L. Crassus the orator, and lived a short time before the Marsic war. He was distinguished for his great wealth, his love of luxury and refinement, and possessed within an unblemished character. In a fragment of Cicero, preserved by Augustin, Orata is described as a "ditsimis amissis, deliciosis, vile et ignominia," and it is related of him, that he was the first person who invented the pensiles balneum, that is, baths with the hypocausta under them (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Balneum), and also the first who formed artificial oyster-beds at Baiae, from which he obtained a large revenue. He is further said to have been the first person who asserted and established the superiority of the shell-fish from the Lucrine lake, although under the empire they were less esteemed than those from Britain. His surname Orata or Aurata was given to him, according to some authorities, because he was very fond of goldfish (auratae pisces), according to others, because he was in the habit of wearing two very large gold rings. (Augustin. de Beata Vítica, c. 26, p. 308, ed. Bened.; Cie. de Off. iii. 16, de Fin. ii. 22, de Orat. i. 39; Val. Max. ix. 1. § 1; Plin. H. N. ix. 54. s.79; Varr. R. R. iii. 3. § 10; Colum. viii. 16. § 5; Matt. Bibl. Sacram. ii. 11; Petrusa. v. Orata.)

ORBIANA, N. SALLUSTIA BA'RBIA, one of the three wives of Alexander Severus. Her name is known to us from coins and inscriptions only, on which she appears with the title of Augusta. (Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 285.) [W. R.] ORBILIUS (Orbilius). In the Etymologicon Magnus (s. v. Στρατός) there is a short account of the names given to the various subdivisions of an army, and to their respective commanders. It is entitled ὄρβιλιον τῶν περὶ τὸ στρατεύμα τάξεως, Orbici de Exercentis Orbilius, and occupies about half or two-thirds of a column in the earlier folio editions of the Etymologicon, Venice, 1499 and 1549, and that of Fred. Sylvius, 1594. It is extemated and given among the pieces at the end of the Dictionarium Graecum of Aldus and Asiaeaus, fol. Venice, 1524, and at the end of the Dictionarium Graecum, of De Ramus, fol. Venice, 1525. Of Orbilius nothing is known except that he wrote (unless we suppose the passage to be interpolated) before the compilation of the Etymologicon, which cannot be placed later than the twelfth century, when it is cited by Eustathius, the commentator on Homer. [J. C. M.]

ORBILIUS PUPILLUS, a Roman grammarian and schoolmaster, best known to us from his having been the teacher of Horace, who gives him the epithet of plagusus from the severe floggings which his pupils received when they were poring over the crabbled verses of Livius Andronicus. (Hor. Ep. ii. 1. 71.) Orbilius was a native of Beneventum, and had from his earliest years paid considerable attention to the study of literature; but in consequence of the death of his parents, who were both destroyed by their enemies on the same day, he was left destitute, and in order to obtain a living, first became an attendant, or servant of the magistrates, and next served as a soldier in Macedonia. On returning to his native town he resumed his literary studies, and after teaching there for a long while, he removed to Rome in the fifteenth year of his age, in the consulsip of Cicero, B. C. 63. Here he opened a school; but although he obtained a considerable reputation, his profits were small, and he was obliged to live in his old age in a sorry garret. His want of success would not contribute to the improvement of his temper as he grew older, and since he must have been upwards of sixty when Horace became his pupil, we can easily imagine that the young poet found him rather a crabbed and cross-grained master. His flogging propensities were recorded by other poets besides Horace, as for instance in the following line of Dmi- mitius Marsus: —

But Orbilius did not, like some schoolmasters, vent all his ill temper upon his pupils, and exhibit a blaud deportment to the rest of the world. He attacked his rival grammarians in the bitterest terms, and did not spare the most distinguished men in the state, of which an instance is given by Suetonius and Macrobius (ii. 6), though they differ in the name of the Roman noble whom he made game of, the former calling him Varro Murena, and the latter Galba. Orbilius lived nearly a hundred years, but had lost his memory long before his death. As he was fifty in B. C. 63, he must have been born in B. C. 113, and have died shortly before B. C. 13. A statue was erected to him at Beneventum in the Capitol. He left a son Orbilius, who followed the profession of his father; and a slave and pupil of his, of the name of Scribonius, also attained some celebrity as a grammarian. Orbilius was the author of a work cited by Suetonius under the title of Periatalogos, but the name is evidently corrupt. Oudemour proposed to read Paelagogus, and Ernesti Periutalogos. (Suet. de Illustr. Gramm. 9, 19; comp. 4.)

O"RPIUS, P., a Roman jurist, and a contemporary of Cicero. (Brut. 48.) [G. L.]

ORBONNA, a female Roman divinity, to whom an altar was erected at Rome, near the temple of the Lares in the Via Sacra. She was invoked by parents who had been deprived of their children, and desired to have others, and also in dangerous maladies of children. (Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 29; Plin. H. N. vii. 7; Arnob. adv. Gent. iv. 7; Tertull. iii. 14; P. Verc. Rem. Urb. x.) [L. S.]

ORCHOMENUS (Orchomus). 1. A son of Lycon, and the reputed founder of the Arcadian towns of Orchomenus and Methydrium. (Apollod. iii. 8, § 1; Paus. viii. 3. § 1.)

2. A son of Athamas and Theistemo. (Hygin. Fab. 1; comp. Athamas.)

3. A son of Zeus or Etcecles and Hesione, the daughter of Danas, was the husband of Hermippe, the daughter of Boeotus, by whom he became the father of Minyas. He is called a king of Orchomenus. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 230; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 272.) According to other traditions, he was a son (or a brother) of Minyas (Paus. ix. 36. § 4) by Phanousa, the daughter of Paeon. (Comp. Müller, Orchom. p. 135, 2d ed.) [L. S.]

ORCHIVIUS. [Orchius.]

C. ORCHIVIUS, tribune of the plebs in the third year after the consulsip of Cato, B. C. 181, was the author of a summiaria lex, limiting the number of guests to be present at entertainments. When attempts were afterwards made to repeal this law, Cato offered the strongest opposition, and delivered a speech in defence of the law, which is referred to by the grammarians. (Macrob. Saturn. ii. 13; Festus, s. v. Obsolavetere, Pecuncatulum; Schol. Bob. in Cic. pro Sest. p. 310, ed. Orelli; Meyer, Orat. Rom. Fragmenta, p. 91, &c., 2d ed.)

C. ORCIVIUS, a colleague of Cicero in the praetorship, B. C. 66, and presided over cases of peculius. He is called by Q. Cicero "elvis ad ambitionem gratiosissimum" (Cic. pro Cluent. 34, 55; Q. Cic. de Pet. Cons. s. 5. § 19.) The name is also written Orchivius and Orchinius, but Orcivius seems to be the correct reading. (See Orelli, Ovum. Tullian. s. e.)

ORCUS. [Hades.]

OREADES. [Nymphes.]

OREATHYLA (Oreithyia). 1. One of the Nereides. (Hom. ii. xviii. 48.)

2. A daughter of Erechtheus and Praxithene. Once as she had strayed beyond the river Illissus she was carried off by Boreas, by whom she became the mother of Cleopatra, Chione, Zetes, and Calais. (Apollod. iii. 15. § 1, &c.; Apollon. Rhod. i. 215; comp. Plat. Phaedr. p. 194, ed. Heind.; Schol. ad Odys. xiv. 533.) [L. S.]

ORESTES (Orestes), the only son of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra, and brother of Chrysothemis, Luodice (Electra), and Iphianassa (Iphigenia): Hom. ii. ix. 142; &c.; comp. Soph. Elect. 154; Eurip. Or. 23.) According to the Homeric account, Agamemnon on his return from Troy did not see his son, but was murdered by Agisthus and Clytemnestra before he had an opportunity of seeing him. (Od. xi. 542.) In the eighth year after his father's murder Orestes came from Athens to Mycenae and slew the murderer of his father, and at the same time solemnised the burial of Agamemnon and of his mother, and for the revenge he had taken he gained great fame among mortals. (Od. i. 30, 298, iii. 306, &c., iv. 546.) This slender outline of the story of Orestes has been spun out and embellished in various ways by the tragic poets. Thus it is said that at the murder of Agamemnon it was intended also to despatch Orestes, but that Electra secretly entrusted him to the slave who had the management of him. This slave carried the boy to Strophius, king in Phocias, who was married to Anaxibia, the sister of Agamemnon. According to some, Orestes was saved by his nurse Gallissa (Aeschyl. Choeph. 732) or by Arsinoe or Laodameia (Pind. Pyth. xi. 25, with the Schol.), who allowed Agamemnon to keep her own child, thinking that it was Orestes. In the house of Strophius, Orestes grew up together with the king's son Plyades, with whom he formed the closest and intimate friendship, which has almost become proverbial. (Eurip. Orest. 804, &c.) Being frequently reminded by messengers of Electra of the necessity of avenging his father's death, he consulted the oracle of Delphi, which strengthened him in his plan. He therefore repaired in secret, and without being known to any one, to Argos. (Soph. Elect. ii. &c., 35, 296, 531, 1346; Eurip. Elect. 1245, Orest. 162.) He pretended to be a messenger of Strophius, who had come to announce the death of Orestes, and brought the ashes of the deceased. (Soph. Elect. 1110.) After having visited his father's tomb, and sacrificed upon it a lock of his hair, he made himself known to his sister Electra, who was ill used by Agamemnon and Clytemnestra, and discussed his plan of revenge with her, which was speedily executed, for both Agamemnon and Clytemnestra were slain by his hand in the palace. (Soph. Elect. 1405; Aeschyl. Choeph. 931; comp. Eurip. Elect. 925, 671, 774, &c., 965, &c., 1165, &c., who differs in several points from Sophocles.) Immediately after the murder of his mother he was seized by madness, he believed the Erinnyes of his mother and took to flight. Sophocles does not mention this as the immediate consequence of the deed, and the tragedy ends where Agamemnon is led to death; but, according to Euripides, Orestes not only becomes mad, but as the Argives, in their indignation, wanted to stone him and Electra to death, and as Menelaus refused to save them, Plyades and Orestes murdered Helen, and her body was removed by the gods. Orestes also threatened Menelaus to kill his daughter Hermione; but by the intervention of Apollo, the dispute was allayed, and Orestes betrothed himself to Hermione, and Plyades to Electra. But, according to the common account, Orestes fled from land to land, pursued by the Erinnyes of his mother. On the advice of Apollo, he took refuge with Athena at Athens. The goddess afforded him protection, and appointed the court of the Areopagus to decide his fate. The Erinnyes brought forward their accusation, and Orestes made the command of the Delphic oracle his excuse. When the court voted, and was equally divided, Orestes was acquitted by the command of Athens. (Aeschyl. Eum. 75.) He therefore dedicated an altar to Athena Areia. (Paus. i. 28. § 5.)

According to another modification of the legend, Orestes consulted Apollo, how he could be delivered from his madness and incessant wandering. The god advised him to go to Tauris in Scythia, and thence to fetch the image of Artemis, which was (Eurip. Iph. Taur. 70, &c., 968, &c.) believed to have there fallen from heaven, and to carry it to Athens. (Comp. Paus. iii. 16. § 6.) Orestes and Plyades accordingly went to Tauris, where Thoas was king, and on their arrival they were seized by the natives, in order to be sacrificed to Artemis, according to the custom of the country. But Iphigenia, the priestess of Artemis, was the sister of Orestes, and, after having recognised each other, all escaped with the safety of the goddess. (Eurip. Iph. Taur. 800, 1527, &c.)

After his return Orestes took possession of his father's kingdom at Mycenae, which had been usurped by Aletes or Menelaus; and when Cyranes of Argos died without leaving any heir, Orestes also became king of Argos. The Lacedaemonians made him their king of their own accord, because they feared him, the grandson of Tydareus, to Nicostratus and Megacranthus, the sons of Menelaus by a slave. The Arcadians and Phocians increased his power by allying themselves with him. (Paus. ii. 18. § 5, iii. 1. § 4; Philostr. Her. 6; Pind. Pyth. xi. 24.) He married Hermione, the daughter of Menelaus, and became by her the father of Tissamenus. (Paus. ii. 18. § 5.) He is said to have led colonists from Sparta to Aeolis, and the town of Argos Oresticum in Epeius is said to have been founded by him at the time when he wandered about in his madness. (Strab. vii. p. 326, xii. p. 582; Pind. Nem. xi. 42, with the Schol.) In his reign the Dorians under Hyllus are said to have invaded Pelosius. (Paus. viii. 5. § 1.) He died of the bite of a snake in Arcadim (Schol. ad Eur. Or. 1640), and his body, in accordance with an oracle, was afterwards conveyed from Tegea to Sparta, and there buried. (Paus. iii. 11. § 8.) In a war between the Lacedaemonians and Tegeatans, a truce was concluded, and during this truce the Lacedaemonian Iphicrates found the remains of Orestes and his mother Clytemnestra on Tegea, the body of the blacksmith, and thence took them to Sparta, which according to an oracle could not gain the victory unless it possessed the remains of Orestes. (Herod. i. 67, &c.; Paus. iii. 3. § 6, viii. 54. § 3.) According to an Italian legend, Orestes brought the image of the Taurian Artemis to Aricia, whence it was carried in later times to Sparta; and Orestes himself was buried at Aricia, whence his remains were afterwards carried to Rome. (Serv. ad Aen. ii. 116.)

There are three other mythical personages of the name of Orestes, concerning whom nothing of interest is related. (Hom. Il. v. 705, xii. 139, 193; Apollod. i. 7. § 3.)

ORESTES ('Oρέστης), regent of Italy during the short reign of his infant son Romulus Augustus, from the 29th of August, A. D. 475, to the 29th of August, 476. As his history is given in the lives of Romulus Augustulus, Nepos, and Odicer, we need only add here a few remarks. He was a Roman by origin, but born in Pannonia, and when Attila conquered that province, he and his father Tatulus both entered the service of the conqueror till the death of the latter and the downfall of the Hunnic empire. Orestes held the office.

of secretary to Attilla, and was also his ambassador at Constantinople. After the death of Attila, Orestes returned to Italy, where on account of his great wealth, he soon rose to eminence, and obtained the title and rank of patrician. He then married a daughter of Romulus Comes. In 475, while at Rome, he received orders from the emperor Julius Nepos to assemble an army and send it to Gaul, as fears were entertained that the West Gothic king Euric intended another invasion of that country. Being once at the head of an army, Orestes availed himself of his power and riches to make himself master of Italy, and forthwith set out for Ravenna, where Nepos was residing. On his approach Nepos fled in confusion (28th of August, 475) to Salona in Dalmatia, where he met with the deposed emperor Glycerius, his former rival, who was their bishop of that place; and on the 29th of August Orestes had his son Romulus Augustulus proclaimed emperor, remaining, however, at the head of affairs. His first minister was Parmenius. He sent Latinius and Madius to Constantinople, that he might be recognised by the emperor Zeno; and he made peace with Genseric, the king of the Vandals. The reign of Orestes was of short duration. In the following year (476) Odoncer rose in arms against him, and Orestes having shut himself up in Pavia, was taken prisoner after the town had been stormed by the barbarians, and conducted to Placentia where his head was cut off by order of Odoncer. This took place on the 28th of August, 476, exactly a year after he had compelled Nepos to fly from Ravenna. On the 4th of September Paulus, the brother of Orestes, was taken at Ravenna, and likewise put to death. (The authorities quoted in the lives of Romulus Augustulus, Glycerius, Julius Nepos, and Odoric.)

[Rev.] ORESTES ('Orestes), a Christian physician of Tyana in Cappadocia, called also Areteus, who suffered martyrdom during the persecution under Diocletian, A.D. 303, 304. An interesting account of his tortures and death is given by Simeon Metaphrastes, ap. Surium, De Probat. Sancitor. Histor., vol. vi. p. 231, where he is named Areteus. See also Menology. Graec. vol. i. p. 176; ed. Urban. 1727. He has been canonized by the Greek and Roman churches, and his memory is celebrated on Nov. 9. (See Baovius, Nomenclator Sanctor. Profess. Medici.)

ORESTES, CN. AUFI/DIUS, originally belonged to the Aurelia gens, whence his surname of Orestes, and was adopted by Cn. Asellius, the historian, when the latter was an old man [See Vol. I. p. 418, b.]. Orestes was expelled when a candidate for the tribunate of the plebs, but he obtained the consulship in B.C. 71, with P. Cornelius Lentulus. From an anecdote recorded by Cicero (de Off. ii. 17) Orestes seems to have carried his election partly by the magnificent treats he gave the people. (Cic. pro Dom. 13, pro Planc. 21; Eutrop. vi. 3.)

ORESTES, AURELIUS. 1. L. AURELIUS L. F. L. N. ORESTES, consul B.C. 157, with Sex. Julius Caesar. (Fasti Capit.; Plin. H. N. xxxiii. 3. s. 17.)

2. L. AURELIUS L. F. L. N. ORESTES, son of the preceding, was consul B.C. 126, with M. Aurelius Lepidus. He was sent into Sardinia to subdue the inhabitants of the island, who had again risen against the Roman authority, as they had done on many previous occasions. Orestes remained in his province upwards of three years, and obtained a triumph on his return to Rome in B.C. 122. C. Gracchus was questor to Orestes in Sardinia, and distinguished himself greatly by the way in which he there discharged the duties of his office. M. Aemilius Scaurus also served under Orestes in Sardinia (Liv. Epit. 60; Plut. C. Gracch. 1, 2; Cic. Brut. 26; Aur. Vict. de Vir. Ill. 72; Fasti Capit.) This Aurelius Orestes obtains a place, along with his brother C. Aurelius Orestes, in the list of orators in the Brutus of Cicero (c. 25), who, however, only says of them, "quos aliquo video in numerò oratorum fusisse."

3. C. AURELIUS ORESTES, younger son of No. 1. See No. 2, sub senem.

4. L. AURELIUS L. F. L. N. ORESTES, son of No. 2, was consul with C. Marius, in the third consularship of the latter, B.C. 103, and died in the same year. (Fasti: comp. Plut. Mar. 14.)

5. CN. AURELIUS ORESTES, praetor urbanus B.C. 77, one of whose decisions was annulled upon appeal by the consul Munatianus Acemilus Lepidus. (Val. Max. vii. 7, § 6.)

ORESTHEUS ('Orestheus'), a son of Lycon, and the reputed founder of Orestesbium, which is said afterwards to have been called Orestaeum, from Orestes. (Paus. viii. 3, § 1; Eurip. Orest. 1642.)

2. A son of Deucalion, and king of the Ozolian Locrians in Aetolia. His dog is said to have given birth to a piece of wood, which Orestes gave in the earth. In the spring a vine grew forth from it, from the sprouts of which he derived the name of his people. (Paus. x. 38. § 1; Hecat. ap. Athen. ii. p. 35.)

ORESTILLIA, AURELIA. [Aurelia.]

ORESTILLA, LIVIA, called Cornelia Orestina by Dion Cassius, was the second wife of Caligula, whom he married in A.D. 37. He carried her away on the day of her marriage to Piso, having been invited to the nuptial banquet, but divorced her before two months had elapsed, and banished her and Piso. (Suet. Cal. 29; Dion Cass. lxx. 8.)

ORFITUS, or ORPHITUS, a cognomen of several gentile names under the empire, does not occur in the time of the republic. Orfitus is the correct orthography, as we see from inscriptions. Many of the Orfiti mentioned below are only known from the Consular Fasti, and from inscriptions.

1. SER. CORNELIUS ORFITUS, consul in A.D. 51, with the emperor Claudius (Tac. Ann. xii. 41; Plin. H. N. ii. 31; and the inscription in Fabretius, p. 472). In A.D. 66 Orfitus proposed, in honour of the imperial family, that the month of June should for the future be called Germanicus (Tac. Ann. xvi. 12). It would appear, from an incidental notice in Tacitus (Hist. iv. 42), that Orfitus perished not long after this, by an accusation of the informer Aquilus Reportius.

2. SALVIENIUS ORFITUS, one of the victims of Nero's cruelty and caprice. (Suet. Ner. 37.)

3. PACCIUS ORFITUS, a centurion primiti pili in Corbulo's army in the East, in the reign of Nero. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 36, xvi. 12.)

4. SALVIENIUS ORFITUS, banished by Domitian, on the pretext of conspiracy. (Suet. Dom. 10.)

5. CORNELIUS SCIFO ORFITUS, one of the consules sufecti A.D. 101.
ORIBASIUS.

6. SER. SALVIDIENUS ORIFITUS, consul A. D. 110, with M. Pudaeus Priscinus.

7. SER. SCIPIO ORIFITUS, consul A. D. 149, with Q. Nonius Priscus. He is perhaps the same as the Orifitus who was praefectus urbi in the reign of Antoninus Pius (Capitol. Anton. Pius, 8). This emperor reigned from A. D. 138 to 161.

10. ORIFITUS GAVIUS, consul A. D. 178, with Julius Agapetus. (Lampl. Commod. 12.)

As the three previous last mentioned all lived in the reign of M. Aurelius (A. D. 161—180), it is impossible to say which of them was the Orifitus who was advanced to various honours in the state by this emperor, although he was the paramour of the empress (Capitol. M. Anton. Phil. 29).

11. ORIFITUS, consul in A. D. 270, with Antiochinius. Trebellius Pollio (Claud. 11) calls his colleague Atticianus.

M. O’RIFIUS, a Roman eques, of the municipium of Atella, was a tribune of the soldiers in Caesar’s army, whom Caesar strongly recommended in b. c. 59 to his brother Quintus, who was then one of Caesar’s legates. (Cic. ad Qu. Fr. ii. 14.)

ORGETORIX, the noblest and richest among the Helvetii, anxious to obtain the royal power, formed a conspiracy of the principal chiefs in b. c. 61, and persuaded his countrymen to emigrate from their own country with a view of conquering the whole of Gaul. After the victory of Caesar he was present at the treaty, and the defeated Helvetii agreed to make the necessary preparations; but the real designs of Orgetorix having meantime transpired, the Helvetii brought him to trial for his ambitious projects.

Orgetorix, however, by means of his numerous retainers, set justice at defiance; and while the Helvetii were collecting forces to compel him to submit to their laws, he suddenly died, probably, as was suspected, by his own hands. Notwithstanding his death the Helvetii carried into execution the project which he had formed, and were thus the first people with whom Caesar was brought into contact in Gaul. After their defeat a daughter of Orgetorix and one of his sons fell into the hands of Caesar. (Caes. B. G. i. 2—4, 26; Dion Cass. xxxviii. 31.)

ORIBAS’IUS (Ορίβασιος or Ορίβασιος), an eminent Greek medical writer, who was born probably about A. D. 325. Suidas (a. o. Ορίβασιος) and Philostorgius (Hist. Eccles. vii. 15) call him a native of Sardeis. In two years he was devoted to making the necessary preparations; but the real designs of Orgetorix having meantime transpired, the Helvetii brought him to trial for his ambitious projects.

Dec. 335, he took Oribasius with him (Julian, l. c. p. 277, C.; Oribas. ap. Phot. Biblioth. Cod. 217); and in the following year (see Clinton’s Fasti Rom.), on the occasion of some temporary absence, addressed to him a letter, which is still extant (Epist. 17), and is an evidence both of their intimacy and of their devotion to paganism. It was while they were in Gaul together that Julian commanded Oribasius to make an epitome of Galen’s writings, with which he was so much pleased that he imposed upon him the further task of adding to the work whatever was most valuable in the other medical writings, and published it, though not till after Julian had become emperor, A. D. 361, in seventy (Phot. Biblioth. Cod. 217) or (according to Suidas) in seventy-two books, part of which are still extant under the title Συναγωγαί Ιστορικά Κολλεκτα Μελετηματων, and will be mentioned again below. Eunapius seems to say that Oribasius was in some way instrumental in raising Julian to the throne (βασιλεύων των Ιωλιανῶν αδέξεω), but the meaning of the passage is doubtful, as the writer refers for the particulars of the transaction to one of his lost works. He was appointed by the emperor, soon after his accession, quaestor of Constantine (Suid. l. c.), and sent to Delphi to endeavour to restore the oracle of Apollo to its former splendour and authority; but in this mission he failed, as the only answer he brought back was that the oracle was no more:—

Εἰτε τέρας βασιλέως, χαμάλ τέρα ταιοδός αὐτός, οὐκέτι φίλος ἤξει καλέσαι, οὐ μάντις δάρβην Οὐ παγαν λαλεύσω, αὐτότετο καὶ λαλόν οὖν; (Codren. Hist. Compend. p. 304, ed. 1647.)

He accompanied Julian in his expedition against Persia, and was with him at the time of his death, June 26, A. D. 363. (Philostorg. l. c.) The succeeding emperors, Valentinian and Valens, were not so favourably disposed towards Oribasius, but confiscated his property, and banished him to some nation of “barbarians” (as they are called)—probably the Goths: they had even thought of putting him to death. The cause of this treatment is not mentioned; his friend Eunapius (who is not a very impartial witness) attributes it to envy on account of his reputation (διὰ τὴν ὑπεροχὴν τῆς δόσης), but we may easily suppose the emperors to have had some more creditable motive than this, and might perhaps be allowed to conjecture that he had made himself obnoxious, either in the discharge of his duties as quaestor, or by his enmity against the Christians. In his exile Oribasius exhibited proofs both of his fortitude and his medical skill, whereby he gained such influence and esteem among thebarbarian kings, that he became one of their principal men, while the common people looked upon him as almost a god. As Eunapius does not mention that the emperors who recalled Oribasius were different from those who banished him (l. c. p. 173), it is probable that his exile did not last long, and that it ended before the year 369. After his return he married a lady of good family and fortune, and had by her four children, one of whom was probably his son Eustathius, to whom he addressed his “Synopsis,” mentioned below. He also had his property restored out of the public treasury by command of the succeeding emperors, but Eunapius does not specify which emperors he means. The date of his death is unknown, but he was still living with his four children when Eunapius inserted the account of his life in "Vita Philosophorum et Sophistarum," that is, at least as late as the year 393. (See Climo, "Festae Rosae." Of the per- sonal character of Oribasius we know little or nothing, but it is clear that he was much attached to paganism and to the heathen philosophy. He was an intimate friend of Eunapius, who praises him very highly, and wrote an account of his life. He attended the philosopher Chrysanthus on his death-bed (Eunap. l. c. p. 197); and there is a short letter addressed to him by Isidorus of Pelusium (Epist. i. 437, ed. Paris, 1638), and two epigrams written in his honour in the Greek Anthology (ix. 199, and Anthol. Planud. iv. 274, vol. ii. p. 106, iii. 293, ed. Tauchn.). He is several times quoted by Aetius and Paulus Aegineta.

Some of his works were translated into Arabic (see Wenrich, De Auctor. Graecor. Version. Syriac. Arab. &c. p. 293); and an abridgment of them was made by Theophanes at the command of the emperor Constantine Porphyrogenitus. (See Lamblin, Biblioth. Vindob. vii. pp. 261, 264, 266, ed. Kollar.)

We possess at present three works of Oribasius, which are generally considered to be genuine. The first of these is called Συναγωγή Ιατρικῆς, Collecta Medicinalia, or sometimes Εθνομονταλβώνης, Hôboldomecontâblôs (Paul. Aegin. lib. i. Prael.), and is the work that was compiled (as was said above) at the command of Julian, when Oribasius was still a young man. It would be impossible to give here an analysis of its contents. It contains but little original matter, but is very valuable on account of the numerous extracts from writers whose works are no longer extant. This work had become scarce, on account of its bulk, as early as the time of Paulus Aegineta (Paul. Aegin. l. c.); it was translated into Syriac in the ninth century by Honain Ibn Ishak and Isa Ibn Yahya, with the title "Collectionis Medicinalis Libri Septem Libros." (Wenrich, l. c.); but in the following century, though Ayl(A) Abbas was aware of its existence, he says he had never seen more than one book out of the seventy. (Theor. i. 1, p. 5, ed. 1523.) More than half of this work is now lost, and what remains is in some confusion, so that it is not easy to specify exactly how many books are at present actually in existence; it is, however, believed that we possess twenty-five (viz. 1—15, 21, 22, 24, 25, 44—49), with fragments of two others (viz. 50 and 51). The first fifteen books were first published in a Latin translation by J. Baptist. Rasarius (together with the 24th and 25th), Venet. 8vo. without date, but before 1555. They were published in Greek and Latin by C. F. Mathaeus, Mosqu. 1698, 4to., but with the omission of all the extracts from Galen, Rufus Ephesi, and Dioscorides. This edition, which is very scarce, is entitled "XXI. Veterum et Clarorum Medicorum Graecorum varia Opuscula." The first and second books had been previously published in Greek and Latin by C. G. Gruner, Jenae, 1782, 4to. Books 21 and 22 were discovered in M. S. by Dietz about fifteen years ago, but have not hitherto been published, either in Greek or Latin. (See Dietz, Schol. in Hippocr. et Gal. vol. i. praef.; Daremberg, Rapport adressé à M. le Ministre de l'Instruction Publique, Paris, 8vo. 1845, p. 7.)

Books 24 and 25 treat of anatomy, and may perhaps be the work translated into Arabic with the title "De Membrorum Anatomiae." (Wenrich, l. c.) They were translated into Latin by J. Baptist. Rasarius, and published together in the first five books. A Greek edition appeared at Paris, 1556, 8vo., ap. G. Morliacum, with the title "Collectaneeorum Arum Medicai Liberi," &c.; and W. Dundass published them in Greek and Latin in 1735, 4to. Lugd. Bat., with the title "Oribasii Anatomicae ex Libris Galeni." Book 44 was published in Greek and Latin, with copious notes, by U. C. Bussemaeker, Groning, 1835, 8vo.; having previously appeared in Greek, together with books 45, 48, and 49, and parts of 50 and 51 (but with the omission of all the extracts from Galen and Hippocrates), in the fourth volume of Angelo Mai's "Classici Auctores e Vaticanis Codicibus edit." Rom. 1831, 8vo. Books 46 and 47 were published by Ant. Cocchi at Florence, 1754, fol. in Greek and Latin, with the title "Graecorum Chirurgiae Libri," &c. Books 48 and 49 were first published in Latin by Vidas Vincens in his "Chirurgie o Grecie in Latinum a se conversa," &c.; and it is feared in Greek, together with fragments of books 50 and 51, in Angelo Mai's collection mentioned above. It will appear at once, from the above list of the editions of the different parts of this work, how much we are in want of a critical and uniform edition of those books which still remain; a want which (as we learn from M. Daremberg's Rapport, quoted above) is likely to be supplied by Dr. Bussemaeker.

The second work of Oribasius, that is still extant, was written probably about thirty years after the above, of which it is an abridgment (Συνωφισ). It consists of nine books, and is addressed to his son Eustathius, for whose use and at whose request it was composed. This work was translated into Arabic by Honain Ibn Ishak, with the title "Ad Filium sumum Eusthathium Libri Novem" (Wenrich, l. c.), and was known to Holy Abbas, who, as well as Paulus Aegineta (l. c.), notices the omission of several topics which he considered ought to have found a place in it. It has never been published in Greek, but was translated into Latin by J. Baptist. Rasarius, and printed at Venice, 1554, 8vo.

The third work of Oribasius is entitled Επιστολα, Epouristha or De facile Purificibus, and consists of four books. It is addressed to Eunapius, probably his friend and biographer, who requested Oribasius to undertake the work, though Photius says (l. c.) that in his time some copies were ascribed to a person of the name of Eugenius. Sprengel doubts (Hist. de la Méd.) the genuineness of this work, but probably without sufficient reason: it appears to be the "smaller" work of Oribasius mentioned by Holy Abbas (l. c.), and is probably the treatise that was translated into Arabic by Stephanus with the title "De Medicamentis Usitatis" (Wenrich, l. c.). Both this and the preceding work were intended as manuals of the practice of medicine, and are in a great measure made up of extracts from his "Collecta Medicinalia." The Greek text has never been printed. The first Latin translation was published by J. Sickard, Basil. 1529, fol. at the end of his edition of Caelius Aurelianus; the next edition is that by J. Baptist. Rasarius, Venet. 1558, 8vo., which is more complete than the preceding. Rasarius united the "Synopsis ad Eustathium," the "Euporiosta ad Epaminium," and the nineteen books of the "Collecta Medichualia" that were then discovered (including the two treatises "De Laqueis" and "De Machinamentis"), and published them together, with the title "Oribasi quae restant Omnii," Basil. 1557, 3 vols. 8vo. They are also to be found in H. Stephani "Medicin Artis Principes," Paris, 1567, fol. The pieces entitled "De Victis Ratione, per quodlibet Anni Tempos" (Basil. 1523, fol.) and "De Simplicibus" (Argent. 1553, fol.) are probably extracted from his larger works.

Oribasis is said by Suidas to have been the author of some other works which are now lost, viz. 1. Περί Βασιλείας, De Regno; 2. Περί Παθήσεως, De Affectibus; and 3. Πρὸς τοὺς Ἀποκριτόν τὸν Ἴτατον. ἄδικοι, etc. "Illas quidem Medicum Coptam non datur (or perhaps rather Ad Medicos dotistantes, vel iapones Consultis)," which last has been conjectured to have been the same work as the "Euporiosta ad Epaminium," mentioned above.

Besides these works, a commentary on the Aphorisms of Hippocrates goes under the name of Oribasis, but is undoubtedly spurious. It was first published in Latin by J. Guinterius Andernacns, Paris, 1553, 8vo, and has since been thrice reprinted. It is probable that the work does not exist in Greek, and that it was written by a person who made use of a Latin translation of the "Synopsis ad Eustathium," and who composed it with the intention of passing it off as the genuine work of Oribasis. If so, it is a clumsy forgery, and betrays its spurious origin to the most cursory inspector, being apparently the work of a Christian, and at the same time purporting to be written at the command of Tolemy Euergetes. It has been conjectured that it was composed by some physician belonging to the school of Salerno, about the beginning of the fourteenth century; but this is certainly too recent, as it was to be found in two MSS. at Paris, which are supposed to belong to the tenth century. (See Litré's Hippocrates, vol. iv. p. 443.)

ORIGENES (Ὀριγένης), one of the most eminent of the early Christian writers, not only for his intellectual powers and attainments, but also for the influence exercised by him on the opinions of subsequent ages, and for the discussions and discussions respecting his opinions, which have been carried on through many centuries down to modern times.

I. LIFE. Origen bore, apparently from his birth (Euseb. H. E. vi. 14) the additional name of Adamantius (Ἀδαμάντιος), though Epiphanius states (Haeres. lxiv. 73) that he assumed it himself. Doubtless, the name was regarded by the admirers of Origen as significant either of his unwearyed industry (Hieron. Ep. xiii. ad Marcellam, c. 1. vol. i. p. 190 ed Vallars.), or of the irrefragable strength of his arguments (Phot. Bibl. cod. 118); but these obviously laudatory interpretations of it render it improbable that Origen assumed it himself, as a boastful temper does not appear to have been at all characteristic of him. The names "Chalecuter" "Χαλεκτέρας" ("braken-bowels") given him by Jerome (l.c.), and "Chalecutes" "Χαλέκτης" ("braiser"), and "Syractes" "Συρακτής" ("Composer") conferred upon him by others (Epiph. Haeres. lxi. i. and Tillemont. H. E. vol. iii. p. 497), appear to have been mere epithets, expressive of his assiduity. As he was in his seventeenth year, at the time of his father's death, which occurred apparently in April 203 (Huet. Origemian. l. 6), in the persecution which began in the tenth year of the reign of the Emperor Severus, his birth must be fixed in or about a.d. 185. The year 167, given in the Chronicon Paschalit, is too late; and 185, given by most modern writers, too early. His father was Leonides, St. a Christian of Alexandria. Suidas (εν ο. Ὅριγένης) calls him a "bishop;" but his authority, unsupported by any ancient testimony, is insufficient to prove his episcopal character. Porphyry (apud Euseb. H. E. vi. 19) speaks of Origen, with whom he claimed to have been acquainted in early life, as having been educated a heathen, and afterwards converted to Christianity; but, as his acquaintance with Origen was apparently very slight, and when Origen was an old man, his authority in such a matter is of little weight. Leonides gave his son a careful education, not only in the usual branches of knowledge, but especially in the Scriptures, of which he made him commit to memory and recite a portion every day.

Origen was a pupil of Clement of Alexandria, and he also received some instruction of Pantaenus apparently after his return from India. [PANTERUS.] He had Alexander, afterwards bishop of Jerusalem, for his early friend and fellow-student (Alex. ap. Euseb. H. E. vi. 14).

In the persecution which commenced in the tenth year of Severus (A.D. 202) Leonides was imprisoned, and after a time beheaded. Origen was anxious to share with his father the glory of martyrdom; and when this desire was frustrated by the watchfulness of his mother, who, after vainly entreating him to give up his purpose, hid away all his clothes, and so prevented him from leaving home, he wrote a letter to his father, exhorting him to steadfastness, in the words "See that thou changest not thy mind for our sakes." By the death of Leonides, his widow, with Origen and six younger sons, was reduced to destitution, the property of the martyr having been confiscated.

Origen was, however, received into the house of a wealthy female, then living at Alexandria, who had, among her inmates at the time, one Paul of Antioch, whom she regarded as a son, who was in bad repute on account of his heretical opinions. Nevertheless, however, attracted a considerable audience, not only of those who sympathised in his views, but of the orthodox; yet Origen refused to unite in prayer with him, "detesting," as he has somewhere expressed it, "heretical teachings." (Euseb. H. E. vi. 2) This repugnance probably quickened his efforts to become independent, and his ardent application to study enabled him soon to extricate himself from difficulty by becoming a teacher of the branches of education comprehended under the epithet "grammatical" (τὰ γραμματικά). (Euseb. ibid.) His attainments included, according to Jerome (De \Viz. Illustr. c. 54) and Gregory Thaumaturgus (Paneg. in Origen. c. 7, 8, 9), ethics, grammar, rhetoric, dialectics or logic, geometry, arithmetic, music, and an acquaintance with the tenets of the various philosophical sects; to which may be added an acquaintance with the Hebrew language, a rare acquisition among the Christians of those days. It is probable, however, that several of these attainments were made later in life than the time of which we are now speaking. His knowledge of Hebrew was most likely of later date; from whom he acquired it is not clear. He often quotes (vid. Index Morav. \Raafus. lib. vi. Opp. vol. iv. pars ii. col. 363, ed. Benedict, vol. ii. pars i. ed. Vallars.) Huilias, a patriarch of the Jews, of whom nothing appears to be known; but whether he was Origen’s instructor in the Hebrew language is only conjecture. If Origen was, as Porphyry (ap. Euseb. \H. E. vi. 19) and Theodoret (\Gracoor. Affection. Curat. lib. vi. Opera, vol. iv. p. 573, ed. Sirmond. p. 869, ed Schulze) affirm, a hearer of Ammonius Saccas (Ammonius Saccas), it was probably at a later period, when he attended a lecturer on philosophy, whom he does not name, to gain an acquaintance with the Greek philosophy. (Origen. ap. Euseb. \H. E. vi. 19.) Epiphanius (\Haeres. Ixiv. 1) says that perhaps he studied at Athens; but it is not likely that he visited that city in early life, though he was there when he travelled into Greece many years afterward. Within a very short time after he had commenced teacher of grammar, he was applied to by some heathens who desired instruction in Christianity. The first of those who applied to him were Plutarchus, who suffered martyrdom at Alexandria very shortly after, and his brother Heraclas, who became in the sequel Origen’s assistant and successor in the office of Catechist, and afterward bishop of Alexandria. At the time of their application to Origen, the office of Catechist was vacant through the dispersion of the clergy consequent on the persecution; and Demetrius, the bishop, shortly after appointed Origen, though only in his eighteenth year, to the office. The young teacher showed a zeal and self-denial beyond his years. The persecution was still raging; but he shrunk not from giving every support and encouragement to those who suffered, frequently at the risk of his life. The number of those who resorted to him as Catechist continually increased; and, deeming his profession as teaching of grammatical inconsistent with his sacred work, he gave it up; and that he might not, in the failure of this source of income, become dependent on others, he sold all his books of secular literature, and lived for many years on an income of four oboli a day derived from the proceeds of the sale. His course of life was of the most rigorously ascetic character. His food, and his periods of sleep, which he took, not in a bed, but on the bare ground, were restricted within the narrowest limits; and, understanding literally the precepts of the Lord Jesus Christ, not to have two coats and to take no shoes (Matt. x. 10.), he went for many years barefoot, by which and by other austerities he had nearly ruined his health. The same ascetic disposition, and the same tendency to interpret the letter the injunctions of the Scriptures, led him to a strange act of self-mutilation, in obedience to what he regarded as the recommendation of Christ. (Matt. xix. 12.) He was influenced to this act also by the consideration of his own youth, and by the circumstance that his catechumens were of both sexes. He wished, however, to conceal what he had done, and appears to have been much confused when it was divulged; but the bishop Demetrius, respecting his motive, exhorted him to take courage, though he did not hesitate, at a subsequent period, to make it a matter of severe accusation against him. (Euseb. \H. E. vi. 3, 6; Epiph. \Haeres. Ixiv. 3; Hieron. Epist. 65, ed. vett., 41, ed. Benedict., 84, ed. Volz.) Origen himself (Comment. in Matt. tom. xx. 1) afterward repudiated this literal understanding of our Lord’s words.

With the death of Severus (A.D. 211), if not before, the persecution (in which Plutarchus and others of Origen’s catechumens had perished) ceased; and Origen, anxiously desiring to become acquainted with the church at Rome, visited the imperial city during the papacy of Zephyrinus, which extended, according to Tillemont, from A.D. 201, or 202, to 218. Tillemont and Neander place this visit in A.D. 211 or 212. He made however a very short stay; and when he returned to Alexandria (Euseb. \H. E. vi. 14), finding himself unable to discharge alone the duties of Catechist, and to give the attention which he desired to biblical studies, he gave up a part of his catechumens (who flocked to him from morning till evening) to the care of his early pupil Heraclas. It was probably about this time that he began to devote himself to the study of the Hebrew language (Euseb. \H. E. vi. 15, 16); and also to the study of the Greek philosophy, his eminence in which is admitted by Porphyry (ap. Euseb. \H. E. vi. 19), that he might instruct and refute the heretics and heathens, who, attracted by his growing reputation, resorted to him to test his attainments, or to profit by them. Among those who thus resorted to him was one Ambrosius, or Ambrose, a Valentinian, according to Eusebius (\H. E. vi. 18); a Marcionite, or a Sabellian, according to other accounts reported by Epiphanius (\Haeres. Ixiv. 3); at any rate a disserter of some kind from the orthodox church; a man of wealth, rank, and earnestness of character. Origen convinced him of his error; and Ambrose, grateful for the benefit, became the great supporter of Origen in his biblical labours, devoting his wealth to his service, and supplying him with more than seven amanuenses to write from his dictation, and as many transcribers to make fair copies of his works. (Euseb. \H. E. vi. 23.) About this time he undertook a journey into Petraea, the Roman Arabia, at the request of the governor of that province, who, wishing to confer with him on some matter not specified, had despatched an officer with letters to the governor of Egypt and the bishop of Alexandria, requesting Origen might be sent to him. After a short absence on this business, he returned to Alexandria. It was perhaps on this visit that he heard Hippolytus preach (Hippolytus, No. 1). After a time he again left Alexandria on account of a serious disturbance which arose there; and, not deeming himself safe in any part of Egypt, withdrew to Caesarea in Palestine. Huet (\Origienia, lib. i. c. ii. § 6), Tillemont, and others identify the tumult (Eusebius calls it “the war”) which compelled Origen to quit Alexandria, with the slaughter of the people of that city by Caracalla. (Caracalla.) If this conjecture is admitted, it enables us to assign to Origen's removal the date A.D. 216. At Caesarea he received the most respectful treatment. Though not yet ordained to the priesthood, he was invited to expound the Scriptures, and to discourse publicly in the church. Theocritus, bishop of Caesarea, and Alexander, bishop of Jerusalem, the latter of whom had been a fellow-student of Origen, were among the prelates at whose invitation he was induced thus to come forward: and when Demetrius of Alexandria, who was growing jealous of Origen, objected to it as an unheard of irregularity, that a layman should preach before bishops, they vindicated him by citing several precedents. It was perhaps during this visit to Palestine that Origen met with one of the Greek versions of the Old Testament, the Edition Quinta or Secta, which he published in his Hexapla, and which is said to have been found in a wine jar at Jericho. He returned to Alexandria, apparently about the end of Cæcilia's reign, at the desire of Demetrius, who sent some deacons of his church to hasten him home (Euseb. H. E. vi. 19). He returned with zeal to the discharge of his office of Catechist, and to the diligent pursuit of his biblical labours.

His next journey was into Greece. Eusebius (H. E. vi. 23) describes the occasion in general terms, as being ecclesiastical business, but Rufinus (In versione Eusebii, l. c.) and Jerome (De Vir. Illust. c. 54) more exactly describe the object as being the refutation of heretics who were increasing there. Passing through Palestine on his way, he was ordained presbyter by his friends, Theocritus and Alexander, and the other bishops of that province, at Caesarea. This aroused again the jealousy of Demetrius, and led to a decisive rupture between him and Origen, who, however, completed his journey, in the course of which he probably met with a Greek version of the O. T. (the Secta or Quinta Edito of his Hexapla), which had been discovered by one of his friends at Nicopolis, in Epirus, near the Promontory of Actium, on the Ambrian Gulf (Synopsis Sacrae Scripturae, Athanasio adscripta). Possibly it was on this journey that Origen had the interview with Mamæa, mother of the emperor Alexander Severus, mentioned by Eusebius (H. E. vi. 21). Mamæa was led by the curiosity which Origen's great reputation had excited, to solicit an interview with him when she was at Antioch. Tillemont places this interview at an earlier period, A. D. 218, Huet in A. D. 223; but the date is altogether uncertain. The journey of Origen into Greece is placed by Eusebius, as we understand the passage, in the episcopate of Pontinus at Rome, which extended from A. D. 230, or, according to other accounts, from 233 to 235, and of Zebinus at Antioch from A. D. 228 to 237; but Tillemont and Huet interpret the passage so as to fix the ordination of Origen in A. D. 220, about the time when Zebinus of Antioch succeeded Philæus. We are disposed to place it in A. D. 230.

On his return to Alexandria, he had to encounter the open enmity of Demetrius. The remembrance of incidents of the former part of his life was revived and turned to his disadvantage. His self-mutilation, which had been excused at the time, was now urged against him; and a passage in Epiphanius (Hæeres. lxxiv. 2) gives reason to think that a charge of having offered incense to heathen deities was also brought against him. Eusebius has omitted the account of the steps taken by Demetrius against Origen from his Ecclesiastical History, on the ground that they were related in the Defence of Origen (Τριήμερον ἀπολογία, Ἀπολογία pro Origeni) drawn up by Pamphilus and Eusebius; and the loss of this defence has deprived us of the most trustworthy account of these transactions. However, we learn from Photius, who has preserved (Bibl. Cod. 118) a notice of the lost work, that a council of Egyptian prelates and presbyters was held by Demetrius, in which it was determined that Origen should leave Alexandria, and not be allowed either to reside or to teach there. His office of Catechist devolved or was bestowed on his colleague Herachus. His ordination, however, was not invalidated, and indeed the passage in Photius seems to imply that the council expressly decided that he should retain his priesthood. But Demetrius was determined that he should not retain it; and, in conjunction with certain Egyptian prelates, creatures, it would appear, of his own, he pronounced his degradation. Origen had probably, before this second sentence, retired from Alexandria into Palestine, where he was welcomed and protected, and where he taught and preached with great reputation. It was, perhaps, mortification at having failed to crush Origen that led Demetrius to take the further step of communicating him, and to write to the bishops of all parts of the world to obtain their concurrence in the sentence. Such was the deference already paid to the see of Alexandria, and to the decision of the Egyptian bishops, that, except in Palestine and the adjacent countries, Arabia and Phœnicia, in Greece, and perhaps in Cappadocia, where Origen was personally known and respected, the condemnation appears to have obtained general assent. Even the bishop and clergy of Rome joined in the general cry. (Hier. Epist. 29, ed. Benedict., 33, ed. Vallars. and alud Ruffin. Inser. ii. 19, ed. Vallars.) It is probable that Origen's unpopularity arose from the obnoxious character of some of his opinions, and was increased by the circumstance that even in his life-time (Hier. In Ruffin. ii. 18) his writings were seriously corrupted. It appears also that the indiscretion of Ambrosius had published some things which were not designed for general perusal. (Hier. Epist. 65, ed. vett., 41, ed. Benedict., 84, ed. Vallars. c. 10.) But what was the specific ground of his exile, deposition, and correspondence is not clear; it is probable that the immediate and only alleged ground was the irregularity of his ordination; and that whatever things in his writings were capable of being used to his prejudice, were employed to excite odium against him, and so to obtain general concurrence in the proceedings of his opponents. Possibly the story of his apostasy, mentioned by Epiphanius, was circulated at the same time, and for the same object.

Origen was, meanwhile, secure at Caesarea, where he preached almost daily in the church. He composed a letter in vindication of himself to some friends at Alexandria, in which he explains the falsification of his writings. According to Jerome (In Ruffin. ii. 18), he severely handled (laerat) Demetrius, and "inveighed against (invekatur) the bishops and clergy of the whole world," expressing his disregard of their excommunication of him: but from some quotations from the letter it appears to have been written in a milder and more forgiving spirit than Jerome's description would lead us to expect.
died about this time. Tillemont places his death in the same year as Origen's expulsion, viz. a. d. 231, correcting in a note the errors of Eusebius, in his Chronicon, as to the dates of these events. Heraclius succeeded Demetrius; but though he had been the friend, pupil, and colleague of Origen, the change produced no benefit to the latter: the Egyptian clergy were too deeply committed to the course into which Demetrius had led them, to allow them to retract, and Origen remained in exile till his death. About this time he met with Gregory Thaumaturgus, afterwards bishop of Neocaesarea [Gregorius Thaumaturgus], and his brother Athenodorus, who were then youths pursuing their studies. They both became his pupils, and the former of them his panegyrist. (Greg. Thaum. Panegyrica Oratio in Origen, § 5.) Maximin, who had murdered the emperor Alexander Severus (a. d. 233) and succeeded to the throne, now commenced a persecution of the church in which Origen's friend Ambrose, who had also settled at Caesarea, where he had become a deacon, and Proxectetus, a presbyter of the same church, were involved. Origen, to encourage them to brave death for the truth, composed his treatise Περὶ Μαρτυρίου, De Martyrio. They escaped, however, with life. Origen himself is thought to have been at this time at Caesarea in Cappadocia, where Firmilianus the bishop was his friend: for he appears to have been concealed two years, during some persecution, in the house of a wealthy lady of the Cappadocian Caesarea, named Juliana (Pallad. Histor. Laus. c. 147; comp. Tillemont, Mem. vol. iii. p. 542, and Huet, Origenian. lib. i. c. iii. § 2), from whom he received several works of Symmachus, the Greek translator of the Old Testament. (Pallad. l. c. ; Euseb. H. E. vi. 17.) If his journey into Cappadocia be placed in the reign of Maximin, he probably returned about the time of Maximin's death (a. d. 238) to Caesarea in Palestine, and there continued, preaching daily and steadily pursuing his biblical studies, composing his commentaries on the prophets Isaiah and Ezekiel and on the Canticles (Euseb. H. E. vi. 32), and labouring also at his Hexapla. These labours were hardly interrupted by a journey into Greece; for he continued his works when on his travels, and finished his commentary on Ezekiel and commenced that on the Canticles at Athens. (Euseb. ibid.) The date of this second journey into Greece is doubtful. According to Suidas (ς. ε. Σπύρης) the commentary on Ezekiel was composed when Origen was in his sixtieth year, i. e. in a. d. 245, and Eusebius (H. E. vi. 32) says it was finished at Athens; but Tillemont infers from the order of events in the narrative of Eusebius that the journey took place before the death of the emperor Gordian III. (a. d. 244). If Tillemont's inference is sound, we must reject the statement of Suidas; and we must also place before the death of Gordian, the visit which Origen made to Bostam in Arabia (Euseb. H. E. vi. 33), and his restoration to the then orthodox belief of Beryllus, bishop of Bostam, who had propagated some notions respecting our Lord's pre-existent nature, which were deemed heretical. [Beryllus.] During the reign of Philippus the Arabin (a. d. 244—249), Origen wrote his reply to the Epicurean Celsus, and his commentaries on the twelve minor prophets, and on the Gospel of Matthew; also a number of letters, among which were one to the emperor Philippus, one to the empress Severa his wife, and others to Fabianus, bishop of Rome, and other leading ecclesiastics, to correct their misconceptions respecting himself. He made also a third journey into Arabia, where he convinced some persons of their error in believing that the soul died with the body and was raised again with it; and repressed the rising heresy of the Eclesiastes, who asserted, among other things, that to deny the faith in a time of persecution was an act morally indifferent, and supported their heresy by a book which they affirmed to have fallen from heaven. (Euseb. vi. 36, 37, 38.)

But the life of this laborious and self-denying Christian was drawing near its close. With the reign of Decius (a. d. 249—251) came a renewal of persecution [Decius], and the storm fell fiercely upon Origen. His friend Alexander of Jerusalem died a martyr: and he was himself imprisoned and tortured, though his persecutors carefully avoided such extremities as would have released him by death. His tortures, which he himself exactly described in his letters, are related somewhat vaguely by Eusebius. (Euseb. H. E. vi. 17.) However, he survived the persecution, which ceased upon, if not before, the death of Decius (a. d. 251). He received during, or after, the persecution a letter on martyrdom from Dionysius, who had now succeeded Heraclius in the see of Alexandria. [Dionysius, No. 2.] Whatever prospect this letter might open of reconciliation with the Alexandrian Church was of little moment now. Origen was worn out with years, labours, and sufferings. He had lost by death his great friend and supporter Ambrosius, who had not bequeathed any legacy to sustain him during what might remain of life. But poverty had been through life the state which Origen had voluntarily chosen, and it mattered but little to him that he was left destitute for the brief remainder of his pilgrimage. After the persecution, according to Epiphanius, he left Caesarea for Jerusalem, and afterwards went to Tyre. He died in a. d. 253, or, at the latest, early in 254, in his sixty-ninth year, at Tyre, in which city he was buried. (Hieron. De Viris Illust. c. 54.) His sufferings in the Decian persecution appear to have hastened his end, and gave rise to the statement, supported by the respectable authority of the martyr Pamphilus and others of the generation succeeding Origen's own time, that he had died a martyr in Caesarea during the persecution. This statement, as Photius observes, could be received only by denying the genuineness of the letters purporting to have been written by Origen after the persecution had ceased. (Phot. Biblioth. Cod. 118.) It is remarkable that Eusebius does not distinctly record his death. One of the early fathers of whom we have such full information as of Origen, and there are none whose characters are more worthy of our esteem. His firmness in time of persecution; his unwearied assiduity both in his office of catechist and his studies as a biblical scholar and theologian; his meekness under the injurious usage he received from Demetrius and other members of the Alexandrian church; the steadfastness of his friendship with Ambrose, Alexander of Jerusalem, and others; and his general piety and self-denial, entitle him to our highest respect. His bitterest enemies respected his character, and have borne honourable testimony to his worth. The chief ancient authorities for his life have been cited

VOL. III.

WORKS. I. Editions of the Old Testament. Origen prepared two editions of the Old Testament, known respectively as Tetrapla, “The Four-fold,” and Hexapla, “The Six-fold.” To the latter the names Octapla, “The Eight-fold,” and Enneapla, “The Nine-fold,” have been sometimes given; but the last name is not found in any ancient writer. There is a difference also in the form of these names. Origen himself, Eusebius, and Jerome use the plural forms τετραπλα, Tetrapla, and ἔξαπλα, Hexapla; but later writers use the singular forms, τετραπλα, Tetrapla, and ἔξαπλα, Hexapla. In one place, speak of ἕξαπλα τὰς Βιβλίας, Sextuplices Libros. The names τετραπλάδων, ἕξαπλάδων, ἑκταπλάδων, Quadruplexes Columna (v. paginis), Sextuplex Columna, Octuplex Columna were also applied to the work by ancient writers. In one citation the name τὸ πενταπλάδων, Quintuplex Columna, is found. In some cases a book of Scripture is cited thus: ἔξαπλα Ἰερεμίας, Sextuplex Hieremias, i. e. “Jeremias in the Hexapla.” But this multiplicity of names must not mislead the reader into the supposition that Origen prepared more than the two works, known respectively as the Tetrapla and Hexapla. Which of the two was first published has been a subject of great dispute with the learned. The text of Eusebius (H. E. vi. 16, ad fin.) is not settled in the place which refers to this point, nor would be decisive if it was. Montfaucon (Prælim. in Hexapla, c. iii.) has cited some passages from Origen and other writers, which indicate the priority of the Tetrapla; and the supposition that the less complete and elaborate work was the earlier is the more probable, especially if we receive the testimony of Epiphanius, that the Hexapla was finished at Tyre, during the time that Origen resided there.

For as that residence appears to have extended only from the close of the Decian persecution to his death, it is not likely that he would have had either time or energy to publish the Tetrapla, though it would, indeed, have been only a portion of the Hexapla separated from the rest of the work.

The Hexapla consisted of several copies of the Old Testament, six in some parts, seven in others, eight in others, and nine in a few, ranged in parallel columns. The first column to the right contained the Hebrew text in Hebrew characters, (i.e. these now in use, not the more ancient Samaritan letters,) the second the same text in Greek characters, the third the version of Aquila, the fourth that of Symmachus, the fifth the Septuagint, the sixth the version of Theodotion, the proximity of these several versions to the columns containing the Hebrew text being determined by their more close and literal adherence to the original; and the seventh, eighth, and ninth columns being occupied by three versions, known from their position in this work as η Ἱερεμίας καὶ η Ἑκελία καὶ η Ἐκκολία ἐκδόσεις. Quinta, Sexta, et Septima Editiones, i. e. versions. Each of the first six columns contained all the books of the Old Testament, and these six complete columns gave to the work its title Hexapla: the other columns contained only some of the books, and principally the poetical books, and from them the work derived the titles of Octapla and Enneapla, which were therefore only partially applicable. The assertion that the title Hexapla was given to the work on account of its having six Greek versions, we believe to be erroneous. We give as a specimen a passage from Habakkuk ii. 4, which is found in all the columns.

The Tetrapla contained the four versions, the Septuagint, and those of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion. Of the versions of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion, an account is given under their respective names, and of the Septuagint there is a brief notice under Aristides. Of the three remaining versions we give here a brief account. The Quinta Edition, according to Epiphanius (De Menstruis et Ponderibus, c. 17, 18), and the author of the Synopsis S. Scripturæ, which is ascribed to Athanasius, was found at Jericho in a wine jar, by one of the learned men of Jerusalem; and Epiphanius adds the date of the discovery, the seventh year of Caracalla (A. D. 217 or 218). The Editioni Sexta, according to the same authorities, was also found in a wine jar at Nicopolis, on the Ambracian gulf, in the reign of Alexander Severus. These dates would accord respectively with the time of Origen’s first visits to Palestine and to Greece. Ancient writers, however, differ as to the discovery of these versions. According to one passage in Jerome (Prologus in Evangel. Cantico, Cantico, secundum Origenem.), Origen himself stated, that the Quinta Edition was found at Nicopolis: according to Zosimus (Annal. xii. 11), the Septima was found at Jericho; and according to Nicephorus Callistus, both the Sexta and Septima were found there. Eusebius states that one of the versions was found at Jericho and one at Nicopolis, but does not give their numbers. The difference between these authorities is owing more probably to the carelessness or mistake of the writers or transcribers, than to any variation in the order of the versions in different copies of the Hexapla; for this appears to have been so fixed as to have suggested the common mode of referring to them by their place in the arrangement. The Quinta, Sexta, &c., versions are anonymous; at least the authors are not known. Jerome (Adv. Rufin. ii. 34, ed. Vallars.) calls the authors of the Quinta and Sexta, Jews; yet a citation from the Editio Sexta, which citation Jerome himself has given in Latin, shows that the author of that version was a Christian. Josephus, author of the Hypomonasticum [Josephus, No. 12] mentions a current report that the author of the Editio Quinta was a woman. The author of the Editio Septima was probably a Jew. (Montfanc. Praefil. in Hexapla, cap. viii. § 5.) These three versions are far less literal than the other four versions; the Sexta, in particular, has some amplifications of most unauthorized character.

Beside the compilation and arrangement of so valuable a critical apparatus as these versions, Origen added marginal notes, containing, among other things, an explanation of the Hebrew names. There is reason to think that he occasionally gave in his marginal notes a Greek version of the readings of the Syriac and Samaritan versions, of the former in various books, of the latter in the Pentaehuc only. Certainly such readings are found, not only in extant MS. where the Hexapla is cited, but in the citations of it by the fathers of the fourth and fifth centuries. It is to be observed also that Origen did not content himself with giving the text of the Septuagint as it stood in his own time, deeming it to have been much corrupted by the carelessness or unscrupulous alterations or additions or omissions of transcribers. (Origen. Comment. in Matth. apud Hodium, De Text. Originalibus, lib. iii. c. iv. § 8.) He amended the text chiefly by the aid of Theodotion’s version, allowing the received reading to remain, but marking his proposed alterations or additions with an asterisk (*), and prefixing an obelus (†) to such words or passages as he thought should be omitted. The use of another mark, the lemmisius (— or ——), which he is said to have employed, can only be conjectured: the account of its use given by Eppiphanius (De Mensur. et Ponderib. c. viii.), is evidently erroneous. Origen’s revision of the text of the Septuagint was regarded by succeeding generations as the standard; it was frequently transcribed, and Latin, Syriac, and Arabic versions made from it.

In the preparation of this most laborious and valuable work, Origen was encouraged by the exhortations and supported by the wealth of his friend Ambrose. It is probable that, from the labour and cost required, comparatively few transcripts were ever made; though there were a sufficient number for the leading ecclesiastical writers of succeeding ages to have access to it; as Pamphilus, Eusebius of Caesarea, (these two are said to have corrected the text of the work, and Eusebius added Scholia,) Athanasius, Theodosus of Hermelceia, the Arian, Diodorus of Tarsus, Eppiphanius, Rufinus, Jerome, Chrysostom, Theodoret, Procopius of Gaza, &c. Others of the fathers employed the work less frequently; and some borrowed their acquaintance with its various readings from the citations of their predecessors. Origen’s own copies of the Tetrapla and Hexapla, with the corrections and Scholia of Origen himself and of Pamphilus and Eusebius, long remained in the library of the monastery of St. Rupert at Caesarea; and were probably destroyed in the seventh century, at the capture of that city by Chosroes II. the Persian, or its subsequent capture by the Saracens. The few transcripts that were made have perished also, and the work, as compiled by Origen, has been lost long. Numerous fragments have, however, been preserved in the writings of the fathers. Many of these, containing scraps of the versions of Aquila and the other Greek translators, collected by Petrus Morinus, were inserted by Flamininus Nobilius in the beautiful and valuable edition of the Septuagint, fol. Rome, 1587. These fragments, and some additional ones, with learned notes, were prepared for publication by Joannes Drusius, and published after his death with this title, Veterum Interpretum Graecorum in toto V. T. Fragmenta, 4to. Arnhem, 1622. But the most complete edition is that of the learned Benedictine Montfaucon—Hexapolorum Origines quae supersunt, 2 vols. fol. Paris, 1714. Montfaucon retained the arrangement of the versions adopted by Origen, and also his asterisks and obelii, wherever they were found in the MSS. employed for the edition; and added a Latin version both to the Hebrew text (for which he employed that of Santes Pagninus or of Arias Montanus with slight alterations, and also the Vulgate); and to the Greek versions. He prefixed a valuable Praefatio and Prae- liminaria, to which we have been much indebted, and added to the edition several Anecdotata, or unpublished fragments of Origen and others, and a Greek and a Hebrew Lexicon to the Hexapla. An edition based on that of Montfaucon was published in 2 vols. 8vo. Leipzig and Louvay, 1763, 1770, under the editorship of C. F. Bahrdt. A second edition of the Hexapla in Greek letters, the Latin versions, the anecdotata, or previously unpublished extracts from Origen and others, and many of the notes. Bahrdt prepared to correct the text, and increased it by some additional fragments; and he added notes of his own to those which he retained of Montfaucon’s. Bahrdt’s preface intimated his purpose of preparing a Lexicon to the work, but it is not subjoined to the copy now before us, nor can we find that it was ever published.

II. Εξεγετικά, Exegetical works. These comprehend three classes. (Hieronym. Praef. in Translat. Homil. Orig. in Joren. et Ezech.) 1. Τούοι, which Jerome renders Volumina, containing ample commentaries, in which he gave full scope to his intellect. 2. Σχολια, Scholia; brief notes on detached passages, designed to clear up obscurities and remove difficulties. 3. Homiliae, popular expositions, delivered chiefly at Caesarea; and in the latter part of his life (i.e. after his sixtieth year, A. D. 246), extemporaneously, being taken down at the time of delivery by persons employed for the purpose. Of the Τούοι there are few remains. Of the Scholia a number have been collected chiefly from the citations of the fathers, and are given by Delarue under the title of Ημελγαι, Secteta. Of the Homiliae a few are extant in the original, and many more in the Latin versions (not very faithful however) of Ruinus, Jerome, and others. Our space does not allow us to give an enumeration of Origen’s Exegetical works, but they will be found in Delarue’s edition of his works.

In his various expositions Origen sought to extract from the Sacred Writings their historical, E 2

mystical or prophetical, and moral significance. (Orig. Homil. XVII. in Genesis, c. 1.) His desire of finding continually a mystical sense led him frequently into the neglect of the historical sense, and even into the denial of its truth. This capital fault has at all times furnished ground for depreciating his labours, and has no doubt materially diminished their value: it must not, however, be supposed that his denial of the historical truth of the Sacred Writings is more than occasional, or that it has been carried out to the full extent which some of his accusers (for instance, Eustathius of Antioch) have charged upon him. His character as a commentator is thus summed up by the acute Richard Simon (Hist. Critique des Principaux Commentateurs du N. T. ch. iii.):—

"Origen is everywhere too long and too much given to digressions. He commonly says every thing which occurs to him with respect to some word that he meets with, and he affects great refinement in his speculations (il affecte de parler subtil dans ses inventions), which often leads him to resort to airy (sublimes) and allegorical meanings. But notwithstanding these faults, we find in his Commentaries on the New Testament an acute and an extensive acquaintance with every thing respecting religion; nor is there any writer from whom we can learn so well as from him what the ancient theology was. He had carefully read a great number of writers of whom we now scarcely know the names." His prominence to allegorical and mystical interpretations was probably derived from, at least strengthened by, his study of Plato, and others of the Greek philosophers.

II. Other Works. The exegetical writings of Origen might well have been the sole labour of a long life devoted to literature. They form, however, only a part of the works of this indefatigable father. Epiphanius affirms (Haeres. livx. 63) that common report assigned to him the composition of "six thousand books (ξιμωκυμένων βιβλίων); and the statement, which is repeated again and again by the Byzantine writers, though itself an absurd exaggeration, may be taken as evidence of his exuberant and copious labours. His Commentaries on the New Testament, to Varro, the most fertile author among the Latins (Hieron. ad Paulam Epistol. 29, ed. Benedictin, 33, ed. Vallars, et apud Rufin. Inveict. lib. ii. 19), and states that he surpassed him and all other writers, whether Latin or Greek, in the number and extent of his works. Of his miscellaneous works the following only are known:—

1. Επιστολάι, Epistolae. Origen wrote many letters, of which Eusebius collected as many as he could find extant, to the number of more than a hundred (H. E. vi. 36). Most of them have long since perished. Delarue has given (vol. i. p. 31—32) those, whether entire or fragmentary, which remain.

2. Περὶ διαστάσεως, De Resurrectione. Eusebius says this work was in two books (H. E. vi. 24), and was written at Alexandria before the Commentaries on the Lamentations of Jeremiah, in which they are referred to. Jerome (ibid.) adds that he wrote two other Dialogi de Resurrectione; and in another place (Ad Pamnach. Epistol. 61, edd. vet., 38, ed. Benedictin.; Lib. Contra Ioannem Jerusolymitanum, c. 25, ed. Vallarsi) he cites the fourth book on the resurrection, as if he regarded the two works as constituting one. The works on the resurrection are lost, except a few fragments cited by Jerome or by Pamphilus, in his Apologia pro Origene, or by Origen himself in his De Principiis (Delarue, vol. i. pp. 32—37).

3. Εξωκαταστάσεις, Theophrastus et. Stromaœis, Libri X. written at Alexandria, in the reign of Alexander Severus (Euseb. H. E. vi. 24), in imitation of the work of the same name by Clemens Alexanderinus. [Clemens Alexandrinus.] The tenth book was chiefly composed of Scholia on the Epistle of Paul to the Galatians. Nothing is extant of the work, except two or three fragments cited in Latin by Jerome. (Delarue, vol. i. pp. 37—41.)

4. Περὶ ἀρχῶν, De Principiis. This work, which was written at Alexandria (Eusebius, H. E. vi. 24), was the greatest object of attack with Origen's enemies, and the source from which they derived their chief evidence of his various alleged heresies. It was divided into four books. The first treated of God, of Christ, and of the Holy Spirit; of the fall, of rational natures and their final restoration to happiness, of corporeal and incorporeal beings and of angels: the second, of the world and the things in it, of the free agency, the dispensation and of the new, of the incarnation of Christ, of the resurrection, and of the punishment of the wicked: the third book, of the freedom of the will, of the agency of Satan, of the temptations of man, of the origin of the world in time and of its end: the fourth, of the divine original and proper mode of studying the Scriptures. The heterodoxy of this work, according to the standard of the day, or rather perhaps of the next generation, was ascribed by Marcellus of Ancyra to the influence of the Greek philosophy, especially that of Plato, which Origen had been recently studying, and had not taken time maturely to consider. Eusebius replied to Marcellus by denying the Platonism of Origen, and Pamphilus, in his Apologia pro Origene, attempted to prove that he was orthodox. On the outbreak of the Arian controversy, Origen was accused of having been the real author of that obnoxious system; and Didymus of Alexandria, in his Scholia on the Περὶ ἀρχῶν of Origen, in order to refute this charge, endeavoured to show how far he differed from them. [Didymus, No. 4.] But as the limits of orthodoxy became more definite and restricted, this mode of defence was abandoned; and Rufinus, no longer denying the heterodox character of many passages with respect to the Trinity, affirmed that they were interpolations. When, therefore, at the close of the fourth century, he translated the Περὶ ἀρχῶν into Latin, he softened the objectionable features of the work, by omitting those parts relating to the Trinity, which appeared to be heterodox, and illustrating obscure passages by the insertion of more explicit declarations from the author's other writings. On other subjects, however, he was said to have rather exaggerated than softened the objectionable sentiments. (Hieron, Contra Rufin. c. 7.) Such principles of translation would have seriously impaired the fidelity of his version, even if his assertion, that he had added nothing of his own, were true; but as he did not give reference to the places from which the inserted passages were taken, he rendered the credibility of that assertion very doubtful. Jerome, therefore, to expose, as he says (ibid.), both the heterodoxy of the writer and the unfaithfulness of the translator, gave another and more exact version of the work. Of the original work some important fragments, including a considerable part of the third and fourth books, have been preserved in the Philocelia; in the Epistola ad Menannum, Patriarcham Coptitanum of the emperor Justinian, given in the various editions of the Concilia (e. g. vol. v. p. 635, &c., ed. Labbe, vol. iii. p. 244, &c., ed. Hardouin); and by Marcellus of Ancyra (apud Eusebius, Contra Marcellum). Of the version of Jerome, there are some small portions preserved in his letter to Avitus (Epistol. 59, edd. vett., 94, ed. Benedictin, 124, ed. Vallars.). The version of Rufinus has come down to us entire; and is given with the fragments of Jerome's version and of the original by Delarue, vol. i. pp. 42—123.

5. Περὶ εὐσήξ. De Orosion. This work is mentioned by Pampilius (Apol. pra Origo. c. viii.), and is still extant. It was first published, 12mo, Oxford, 1653, with a Latin version. (Delarue, vol. i. pp. 195—272.)

6. Εἰς μαρτυρίον προπενθήκος λόγος, Exhortatio ad Martyrium, Περὶ μαρτυρίου, De Martyrio, addressed to his friend and patron Ambrosius, and to Protetocet of Caesarea, during the persecution under the emperor Maximin (a. d. 235—238), and still extant. (Delarue, vol. i. pp. 273—310.) It was first published by Jo. Rud. Wetstenius (Weitsen) the younger, 4to, Basel, 1574, with a Latin version and notes. Origen's letter of like purport, written when a mere boy to his father, has been already noticed.

7. Κατὰ Κάκην θύρων τῆς, Contra Celenum Libri VIII, written in the time of the emperor Philippus (Euseb. H. E. vi. 36), and still extant. In this valuable work Origen defends the truth of Christianity against the attacks of Celas, an Epicurean, or perhaps a Platonic philosopher [CELSUS]. The Philocelia is chiefly made up of extracts from it. It was first printed in the Latin version of Christophorus Person, fol. Rome, 1481, and in Greek by David Hoeschelius, 4to, Augsburg, 1605. (Delarue, vol. i. pp. 310—799.)

It may be as well here to mention that the Philocelia, Philocelia, so often mentioned, was a compilation by Basil of Caesarea, and his friend Gregory of Nazianzus [Basilius, No. 2; Gregory Nazianzenus], almost exclusively from the writings of Origen, of which many important fragments have been thus preserved, especially from his reply to Celsus. It is divided into twenty-seven chapters. It was first published in the Latin version of Gilbertus Genebrardus, in the second volume of that author's edition of Origen's works, fol. Paris, 1574, and in Greek by Joannes Tarinus, 4to, Paris, 1618. It is not given as a whole by Delarue, but such of the extracts as are not elsewhere extant are distributed to their appropriate places.

Many works of Origen are totally lost. An enumeration of those of which we have any information is given by Fabriucus (Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 235, &c.). The majority of those which are lost were biblical and exegetical. The others were chiefly directed against the various classes of heretics, and partly consisted of records of his disputations with them. The book De Liberis 2c, mentioned by himself in his Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, was perhaps that portion of his Περὶ διψῶν which relates to that subject. What the Monobiblia, mentioned by Jerome (Ad Paulam Epistol. 29, ed Benedictin, 33, ed. Vallars. and apud Ruini. Insept. lib. ii. 19), was, we have no means of ascertaining. There were, perhaps, other works beside those enumerated by Fabriucus (l. c.): for there is no complete list of Origen's works extant; those drawn up by Eusebius (see H. E. vi. 32) in his Life of Pamphilus, and by Jerome (see De Viris Illust. c. 54) in the mutilated Epitope to Paula, just cited, are now lost.

Several works have been ascribed to Origen, and published under his name, which really do not belong to him. Of these, the most important are the following. (1) Διδαχογος κατα Μαρτυρους, De Doctrina Fidei, with the Epistle to the Romans, ed. by Wetstein (see H. E. vi. 32) in his Life of Pamphilus, and by Jerome (see De Viris Illust. c. 54) in the mutilated Epitope to Paula, just cited, are now lost.

Origen's version of the Greek Testament was, as stated above, published, first in 1601, in the tenth volume of his Theaurus Antiquitatum Graecarum, published by Jac. Groroivius, in the title volume of his Thesaurus Antiquitatum Graecarum, p. 249, &, under the title of Origenis Philosophorum Fragmentum. This title is not quite correct: the Philosopherum, or account of the systems of the ancient philosophy, appears to be entire, but is itself only a portion of a larger work against all "heresies" or sects holding erroneous views. The author is not known; but he was not Origen; for in his proemium he claims episcopal rank, which Origen never held. (The work is in Delarue, vol. i. pp. 907—903. (2) Σχεδίας εἰς εὐσήξ κυριάρχης, Schol. in Oratio. II. Dominicae, published by Fed. Morellus, in 1601, as the production of "Origen or some other teacher of that age:" but Huet and Delarue deny that these Scholia are his, and Huet ascribes them to Petrus of Laodicia, following the editors of the Bibliotheca Patrum, who have given a Latin version of them in that collection. (Delarue, vol. i. pp. 909, 911.)—The above, with (4), an ancient Latin version of a Commentary on Job, are the only supposititious works given by Delarue. Others, however, are extant, and have been given by other editors, but do not require any further notice here.

On his own works, Origen revised the Lexicon of Hebrew names, Hebriborum Nominae S. Scripturae et Mensuratur Interpretatio, of Philo Judaeus (Philo), and enlarged it by the addition of the names in the New Testament: the work is consequently ascribed to him in some MSS.; but after his reputed heresies had rendered him odious, the name of Cyril of Alexandria was prefixed to the work in some MSS. in place of his. The Lexicon is extant in the Latin version of Jerome, among whose works it is usually printed. (Vol. ii. pars i. edit. Benedictin, vol. iii. ed. Vallars.)

The collected works of Origen, more or less complete, have been repeatedly published. The first editions contained the Latin versions only; they were those of Jac. Merlimus, 4 vols., or more exactly, 4 parts in 2 vols. fol. Paris, 1512—1519. In this edition the editor published an Apologia pro Origenis, which involved him in much trouble, and obliged him to defend himself in a new Apologia, published in A.D. 1522, when his edition was reprinted, as it was again in 1530, and perhaps 1536. The second edition was prepared by Erasmus, who made the versions, and was published after his death by Beat. Rhenanus, fol. Basel, 1536. Panzer (Annales Typ. vol. vii.) gives the version of Eras- mus as published in 4 vols. fol. Lyon (Laubunam), 1536. It was reprinted, with additions, in 1545, 1551, 1557, and 1571. The third and most complete Latin edition was that of Gilbertus Genebrardus, 2 vols, Paris, 1574, reprinted in 1604 and 1619. The value of these Latin editions is diminished by the consideration, that some of the works of Origen, for instance, the De Martyrio and De Oratione, are not contained in them, and that the versions of Rufinus, which make up a large part of them, are notoriously unfaithful. We do not here notice any but professedly complete editions of Origen's works.

Of the Graeco-Latin editions the most important are the following:—Origines Opera Exegetica, 2 vols. fol. Rouen, 1668, edited by Pierre Daniel Huet, afterwards Dp. of Avanches. An ample and valuable dissertation on the life, opinions, and works of Origen, entitled Originalia, was prefixed to this edition. The fragments, collected from the Catena oy Combes, were sent to Huet, but were not inserted by him. Huet intended to publish the complete works of Origen, but did not execute his purpose. His edition was reprinted at Paris, in 1679, and at Cologne, or rather Frankfort, in 1683. But the standard edition of Origen's works is that of the French Benedictine, Charles Delarue, completed after his death by his nephew, Charles Vincent Delarue, a monk of the same order, 4 vols. fol. Paris, 1733—1759. The first volume contains the Miscellaneous, including some of the supposi- tionatious works; and the other three the Exegetical works, including one of the supposititious Commentarii in Jobum. The fragments of the Hexapla and the Hebrornum Novinum, &c. Interpretatio, and a portion of the supposititious works, are not given. To the fourth volume are appended (1) Rufinus' version of the Apologia pro Origen of the Martyr Pamphilus, with considerable fragments of the Greek, accompanied by a new Latin version of the fragments. (2) The Epilegis of Rufinus on the interpolation of Origen's writings. (3) Ets ΄Αρχήν των φαντασμάτων καὶ παντηρίων λόγων. In Original Prophetionis ac Paganorum Oratio, addressed by Gregorius Thannachturos to Origen, his preceptor, on leaving him to return to his native land, with the Latin version of Gerard Vossius. (4) The Originalium of Huet: and (5) an extract from Bishop Bull's Defensio Fidei Nicennae, cap. ix. on the Consistency of the Son of God. The whole works were accompanied by valuable prefaces, "monita," and notes.

The works of Origen, from the edition of Delarue, revised by Oberhürr, were reprinted without notes, in 15 vols. 8vo. Würzburg, 1785, &c. A number of additional passages from Origen, chiefly gleaned from various Catena, and containing Scholia on several of the books of Scripture, are given in the Appendix to the xivth (posthumous) volume of Galland's Bibliotheca Patrum. The most important of these additions are to the Scholia on the books of Deuteronomy, Samuel, Kings, Job, Psalms, Proverbs, and the Gospels of Matthew and Luke. Some additions to the Scholia on the Canticles, and to the Hexaplar readings on the same book, are contained in the Ets τῶν Ταυτων, Catena in Canticam, of Procopius of Gaza, published in the Classicorum Auctorum et Vaticanos Codis. editorum of Angelo Mai, vol. ix. p. 527, &c. 8vo. Rome, 1837. Two fragments of Origen, one considerable one, Ets τῶν Δαιμονίων, In Evangelium Luceæ (pp. 474—482), and one of a few lines, Ets Ανωτάτων, In Levicæ, appear in vol. x. of the same series. Some Scholia of Origen are contained in a collection, Ets τῶν Δαιμονίων διάφορων, In Danielum Variorum Commentarii, published in vol. i. pars ii. p. 161, &c. of the Scripturum Veterum Nova Collectio, 10 vols. 4to. Rome, 1825, &c. of the same learned editor.

Few writers have exercised greater influence by the force of their intellect and the variety of their attainments than Origen, or have been the occasion of longer and more acrimonious disputes. His influence is the more remarkable as he had not the advantage of high rank and a commanding position in the church; and his freedom in interpreting the Scriptures, and the general liberality of his views, were in direct opposition to the current of religious opinion in his own and subsequent times.

Of the more distinctive tenets of this father, several had reference to the doctrine of the Trinity, on which he was charged with distinguis-Origen lived before the limits which separated orthodoxy and heterodoxy were so determinately and narrowly laid down, as in the following centuries, and therefore, though his opinions were obnoxious to many, and embittered the opposition to him, he was not cast out of the church as a heretic in his lifetime, the grounds of his excommunication relating rather to points of ecclesiastical order and regularity, than to questions of dogmatic theology. But some time after his death, and especially after the outbreak of the Arian controversy, and the appeal of the Arians to passages in Origen’s works, the cry of heresy was raised by the orthodox party against his writings. The tone, however, of the earlier orthodox leaders, Athanasius, Basil, and Gregory Nazianzen was moderate; others, as Hilary of Poitiers, John of Jerusalem, Didymus, Gregory Nyssen, Eusebius of Vercellae, Titus of Bostra, Ambrose, Palladius, Isidore of Pelusium, and even Jerome himself in his earlier life, defended Origen, though Jerome’s change of opinion in respect of Origen afterwards, led to his famous quarrel with Rufinus. About the close of the fourth century, Theophilus of Alexandria expelled some monks from Egypt on account of their Origenism; but the oppressive deed was not approved at Constantinople, where the monks were kindly received by the Patriarch Chrysostom and the Empress Eudoxia. The monks were restored: but the conflict of Theophilus and Chrysostom led to the deposition of the latter, one of the charges against whom was that of Origenism. The memory and opinions of Origen were now more decidedly condemned both in the East and West, yet they were favourably regarded by some of the more eminent men, among whom were the ecclesiastical historians Eusebius and Sozomen. On the reign of Justinian, Origenism revived in the monasteries of Palestine, and the emperor himself wrote his Epistola ad Menam (s. Menenam) Patriarcham CPhulinam against the Origenists, who were expelled from their monasteries in Palestine, and condemned in the fifth ecumenical (second Constantinopolitan), council A. d. 553. The Greeks generally followed the decision of the council, and a new element, the question of the salvation of Origen, was added to the controversy respecting the truth or error of his doctrines. In the West the dispute was revived with the revival of learning. Merlinus, Erasmus, and Genebrardus, his editors, Joannes Picus of Miranda, Sixtus of Sena, and the Jesuit Halloix, defended Origen, and affirmed his salvation. The cardinals Baronius and Bellarmine took the opposite side, as did the reformers Luther and Beza. Sir翰ham Binet, a Jesuit, published a little book, De Salvate Origenis, Paris, 1629, in which he introduces the leading writers on the subject as debating the question of Origen’s salvation, and makes Baronius propose a descent to the infernal regions to ascertain the truth. (Bayle, Dictionnaire, s. v. Origenis, note D.) A summary of the history of Origenism is given by Huet (Originaux, 1. i. 4; and by the Jesuit Doucin, in his Histoire de l’Originaisme. [J. C. M.]

ORIGENES, a platonic philosopher, who wrote a book De Daemonibus. He is not to be confounded with the subject of the foregoing article, as he has been sometimes done. (Porphyry, Vit. Plotin. c. 3; 20; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 180.) [J. C. M.]

ORION (Orion), a son of Hyrieus, of Hyria, in Bocotia, a very handsome giant and hunter, and said to have been called by the Boeotians Caudon. (Hom. Od. xi. 509; Strab. ix. p. 404; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 328.) Once he came to Chios (Ophiussa), and fell in love with Aero, or Meropis, a sister of Oenopion, by the nympha Helice. He cleared the island from wild beasts, and brought the spoils of the chase as presents to his beloved; but as Oenopion constantly deferred the marriage, Orion one day being intoxicated forced his way into the chamber of the maiden. Oenopion now implored the assistance of Dionysus, who caused Orion to be thrown into a deep sleep by satyrs, in which Oenopion blinded him. Being informed by an oracle that he should recover his sight, if he would go towards the east and expose his eye-balls to the rays of the rising sun, Orion following the sound of a Cyclops’ hammer, went to Lemnos, where Hephaestus gave to him Cedalion as his guide. When afterwards he had recovered his sight, Orion returned to Chios to take vengeance, but as Oenopion had been concealed by his friends, Orion was unable to find him, and then proceeded to Crete, where he lived as a hunter with Artemis. (Apollod. i. 4. § 3; Parthen. Erot. 20; Theod. ad Arn. 338; Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 34.) The cause of his death, which took place either in Crete or Chios, is differently stated. According to some Eos, who loved Orion for his beauty, carried him off, but as the gods were angry at this, Artemis killed him with an arrow in Ortygia (Hom. Od. v. 121); according to others he was beloved by Artemis, and Apollo, indignant at his sister’s affection for him, asserted that she was unable to hit with her bow a distant point which he showed to her in the sea. She thereupon took aim, and hit it, but the point was the head of Orion who had been swimming in the sea. (Hygin. i. 4; Oedip. i. p. 157.) A third account states that he harboured an improper love for Artemis, that he challenged her to a game of discus, or that he violated Upis, on which account Artemis shot him, or sent a monstrous scorpion which killed him. (Serv. ad Aen. i. 539; Horat. Carm. ii. 4. 72; Apollod. i. 4. § 5.) A fourth account, lastly, states that he boasted he would conquer every animal, and would clear the earth from all wild beasts; but the earth sent forth a scorpion by which he was killed. (Ov. Fast. v. 539, &c.) Asclepius wanted to recall him to life, but was slain by Zeus with a flash of lightning. [ASCLEPIUS.] The accounts of his parentage and birth-place are varying in the different writers, for some call him a son of Poseidon and Euryale (Apollod. i. 4. § 3), and others say that he was born of the earth, or a son of Oenopion. (Serv. ad Aen. i. 539, x. 763.) He is further called a Theban, or Tanagraean, but probably because Hyria, his native place, sometimes belonged to Tanagra, and sometimes to Thebes. (Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 34; Paus. ii. 20. § 3; Strab. ix. p. 404.) After his death, Orion was placed among the stars (Hom. Il. xviii. 486, &c., xxii. 29, Od. v. 274), where he appears as a giant with a girdle, sword, a lion’s skin and a club. As the rising and setting of the constellation of Orion was believed to be accompanied by storms and rain, he is often called imbrifer, nimbosus, or aquosus. His tomb was shown at Tanagra. (Paus. ii. 20. § 3.) [L. S.] ORION – ORUS (Orion and Orion), names of more than one ancient grammarian. The mode in which they are mentioned by the authorities who speak of them is so confused, that it is a matter of the greatest difficulty to distinguish the different writers, and to assign to them their respective productions. The subject has been investigated with great care and acuteness by Ritschl, and the following are the leading results at which he has arrived.

Suidas speaks of two writers of the name of Orion, and one of the name of Orus. The first Orion made his name in Thebes in Egypt, the author of an ἀνωθότων in three books, dedicated to Eudocia, the wife of the younger Theodotius. The second Orion he describes as an Alexandrian grammarian, the author of, 1. an ἀνωθότων: 2. Ἀττικῶν λέξεων συναγωγῆς: 3. A work on etymology: 4. A panegyric on the emperor Hadrian. Orus is said by Suidas (as the text stands) to have been a grammarian of Alexandria, who taught at Constantinople, the author of a treatise περὶ διχρώμων, a treatise περὶ ἑθικῶν, one on orthography, and several others. Now Orus and Orion are mentioned some hundreds of times in the Etymologicum Magnum, the Etymologicum Gudianum, and the Etymologicum of Zonaras. But they are neither of them ever styled Alexandrians, while a Milesian Orus is often quoted, here and there a Theban Orus is spoken of, and also a Milesian Orus: and these quotations appertain the writings referred to not one of these authors, of Suidas he has not even uniformly as regards these etymological works as compared with each other and themselves. Both a Theban Orion and a Theban Orus are quoted as writing on etymology; a Milesian Orion and Orus περὶ ἑθικῶν; a Milesian Orus (not an Alexandrian, as Suidas says) on orthography. Now in the midst of this confusion it happens fortunately enough that the etymological work of Orus is still extant; and in it he is distinctly spoken of as a Theban, who taught at Caesarea. The ἀνωθότων πρὸς Εὐδοκίαν, in three books, is likewise extant in manuscript, bearing the name of the same author. The dedication of this work to Eudocia fixes the period when the Theban Orion lived to about the middle of the fifth century after Christ. This is confirmed by what Marinus says in his life of Proclus (c. 8), that the latter studied under a grammarian of the name of Orus, who was descended from the Egyptian priestly class: and the first expression of this is that Orus taught at Alexandria before he went to Caesarea. There is no reason whatever for considering these to be distinct persons, as Fabricius does (vol. vi. p. 374).

The Alexandrian Orion, who is said by Suidas to have written a panegyric on the emperor Hadrian, would probably be a contemporary of that emperor. It is probably by a mistake that Suidas attributes to him a work on etymology: of the other works assigned to him we know nothing further.

The lexicon of Orion the Theban was first introduced to the notice of philologers by Ruhnken, and was published under the editorship of Sturz at Leipzig in 1820.

In like manner Ritschl distinguishes two grammarians of the name of Orus. In many passages of the Etymologicum Orus is quoted and called a Milesian. In others he is quoted without any such distinctive epithet. It might seem a tolerably easy matter to reconcile this with the statement of Suidas to suppose that the Alexandrian Orus, as being the more celebrated, is mentioned without any distinctive epithet, while the Milesian is always thus designated. But it is decisive against this supposition, that, besides the internal evidence that the articles taken from Orus and those taken from Orus the Milesian are really taken from one and the same author, all the works attributed by Suidas to the Alexandrian Orus are quoted as the works of the Milesian Orus in the Etymologicum. From this, combined with the circumstance that the quotations made by Orus exhibit a more extensive acquaintance with ancient and somewhat rare authors than was to be expected in a Byzantine grammarian of the fourth century, and that in the passages in the Etymologicum no author later than the second century is quoted by Orus, Ritschl concludes that there were two grammarians of the name of Orus; one a Milesian, who lived in the second century, and was the author of the works mentioned by Suidas; the other, an Alexandrine grammarian, who taught at Constantinople not earlier than the middle of the fourth century after Christ, and of whose works, if he was the author of any, we possess no remains.

A comparison of the Etymologicum Magnum and the Etymologicum Gudianum with the lexicon of Orion shows that the various articles of the latter have been incorporated in the two former, though not always in exactly the same form; and it is in this that the difference between Orus and Orion. It is found also that in the Etymologicum Magna a very large number of the citations professedly taken from Orus are also found in Orion. Ritschl has shown that it is impossible to substitute in all these passages the name of Orus, as the Orus spoken of is sometimes distinctly called Μιλεσιος; and that moreover it is not necessary to attempt it, for an article in the Etymologicum Magnum, which ends with the words οὕτως ὁ Όρος ἀλλὰ καὶ Ὀροῦν καὶ Ἡρωδιανοῦ περὶ παθῶν, renders it all but certain that Orus had borrowed a large number of his articles from Orus without acknowledgment. This is confirmed by a comparison of various passages. Orion cites the older authorities by name. Orus he never so quotes; and in this he followed the example of various other grammarians, who were rather given to make use of the labours of their more immediate predecessors without acknowledgment. It is of course possible enough that in a few portions of the Etymologicum Magna, the name of Orus has been accidentally substituted for that of Orion.

It appears that Orus was the author of the following works. 1. A commentary on the orthography of Herodianus. 2. A treatise of his own on orthography, arranged in alphabetical order (Suidas s. v. Ὄρος. Zonaras quotes Orus ἐν τῇ οἰκείᾳ αὐτοῦ ἀρχαιογραφίᾳ). The treatises on the diphthongs αι and ει, mentioned by Suidas, were probably portions of this work. 3. Περὶ ἑθικῶν, 4. Περὶ διχρώμων, 5. Περὶ ἐγκλητικῶν μορφῶν. Of this we know nothing further. 6. Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 374) mentions a treatise Περὶ πολυμένων οὐ πολυμεμφόμενων λέξεων as extant in manuscript. Of this likewise nothing further is known. 7. Περὶ παθῶν. This is omitted by Suidas, but quoted in the Etymologicum. 8. Αἰσθητῶν παραγάγων τῶν Ἡρωδιανοῦ. Ἡ Ἀἰσθητὴν παραγάμη is attributed to Orus in the Etymol. Magn. (p. 386, 54); probably from a confusion with the work of Herodianus on the same subject. Fabricius (vol. vi. p. 374) speaks of an Etymologicum Oris Milesi, on the authority, as he supposes, of Fulvius Ursinus, whom Fabricius understands to say that he possessed it in manuscript. But Ritschl has shown that the passage of Ussurin does not convey any such assertion. The πίθα τῶν εἰρωτῶν, spoken of by Suidas, would indicate that Orus was the author of one of these treatises besides those mentioned, of which we know nothing. The name Oraus is sometimes read for Aeaus (Fabric. Biblioth. Græca, vol. vi. pp. 193, 374, 601, 603; Ritschl, de Oro et Oriene commentatio, Breslau, 1834; and an elaborate article on Orus by Ritschl in Ersch and Gruber's Encyclopædia.) [C. P. M.]

ORITHYIA. [Oreithyia.] OROMENUS ('Oro'menos). 1. A son of Cercaphus, grandson of Aeolus and father of Amyntus, was believed to have founded the town of Ormenium, in Thessaly. From him Amyntus is sometimes called Ormenides, and Astydamia, his grand-daughter, Ormenia. (Hom. ii. ii. 571, ii. 25, § 5, x. 35. § 5.)

ORNODOPANTES (Oro'dopanta), a Persian satrap, whom Bibulus persuaded in B.C. 50 to revolt against Orodès, the Parthian king, and proclaimed Pocorus as king. (Dion Cass. xl. 30.) [Comp. Vol. i. p. 536, a.] This Parthian name appears to be the same, with a slightly varied orthography, as that of Ornospades, which occurs in Tacitus. The latter was a Parthian chief of great power and influence in the reign of Tiberius. (Tac. Ann. viii. 37.)

ORNOSPades. [Ornospades.]

ORNYTON ('Ornyton), a Corinthian, was the son of Sisyphus, and the father of Phocus and Theas. (Paus. ii. 4, § 3, ix. 17. § 4.) [L. S.]

ORNÝTUS ('Ornýtus), the name of three different mythical personages. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 208, ii. 57; Paus. viii. 26. § 3.) [L. S.]

ORÓDES ('Oro'des), a name common to many Eastern monarchs, of whom the Parthian kings were the most celebrated. Herodes is probably merely another form of this name.

1. ORÔDES I., king of Parthia. [Arsaces XIV. p. 356.]

2. ORÔDES II., king of Parthia. [Arsaces XVII. p. 357.]

3. ORÔDES, son of Artabanus III., king of Parthia. [Arsaces XIX. p. 358, a.]

4. ORÔDES, a king of the Albarians, conquered by Pompey [Pompius], is called Oroses by the Greek writers. (Dion Cass. xxxvi. 57, xxxvii. 4; Appian, Mithr. 103, 117; Oros. vi. 4; Eutrop. vi. 11.)

OREBA'NTIUS (Oro'bantius), of Troezene, an ancient epic poet, whose poems were said by the Troezenes to be more ancient than those of Homer. (Aelian, V. H. ii. 2.)

ORESES. [Oro'ses, No. 4.]

ORETES ('Oro'tes), a Persian, was made satrap of Sardis by Cyrus, and retained the government of it till his death. Like many other Persian governors, he seems to have aimed at the establishment of an independent sovereignty, and it was probably as one step towards this that he decoyed Polycrates into his power by specious promises, and put him to death in B.C. 522. For this act Herodotus mentions two other motives, not incompatible either with one another or with the one above suggested; but certainly the power of the Sian tyrant would have been a barrier to any schemes of aggrandizement entertained by Oretes; and, in fact, Samos, from its position and consequences, would, perhaps, be the natural enemy of any Lydian potentate. Thus, when Amasis, as a vassal of Babylon, was compelled to take part with Croesus against Cyrus, he found it necessary to abandon his alliance with Polycrates, which, for purposes of commerce, he would, doubtless, have preferred; and the Lacedaemonians were naturally urged to their connection with Croesus by their hostility to Polycrates as a tyrant. (Comp. Herod. i. 69, 70, 77, ii. 178, iii. 39, &c.; Thuc. i. 18; Arist. Polit. v. 10. ed. Bekk.) The disturbed state of affairs which followed the death of Cambyses, B.C. 521, further encouraged Oretes to prosecute his designs, and he put to death Mithrobates, viceroy of Dascyleium, in Bithynia, regarding him probably as a rival, or, at least, as a spy, and caused a messenger, who brought an unwelcome firmann from Dareius Hystaspis, to be assassinated on his way back to court. Dareius, however, succeeded in procuring the death of his death through the agency of Isagoras. (Herod. ii. 129–128; Luc. Comentul. 14.) [E. E.]

OROLUS. [Olorus.]

ORONTES or ORONTAS ('Orôntes, 'Orôntas). 1. A Persian, related by blood to the royal family, and distinguished for his military skill. Dareius II. (Nuthus) appointed him to be one of the officers of his son, Cyrus the younger; but, after the accession of Artaxerxes Mmnon, Orontes, who commanded in the citadel of Sardis, held it against Cyrus, professing to be therein obeying the king's commands. Cyrus reduced him to submission and pardoned him; but Orontes revolted from him a second time, fled to the Mysians, and joined them in invading his territory. Again Cyrus subdued him, and again received him into favour. When, however, the prince in his expedition against his brother (B.C. 401.) had passed the Euphrates, Orontes asked to be entrusted with 1000 horse, promising to check effectually with these the royal cavalry, which was laying waste the country before the invaders. Cyrus consented; but, ascertaining from an intercepted letter of his to Artaxerxes, that he meant to desert with the force committed to him, he caused him to be arrested, and summoned a council, consisting of seven of the principal Persians and Clearchus the Lacedaemonian, to try the case. Orontes had not a word of defence or palliation to offer, and was condemned unanimously by the judges. He was then led off to the tent of Artapatas, one of the chief officers of Cyrus, and was never seen again either dead or alive. How he perished no one knew. Xenophon remarks that, on his way from the council, he received all the customary marks of respect from his inferiors, though they knew his doom. (Xen. Anab. i. 6. §§ 1–11.)

2. A Persian, son-in-law of Artaxerxes Mmnon. In the retreat of the Cyrenaee Greeks, when Tissaphernes joined their march, twenty days after his solemned and hollow treaty with them, Orontes accompanied him with a separate force under his command, and appears to have been a party to the treachery, by which the principal Greek generals were decoyed into the power of the Persians. He held the satrapy of Armenia (Xen. Anab. ii. 4. §§ 3, 5. 40, iii. 5. § 17, iv. 8. § 4). It seems to have been the same Orontes who was appointed by Artaxerxes (in b. c. 386, according to Diodorus) to command the land forces against Evagoras, the fleet being committed to Tiribazus. In 385, Tiribazus offered Evagoras certain conditions of peace, which the latter was willing to accept, professing only against the requisition that he should acknowledge himself the mere vassal of Persia, and claiming the title, kingship, of Hersonon Orontes, jealous of Tiribazus, wrote to court accusing him of treason, and obtained in answer an order to arrest his colleague, and to take upon himself the sole command of the forces. But Tiribazus was a favourite with the army, and the general dissatisfaction, together with some deserts, alarmed Orontes for the result of the war. He hastened therefore to make peace with Evagoras, on the very terms on which the latter had before insisted, and which Tiribazus had refused to grant. Not long after this, the trial of Tiribazus took place. The judges appointed by Artaxerxes unanimously acquitted him, and Orontes was disgraced, and lost the royal favour. (Diod. xiv. 2—4, 8—11; Isocr. Eucrat. p. 201, d; Theopomp. ap. Phot. Bibl. 176; Wess. ad Diod. xiv. 26; Clint. F. I. vol. ii. App. xii.)

3. A Persian satrap of Mysia, joined in the great revolt of the western satraps from Artaxerxes Mnemon, in b. c. 362. He was appointed to the command of the rebel forces and entrusted with a large sum of money for the pay of 20,000 mercenaries for a year; but, hoping to gain high rewards from the king, he arrested those who came to place the treasure in his hands, and sent them to Artaxerxes; an act of treachery which he followed up by the surrender of a number of towns, and of the mercenary troops. (Diod. xiv. 90, 91.)

4. A descendant of Hydarnes (one of the seven conspirators against Smerdis the Magian) is mentioned by Strabo (xi. p. 531), as the last Persian prince who reigned in Armenia, before the division of the country by Antiochus the Great, of Syria, between two of his own officers, Artaxias and Zariadris. [E. E.]

ORO'TIUS MARCELLUS. [MARCELLUS.]

ORONTOBATES (Ορόντωβατης). 1. A Persian, who married the daughter of Ptolemaus, the usurping satrap of Caria, and was sent by the king to succeed him. On the approach of Alexander (b. c. 334) Orontobates and Mnemon [Mnemon] entrenched themselves in Halicarnassus. But at last, despairing of defending it, they set fire to the town, and under cover of the conflagration crossed over to Cos, whither they had previously removed their treasures. Orontes, however, still held the citadel Salmacis, and the towns Myndus, Causus, Thara, and Callipolis, together with Tripiion and the island of Cos. Next year, when at Soli, Alexander learnt that Orontobates had been defeated in a great battle by Ptolomeaus and Asander. It is natural to infer that the places which Orontobates held did not long hold out after his defeat. (Arrian, ii. 23, ii. 5. § 7; Curt. iii. 7. § 4.)

An officer of the name of Orontobates was present in the army of Dareius at the battle of Gaugamela, being one of the commanders of the troops drawn from the shores of the Persian Gulf. (Arrian, iii. 8. § 6.) Whether he was the same or a different person from the preceding, we have no means of knowing. We are not told that the latter was killed as well as defeated.

2. A Median, who was appointed satrap of Media by Antigonus. He soon after successfully repulsed an attempt made upon the province by some partizans of Eumenes and Pithon, b. c. 316. (Diod. xix. 46, 47.) [C. P. M.]

OROPHERNES. [OLOPHERNES.]

OROSIUS, PAULUS, a Spanish presbyter, a native, as we gather from his own words (Hist. vii. 22), of Tarragona, flourished under Arcadius and Honorius. Having conceived a warm admiration for the character and talents of St. Augustine, he passed over into Africa about A. D. 413, in order that he might consult him upon the dogmas of the Priscillianists, which at that period were a source of great dissension in the churches of the Western peninsula. The bishop of Hippo flattered by the deep respect of this disciple, gave him a most cordial reception, and after imparting such instructions as he deemed most essential, despatched him to Syria in 414 or 415, ostensibly for the purpose of completing his theological education under St. Jerome, who was dwelling at Bethlehem, but in reality to counteract the influence and expose the principles of Pelagius, who had resided for some years in Palestine. Orosius having found a warm friend in Jerome, began to carry out the object of his mission by industriously spreading the intelligence that Cœlestius had been condemned by the Carthaginian synod, impressing at the same time upon all the close connection which subsisted between this convicted heretic and Pelagius, against whom he at length brought a direct charge of false doctrine. The cause was formally heard before the tribunal of John, bishop of Jerusalem, and ended in the discomfiture of the accuser, who, having indulged in some disrespectful expressions towards the judge, was in turn denounced as a blasphemer. He remained in the East until he had ascertained the unfavourable result of the appeal to the council of Diospolis, after which, having obtained possession of the relics of St. Stephen, the protomartyr, the place of whose sepulture had not long before been marvellously revealed, he returned with them to Africa, and there, it is believed, died, but at what period is not known.

The following works by this author are still extant.

1. Historiarum adversus Paganos Libri VII., dedicated to St. Augustine, at whose suggestion the task was undertaken. The genuineness of this work were to complain that the dishonour and ruin which had so long threatened the empire, and which had at length been consummated in the sack of Rome by Alaric and his Goths, must be ascribed to the wrath of the ancient deities, whose worship had been abandoned and whose altars had been profaned by the votaries of the new faith. In order to silence their clamour Orosius, upon his return from Palestine, composed this history to demonstrate that from the earliest epoch the world had been the scene of crimes not less revolting, and that men had groaned under calamities still more intolerable from war, pestilence, earthquakes, volcanoes, and the fury of the elements, while they could look forward to no happiness in a future state to console them for their miseries in the present. The annals, which extend from the Creation down to the year A. D. 417, are, with exception of the concluding portion, extracted from Justin, Eutropius, and inferior second-hand authorities, whose statements are rashly admitted and unskillfully combined, without any attempt to investigate the basis upon which they rest, or to reconcile their contradictions and inconsistencies. Although such a compilation might be held in high esteem in the fifth century, and might command the applause of the ecclesiastical biographers from Gennadius downwards, and even of some scholars of a later date, its defects could not escape the keen discernment of Siganius, Lipsius, and Casaubon, who soon perceived that no original sources of information had been consulted, that the Greek writers had been altogether neglected, either through ignorance or indifference, and that the whole narrative
so adorned with gross errors in facts and in chro-nology as to be almost totally destitute of utility, since no dependence can be placed on the accuracy of those representations which refer to events not elsewhere chronicated. The style which has been pronounced by some impartial critics not devoid of elegance, is evidently formed upon the two great models of the Christian eloquence of Africa, Tertullian and Cyprian. Among the various titles exhibited by the MSS., such as, Historia adversus Paganorum Cælumanni; De Cladibus et Misericordi Mundi, and the like, one, which has proved a most puzzling enigma, appears under the varying forms, Hermes, or Orosius, or Orontius, sometimes with the addition, id est misericordia Christiani tempori-Among a multitude of solutions, many of them altogether ridiculous, the most plausible is that which adopting Ornista as the true orthography supposes it to be a compound of Or. m. ist.—an abbreviation for Orosi mundi historia.

The Edito Princeps of the Historia was printed at Vienna, by J. Schässler, fol. 1471, and presents a text derived from an excellent MS. Another very early impression is that published at Vicenza, in small folio, without a date, by Herm. de Colonia, and from this the Venice editions of 1483, 1484, 1499, and 1500, appear to have been copied. The only really good edition is that of Havercamp, Lan. Dat. 4to. 1738, prepared with great industry, and containing a mass of valuable illustrations.

The compilation into Anglo-Saxon was executed by Alfred the Great, of which a specimen was published by Elstob at Oxford in 1690, and the whole work accompanied by a version of the Anglo-Saxon text into English appeared at London, 8vo. 1773, under the inspection of Daines Barrington and John Reinhold Foster. There are old translations into German and Italian also; into the former by Hieronymus Bonerus, fol. Colmar, 1539, frequently reprinted; into the latter by Giov. Guerini Da Lanciza, without date or name of place, but apparently belonging to the sixteenth century.

II. Liber Apologisticus de Arbitri Libertate, written in Palestine, A. D. 415. Orosius, having been anathematised by John of Jerusalem as one who maintained that man could not, even by the aid of God, fulfil the divine law, published this tract with the double object of proving the injustice of the charge and of defending his own proceedings by demonstrating the fatal tendency of the tenets inculcated by Pelagius. By some oversight on the part of a transcriber, seventeen chapters of the De Natura et Gratia, by Augustine, have been inserted in this piece, a mistake which has led to no small confusion. The Apologetica was first printed at Louvain, 8vo. 1558, along with the epistle of Jerome against Pelagius, and will be found also in the Bibliotheca Iurism Max. Lugdun. 1677, vol.
vi.; it is appended to the edition of the Historias
by Havercamp, and is included in Harduin's col-

111. Commonitorium ad Augustinum, the earliest of the works of Orosius, composed soon after his first arrival in Africa, for the purpose of explaining the state of religious parties in Spain, especially in reference to the commotions excited by the Pris-cillianists and Origenists. It is usually attached to the reply, by Augustine, entitled Cudra P里斯-cillianistiar et Origenistas Liber ad Orosiam, vol. viii.
ed. Bene

Some Epistolae ad Augustinum appear to have been at one time in existence, but are now lost.

The following productions have been commonly ascribed to Orosius.

1. Dialogus særapii quiue Quaestioium Orosii percontantis et Augustini respon divis, found among the works of Augustine.

2. Quaestiones de Trinitate et aliis Scripturae Sacrae Locis ad Augustinum, printed along with Augustini Responso, at Paris, in 1533.

3. Commentarium in Canticum Canticor num, attributed by Trithemius to Orosius, but in reality belonging to Honorius Augustodunensis.

4. The De Ratione Animae, mentioned by Tri-themius, supposed by many to be a spurious treatise, but is in reality a common edition of a comment-title.

No complete edition of the collected works has yet appeared. (Augustin. de Ratione Anim. ad Hieron.;

ORPHÉUS (Oppédus). The history of the extant productions of Greek literature begins with the Homeric poems. But it is evident that works so perfect in their kind are not the end, and not the beginning, of a course of poetical development.
This assumption is confirmed by innumerable traditions, which record the names of poets before the time of Homer, who employed their music for the civilisation of men and for the worship of different divinities. In accordance with the spirit of Greek mythology, the gods themselves stand at the head of this succession of poets, namely, Hermes, the inventor of the lyre, and Apollo, who received the invention from his brother, and became the divinity presiding over the whole art of music. With Apollo are associated, still in the spirit of the old mythology, a class of subordinate divinities—the Muses. The earliest human cultivators of the art are represented as the immediate pupils, and even (what, in fact, merely means the same thing) the children of Apollo and the Muses. Their personal existence is as uncertain as that of other mythical personages, and for us they can only be considered as the representatives of certain periods and certain kinds of poetical development. Their names are no doubt all significant, although the etymology of some of them is very uncertain, while that of others, such as Museus, is at once evident. The chief of these names are Olen, Linus, Orpheus, Musaeus, Eumolpus, Pamphilus, Thamyris, and Philammon.

Of these names that of Orpheus is the most important, and at the same time the one involving the greatest difficulties. These difficulties arise from the scantiness of the early traditions respecting him, in tracing which we are rather impeded than aided by the many marvels which later writers connected with his story; and also from the very different religious positions which are assigned to him. On this last point it may be remarked in general that the earliest opinions respecting him seem to have invariably connected him with Apollo; while his name was afterwards adopted as the central point of one system of Dionysiac worship.

One of the most essential points in such an inquiry as the present is, to observe the history of the traditions themselves. The name of Orpheus does not occur in the Homeric or Hesiodic poems; but, during the lyric period, it had attained to great celebrity. Ibycus, who flourished about the middle of the sixth century B.C., mentions him as "the renowned Orpheus" (ὅμως ἀκροατός Ἄφρον, Ιβύς, Fr. No. 22, Schneidewin, No. 9, Bergk, ap. Prisian. vol. i. p. 263, Kreil). Pindar enumerates him among the Argonauts as the celebrated harp player, father of songs, and as sent forth by Apollo (Pyth. iv. 315. s. 176): elsewhere he mentioned him as the son of Oeagrus (Schol. ad loc.). The historians Hellenicus and Therycyes record his name, the former making him the ancestor both of Homer and of Hesiod (Fr. Nos. 5, 6, Müller, ap. Procl. Vit. Hom. p. 141, b., Vit. Hym. Ined.), the latter stating that it was not Orpheus, but Philammon, who was the bard of the Argonauts (Fr. 63, Müller, ap. Schol. ad Apollon, i. 29), and this is also the account which Apollonius Rhodius followed. In the dramatic poets there are several references to Orpheus. Aeschylus alludes to the fable of his leading after him trees charmed by the sound of his lyre (Ag. 1612, 1613, Wellauer, 1629, 1630, Dind.); and there is an important statement preserved by Eratosthenes (c. 24), who quotes the Bassarides of the same poet, that "Orpheus did not honour Dionysus, but believed the sun to be the greatest of the gods, whom also he called Apollo; and rising up in the night, he ascended before dawn to the mountain called Pangaenum, that he might see the sun first, at which Dionysus being enraged sent upon him the Bassarides, as the poet Aeschylus says, who tore him in pieces, and scattered his limbs abroad; but the Muses collected them, and buried them at the place called Leibethra:" but the quotation itself shows the impossibility of determining how much of this account is to be considered as given by Aeschylus. Sophocles does not mention Orpheus, but he is repeatedly referred to by Euripides, in whom we find the first allusion to the connection of Orpheus with Dionysus and the infernal regions: he speaks of him as related to the Muses (Iph. 944, 946); mentions the power of his song over rocks, trees, and wild beasts (Med. 543, fih. in Atul. 1211, Bacch. 561, and a jocular allusion in Cyc. 646); refers to his charming the infernal powers (Alic. 357); connects him with Bacchanalian orgies (Hippol. 953); ascribes to him the origin of sacred mysteries (Iph. 943), and places the scene of his activity among the forests of Olympus. (Bacch. 561.) He is mentioned once only, but in an important passage, by Aristophanes (Ran. 1032), who enumerates, as the oldest poets, Orpheus, Musaeus, Hesiod, and Homer, and makes Orpheus the teacher of religious initiations and of abstinence from murder:

"Ορφέος μὲν γὰρ τελεσθ' ἵμαρ κατεκίνησε φώνα τ' ἀπέκεκυσθαν." Passages exactly parallel to this are found in Plato (Apol. p. 41, a., Protag. p. 316, d.), who frequently refers to Orpheus, his followers, and his works. He calls him the son of Oeagrus (Sympos. p. 178, d.), mentions him as a musician and inventor (Ion, p. 536, c., Leg. iii. p. 677, d.), refers to the miraculous power of his lyre (Protag. p. 318, a.), and gives a misunderstanding of the story of his descent into Hades: the gods, he says, imposed upon the poet, by showing him only a phantasm of his lost wife, because he had not the courage to die, like Alcestis, but contrived to enter Hades alive, and, as a further punishment for his cowarice, he met his death at the hands of women (Sympos. p. 179, d.; comp. Polit. x. p. 620, a.). This account is quite discordant with the notions of the early Greeks respecting the value of life, and even with the example quoted by Plato himself, as far as Admetus is concerned. Plato seems to have misunderstood the reason why Orpheus' "contriving to enter Hades alive," called down the anger of the gods, namely, as a presumptuous transgression of the limits assigned to the condition of mortal men: this point will have to be considered again. As the followers of Orpheus, Plato mentions both poets and religious ceremonies (Prod. p. 316, d., Ion, p. 536, b., Cral. p. 400, c.), and in the passage last quoted, he tells us that the followers of Orpheus held the doctrine, that the soul is imprisoned in the body as a punishment for some previous sins. He makes several quotations from the writings ascribed to Orpheus, of which one, if not more, is from the Theogony (Cral. p. 402, b., Philob. p. 66, c., Leg. ii. p. 669, d.), and in one passage he speaks of collections of books, which went under the names of Orpheus and Musaeus, and contained rules for religious ceremonies. (Polit. ii. p. 364, e.)

The writings mentioned in the last passage were evidently regarded by Plato as spurious, but, from the other passages quoted, he seems to have believed at least in the existence of Orpheus and in the genuineness of his Theogony. Not so, however, Aristotle, who held that no such person as Orpheus ever existed, and that the works ascribed to him were forged by Cerops and Onomacritus. (Onomacritus.) Proceeding to the mythographers, and the later poets, from Apollodoros downwards, we find the legends of Orpheus amplified by details, the whole of which it is impossible here to enumerate; we give an outline of the most important of them.

Orpheus, the son of Oeagrus and Calliope, lived in Thrace at the period of the Argonauts, whom he accompanied in their expedition. Presented with the lyre by Apollo, and instructed by the Muses in its use, he enchanted with its music not only the wild beasts, but the trees and rocks upon Olympus, so that they moved from their places to follow the sound of his golden harp. The power of his music caused the Argonauts to seek his aid, which contributed materially to the success of their expedition: at the sound of his lyre the Argo glided down into the sea; the Argonauts tore themselves away from the pleasures of Lemnos; the Symplegades, or moving rocks, which threatened to crush the ship between them, were fixed in their places; and the Colchian dragon, which guarded the golden fleece, was lulled to sleep: other legends of the same kind may be read in the Argonautica, which bears the name of Orpheus. After his return from the Argonautic expedition he took up his abode in a cave in Thrace, and employed himself in the civilisation of its wild inhabitants. There is also a legend of his having visited Egypt. The legends respecting the loss and recovery of his wife, and his own death, are very various. His wife was a nymph named Agriope or Eurydice. In the older accounts the cause of her death is not referred to, but the legend followed in the well-known passages of Virgil and Ovid, which ascribes the death of Eurydice to the bite of a serpent, is no doubt of high antiquity, but the introduction of Aristaeus into the legend cannot be traced to any writer older than Virgil himself. (Diod. iv. 25; Conon, 43; Paus. ix. 30. § 4; Hygin. Fab. 164.) He followed his lost wife into the abodes of Hades, where the charms of his lyre suspended the torments of the damned, and won back his wife from the most inexorable of all deities; but his prayer was only granted upon this condition, that he should not look back upon his restored wife, till they had arrived in the upper world: at the very moment when they were about to pass the fatal bounds, the anxiety of love overcame the poet; he looked round to see that Eurydice was following him; and he beheld her caught back into the infernal regions. The form of the myth, as told by Plato, has been given above. The later poets, forgetting the religious meaning of the legend, connected his death with the second loss of Eurydice, his grief for whom led him to treat with contempt the Thracian women, who in revenge tore him to pieces under the excitement of their Bacchannalian orgies. Other causes are assigned for the fury of the Thracian Maenads; but the most ancient form of the legend seems to be that already mentioned as quoted by Eratosthenes from Aeschylus. The variation, by which Aphrodite is made the instigator of his death, from motives of jealousy, or of course merely a fabric made according to the taste of the poet (Conon, 45). Another form of the legend, which deserves much more attention, is that which was embodied in an inscription upon what was said to be the tomb, in which the bones of Orpheus were buried, at Dium near Pydna, in Macedonia, which ascribed his death to the thunderbolts of Zeus: —

(Diog. Laërt. Procem. 5; Paus. ix. 30. § 5; Anth. Graec. Epig. Inc. No. 483; Brunck, Anecd. vol. iii. p. 253.)

After his death, according to the more common form of the legend, the Muse collected the fragments of his body, and buried them at Leibethra at the foot of Olympus, where the nightingale sang sweetly over his grave. The subsequent transference of his bones to Dium is evidently a local legend. (Paus. l.c.) His head was thrown upon the Hebrus, down which it rolled to the sea, and was borne across to Lesbos, where the grave in which it was interred was shown at Antissa. His lyre was also said to have been carried to Lesbos; and both traditions are simply poetical expressions of the historical fact that Lesbos was the first great seat of the music of the lyre: indeed Antissa itself was the birth-place of Terpander, the earliest historical musician. (Phanocles, ap. Stob. Tht. ix. p. 399.) The astronomers taught that the lyre of Orpheus was placed by Zeus among the stars, at the intercession of Apollo and the Muses (Eratosth. 24; Hygin. Astr. ii. 7; Manil. Astron. i. 324).

In these legends there are some points which require but little explanation. The invention of music, in connection with the services of Apollo and the Muses, its first great application to the worship of the gods, which Orpheus is therefore said to have introduced, its power over the passions, and the importance which the Greeks attached to the knowledge of it, as intimately allied with the very existence of all social order, — are probably the chief elementary ideas of the whole legend. But then comes in one of the dark features of the Greek religion, in which the gods envy the advancement of man in knowledge and civilisation, and severely punish any one who transgresses the bounds assigned to humanity, as may be seen in the legend of Prometheus, and in the sudden death, or blindness, or other calamities of the early poets and musicians. In a later age, the conflict was no longer viewed as between the gods and man, but between the worshippers of different divinities; and especially between Apollo, the symbol of pure intellect, and Dionysus, the deity of the senses: hence Orpheus, the servant of Apollo, falls a victim to the jealousy of Dionysus, and the fury of his worshippers. There are, however, other points in the legend which are of the utmost difficulty, and which would require far more discussion than can be entered upon here. For these matters the reader is referred to Lobeck's Agyiapomannus, Müller's Prolegomena zur einer wissen-schaftlichen Mythologie, and Klausen's article in Ersch and Gruber's Encyclopädie. Concerning the localities of the legend, see Müller's Literature of Ancient Greece, p. 26, and Klausen. The works of art representing Orpheus are enumerated by Klausen.

Orphic Societies and Mysteries. — All that part of the mythology of Orpheus which connects him with Dionysus must be considered as a later invention, quite irreconcilable with the original legends, in which he is the servant of Apollo and the Muses: the discrepancy extends even to the instrument of his music, which was always the lyre, and never the flute. It is almost hopeless to explain the transition. It is enough to remark here that, about the time of the first development of Greek philosophy, societies were formed, which assumed the name of Orpheus, and which celebrated peculiar mysteries, quite different from those of Eleusis. They are thus described by Müller (Hist. Lit. Anc. Gr. p. 231): —

"On the other hand there was a society of persons, who performed the rites of a mystical worship, but were not exclusively attached to a particular temple and festival, and who did not confine their notions to the initiated, but published them to others, and committed them to literary works. These were the followers of Orpheus (οἱ Ὀρφεαδοί); that is to say, associations of persons, who, under [the pretended] guidance of the ancient mystical poet Orpheus, dedicated themselves to the worship of Bacchus, in which they hoped to find satisfaction for an ardent longing after the soothing and elevating influences of religion. The Dionysus, to whose worship the Orphic and Bacchic rites were annexed (τὰ Ὀρφικὰ καλεῖμενα καὶ Μαύρεια, Herod. ii. 81), was the Cthonian deity, Dionysus Zagreus, closely connected with Demeter and Kore, who was the personified expression, not only of the most rapturous pleasure, but also of a deep sorrow for the miseries of human life. The Orphic legends and poems related in great part to this Dionysus, who was combined, as an imperial deity, with Hades (a doctrine given by the philosopher Heraclitus as the opinion of a particular sect, ap. Clement. Alex. Protrep. p. 30, Potter); and upon whom the Orphic theologers founded their hopes of the purification and ultimate immortality of the soul. But their mode of celebrating this worship was very different from the popular rites of Bacchus. The Orphic worshippers of Bacchus did not indulge in unrestrained pleasure and frantic enthusiasm, but rather aimed at an ascetic purity of life and manners. (See Lobeck, Aeglogaph. p. 244.) The followers of Orpheus, when they had tasted the mystic sacrificial feast of raw flesh torn from the ox of Dionysus (ἄρπαγάδα), partook of no other animal food. They wore white linen garments, like Oriental and Egyptian priests, from whom, as Herodotus remarks (i. c.), much may have been borrowed in the ritual of the Orphic worship.

Herodotus not only speaks of these rites as being Egyptian, but also Pythagorean in their character. The explanation of this is that the Pythagorean society, after they emigrated from Magna Graecia, united themselves with the Orphic societies of the mother country, and of course greatly influenced their character. But before this time the Orphic system had been reduced to a definite form by PHREBECYES and ONOMACRITUS, who stand at the head of a series of writers, in whose works the Orphic theology was embodied; such as Cercops, Brontinius, Orphens of Camarina, Orphens of Croton, Arignote, Persinus of Miletus, Thaemocles of Syracuse, and Zephyrus of Hercules or Tarentum (muller, p. 235). Besides these associations there were also an obscure set of mystagogues derived from them, called Orpheoleutians (Ὀρφολευταῖοι), "who used to come before the doors of the rich, and promise to release them from their own sins and those of their forefathers, by sacrifices and expiatory songs; and they produced at this ceremony a heap of books of Orphens and Musaeus, upon which they founded their promises." (Plat. Ion, p. 526, b.; Müller, p. 235). The nature of the Orphic theology, and the points of difference between it and that of Homer and Hesiod, are fully discussed by Müller (Hist. Lit. Anc. Gr. pp. 235-238) and Mr. Grote (vol. i. pp. 22, &c.) but most fully by Lobeck, in his Aeglogaphum.

Orphic Literature.—We have seen that many poems ascribed to Orpheus were current as early as the time of the Peisistratids (ONOMACRITUS), and that they are often quoted by Plato. The allusions to them in later writers are very frequent; for example, Pausanias speaks of hymns of his, which he believed to be still preserved by the Lycomidae (an Athenian family who seem to have been the chief priests of the Orphic worship, as the Eumolpidae were of the Eleusinian), and which, he says, were only inferior in beauty to the poems of Homer, and held even in higher honour, on account of their divine subjects. He also speaks of them as very few in number, and as distinguished by great brevity of style (ix. 30. §§ 5, 6. s. 12).

Considering the slight acquaintance which the ancients evidently possessed with these works, it is somewhat surprising that certain extant poems, which bear the name of Orpheus, should have been generally regarded by scholars, until a very recent period, as genuine, that is, as works more ancient than the Homeric poems, if not the productions of Orpheus himself. It is not worth while to repeat here the history of the controversy, which will be found in Bernhardy and the other historians of Greek literature, who have been the chief opponents of this theory. The result is that it is now fully established that the bulk of these poems are the forgeries of Christian grammarians and philosophers of the Alexandrian school; but that among the fragments, which form a part of the collection, are some genuine remains of that Orphic poetry which was known to Plato, and which must be assigned to the period of Onomacritus, or perhaps a little earlier. The Orphic literature, which, in this sense, we may call genuine, seems to have included Hymnus, a Theogony, an ancient poem called Minyas or the Descent into Hades, Oracles and Songs for Initiations (Τεκταλοῦ), a collection of Sacred Legends (Ἰσόλος Κόσμος), ascribed to Cercops, and perhaps some other works. The apocryphal productions which have come down to us under the name of Orphica, are the following:

1. Aprotus arcto Σάρων, an epic poem in 1384 hexameters, giving an account of the expedition of the Argonauts, which is full of indications of its late date.

2. "Τίττος, eighty-seven or eighty-eight hymns in hexameters, evidently the productions of the Neo-Platonic school.

3. Alexa, the best of the three apocryphal Orphic poems, which treats of properties of stones, both precious and common, and their use in divination.

The chief editions of Orpheus, after the early ones of 1517, 1519, 1540, 1543, 1566, and 1606, are those of Eschenbach, Traj. ad Rhen. 1689, 12mo.; Gesner and Hamburger, Lips. 1764, 8vo. and Herrmann, Lips. 1805, 8vo., by far the best. There are also small editions, chiefly for the use of schools, by Schaefer, Lips. 1818, 12mo., and in the Tauchnitz Classics, 1824, 16mo.

[O. S. P. S.] ORPHIDIIUS BENIGNUS, a legate of the emperor Otho, fell in the battle of Bedriacum against the troops of Vitellius, a. d. 69. (Tac. Hist. ii. 45, 45.)

ORPHITUS. [Orphit.] ORSA'BARIS (Ὀρσαβάρις), a daughter of ORSABARIS.
Mithridates the Great, who was taken prisoner by Pompey, and served to adorn his triumph, n. c. 61 (Appian, Mithr. 117). The name Osorobas occurs also on a coin of the city of Prusias, in Bithynia, which bears the inscription ΒΑΣΙΛΕΩΣ ΜΟΥΤΟΥΡ ΩΡΟΒΑΙΩΣ; and this is conjectured by Vis- coniti (Iconogr. Greecae, tom. ii. p. 195) to refer to the same person as the one mentioned in Appian, whom he supposes to have been married to Socrates, the usurper set up by Mithridates as king of Bithynia.

E. H. B.

ORBS/LOCUS ('Ωρος/λόχος). 1. A son of the river god Alpheus and Telephoe, and the father of Diocles, at Phene, in Messenia. (Hom. Il. v. 545, Od. iii. 489, xvi 187, xxi. 15; Paus. iv. 30. § 2.)

2. A grandson of No. 1, and brother of Crethon, together with whom he was slain by Aeneas, at Troy. (Hom. Il. v. 542, &c.; Paus. iv. i. § 3.)

3. A son of Idomeenus. (Hom. Od. xiii. 239—271.)

ORTALUS, or more properly HORITALUS, a cognomen of the HORTENSIUS. [HORTENSIUS]

ORPHA/GORAS ('Ορφαγόρας). 1. Of Thebes, mentioned by Socrates in the Protagoras of Plato (p. 318, c.), as one of the most celebrated flute-players of his day, and by Athenaeus as one of the instructors of Epaminondas in flute-playing. (Ath. p. 184, c.)

2. A geographer, whose age is unknown, but whose work on India (Τεξαλ λαός) is quoted both by Aelian (N. A. xvi. 35; xvii. 6) and by Strabo (xvi. p. 766). His statements in that work, respecting the Red Sea, are quoted by Philostratus (Vit. Apollon. iii. 53; Phot. Biblioth. cod. excli. p. 327, b. 10, Bekker).

ORTHA ('Ορθα, 'Ορθή, or 'Ορθωρα), a surname of the Artemis who is also called Iphigenaea or Lygodeuma, and must be regarded as the goddess of the moon. Her worship was probably brought to Sparta from Lemnos. It was at the altar of Artemis Orthia that Spartan boys had to undergo the daimastigosis (Schol. ad Pind. Od. iii. 54; Herod. iv. 67; Xenoph. de Rep. Lec. ii. 10). She also had temples at Beuron, in the Ceramicus at Athens, in Elis, and on the coast of Byzantium. The ancients derived her surname from mount Orthosium or Orthium in Arcadia.

ORTHRS ('Ορθρος), the dog of Geryones, who was begotten by Typhon and Echidna. (Hes. Theog. 293; Apollod. ii. 5. § 10.)

[Orthion]

ORTIAGON ('Ορτιαγόν), one of the three princes of Galatia, when that country was invaded by the Romans under Cn. Manlius Vulsus, in b. c. 169. He was defeated on Mount Olympus by the invaders, and compelled to fly home for refuge. Polybinus tells us that he cherished the design of uniting all Galatia under his rule, and that he was well qualified to succeed in the attempt, being liberal, magnanimous, possessed of sagacity and winning manners; and above all, brave and skilful in war. (Polyb. xxii. 21; Liv. xxxviii. 19, &c.)

[Christa]

ORTYGIA ('Ορτύγια), a surname of Artemis, derived from the island of Ortygia, the ancient name for Delos, or an island off Smyrna (Ov. Met. i. 694). The goddess bore this name in various places, but always with reference to the island in which she was born. (Strab. x. p. 486.)

[Orus. [Horus; Orion.]

ORUS, the engraver of a beautiful gem, representing a head of Silenus, in the Museum Woryl- anum, p. 144. [P. S.]

ORXINES ('Ορξίνης), a noble and wealthy Persian, who traced his descent from Cyrus. He was present at the battle of Gaugamela, when, together with Orontobates, he commanded the troops which came from the shores of the Persian Gulf. Subsequently, during the absence of Alexander (n. c. 325), on the death of Phraorastes, the satrap of Persia, Orxines assumed the government, and on the return of Alexander came to meet him with costly presents. Alexander does not appear to have been incensed at this usurpation, in which indeed Orxines seems to have been actuated by loyal intentions towards Alexander. But the secpulcre of Cyrus at Pasargadae had been violated and pillaged, and the enemies of Orxines seem to have laid hold of this for the purpose of securing his ruin. He was charged with that and other acts of sacrilege, as well as with having abused his power. Arrian says nothing of the charge being unfounded, but Curtius represents Orxines (or Orsines, as he calls him) as the victim of calumny and intrigue. However that may have been, he was crucified by order of Alexander. (Arrian, iii. 6. § 8, vi. 29, § 3; Curt. iv. 12. § 6, x. 1. §§ 29, 29, 37.)

OSTACCIAS. [ARSAECS XIV., p. 355, a.]

OSTRIS ('Οστρις), the great Egyptian divinity, and husband of Isis. According to Herodotus they were the only divinities that were worshiped by all the Egyptians (Herod. ii. 42). Osiris is described by Plutarch, in his treatise on Isis and Osiris, as a son of Rhea and Helios. His Egyptian name is said to have been Hysiris (Plut. l. c. 34), which is interpreted to mean “son of Isis,” though some said that it meant “many-eyed;” and according to Heliodorus (Aeth. ix. 424), Osiris was the god of the Nile, as Isis was the goddess of the earth. (Comp. Bunsen, Aegypt. Stelle in der Weltgesch. vol. i. p. 494, &c.)

OSTROBS. [ARSAECS XXV., p. 359, a.]

OSSA ('Οσσα), the personification of rumour or report, the Latin Fama. As it is often impossible to trace a report to its source, it is said to come from Zeus, and hence Ossa is called the messenger of Zeus (Hom. Od. i. 292, ii. 216, xxiv. 412, II. ii. 93). Sophocles (Oed. Tyr. 158) calls her a daughter of Hope, and the poets, both Greek and Latin, have indulged in various imaginary descriptions of Ossa or Fama (Hes. Op. et Dies, 705, &c.; Virg. Aen. iv. 174, &c.; Od. Met. xii. 39, &c.). At Athens she was honoured with an altar. (Paus. i. 17. § 1.)

[Ostius. [Sabinus.]

OSTIPAGA, or OSSIPANGA, also written Osslinga, Ossipangina, was a Roman divinity, who was prayed to, to harden and strengthen the bones of infants. (Arnob. adv. Gent. III. 36, iv. 7.) [L. S.]

OSTORIUS SABINUS. [SAUNUS.]

OSTORIUS SCA/PULA. [SCAPULA.]

OTACILIA SEVERA, MABRICA, the wife of the elder M. Julius Philippus, and the mother of the boy who was put to death by the praetorians after the battle of Verona, A.D. 249. She appears to have had a daughter also, since Zosimus speaks of a certain Severinus as the son-in-law of the emperor. No other circumstances are known regarding this princess, except that she was believed by many of the ancients to have been a Christian. The Alexandrian Chronicle makes a positive assertion to this effect, and Eusebios (H. E. vi. 33) mentions a letter, said to have been addressed to her by Origen. (Tillemont, Notes sur l’Empereur Philippe, in his Histoire des Empereurs, vol. iii. p. 499 ; Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 332 ; Zosim. i. 19.)

COIN OF OTACILIA.

OTACILIA, condemned in a judicium by the celebrated jurist C. Aquilius, (Val. Max. viii. 2. § 2.) In the MSS. of Valerius we have ab Otacilia Laterensis, for which we ought perhaps to read ab Otacilia Laterensis, that is, Otacilia, the wife of Laterensis.

OTACILIA GENs, sometimes written Octacilia, is first mentioned at the commencement of the first Punic war, when two brothers of this name obtained the consulsip, M. Otacilius Crassus in b. c. 263, and T. Otacilius Crassus in b. c. 261; but after this time the Otacili rarely occur. The only cognomens in this gens are Crassus and Naso. One or two persons, who were accidentally omitted under Crassus, are given below.

OTACILUS, l. T. OTACILIUS CRASSUS, one of the Roman generals, actively employed during the greater part of the second Punic war, was probably a son of T. Otacilius Crassus, consul in b. c. 216. (Crassus, Otacilius, No. 2.) He is generally mentioned by Livy without a cognomen, but we learn from two passages (xxiii. 31, xxvi. 33), that he had the surname of Crassus. He was praetor b. c. 217, in which year he vowed a temple to Mens, and is mentioned next year, b. c. 216, as pro-praetor, when he brought a letter to the senatus from Hieron in Sicily, imploring the assistance of the Romans against the Carthaginian fleet. In b. c. 215 Otacilius and Q. Fabius Maximus were created duumviri for dedicating the temples they had vowed; and after consecrating the temple of Mens, Otacilius was sent with the imperium into Sicily to take the command of the fleet. From Lilybaeum he crossed over into Africa, and after laying waste the Carthaginian coast fell in with the Punic fleet, as he was making for Sardinia, and captured a few of their ships. On his return to Rome Otacilius became a candidate for the consulship for the year b. c. 214, and would certainly have been elected but for Q. Fabius Maximus, the daughter of whose sister was the wife of Otacilius. The praerogativa centuria had already given their votes in favour of Otacilius, when Fabius dissuaded the people from nominating him to the consulship on the ground that he had not sufficient military abilities to cope with Hannibal. Fabius Maximus and Claudius Marcellus were accordingly appointed consuls; but as some compensation to Otacilius, he was elected praetor for the second time, b. c. 214, and the command of the same fleet was entrusted to him which he had had in the previous year. His command was prolonged during the next three years; and in b. c. 212 he did good service by plundering the Carthaginian coast round Utica, and capturing several corn-vessels in the harbour of the latter city, by means of which he was able to send a supply of corn to the Roman forces, which had just taken Syracuse. In the election of the consuls for the year b. c. 210 Otacilius was again nominated to the consulship by the praerogativa centuria, and again lost his election, when it seemed certain, by the interference of T. Manilius Torquatus. Otacilius, however, never heard of this new affront; for just after the elections were over, word was brought that Otacilius had died in Sicily, b. c. 211. Otacilius was one of the pontifices. (Liv. xxii. 10, 56, xxiii. 21, 31, 32, 41, xxiv. 7—10, xxv. 31, xxvi. 1, 22, 28.)

2. OTACILIUS CRASSUS, one of Pompey’s officers, had the command of the town of Lissus in Ilyria, and cruelly butchered 220 of Carthaginian soldiers, who had surrendered to him on the promise that they should be unijured. Shortly after this he abandoned Lissus, and joined the main body of the Pompeian army. (Caes. B. C. iii. 28, 29.)

L. OTACILIUS PILITUS, a Roman rhetorician, who opened a school at Rome b. c. 81 (Hieronym. in Eusel. Chron. Olymp. 174. 4.) The cognomen of Otacilius is uncertain. Suetonius calls him Plilius (in some manuscripts Pilitus), Eusebios Plodus, and Macrobius (Saturn. ii. 2) Pithodaus. He had been formerly a slave, and while in that condition acted as door-keeper (ostiarium), being chained, as was customary, to his post. But having exhibited talent, and a love of literature, he was manumitted by his master, and became a teacher of rhetoric. Cn. Pompeius Magnus was one of his pupils, and he wrote the history of Pompey, and of his father likewise, in several books, being the first instance according to Cornelius Nepos, in which a history was written by a freedman. (Suet. de ill. Hist. 3; Voss. de Hist. Lat. i. 9. p. 40.)

OTANES (Οτανής). 1. A noble and wealthy Persian, son of Pharnaces. He was the first who suspected the imposture of Smerdas the Magian, and, when his suspicion was confirmed by the report of his daughter Pharkima (one of the royal wives), he took the chief part in organizing the conspiracy against the pretender and his faction (b. c. 521). After the slaughter of the Magians, Otanes, according to the statement in Herodotus, recommended the establishment of democracy, and, when his fellow-conspirators came to the resolution of retaining monarchy, he abandoned all pretensions to the throne on condition that himself and his descendants should be exempted from the royal authority. At the same time it was decreed that to him and his posterity for ever a Median dress and other gifts of honour should be annually presented. Not long after this, Otanes was placed in command of the Persian force which invaded Samos for the purpose of placing Sylosus, brother of Polycrates, in the government; and the act of the madman Charilaus in murdering a number of the most distinguished Persians provoked him to order an indiscriminate massacre of the Samians. Afterwards, however, in obedience to the warning of a dream, he re-peopled the island which he had thus desolated. (Herod. iii. 68—64, 141—149; comp. Strab. xiv. p. 638.)

2. A Persian, son of Sisamnes. His father,
Larch, Frontinus, and Carabises to cedon, forces generals of Ephesus, the satrap of Ephesus, and Tiramphe, seems to Herod (Senec. Controv. i. 3, Declam. ii. 1, &c. ; Tac. Ann. iii. 66.)

2. Tribune of the plebs, A. D. 37, the last year of the reign of Tiberius. He was banished for putting his intercessio upon the question of the reward that was to be given to the accuser of Acutus. (Tac. Ann. vii. 47.)

OTHO. L. RO'SCIIUS, tribune of the plebs B. C. 67, was a warm supporter of the aristocratical party. When Gabinius proposed in the year to bestow upon Pompey the command of the army against the pirates, Otho and his colleague L. Trebellius were the only two of the tribunes that offered any decided opposition. It is related that, when Otho, afraid of speaking, after the way in which Trebellius had been dealt with [Trebellius], held up two of his fingers to show that a colleague ought to be given to Pompey, the people set up such a shout that a crow that was flying over the forum was stunned, and fell down among them (Dion Cass. xxxvi. 7, 13 ; Plut. Pomp. 25). In the same year Otho proposed and carried the law which gave to the equites and to those persons who possessed the equestrian census, a special place at the public spectacles, in fourteen rows or seats (in quatuordecim gradibus sive ordinibus), next to the place of the senators, which was in the orchestra (Vell. Pat. ii. 32 ; Liv. Bel. jud. 99 ; Dion Cass. xxxvii. 25 ; Cic. pro Mur. 19 ; Tac. Ann. xx. 32 ; Hor. Epod. iv. 15, Ep. i. 1. 62 ; Juv. iii. 159, xiv. 324). For those equites who had lost their rank by not possessing the proper equestrian census, there was a special place assigned (inter decsortes, Cic. Phil. ii. 18). This law soon became very unpopular; the people, who were excluded from the seats which they had formerly occupied in common with the equites, thought themselves insulted ; and in Cicero's consulsip (B. C. 63) there was such a riot occasioned by the obnoxious measure, that it required all his eloquence to aly the agitation. (Cic. ad Att. ii. 1.)

This L. Ruscios Otho must not be confounded, as he has frequently been, with the L. Ruscios who was praetor in B. c. 49. The latter had the cognomen of Fabarius. The Otho spoken of by Cicero in B. C. 45, may be the same as the tribune. (Cic. ad Att. xiii. 29, comp. xiii. 37, § 2, 38, § 4, 42, § 1.)

OTHO, SALVIUS. 1. M. SALVIUS OTHO, the grandfather of the emperor Otho, was descended from an ancient and noble family of the town of Ferentium, in Etruria. His father was a Roman eques, his mother was of low origin, perhaps even a freedwoman. Through the influence of Livia Augusta, in whose house he had been brought up, Otho was made a Roman senator, and eventually obtained the praetorship, but was not advanced to any higher honour. (Suet. Otho, 1 ; Tac. Hist. ii. 50.)

2. L. SALVIUS OTHO, the son of the preceding, and the father of the emperor Otho, was connected on his mother's side with many of the most distinguished Roman families, and stood so high in the favour of Tiberius and resembled this emperor so strongly in person, that it was supposed by most that he was his son. He discharged the various public offices at Rome, was consul successively in A. D. 33 (Suet. Calb. 6), obtained the praconulate of Africa, and administered the affairs of this province, as well as of other extraordinary commands which he held, with great diligence and energy. In A. D. 42 he was sent into Illyricum, where the Roman army had lately rebelled against Claudius. On his arrival he put to death several of the soldiers, who had killed their own officers under the pretext that they had excited them to rebellion, and who had even been rewarded by Claudius for this very act. Such a proceeding, though it might have been necessary to restore the discipline of the troops, gave great umbrage at the imperial court; but Otho soon afterwards regained the favour of Claudius by detecting a conspiracy which had been forming against his life by a Roman eques. The senate conferred upon him the extraordinary honour of erecting his statue on the Palatine, and Claudius enrolled him among the patricians, adding that he did not wish better children than Otho. By his wife Albia Terentia he had two sons and one daughter. The elder of his sons, Lucius, bore, says Suetonius, the surname of Titianus, but we may conclude from Tacitus (Ann. xii. 52) and Frontinus (Aquaed. 13), that he had the cognomen of Otho as well (see below, No. 3). His younger son, Marcus, was the emperor Otho. His daughter was betrothed, when quite young, to Drusus, the son of Germanicus. (Suet. Otho, 1 ; Tac. Hist. ii. 50.)

3. L. SALVIIUS OTHO TITIANUS, was the son of No. 2, and the elder brother of the emperor Otho. He was consul a. d. 52, with Faustus Cornelius Sulla (Tac. Ann. xii. 52 ; Frontin. Aquaed. 13). In A. D. 63 Titianus was praconus in Asia, and had Agrigola for his quaestor. It is related to the honour of the latter that he was not corrupted by the example of his superior officer, who indulged in every kind of rapacity (Tac. Agric. 6). On the death of Galba in January A. D. 69, Titianus was a second time made consul, with his brother Otho, the emperor. When the latter set out from Rome against the generals of Vitellius, he left Titianus in charge of the city, but he soon afterwards sent for him and gave him the chief command in the war.
It was partly through his eagerness to engage with the Vitellian troops, that his brother lost the empire; and on the downfall of the latter Titianus was so little dreaded, that he was pardoned by (Tac. Hist. i. 75, 77, ii. 23, 39, 39, 69.)

OTHO, M. SALVIUS, Roman emperor A. D. 69, was descended from an ancient Etruscan family. His father L. Otho, who was consul in A. D. 33, had two sons, Marcus and L. Salvinus Titianus. [See above, No. 2.] Marcus Otho was born in the early part of A. D. 32. He was of moderate stature, ill-made in the legs, and had an effeminate appearance. He was one of the companions of Nero in his debaucheries, till he was sent as governor to Lusitania, which he administered with credit during the last ten years of Nero’s life [Nero, p. 1163, a.]. Otho attached himself to Galba when he revolted against Nero, in the hope of being adopted by him and succeeding to the empire. But Galba, who knew Otho’s character, and wished to have a worthy successor, adopted L. Piso, on the tenth of January, A. D. 69, and designated him as the future emperor. (Tacit. Hist. i. 15.)

Otho then saw his hopes disappointed. His private affairs also were in a ruinous condition, and he resolved to seize the power which an astrologer
had foretold him that he would one day possess.
He enlisted in his design a few soldiers, and on the fifteenth of January he was proclaimed emperor by a mere handful of men, who, with their swords drawn, carried him in a litter to the camp, where he was saluted emperor. Otho was ready to promise any thing and to stoop to any thing to extricate himself from his dangerous position, and to receive the prize at which he aimed (Tacit. Hist. i. 36).
A little vigour and decision on the part of Galba might have checked the rising. The matter was at last decided by Otho and the soldiers making their way into the forum, upon which the standard-bearer of the cohort that accompanied Galba snatched from it the emperor’s effigy, and threw it on the ground. This was the signal for deserting Galba, who received his death-blow from a common soldier.

The soldiers showed they were the masters of the emperor by choosing as praefecti praetorio, Plautus Firmus and Licinius Proculeius; Flavius Sabinus, the brother of Vespasion, was made praefectus urbi. On the evening of the day in which Galba was murdered the senate took the oath of fidelity to Otho, who afterwards offered a sacrifice in the Capitol, with no favourable omens. The new emperor showed his moderation or his prudence
by protecting against the fury of the soldiers, Marius Celsus, who had maintained his fidelity to Galba, and who showed the same devotion afterwards to the cause of Otho. The punishment of Tigellinus, the guilty encourager of Nero’s crimes, and the first to desert him, was demanded by the people, and granted. This abominable wretch received the news of his death being required while he was enjoying the waters of Sinuessa, and he cut his throat with a razor. The indulgence of Otho towards those who were his personal enemies, and the change in his habits shown by devoting himself to the administration of affairs, gave people hopes that the emperor would turn out better than was expected. Still these appearances were by many considered deceptive, and there was little confidence in a man who owed his elevation to the murder of Galba, and the violence of the soldiers, whom he was compelled to keep in good humour. Otho was acknowledged emperor by Lucius Albinus, go-vener of Mauritania (Tacit. Hist. ii. 50), and by Carteius, prefect of Africa, says Tacitus.
(Tacit. Hist. i. 75, 77, ii. 23, 39, 39, 69.)

Otho, son of Licinius Proculeius, says Tacitus.
Otho. Cæcina, while he was still on the north side of the Alps, received intelligence that a body of cavalry on the Po had taken the oath to Vitellius, under whom they had formerly served in Africa. Mediolanum (Milan), Vercellae, and other towns in North Italy, followed this example. Cæcina having sent some Gallic, Lusitanian, British, and German troops over the mountains to support his new friends, led his soldiers across the Pennine Alps, through the snow with which they were still covered.

The revolt of Vitellius had not reached Rome at the time of Galba's death. As soon as it was known, Otho wrote to Vitellius, and offered to give him all that he could desire, and even to share the empire with him. Vitellius replied by offers of his part, but they could come to no terms, and both sides made preparation for war. A disturbance was caused at Rome by the praetorian soldiers, who suspected that there was some design against Otho. They broke into the palace, threatening to kill the senators, many of whom were supping with Otho, and with difficulty made their escape. The soldiers penetrated even to the emperor's apartment, in order to be assured that he was alive. The tumult was at last allayed, but the approach of a civil war, from the evils of which the state had so long been secure, caused general uneasiness.

Otho left Rome for North Italy about the fourteenth of March. His brother Titianus remained at Rome to look after the city, with Flavius Sabinus, Vespasian's brother, who was praefectus urbi. Otho had under him three commanders of ability, Suetonius Paulinus, Marius Celsus, and Annius Gallus. He marched on foot at the head of his troops, in a plain military equipment (Tacit. Hist. ii. 11). Otho's fleet was master of the sea on the north-west coast of Italy, and the soldiers treated the country as if it was a hostile territory. They defeated the Ligurian mountainers and plundered Albium Intemelium (Vintimiglia). Annius Gallus and Vestricius Spurinna were commissioned by Otho to defend the Po. Spurinna, who was in Placentia, was attacked by Cæcina, but succeeded in repelling him and destroying a large part of his force. Cæcina retired, but the magnificent amphitheatre which was outside the walls was burnt during the contest. Cæcina retreated towards Cremona, and bodies of his troops sustained fresh defeats. Martius Macer, at the head of Otho's gladiators, surprised some auxiliaries of Cæcina, who took refuge in Cremona, but Macer from caution prevented his men from following them into the town. His conduct brought suspicion on Suetonius and the other generals of Otho, and Titianus, his brother, was sent for to take the conduct of the war. Cæcina made another attempt to retrieve his losses, but he was beaten by Marius Celsus and Suetonius, who, however, would not allow the men to follow up their advantage; and that which probably was prudence, became the foundation of a charge of treason against him from his troops.

Valens, who was at Ticinum (Pavia), now joined his forces to those of Cæcina, and the two generals, who had been jealous of one another, now thought only of combining to defeat the enemy. Otho's generals advised him to avoid a decisive battle, but his own opinion, and that of his brother and of Proculus, praefectus pretoria, was in favour of bringing the war at once to a close; and this determination ruined the cause of Otho. He was advised to retire to Brixellum (Bresseillé), to be out of the way of danger, and he went there with a considerable force. The generals of Vitellius knew the state of affairs in Otho's army, and were ready to take advantage of it. The hostile armies were on the Po. The forces of Otho, under Titianus and Proculus, were marched to the fourth milestone from Bedriacum (Cividade), and on their route they suffered for want of water. They had now sixteen miles to march to the confluence of the Adda and the Po, to find the enemy, whom they came up with before they were expected. A fierce battle was fought in which Otho's troops were entirely defeated. It is said that forty thousand men fell in this battle. The troops of Vitellius followed up the pursuit within five miles of Bedriacum, but they did not venture to attack the enemy's camp on that day. On the next day the two armies came to terms, and the soldiers of Otho received the victors into their camp.

Though Otho had still a large force with him, and other troops at Bedriacum and Placentia, he determined to make no further resistance, and to die by his own hand. After settling his affairs with the utmost coolness and deliberation, he stabbed himself. The manner of his death is circumstantially told by Suetonius. His life had been dissolute, and his conduct at the last, though it may appear to have displayed courage, was in effect only despair. He died on the fifteenth of April, A. D. 69, in the thirty-seventh year of his age. His sepulchre was at Brixellum, and Plutarch, who saw it, says that it bore simply his name, and no other inscription. Suetonius, who records every thing, has not forgotten Otho's wig. His hair was thin, and he wore a perruque, which was so skilfully fitted to his head that nobody could tell it from true hair. (Suetonius, Otho; Plutarch, Otho; Dion Cassius, liv.; Tacitus, Hist. i. ii.; all the authorities are collected by Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs, vol. i.)

[Othryades, OTHRY ADES ('Oθρυάδης'), a Spartan, was one of the three hundred selected to fight with an equal number of Argives for the possession of Thryea. Othryades was the only Spartan who survived the battle, and he remained on the field, and spoiled the dead bodies of the enemy, while Alcmenor and Chromius, the two survivors of the Argive party, hastened home with the news of victory, supposing that all their opponents had been slain. On the second day after this, Othryades having remained at his post the whole time, the main armies of the two states came to ascertain the result, and, as the victory was claimed by both sides, a general battle ensued, in which the Argives were defeated. Othryades slew himself on the field, being ashamed to return to Sparta as the one survivor of her three hundred champions. The above is the account of Herodotus. Pausanias tells us, that in the theatre at Argos there was a sculptured group representing Perilaus, an Argive, son of Aleconor, as slaying Othryades; and the story of his suicide, as given by Herodotus, is also contradicted by the account in Suidas, where we find (adopting the amended reading) that, being wounded, he lay among the dead, unnoticed by Aleconor and Chromius, and that, on their departure from the field, he raised a trophy, traced on it an inscription with his blood, and died (Herod. i. 82; Thuc. v. 41; Suid. s. v. 'Othydatos: Luc. Contempl. ad fin.; Hemst. ad loc.; Pseudo-Simon. ap. Anth. i. p. 63; ed. Jacobs; Dioscor. ibid. p. 247; Nicand. ibid. ii. p. 2; Charrem. ibid. ii. p. 58; Thes. ap. Stob. vii. p. 92; Ov. Fast. ii. 663.)

OVIDIUS.
Gallus was followed by Tibullus, and he by Propertius; so that Ovid claimed to be the fourth who succeeded to the elegiac lyre. In this enumeration Catullus is entirely omitted. In Propertius, who was some years older than himself, Ovid not only found a μουσατήρ, but also a hierophant very capable of initiating him in all the mysteries of Roman dissipation. (Saepe suos solitius recitare Propertius ignes, Trist. iv. 10.) Ovid was an apt scholar; but his views were more ambitious than his master’s, whom he was destined to surpass in the quality, not only of the Muse, but of the mistress, that he courted. The Cynthia of Propertius seems to have been merely one of that higher class of accomplished courtesans with which Rome then abounded. If we may believe the testimony of Sidonius Apollinaris, in the following lines, Corinna was no less a personage than Julia, the clever and accomplished, but abandoned daughter of Augustus:—

Et te carmina per libidinos Notum, Naso tener, Tomosque missum:
Quondam Caesareae nunc pueliae
Ficto nomine subditum Corinnae.

This authority has been rejected on the ground that it ascribes Ovid’s banishment to this intrigue, which, for chronological and other reasons, could not have been the case. But, strictly taken, the verses assert no such thing. They merely tell us that he was sent to Tomi “carmina per libidinosa,” which was, indeed, the cause set forth in the edict of Augustus; and the connection with Julia is mentioned incidentally as an old affair, but not by any means as having occasioned his banishment. Such hints of antiquity are there, as lightly disregarded, and there are several passages in Ovid’s Amores which render the testimony of Sidonius highly probable. Thus it appears that his mistress was a married woman, of high rank, but profligate morals; all which particulars will suit Julia. There are, besides, two or three passages which seem more especially to point her out as belonging to the family of the Caesars; and it is remarkable that in the fourteenth elegy of the first book Ovid alludes to the baldness of his mistress, which agrees with an anecdote of Julia preserved by Macrobius. (Saturn. ii. 5.) Nor can the practice of the Roman poets of making the metrical quantity of their mistress’s feigned name answer precisely to that of the real one be alleged as an insuperable objection. We have already seen that Sidonius Apollinaris did not so consider it. In Ovid’s case the great disparity of rank would have made it dangerous to adopt too close an imitation; not to mention that the title of Corinna would convey a compliment to Julia, as comparing her for wit and beauty to the Theban poetess.

Be this as it may, it cannot be doubted that Ovid’s mistress was a woman of high rank; and as this circumstance dispensed with those vulgar means of seduction which may be supplied by money, and which the poet’s moderate fortune would have prevented him from adopting, even had he been so inclined (Ars Am. ii. 165), so it compelled him to study those arts of insinuation which are most agreeable to the fair sex, and to put in practice his own maxim, ut amemis amabilis esto. It was thus he acquired that intimate knowledge of the female heart, and of all the shades of the amatory passion, which appears in so many parts of his writings, and which he afterwards embodied in his Art of Love, for the benefit of his contemporaries and of posterity. His first attempts in verse seem to have been in the heroic metre, and on the subject of the Gigantomachia, but from this he was soon diverted by his passion for Corinna, to which we owe the greater part of the elegies in his Amores. How much of these is to be set down to poetic invention? How much is to be taken literally? These are questions which cannot be accurately answered. In his later poems he would have us believe that his life is not to be judged by his writings, and that he did not practise the precepts which he inculcated. (Trist. i. 6. 59, ii. 354, &c.) But some of his effusions are addressed to other mistresses besides Corinna; and the warmth, nay the grossness of mere animal passion, which breathes in several of them, prevents us from believing that his life was so pure as it answered his purpose to affirm in his exile; though we may readily concede that he conducted his amours with sufficient discretion to avoid any open and flagrant scandal (Nomine sub nostro fabula nulla fuit, Trist. iv. 10. 68). On the other hand, something may doubtless be ascribed to youthful vanity, to the fashion of the age, and above all to his determination to become a poet. His love for his art was boundless. He sought the acquaintance of the most eminent poets of the day, and when they were assembled together he regarded them as so many divinities. Among his more intimate poetical friends, besides Maecius and Propertius, were Ponticus and Basus. Horace was considerably his senior, yet he had frequently heard him recite his lyric compositions. Virgil, who died when Ovid was only seventy-four years of age, is said to have been his patron; for it was the life of Tibullus sufficiently prolonged to allow him to cultivate his friendship. It is remarkable that he does not once mention the name of Maecenas. It is possible, however, that that minister, whose literary patronage was in some degree political, and with a view to the interests of his master, had retired from public affairs before Ovid had acquired any considerable reputation.

How long Ovid’s connection with Corinna lasted there are no means of deciding. Some of the elegies in the Amores are doubtless his earliest remaining compositions; and he tells us that he began to write when the razor had passed but once or twice over his chin (Trist. iv. 10. 58). That work, however, as we now possess it, is a second edition, and evidently extends over a considerable number of years. But some of the elegies may have been mere reminiscences, for we can hardly think that Ovid continued the intrigue after he had married his third wife. His former marriages were matters of duty; this seems to have been one of choice. The lady was one of the Fabian family, and appears to have been every way worthy of the sincere affection which Ovid entertained for her to the day of his death. She had a daughter by a former union, who married Suillius. At what time the poet entered on this third marriage cannot be ascertained; but we can hardly place it later than his thirtieth year, since a daughter, Perilla, was the fruit of it (Trist. iii. 7. 3), who was grown up and married at the time of his banishment. Perilla was twice married, and had a child by each husband; one of whom seems to have been Cornelius Fidus. Ovid was a grandfather before he lost his father at the age of ninety; soon after whose decease his mother also died.

This is all the account that can be given of Ovid’s life, for his birth is the age of fifty; and it has been for the most part drawn from his own writings. It is chiefly misfortune that swells the page of human history. The very dearth of events justifies the inference that his days glided away smoothly and happily, with just enough of employment to give a zest to the pursuits of his leisure, and in sufficient affluence to secure to him all the pleasures of life, without exposing him to its storms and dangers. His residence at Rome, where he had a house near the Capitol, was diversified by an occasional trip to his Pelignian farm, and by the recreation which he derived from his garden, situated between the Flaminian and Clodian ways. His devotion to love and to Corinna had not so wholly engrossed him as to prevent his achieving great reputation in the higher walks of poetry. Besides his love Elegies, his Herorical Epistles, which breathe purer sentiments, his Amours and verses, and his Art of Love, in which he had embodied the experience of twenty years, he had written his Medea, the finest tragedy that had appeared in the Latin tongue. The Metamorphoses were finished, with the exception of the last corrections; on which account they had been seen only by his private friends. But they were in the state in which we now possess them, and were sufficient of themselves to establish a great poetic fame. He not only enjoyed the friendship of a large circle of distinguished men, but the regard and favour of Augustus and the imperial family. Nothing, in short, seemed wanting, either to his domestic happiness or to his public reputation. But a cloud now rose upon the horizon which was destined to throw a gloom over the evening of his days.

Towards the close of the year of Rome, 761 (A.D. 8), Ovid was suddenly commanded by an imperial edict to transport himself to Tomis, or, as he himself calls it, Tomis (sing. fem.), a town on the Exine, near the mouths of the Danube, on the very border of the empire, and where the Roman dominion was but imperfectly assured. Ovid underwent no trial, and the sole reason for his banishment stated in the edict was his having published his poem on the Art of Love. It was not, however, an exilium, but a relegatio; that is, he was not utterly cut off from all hope of return, nor did he lose his citizenship.

What was the real cause of his banishment? This is a question that has long exercised the ingenuity of scholars, and various are the solutions that have been proposed. The publication of the Ars Amatoria was certainly a mere pretext; and for Augustus, the author of one of the filthiest, but funniest, epigrams in the language, and a systematic adulterer, for reasons of state policy (Suet. Aug. 69) not a very becoming one. The Ars had been published nearly ten years previously; and moreover, whenever Ovid alludes to that, the ostensible cause, he invariably couples with it another which he mysteriously conceals. According to some writers, the latter was his intrigue with Julia. But this, besides that it does not agree with the poet’s expressions, is sufficiently refuted by the fact that Julia had been an exile since n. c. 2 (Dion Cass. iv. 10; Vell. Pat. ii. 100.) The same chronological objection may be urged against those who think that Ovid had accidentally discovered an incestuous commerce between Augustus and his daughter. To obviate these objections on the score of chronology, other authors have transferred both those persons to the younger Julia, the daughter of the elder one. But with respect to any intrigue with her having been the cause of Ovid’s banishment, the expressions alluded to in the former case, and which show that his fault was an involuntary one, are here equally conclusive, and are, too, strengthened by the great disparity of years between the parties, the poet being old enough to be the father of the younger Julia. As regards the other point — the imputed incest of the emperor with his grand-daughter — arguments in refutation can be drawn only from probability, for there is nothing in Ovid’s poems that can be said directly to contradict it. But in the first place, it is totally unsupported by any historical authority, though the same imputation on Augustus with regard to his daughter might derive some slight colouring from a passage in Suétone (iv. 34. 2). But again, it is the height of improbability that Ovid, when being for pardon, would have alluded so frequently to the cause of his offence had it been of a kind so disgracefully to compromise the emperor’s character. Nay, Bayle (art. Oviede) has pushed this argument so far as to think that the poet’s life would not have been safe had he been in possession of so dangerous a secret, and that silence would have been secured by his assassination. The conjecture that Ovid’s offence was his having accidentally seen Livia in the bath is hardly worthy of serious notice. On the common principles of human action we cannot reconcile so severe a punishment with so trivial a fault; and the supposition is, besides, refuted by Ovid’s telling us that what he had seen was some crime. One of the most elaborate theories on the subject is that of M. Villenave, in a life of Ovid published in 1802, and subsequently in the Biographie Universelle. He is of opinion that the poet was the victim of a coup d’état, and that his offence was his having been the political partisan of Posthumus Agrippa; which prompted Livia and Tiberius, whose influence over the senile Augustus was then complete, to procure his banishment. But this is not the former was banished, at least a year before the latter, namely some time in A.D. 7 (Dion Cass. iv. 32; Vell. Pat. ii. 112), whereas Ovid did not leave Rome till December A.D. 8. Nor can Ovid’s expressions concerning the cause of his disgrace be at all reconciled with Villenave’s supposition. The coincidence of his banishment, however, with that of the younger Julia, who, as we learn from Tacitus (Ann. iv. 71) died in A.D. 28, after twenty years’ exile, is a remarkable fact, and lends very strongly to the inference that his fate was in some way connected with hers. This opinion has been adopted by Tiraboschi in his Storia della Letteratura Italiana, and after him by Rosmini, in his Vita d’Ovidio, who, however, has not improved upon Tiraboschi, by making Ovid deliberately seduce Julia for one of his exalted friends. There is no evidence to fix on the poet the detestable character of a procurer. He may more probably have become acquainted with Julia’s profligacy by accident, and by his subsequent conduct, perhaps, for instance, by con-scaling it, have given offence to Livia, or Augustus, or both. But we have not space here to pursue a subject which, in a brief treatise, can only end in a partial consideration; and therefore the reader who is desirous of seeing it discussed at greater length, is referred to the Classical Museum, vol. iv. No. 13.

Ovid has described in one of his most pathetic elegies (Trist. i. 3), the last night spent in Rome, and the overwhelming sorrow with which he tore himself from his home and family. To add to his affliction, his daughter was absent with her husband in Africa, and he was thus unable to bid her a last farewell. Accompanied by Maximus, whom he had known from a child, and who was almost the only friend who remained faithful to him in his adversity, he departed for the shores of the Adriatic, which he crossed in the month of December. After experiencing some of the storms common at that season, and which had well nigh shipwrecked him, he at length landed safely on the Corinthian isthmus, and having crossed it, embarked in another vessel at Nocerae, on the Sarone Gulf. Hence his navigation through the Hellespont, and northwards up the Euxine to his destined port, seems to have been tedious, but safe. The greater part of a year was consumed in the voyage; but Ovid b eguilied the time by the exercise of his poetical talent, several of his pieces having been written on shipboard. To one like Ovid, accustomed from his youth to all the luxury of Rome, and so ardent a lover of politeness and refinement (Ars Am. iii. 121), painful indeed must have been the contrast presented by his new abode, which offered him an inhospitable soil, a climate so severe as to freeze even the wine, and the society of a horde of semi-barbarians, to whose language he was a stranger. Life itself was hardly safe. When winter had covered the Danube with ice, the barbarous tribes that dwelt beyond, crossed it on their horses, plundering all around, and insulting the very walls of Tomi. Add to all this the want of convenient lodging, of the decent luxuries of the table, and of good medical advice, and we shall scarcely be surprised at the urgency with which the poet solicits, not so much for his recall as for a change in his place of banishment. He has often been reproached with the abruptness of his supplications, and the fulsome flattery towards Augustus by which he sought to render them successful: nor can these charges be denied, or altogether defended. But it seems very unreasonable to require the bearing of a Cato from the tender poet of love under such truly distressing circumstances. To a Roman, who looked upon the metropolis as the seat of all that was worth living for, banishment, even to an agreeable spot, was an evil of great magnitude. In Ovid's case it was aggravated tenfold by the remoteness and natural wretchedness of the place. If he deified Augustus it was no more than was done by Virgil, Horace, and the other poets of the age, with a tithe of his inducements to offer in excuse. But in truth this was nothing more than a part of the manners of the age, for which neither Ovid nor any other writer is to be held individually responsible. Such deifications were public and national acts, formally recognised by the senate. But in the midst of his misfortunes, Ovid felt a noble confidence in his genius and fame; and it is refreshing to read a passage like the following, where he exults in the impotence of the imperial tyrant to hurt him:

En ego, cum patria caream, vobisque, domoque, Raptaque sint, adimi qua potuere mihi; Ingenio tamen ipse meo comitique fruam; Caesar in hoc potuit juris habere nihil.

Trist. iii. 7. 45.

Nor were his mind and spirit so utterly prostrated as to prevent him from seeking some relief to his misfortunes by the exercise of his poetical talents. Not only did he finish his Fasti, in his exile, besides writing the Ibis, the Tristitia, Ex Ponto, &c., but he likewise acquired the language of the Goths, in which he composed some poems in honour of Augustus. These he publicly recited, and they were received with tumultuous applause by the Tomitae. With his new fellow-citizens, indeed, he had succeeded in rendering himself highly popular, insomuch that they honoured him with a decree, declaring him exempt from all public burthens. (Ex Ponto, iv. 9. 101.) From the same passage (v. 89, &c.) we learn that the secret of his popularity lay in his unaltered bearing; that he maintained the same tranquillity of mind, the same modesty of demeanour, for which he had been known and esteemed by his friends at Rome.

Yet, under all this apparent fortitude, he was a prey to anxiety, which, combined with the effects of a rigorous climate, produced in a few years a declining state of health. He was not afflicted with any acute disorder; but indigestion, loss of appetite, and want of sleep, slowly, but surely, undermined a constitution originally not the most robust. (Ex Ponto, i. 10, &c.) He died in the sixtieth year of his age and tenth of his exile, A. D. 18, a year also memorable by the death of the historian, Livy. Two or three pretended discoveries of his tomb have been made in modern times, but they are wholly undeserving of attention.

1. Among the earliest of Ovid's works must be placed the Amores (Libri III.), which however extends over a considerable number of years. According to the epigram prefixed, the work, as we now possess it, is a second edition, revised and abridged, the former one having consisted of five books. The authenticity of this epigram has been questioned by Jahn, but Ovid himself tells us in another place that he had destroyed many of the elegies dedicated to Corinna. (Multa quidem scripsi, sed quae vitiosa putavi, Emendaturis ignibus ipse dedi, Trist. iv. 10. 61.) Nor can we very well account for the allusion made to the Ars Amatoria in the Amores (ii. 18, 19), except on the assumption of a second and late edition of the latter, in which the piece containing the allusion was inserted. This second edition must, however, have been finished before the third book of the Ars, since the Amores are there mentioned (v. 343) as consisting of three books. The elegies of the Amores seem thrown together without any regard to chronological order. Thus from the first elegy of the third book it would seem that Ovid had not yet written tragedy; whilst in the eighteenth elegy of the preceding book he not only alludes to his Medea (v. 13), but, as we have seen, to his Ars Amatoria. This want of sequence is another proof of a later edition. Though the Amores is principally addressed to Corinna, it contains elegies to other mistresses. For instance, the ninth and tenth of the first book.
point evidently to one of a much inferior station to Corinna; and the seventh and eighth of the second book are addressed to Cyparissus, Corinna's maid.

2. Epistolae Heroidum, twenty-one in number, were an early work of Ovid. By some critics the authenticity of the last six has been doubted, as also that of the fifteenth (Sappho to Phaon), because it is found only in the most recent MSS. But Ovid mentions having written such an epistle (Amor. ii. 18, 26), and the internal evidence is sufficient to indicate it. From a passage in the Ars Amatoria (iii. 346—Ignotum hoc aliis ille novavit opus) Ovid appears to claim the merit of originating this species of composition; in which case we must consider the epistle of Arethusa to Lyctos, in the fourth book of Propertius, as an imitation. P. Burmann, however, in a note on Propertius, disallows this claim, and thinks that Ovid was the imitator. He explains novavit in the preceding passage of the Ars as follows:—

"Ab aliis neglectum et omissum rursus in usum redactum." But this seems very harsh, and is not consistent with Ovid's expression "ignotum aliis." We do not know the date of Propertius's death; but even placing it in n. c. 15, still Ovid was then eight and twenty, and might have composed several, if not all, of his heroic epistles. Answers to several of the Heroides were written by Aulus Sabinus, a contemporary poet and friend of Ovid's, viz. Ulysses to Penelope, Hippolytus to Phaedra, Aeneas to Dido, Demophon to Phyllis, Jason to Hysipyle, and Phaon to Sappho (see Amores, ii. 18, 29). Three of these are usually printed with Ovid's works; but their authenticity has been doubted, both on account of their style, and because there are no MSS. of them, except, though they appear in the Epistola principis. From the passage in the Ars Amatoria, before referred to (iii. 345) it would seem as if the Heroides were intended for musical recitation. (Vel tibi composita cantetur epistola voce. Comp. Alex. ab Alex. Gen. Dier. ii. 1.) A translation of these epitaphe into Greek by Maximus Planudes exists in MS., but has never been published.

3. Ars Amatoria, or De Arte Amandi. This work was written about b. c. 2, as appears from the sham naval combat exhibited by Augustus being alluded to as recent, as well as the expedition of Caius Caesar to the East. (Lib. i. v. 171, &c.) Ovid was then forty, and his earlier years having been spent in intrigue, he was fully qualified by experience to give instruction in the art and mystery of the tender passion. The first two books are devoted to the male sex; the third professes to instruct the ladies. This last book was probably published some time after the two preceding ones. Not only does this seem to be borne out by vv. 45, &c., but we may thus account for the Ars (then in two books) being mentioned in the Amores, and also the Amores, in its second edition of three books, in the third book of the Ars. At the time of Ovid's banishment this poem was ejected from the public libraries by command of Augustus.

4. Remedia Amoris, in one book. That this piece was subsequent to the Ars Amor. appears from v. 9. Its subject, as the title implies, is to suggest remedies for the violence of the amatory passion. Hence Ovid (v. 47) compares himself to the spear of Telphus, which was able both to wound and heal.

5. Nux. The elegiac complaint of a nut-tree respecting the ill-treatment it receives from wayfarers, and even from its own master. This little piece was probably suggested by the fate of a nut-tree in Ovid's own garden.

6. Metamorphosen Libri XV. This, the greatest of Ovid's poems in bulk and pretensions, appears to have been written between the age of forty and fifty. He tells us in his Tristia (i. 6) that he had not put the last polishing hand to it when he was driven from the banishment; and it in the hurry and vexation of his flight, he burnt it, together with other pieces. Copies had, however, got abroad, and it was thus preserved, by no means to the regret of the author (Trist. i. 6. 25). It consists of such legends or fables as involved a transformation, from the Creation to the time of Julius Caesar, the last being that emperor's change into a star. It is thus a sort of cyclic poem made up of distinct episodes, but connected into one narrative thread, with much skill. Ovid's principal model was, perhaps, the ΕΤΕΡΟΠΟΙΟΜΕΝΑ of Nicander. It has been translated into elegant Greek prose by Maximus Planudes, whose version was published by Bois-sonade (Paris, 1822), and forms the 46th vol. of Lemaire's Bibliotheca Latina.

7. Fastorum Libri XII., of which only the first six are extant. This work was incomplete at the time of Ovid's banishment. Indeed he had perhaps done little more than collect the materials for it; but the first book, and the last, which Ovid professed to write, appears from v. 38. Yet he must have finished it before he wrote the second book of Tristia, as he there alludes to it as consisting of twelve books (Sex ego Fastorum scripsi totidemque libello, v. 549). Masson, indeed, takes this passage to mean that he had only written six, viz. "I have written six of the Fasti, and as many books"; and holds that Ovid never did any more. But this interpretation seems contrary to the natural sense of the words, and indeed to the genius of the language. The Fasti is a sort of poetical Roman calendar, with its appropriate festivals and mythology, and the substance was probably taken in a great measure from the old Roman annalists. The study of antiquity was then fashionable at Rome, and Propertius had preceded Ovid in this style of writing in his Origins, in the fourth book. The model of both seems to have been the Aenar of Callimachus. The Fasti shows a good deal of learning, but it has been observed that Ovid makes frequent mistakes in his astronomy, from not understanding the books from which he took it.

8. Tristian Libri V. The five books of elegies under the title of Tristia were written during the first four years of Ovid's banishment. They are chiefly made up of descriptions of his afflicted condition, and petitions for mercy. The tenth elegy of the fourth book is valuable, as containing many particulars of Ovid's life.

9. Epistolaram ex Ponto Libri IV. These epistles are also in the elegiac metre, and much the same in substance as the Tristia, to which they were subsequent (see lib. i. cp. i., v. 15, &c.). It must be confessed that age and misfortune seem to have damped Ovid's genius both in this and the preceding work. Even the versification is more slovenly, and some of the lines very prosaic.

10. Juba. This satire of between six and seven hundred elegiac verses was also written in exile. The poet inveighs in it against an enemy who had traded him, and who some take to have been Hyginus, the mythologist. Caecilius Rhodiginus (Antiq. Lect. xiii. 1) says, on the authority of Caecilius Minusianus Appuleius, that it was Cor vinus. Though the variety of Ovid's imitations displays learning and fancy, the piece leaves the impression of an impotent explosion of rage. The title and plan were borrowed from Callimachus. 11. Consolatione ad Liviam Augustam. The authen-ticty of this elegiac poem has been the subject of much dispute among critics, the majority of whom are against it. The leading names on the other side are Barth, Passerat, and Amar, the recent French editor. However, it is allowed on all hands to be not unworthy of Ovid's genius. Sca-liger and others have attributed it to P. Albinovagus.

12. The Medicamina Faciei et Hallelucicon are mere fragments, and their genuineness not altogether certain. Yet Ovid in the Ars Am. (iii.205) alludes to a poem which he had written in one book on the art of heightening female charms, and which must, therefore, have been prior to the Ars; and Pliny (H.N. xxxii. 34) mentions a work of his on fishing, written towards the close of his life. Of his tragedy, Medea, only two lines remain. Of this work Quintilian says, "Ovidi Medea videtur multo ostendere quantum ille vir praestaret poterit si ingenio suo temperare quam in dulga malinsensus," x. 38. He seems to have written other works now lost: as, Metaphrasis Phenomenon Arati, Epigrammata, Liber in malos Poetas, or sort of Duciaed (Quintil. vi. 3), Triumphus Tiberii de Illyriis, De Bello Aetiaeo ad Tiberium, &c. Several sporadic pieces have been attributed to him; as the Elegiae ad Philodemum, De Pulicte, Priapea, &c. That his poems in the Grecian language have not been preserved is, perhaps, chiefly to be regretted on the score of their philosophal value.

That Ovid possessed a great poetical genius is unquestionable; which makes it the more to be regretted that it was not always under the control of a sound judgment. Niebuhr, in his Lectures, edited by Dr. Schmitz (vol. ii. p. 106), calls him, next to Catullus, the most poetical amongst the Roman poets; in allusion, perhaps, to the vigour of fancy and warmth of colouring displayed in some parts of his works. The same eminent scholar ranks him, in respect of his facility, amongst the very greatest poets. Of the truth of this remark no doubt can be entertained. Ovid has himself described how spontaneously his verses flowed; and the fact is further attested by the bulk of his productions. But this was a dangerous gift. The facility of composition possessed more charms for him than the irksome, but indispensable labour of correction and retrenchment. Hence those prolix and puerile descriptions which led Quintilian (x. 88) to characterise him as minutum avutor ingenii sui, laudandus tamen in partibus; and of which a notable instance has been pointed out by Seneca (N. Q. iii. 27) in the description of the flood (Metam. i. 262, &c.); which, though it commences with sublimity, is spoilt by the repetition of too many words, and some of them trite and vulgar, images of the same thing. Nor was this his only fault. He was the first to depart from that pure and correct taste which characterises the Greek poets, and their earlier Latin imitators. His writings abound with those false thoughts and frigid conceits which we find so frequently in the Italian poets; and in this respect he must be regarded as unanteique. Dryden's indigation at these misplaced witticisms led him to rank Ovid among the second-rate poets (see his Life of Virgil, and Dedication of the Aeneis). But though a just criticism cannot allow these faults to pass without severe reprehension, there are numerosous passages which show that Ovid was capable of better things.

The Amores, his earliest work, is less injected with conceit than some of his later ones; and is marked by grossness and indecency, rather than by false wit or overwrought refinement. His fictitious love epistles, or Heroides, as, indeed, might be naturally expected, partake more of the latter qualities; but they are remarkable for terse and polished versifications, and the turns of expression are often highly effective. The Ars Amatoria may be said to contain appropriate precepts, if that be any recommendation, or if love, in the proper sense of the term, requires them; the little god himself being the best instructor, as Boccaccio has so well shown in the tale of Cymon and Iphigenia. In a certain sense it may be styled a didactic poem, and, like most works of that nature, contains but little poetry, though the subject seems more than usually favourable to it. The first two or three books of the Metamorphoses, in spite of their faults, abound with poetical beauties; nor are we without passages treated with a more sparing hand, in the remaining ones; as, among other instances, in the tale of Pyramus and Thisbe; the charming rustic picture of the household of Baucis and Philemon; and the description of the Cave of Sleep, in the eleventh book, which for vigour of fancy is not perhaps surpassed by any thing in Spencer. In the Fasti Ovid found a favourable subject from the poetical nature of the mythology and early legends of Rome, which he has treated with great power and effect. His prolixity was here more restricted than in the Metamorphoses, partly by the nature of his plan, and partly, perhaps, by the metre; and he has treated his subject in a severer taste. Schiller (Ueber native und sentimentalitische Dichtung) will not allow the Tristia and Ex Ponto to be called poetry, from their being the offspring, not of inspiration but of necessity; and it must be confessed that there is little except the versification to entitle them to the name. As, however, Gibbon has remarked (Decline and Fall, c. 18, note), they are valuable as presenting a picture of the human mind under very singular circumstances; and it may be added, as affording many particulars of the poet's life. But in forming an estimate of Ovid's poetical character, we must never forget that his great poem had not the benefit of his last corrections; and that by the loss of his tragedy, the Medea, we are deprived, according to the testimony of antiquity, of his most perfect work; and that, too, in a species of composition which demands the highest powers of human genius. The loss which we have thus sustained may be in some measure inferred from the intimate knowledge which Ovid displays of the female heart; as in the story of Byblis in the Metamorphoses, and in the soliloquy of Medea in the same work, in which the alternations of hope and fear, reason and passion, are depicted with the greatest force.

The editions of Ovid's works are very numerous, and the following list contains only the more remarkable: — OVINIUS.

Besides the two ancient memoirs of Ovid commonly prefixed to his works, several short accounts of his life, by Aldus Manutius, Paulus Marus, Ciofani, and others, are collected in the 4th vol. of Barmann's edition. In the same place, as well as in Lemaire's edition, will be found Masson's Life, originally published at Amsterdam in 1708. This is one of the most elaborate accounts of Ovid, but too discursive, and not always accurate. There is a short sketch in Crusiús' Lives of the Roman Poets. By far the best Life is the Italian one by the Cavaliere Rosmini, Milan, 1821, 2 thin vols. 8vo. (2nd ed.) [T. D.]

OXA'THRES (Ojadopis), a Persian name, which is also written OXOATHRES and OXATHRES, and is frequently confounded or interchanged both by Greek and Latin writers with OXARTES and OXARTES. Indeed, it is probable that these are all merely different forms of the same name. (See Ellendt, ad Arrian, Anast. iii. 8. § 8; Mützell, ad Curt. viii. 4. § 21.)

1. A younger brother of Artaxerxes II. Menmon king of Persia. He was treated with kindness by his brother, and even admitted to the privilege of sharing the king's table, contrary to the usual etiquette of the Persian court. (Plut. Artr. 18.)

2. Brother of Dareius III. Codomannus. He was distinguished for his bravery, and in the battle of Issus, B.C. 333, took a prominent part in the combat in defence of the king, when attacked by the Macedonian cavalry under Alexander himself. (Diod. xvii. 34; Curt. iii. 11. § 8.) He afterwards accompanied Dareius on his flight into Bactria, and fell into the hands of Alexander during the pursuit, but was treated with the utmost distinction by the conqueror, who even assigned him an honourable post about his own person; and subsequently devolved upon him the task of punishing Bessus for the murder of Dareius. (Diod. xvii. 77; Curt. vi. 2. §§ 9, 11, vii. 5. § 40; Plut. Alex. 43.) He was the father of Amastris queen of Herculea. (Mannom, c. 4. ed. Orell.; Arr. Anast. vii. 4. § 7; Strab. xii. p. 544; Steph. Byz. x. v. Amastris.)

3. A son of Abilines, the satrap of Susiana under Dareius Codomannus, commanded the contingent furnished by his father to Dareius at the battle of Arbela, B.C. 331. On the approach of Alexander to Susa, Oxathres was sent to meet him and bear the submission of Abilines: he was favourably received, and soon after appointed to the government of Parnasetae, which he held until the return of Alexander from India, when he was put to death by the king for maladministration of his province. According to Plutarch, Alexander slew him with his own hand. (Arr. Anast. iii. 8, 16, 19, vii. 4; Curt. v. 2. § 8; Diod. xvi. 65; Plut. Alex. 68.)

4. A son of Dionysius tyrant of Herculea and of Amastris, the daughter of No. 2. He succeeded, together with his brother Clearchus, to the sovereignty of Herculea on the death of Dionysius, B.C. 306; but the government was administered by Amastris during the minority of her two sons. Soon after the young men had attained to manhood and taken the direction of affairs into their own hands, they caused their mother to be put to OXYARTES.

OXYARThES. [OXYARTES.]

OXYANUS (O'xyanus), or PORTICANUS, as he is called by Q. Curtius, an Indian prince, whose territories lay to the west of those of Muscianus. On the approach of Alexander he had not come to meet him, or sent ambassadors to make his submission to the conqueror. Alexander accordingly marched against him, and speedily took by storm two of his cities, Oxynus himself being made prisoner. The other towns in his dominions speedily submitted.

It has been supposed that in the latter part of the names Oxynus and Musicianus is to be traced the word Khana or Khan, so that Oxynus might mean the Rajah of Ouche, Musicianus the Rajah of Moosh. To this it is objected that Khan is a Turkish title, and that there is nothing to show that it was in use in that region at the time of Alexander's invasion. (Arrian, vi. 16. § 1; Q. Curt. ix. 8. § 11; Thirlwall, Hist. Gr. vol. vii. p. 48, note.)

[C. P. M.]

OXYDATES (Oxodatyns), a Persian of high rank, who, for some cause or other, had been imprisoned by Darius at Susa, and was found lying there under sentence of death, when the city fell into the hands of Alexander. For this reason he seemed the more likely to be faithful to Alexander, who appointed him satrap of Media. In this office Oxydates was subsequently superseded by Arsaces. (Arrian, iii. 20. § 4; Curt. vi. 2. § 11, viii. 3. § 17.)

O'XYLUS (Oxylon). 1. A son of Ares and Protagenien. (Apollod. i. 7. § 7.)

2. A son of Haemon (according to Apollod. ii. 8. § 3, of Andraemon), and husband of Perea, by whom he became the father of Aetolus and Laïs. He was descended from a family of Ellis, but lived in Aetolia; and when the Dorian invaded Peloponnesus, they, in accordance with an oracle, chose him as one of their leaders. He afterwards became king of Ellis, which he conquered. (Paus. v. 3, in fin. 4. § 1, &c.; Aristot. Polit. vi. 2. § 5; Strab. viii. p. 335.)

3. A son of Orius, who became the father of the Hamadryades, by his sister Hamadryas. (Athen. iii. 375.)

OXYNTAS (Oxynnas), son of Jugurtha, was led captive, together with his father, before the triumphant car of Marcus (B. c. 104); but his life was spared, and he was placed in custody at Venusia. Here he remained till B. c. 90, when he was brought forth by the Samnite general, C. Pappus Mutilus, and adorned with the insignia of royalty, in order to produce a moral effect upon the Numidian auxiliaries in the service of the Roman general L. Caesar. The device was successful, and the Numidians deserted in great numbers; but of the subsequent fortunes of Oxyntas we know nothing. (Eutrop. iv. 27; Oros. v. 15; Appian, B. C. i. 42.)

OXYTHEMIS. [OXYTHEMIS.]

OXYTHEMIS (Oxythymus), a friend of Demetrius Poliorcetes, who was sent by him to the court of Agathocles, king of Sicily, with whom he had just concluded an alliance, ostensibly in order to receive the ratification of the treaty, but with a secret mission to examine the real state of affairs in Sicily. The death of Agathocles followed shortly after, B. c. 289, and it was Oxythemis who placed him on the funeral pile, as we are told, before life was yet extinct. (Diod. xxi. Exc. Horesch. pp. 491, 492.)

[E. H. B.]
PACCIUS, DE'CIMUS, procurator of Cor- sica in a.d. 69, wished to send assistance to Vi- tellius, but was murdered by the inhabitants. (Tac. Hist. ii. 16.)

PACATIANUS, a Roman emperor, known to us only from coins, a specimen of which is annexed. From the number of coins of this emperor found in Austria, Eckhel thinks that the brief reign of Pa- cbianus was probably in Pannonia or Moesia. The full name of Pacbianus was Tr. Cl. MAR. PACA- TIANUS. Mar. is variously interpreted, some making it Murius, some Marcius, and others Mu- riu. Eckhel adopts the last, and assigns the coins to the times of Philippus and Decius (Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 338). There was a Pacbianus, consul a. D. 322, in the reign of Constantine (Pasti).

COIN OF THE EMPEROR PACATIANUS.

PACATUS, CLAUDIUS, although a centu- rion, was restored to his master by Domitian, when he was proved to be his slave. (Dion Cass. lxxvi. 13.)

PACATUS, DREPA'NIUS. [Drepanius.]
PACATUS, MINUCIUS. [Irenaeus, No. 3.]

PACCIA'NUS. 1. Was sent by Sulla into Mauritania to help Ascalis, whom Serviorius was attacking, but he was defeated and slain by Serto- rius. (Plut. Sert. 9.)

2. C., a Roman prisoner taken on the defeat of Crassus by the Parthians. As he bore the greatest resemblance to Crassus among the prisoners, the Parthians put him a female dress, and paraded him in mockery of the Roman general. (Plut. Crass. 32.)

PAC'CIUS. This name is frequently written Pacitus, but in inscriptions we only find Pacius, and the derivative Paci asus also points to Pacius as the correct orthography. It appears that the name was originally not Roman. [See Nos. 1 and 2.]

1. OVIVS PACCIUS, a priest in the Sannite army, b. c. 293 (Liv. iii. 38).

2. PACCUS and VIBIUS, two brothers, the noblest among the Bruttii, came to the consul Q. Fabius in b. c. 209 to obtain pardon from the Ro- mans (Liv. xxvii. 15).

3. M. PACCIUS, a friend of Atticus, b. c. 54 (Cic. ad Att. iv. 16).

4. PACCIUS AFRICANUS, expelled from the senate after the death of Vitellius, a. D. 70 (Tac. Hist. iv. 41).

5. PACCIUS ORBITUS. [Orbitus, No. 3.]

PA'CIOCCHUS (Pâkkos), or PACCIUS ANTIO- CHUS (Pâkkos 'A'tlygos), a physician about the beginning of the Christian era, who was a pupil of Philonides of Catana, and lived probably at Rome. He made a large fortune by the sale of a certain medicine of his own invention, which was much employed, and the composition of which he kept a profound secret. At his death he left his prescription as a legacy to the Emperor Tiberius, who, in order to give it a wide circulation as possible, ordered a copy of it to be placed in all the public libraries. (Scribon. Larg. De Compos. Medicam. c. 23. § 97. p. 209; Marcell. Empir. De Medicam. c. 20. p. 324.) Some of his medical formulae are quoted by Galen (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Lnc. iv. 4, 8, ix. 4, vol. xii. pp. 715, 751, 760, 772, 782, xii. 284; De Compos. Medicam. sec. Gen. vii. 7, vol. xliii. p. 981), Scribonius Largus (l. c., and c. 40, § 156. p. 218), Aetius (ii. 3. § 109, 111, pp. 354, 359), and Marcellus Empiricus (l. c.).

[W. A. G.]

PACSENSIS, AEM'ILIUS, was tribune of the city cohorts (urbaneae cohortes) at the death of Nero, but was deprived of this office by Galba. He sub- sequently joined Otho, who restored to him his tribunate, was chosen one of the generals of Otho's army, and perished fighting in the Capitol against the Vitellian troops, a. d. 69. (Tac. Hist. i. 29, 67, ii. 12, iii. 73.)

PACHES (Pâkês). An Athenian general, the son of A. named Epicius (or, according to Dio- xii. 53, Epicius). In the autumn of b. c. 428 Paches was sent out at the head of 1000 hoplites to reinforce the troops which, on the revolt of Mytilene, had been sent out under Cleippides, and had entrenched themselves in two forts near the city, while the fleet blockaded the harbour. On the arrival of Paches a wall was carried round the city on the land side, with forts at the strongest points. In the summer of b. c. 427 the Spartans sent a fleet under the command of Alcidas for the relief of Mytilene; but Alcidas delayed so much on his voyage that the Myti- lenaens, and even Salanths, whom the Spartans had sent before their fleet, gave up all hopes of its arrival. By the advice of Salantas the com- monalty of the Mytilenaeans were entrusted with the arms of the regular infantry; but they forth- with rose against the aristocratical party, and the latter, fearing a capitulation on the part of the commonalty, surrendered the city to Alcidas, who at last, according to their own desire, gave himself up to the Athenians. At this juncture Alcidas arrived at Embaton; but, instead of attacking the Athenians, sailed southwards along the coast of Ionia. Paches, hearing from many quarters of the approach of the Peloponnesian fleet, set out in pursuit of it; but, not coming up with it, returned at leisure along the coast of Ionia. In his course he touched at Notium. Here his assistance was called in by the democratical party, who were being hard pressed by their political opponents, who were supported by the ruling party among the Colo- phonians, and by a body of mercenaries, com- manded by an Arcadian named Hippas, borrowed from the satrap Pissuthnes. Paches invited Hippas to a parley; but when he came he imme- diately arrested him, and with the garrison, which was overpowered and cut to pieces. Hippas, with what was left of his army, met him at a calm engagement; but, if the parley did not lead to an agreement, he should be reconduted in safety into the town, which was taken by Paches within the walls, and then barbarously put to death by being shot with arrows; Paches urging that he had fulfilled the stipulation. Nataus was given up to the party which had called in the aid of the Athenians. Paches now returned to Lesbos, and proceeded to reduce those parts of the island which still held out. He sent home most of his forces, and with them Selenathi and a large number of Mytileneans who on the surrender of the city had taken refuge at the altar, and were removed thence by Paches to Tenedos. On the arrival of the first decree of the Athenians, ordering the execution of all the adult citizens of Mytilene, and the enslavement of the women and children, Paches was about to put it into execution, when the second decree arrived, sparing the lives of the inhabitants, but ordering the destruction of their walls and the surrender of the fleet. Paches, after complying with these instructions, returned to Athens. On his arrival there he was brought to trial on some charge, and, perceiving his condemnation to be certain, drew his sword and stabbed himself to the heart in the presence of his judges. (Plut. Nic. c. 6, Aristid. c. 26.) On what grounds he was impeached it is very difficult to ascertain. There is a story preserved in an epigram of Agathias (Jacobs, Arch. vol. iv. p. 34), according to which Paches, after the surrender of Mytilene, became enamoured of two women of the city, Hellanis and Lamaxis, and murdered their husbands that he might accomplish his design. The victims of his cruelty, however, escaped to Athens, and made known his criminal proceedings; and their prosecution of him ended in his death. There seems no sufficient reason for rejecting this story. If the offence be thought hardly sufficient to have occasioned the condemnation to death of a general who had just returned after a most successful series of military operations, there are various suppositions which might remove the difficulty. It is possible that Cleon was incensed against him for not putting the first decree into execution more promptly, or there might have been some ground for exciting odium against him on account of his not having set out in chase of Alcidas sooner than he did; for it appears that he did not act upon the first information which he received. Or various other pretenses might be imagined, which would furnish a handle to the demagogues of the day. It seems likely that the singular death of Paches gave occasion for the introduction of that provision in the decree of Cannons, according to which in certain cases the defendant was to plead his cause in fetters. (Thuc. iii. 18, 28, 33, 34—36, 49; Poppp. ad iii. 50; Diod. l. c.; Strab. xii. p. 600; Philological Museum, vol. ii. p. 236.) [C. P. M.]

PACHOMIUS (Pαχωμιος), as Socrates and Palladius write the name, or PACHU'MIUS (Παχομιος), according to the author of the Vita Pachomii, an Egyptian ascetic of the fourth century, one of the founders, if not pre-eminentiy the founder of regular monastic communities. "The respect which the Church at present entertains," says Tillemont (Mémo. vol. vii. p. 167), "for the name of St. Pachomius, is no new feeling, but a just recognition of the obligation which she is under to him, as the holy founder of a great number of monasteries; or rather as the institution, not only of certain convents, but of the conventual life itself, and of the holy communities of men devoted to a religious life." Of this eminent person there is a prolix life, Bios των ἢλων Παχουλα, Vita S. Pa-

clomii, in barbarous Greek, the translation perhaps of a Sahidic original, by a monk of the generation immediately succeeding Pachomius; also there is a second memoir, or extracts of a memoir, either by the writer of the life, or by some other writer of the same period, supplementary to the first work, and to which the title Paralipomena de SS. Pachomio et Theodoro has been prefixed; and there is an account of Pachomius, in a letter from Ammon, an Egyptian bishop, to Theophilus, patriarch of Alexandria: "Επιστολή Αμμώνων πρὸς επισκόπον περὶ πολεμίας καὶ βίου μενοκράτων ιεροσόλυμων καὶ Θεότοπων, Epitola Ammonis Epicopi de Conuersatione ac Vitae Parte Pachomi et Theodori. All these pieces are given by the Bollandists, both in a Latin version (pp. 295—357), and in the original (Appendix, pp. 25*—71*) in the Acta Sanctorum, Maii, vol. iii., with the usual introduction by Papebroche.

Pachomius was born in the Thebaid, of heathen parents, and was educated in heathenism; and, while a lad, going with his parents to offer sacrifice in one of the temples of the gods, was hastily expelled by the order of the priest as an enemy of the gods. The incident was afterwards recorded as a prognostic of his subsequent conversion and saintly eminence. At the age of twenty he was drawn for military service in one of the civil wars which followed the death of Constantius Chlorus, in A. D. 306. The author of the Vita Pachomii says that he was placed for service of the army, to be in the Great, in one of his struggling for the empire. Tillemont thinks that the war referred to was Constantine’s war with Maxentius in A. D. 312, but supposes that Pachomius was drawn to serve in the army of Maximian II., in his nearly contemporary struggle against Licinius, as it is difficult to conceive that Constantine should be allowed to raise troops by conscription in Egypt, then governed by his jealous partner in the empire, Maximin. A similar difficulty applies to all Constantine’s civil contests, until after the final overthrow of Licinius in A. D. 323, and the only civil war of Constantine after that was against Calocerus in Cyprus, in 353; the date of which is altogether too late, as Pachomius (Epist. Am. c. 6) was converted in the time of Alexander, bishop of Alexandria, who died A. D. 326. It is likely, therefore, that the mention of Constantine’s name is an error in the biographer, and that Tillemont is right in thinking that the conscription in which Pachomius was drawn was ordered by Maximin II. We may, therefore, with Tillemont, fix the time of Pachomius’ birth in A. D. 292. Papebroche makes the war to be that of Diocletian (under whom Constantine, then a youth, was serving) against the usurper Achilles, A. D. 296, but this supposition is inadmissible.

The conscripts were embarked in a boat and conveyed down the Nile; and being landed at Thebes, were placed in confinement, apparently to prevent desertion. Here they were visited and relieved by the Christians of the place, and a grateful curiosity led Pachomius to inquire into the character and opinions of the charitable strangers. Struck with what he heard of them, he seized the first opportunity of solitude to offer the simple and touching prayer, "O God, the creator of heaven and earth, if thou wilt indeed look upon my low estate, notwithstanding my ignorance of thee, the only true God, and wilt deliver me from this affliction, I will obey thy will all the days of my PACHOMIUS. life, and will love and serve all men according to thy commandment." He was, however, obliged to accompany his fellow-conscripts, and suffered many hardships during this period of enforced service: but the settlement of the contest having released him from it, he hastened back into the Thebaïd, and was baptized in the church of Chenoboscai, near the city of Dapispolis the Less; and, aspiring at pre-eminent holiness, commenced an ascetic life, under the guidance of Palaemon, an anchor of high repute. After a time, he withdrew with Palaemon to Tabenna, or Tabennik, which appears to have been in an island or on the bank of the Nile, near the common boundary of the Theban and Tentyrite nomi. Some time after this removal his companion Palaemon died; but whether he died at Tabenna, or whether he had returned to his previous abode, is not clear. Pachomius found, however, another companion in his own elder brother Joannes, or John, who became his disciple. But his sphere of influence was now to be enlarged. Directed by what he regarded as a Divine intimation, he began to incite men to embrace a monastic life; and obtaining first three disciples, and then many more, formed them into a community, and prescribed rules for their guidance. As the community grew in number, he appointed the needful officers for their regulation and instruction. He built a church as a place of worship and instruction for the poor shepherd's of the neighbourhood, to whom, as there was no other reader, he read the Scriptures. The bishop of Tentyra would have raised him to the rank of presbyter, and requested Athanasius, patriarch of Alexandria, when visiting the Thebaïd, to ordain him: but Pachomius, being aware of the design, hid himself until the patriarch had departed. His refusal of the office of presbyter did not diminish his reputation or influence; new disciples flocked to him, of whom Theodorus or Theodore was the most illustrious, new monasteries sprung up in his neighbourhood, including one for women, founded by his sister. Of these several communities he was visitor and regulator general, appointing his disciple Theodore superior of his original monastery of Tabenna, and himself removing to the monastery of Proii, which was made the head of the monasteries of the district. He died of a pestilential disorder, which had broken out among the monks, apparently in A.D. 346, a short time before the death or expulsion of the Arian patriarch, Gregory [Gregorius, No. 3], and the restoration of Athanasius [Athanasius], at the age, if his birth is rightly fixed in A.D. 292, of fifty-six. Some place his death in A.D. 360.

In speaking of Pachomius as the founder of monastic institutions, it must not be supposed that he was the founder of the monastic life. Antonius, Ammonas, Paulus and others [Antonius; Ammonas; Paulus] had devoted themselves to religious solitude before him; and even the practice of persons living an ascetic life in small communities existed before him; but in these associations there was no recognized order or government. What Pachomius did was to form communities on a regular plan, directed by a fixed rule of life, and subject to inspection and control. Such monastic communities as existed before him had no regularity, no permanence: those which he arranged were regularly constituted bodies, the continuity of whose existence was not interrupted by the death of individuals. Miracles, especially divine visions, angelic conver-

PACHOMIUS, distinguished as the Younger. Among the histories published by Herbert Roswey (Vitaæ Patrum, fol. Antwerp, 1615, p. 239) is one of a certain Pothumius of Memphis, father (i.e. abbot) of five thousand monks. The MSS. have Pachomius instead of Posthumius. The truth of the whole history is, however, strongly suspected by the editors of the Acta Sanctorum, who have, nevertheless, printed it in the introduction to the account of Pachomius of Tabenna, the subject of the preceding article.

PACHOMIUS. Valentine Ernest Loecher, in the Appendix to his Stromeæ, s. Dissertationes Sacri et Literarii Argumenti, 4to. Wittenberg, 1723, published in the original Greek with a Latin version a discourse entitled Pachomii Monachi Sermonem contra Mores sui Sacelli et Provisiandæ Dëivæ Contentum. Nothing is known of the author: but from internal evidence afforded by the work itself, it is probable that he was either an Egyptian or Syrian, and wrote not long after the subjugation of his native country by the Saracens in the seventh century. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ix. p. 313, note n, sub fin.)

PACHYMERES, GEORGIUS (Γεώργιος ὁ Παχύμερος), one of the most important of the later Byzantine writers, was born in, or about A.D. 1242 at Nicæa, whither his father, an inhabitant of Constantinople, had fled after the capture of Constantinople by the Latins, in 1204. Thence Pachymeres sometimes calls himself a Constantinopolitan. After receiving a careful and learned education, he left Nicæa in 1261, and took up his abode in Constantinople, which had then just been retaken by Michael Palæologus. Here Pachymeres became a priest. It appears that besides divinity he also, according to the spirit of the time, studied the law, for in after years he was promoted to the important posts of πρωτεργατος, or advocate general of the church (of Constantinople), and Διάκονος, or chief justice to the imperial court, perhaps in ecclesiastical matters, which, however, were of high political importance in the reigns of Michael Palæologus and his successor, Andronicus the elder. As early as 1267 he accompanied, perhaps as secretary, three imperial commissioners to the exiled patriarch Arsenius, in order to investigate his alleged participation in an alleged conspiracy against the life of Michael Palæologus. They succeeded in reconciling these two chiefs of the state and the church. The emperor Michael having made preparatory steps towards effecting a union of the Greek and Latin churches, Pachymeres sided with the patriarch Joseph, who was against the union; and when the emperor wrote in defence of the union Pachymeres, together with Jasites Job, drew up an answer in favour of the former state of separation. It was Pachymeres who was the author of the deed of abdication of the patriarch Johannes Becens. When the emperor Andronicus repealed the union, Pachymeres persuaded the patriarch Georgius Cyprus, who was for it, to abdicate. It seems that Pachymeres also devoted some of his time towards teaching, because one of his disciples was Manuel Phile, who wrote an iambic poem on his death, which is given by Leo Allatius quoted below.

Pachymeres died probably shortly after 1310; but some believe that his death took place as late as 1340. There is a wood-cut portrait of Pachymeres prefixed to Wolf's edition of Nicephorus Gregorius, Basel, 1562, which the editor had engraved after a drawing of a MS. of his Historia Byzantina, "which was then at Augsburg." Pachymeres' works fall into four classes, the principal of which are:

1. Historia Byzantina, being a history of the emperors Michael Palæologus and Andronicus Palæologus, the Elder, in thirteen books, six of which are devoted to the life of the former, and seven to that of the latter. This is a most valuable source for the history of the time, written with great dignity and calmness, and with as much impartiality as was possible in those stormy times, when both political and religious questions of vital importance agitated the minds of the Greeks. The style of Pachymeres is remarkably good and pure for his age. It would seem as if Wolf intended to publish this work from the above-mentioned Augsburg codex, but was prevented from doing so by causes not known to us. That Codex, however, was not complete, but the remaining portions were discovered by Petavius in Paris, who published them in Greek, together with the History of St. Gregorius, some fragments of Nicephorus Gregorius and others, Paris, 1616, 8vo. The complete editio princeps, however, is that of Petrus Passinus, Greek and Latin, Rome, 1666—69, 2 vols. fol. To each of the two lives the editor wrote a very valuable commentary, the one like the other divided into three books, and in both cases the first contains a Glosarium, the second Notes, and the third the Chronology of the period. He added to it "Liber de Sapientia Indorum," being a Latin translation of an Arabic work on that subject which was known to, and is referred to, by Pachymeres. Immanuel Bekker published a reprint of this edition, revised in several places, but without the "Liber de Sapientia," Bonn, 1853, 2 vols. 8vo., which belongs to the Böhm Collection of the Byzantines.

2. Kata βιογραφίαν autographiæ Pachymeris which is lost, and the existence of which is only known by the author giving two fragments of it in his History. Were this work extant, we should know more of the life of so important a man as Pachymeres.

5. Περὶ ἀτόμων γραμματών, a Paraphrase of Aristotle's work on the same subject (on indivisible lines). It was formerly attributed to Aristotle himself, and appeared as such in the earlier editions of that philosopher. The first edition, with the name of Pachymeres in the title, is that by Casaubon, who affixed to his PACIUS.

PACIUS, described by Cicero as "home gens et levis," was the accuser of Schemius before Verres (Cic. Verr. ii. 38, 40). The Pauciliana domus, which Q. Cicero wished to purchase, must have belonged to a different Pacilius. (Cic. ad Att. i. 14, § 7.)

PACILUS, a family name of the patrician Furius gens.

1. C. Furius Pacilus Fuscus, consul b.c. 441 with M. Papirius Crassus (Liv. iv. 12). He was censor b.c. 435 with M. Geganius Macerinus; the events of his censorship are given under MACRINIUS, No. 3. (Liv. iv. 22, 24, ix. 33, 31.) He was one of the consular tribunes in b.c. 426, and was unsuccessful in a battle against the Valentines (Liv. iv. 31).

2. C. Furius Pacilus, son of the preceding, was consul b.c. 412 with Q. Fabius Vibulanos Ambustus (Liv. iv. 52).

3. C. Furius C. F. C. N. Pacilus (Fasti Capit.), was consul b.c. 251 with L. Cæcilius Metellus in the first Punic war. The history of their consulship is given under METELLUS, No. 1.

PACONIANUS, SEXTIUS, one of the bold and unscrupulous agents of Sejanus, was involved in the fall of his master, to the great joy of the senators, whose secrets he had frequently betrayed. He was sentenced to death in A. D. 32, unless he gave information; but in consequence of his doing so, the sentence was not carried into execution. He remained in prison till A. D. 35, in which year he was strangled on account of his having written some libellous verses against Tiberius while in confinement. (Tac. Ann. vi. 3, 4, 39.)

PACONIUS. 1. M. Paconius, a Roman eques, violently deprived of his property by the tribune Clodius. (Cic. pro Mil. 27.)

2. Paconius, described by Cicero as some Myrian or Phrygian, who complained of Q. Cicero (Cic. ad Qu. Fr. i. 1. § 6). Perhaps we ought to read Paonius.

3. M. Paconius, a legatus of Silanus, proconsul of Asia, was one of his accusers in A. D. 22. Paconius was afterwards put to death by Tiberius on a charge of treason. He was the father of Paconius Agrippinus. (Tac. Ann. iii. 67; Suet. Tib. 61.)

4. Paconius Agrippinus. [Agrippanus, p. 82, a.]

PACORUS (Πάκωρος), a common Parthian name.

1. The son of Orodos I. (Arsaces XIV.), king of Parthia. His history is given under ARSACES XIV., p. 356.

2. A contemporary of Pacorus, the son of Orodos [No. 1], was one of the royal cup-bearers. After Pacorus, the son of Orodos, had conquered Saka, Antony's quaster (n. c. 40), and had overrun a great part of Syria, Antigonus, the son of Aristobulus, applied to him for help to restore him to the Jewish throne. This request was immediately complied with; and Pacorus, the cup-bearer, was sent with a large force against Jerusalem. The city surrendered: Hyrcanus and Phasael were taken prisoners, and Herod fled to Rome. (Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 13, B. Jud. i. 13; comp. Hyrcanus. p. 544, b.) Dion Cassius, who makes no mention of Pacorus, the cup-bearer, attributes this expedition to the son of Orodos (xlviii. 26); and Tacitus in like... manner speaks of Jerusalem having been taken by the king Pacorus (Hist. v. 9); but the authority of Josephus on all matters relating to Jewish history is superior to that of the Antiquarians.

3. The son of Venones II., king of Parthia, obtained the kingdom of Media on the death of his father, while his brother Vologeses I. succeeded to the Parthian throne. [Arsaces XXIII. p. 558, b.]

4. King of Parthia, succeeded his father Vologeses I. [Arsaces XXIV.]

5. Aurelius Pacorus, a king of the greater Armenias, was a contemporary of the Antinikes, and is mentioned in a Greek inscription published by Gruter (p. 1091, No. 10). It appears by this inscription that Pacorus had purchased a burial-place for himself and his brother Aurelius Meridates, and that both brothers resided at Rome, where one of them died. Niebuhr supposes that a passage from Fronto has reference to this Pacorus, in which a Pacorus is said to have been deprived of his kingdom by L. Verus (Fronto, p. 70, ed. Niebuhr), and he further concludes from the name Aurelius that he was a client of the imperial family and a Roman citizen. He may be the same as the Pacorus who was placed as king over the Lazis, a people on the Caspian sea, by Antoninus Pius. (C. A. Anton. Pius, 9. 31.)

PACTIUS. [Pactius.]

PACTHUMIUS CLEMENS. [Clemens.]

PACTHUMIUS MAGNUS, a man of consular rank, slain by Commodus (Lamprid. Commod. 7), occurs as one of the consules suffecti in A.D. 183. He had a daughter Pacthumea Magna, who is mentioned in the Digest (28, tit. 5, s. 92), where we also read of a Pacthumeus Androsthenes, who was no doubt a freedman of Magnus.

PACTHAS (Pacthas), a Lydian, who on the conquest of Sardis (A.D. 546), was charged by Cyrus with the collection of the revenues of the province. When Cyrus left Sardis on his return to Ecbatana, Pacthas induced the Lydians to revolt against Cyrus and the Persian governor Tabalus; and, going down to the coast, employed the revenues which he had collected in hiring mercenaries and inducing those who lived on the coast to join his army. He then marched against Sardis, and besieged Tabalus in the citadel. Cyrus sent an army under the command of Mazares against the revolters; and Pacthas, hearing of its approach, fled to Cyme. Mazares sent a messenger to Cyme to demand that he should be surrendered. The Cumeans referred the matter to the oracle of Apollo at Branchidae. The oracle directed that he should be surrendered; and this direction was repeated when, at the suggestion of Aristodorus [Aristodoros] the oracle was consulted a second time. But the Cumeans, not liking actually to surrender Pacthas, and yet being afraid to keep him, sent him to Mytilene. Hearing, however, that the Mytileneans were bargaining about his surrender, the Cumeans sent a vessel to Mytilene, and conveyed him to Chios. The Chians surrendered him, and, according to stipulation, received possession of Atarneus as a recompense. The Persians, to whom Pacthas was surrendered, kept him in custody, intending to deliver him up to Cyrus. Of his subsequent fate we hear nothing. (Herod. I. 153—160; Paus. iv. 33. § 10.) (C. P. M.)

PACULLA, A'NNIA or Mi'NIA, a Campanian woman, one of the chief agents in introducing the worship of Bacchus into Rome, B. C. 186. (Liv. xxxix. 15.)

PACUVIUS, a Campanian family, is first mentioned in the time of the second Punic war, when we read of Pacuvius Calvius, who persuaded the inhabitants of Capua to revolt to Hannibal [Calvius, No. 4]. Besides the poet Pacuvius, there were a few Romans of this name in the latest times of the republic and under the empire.

M. PACUVIUS, one of the most celebrated of the early Roman tragedians, was born about B. C. 220, since he was fifty years older than the poet Accius or Attius (Cic. Brut. 64), who was born in B. C. 170 [Accius]. This agrees with the statement of Jerome (in Euseb. Chron. Olymp. 156. 3) that Pacuvius flourished about B. C. 154, since we know from various sources that Pacuvius attained a great age, and accordingly the time understood by the indefinite term flourished may properly be placed in B. C. 154, though Pacuvius was then about sixty-five years old. Jerome further relates that Pacuvius was almost ninety years of age at the time of his death, which would therefore fall about B. C. 130. Pacuvius was a native of Brundisium, and accordingly a countryman of Ennius, with whom he was connected by ties of blood, and whom he is also said to have buried. According to the accounts of most ancient writers he was the son of the sister of Ennius, and this is more probable than the statement of Jerome, that he was the grandson of Ennius by his daughter, since Ennius was only nineteen years older than Pacuvius. Pacuvius appears to have been brought up at Brundisium, but he afterwards repaired to Rome, though in what year is uncertain. Here he devoted himself to painting and poetry, and obtained so much distinction in the former art, that a painting of his in the temple of Hercules, in the forum boarium, was regarded as only inferior to the celebrated painting of Fabius Pictor (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 4. s. 7). After living many years at Rome, for he was still there in his eightieth year (Cic. Brut. l. c.), he at last returned to Brundisium, on account of the failure of his health, and died in his native town, in the nineteenth year of his age, as has been already stated. We have no further particulars of his life, save that his talents gained him the friendship of Laelius, and that he lived on the most intimate terms with his younger rival Accius, of whom he seems to have felt none of that jealousy which poets usually entertain towards one another. After his retirement to Brundisium Pacuvius invited his friend to his house, and there they spent some time together, discoursing upon their literary pursuits. These notices, brief though they are, seem to show that Pacuvius was a man of an amiable character; and this supposition is supported by the modest way in which he speaks of himself, in an epigram which he composed for his tombstone, and which, even if it be not genuine, as some modern writers have maintained, indicates at least the opinion which was entertained of him in antiquity. The epigram runs as follows (Gell. i. 24):—

"Adulescens, tametsi properas, te hoc saxum rogar, Uti sese ascipias, deinque, quid scriptum est, legas.
Hic sunt poëtas Pacuvii Marcii sita.
Ossa. Hoc volebam, nescius ne esses. Vale."

Pacuvius was universally allowed by the best writers in antiquity to have been one of the greatest of the Latin tragic poets. Pacuvius. Horace regarded him and Aecius (Ep. ii. i. 56) as the two most important of the early tragedians; and he is especially praised for the lofiness of his thoughts, the vigour of his language, and the extent of his knowledge. Hence we find the epithet doctus frequently applied to him, and the great critic Varro (ap. Gell. viv. 14) praises him for the ubertas of his style. He was at the same time an equal favourite with the people, with whom his verses continued to be esteemed in the time of Julius Caesar (comp. Cic. de. Anic. 7; Suet. Caes. 84). The tragedies of Pacuvius continued, like those of his predecessors on the Latin stage, to be taken from Sophocles, Euripides, and the great Greek writers; but he did not confine himself to a mere translation of the latter, as most of the previous Latin writers had done, but worked up his materials with more freedom and independent judgment, of which we have an example in his Dulorestes, which was an adaptation to the Latin stage of the Iphigenia in Tauris of Euripides. Some of the plays of Pacuvius were not based upon the Greek tragedies, but belonged to the class called Praetextatae, in which the subjects were taken from Roman story. One of these was entitled Palus, and has as its hero the celebrated L. Aemilius Paullus who conquered Perseus, king of Macedon (f. xix. 14). The following titles of his tragedies have come down to us:—Anchises; Antiope; Armorum Judicium; Alatula; Chryses; Dulorestes; Hermione; Iliona; Medus or Medea; Nuptia; Periboea; Tantalus (dubious); Teucer; Thyestes. Of these the Antiope and the Dulorestes were by far the most celebrated.

Although the reputation of Pacuvius rested almost exclusively on his tragedies, yet he seems to have written other kinds of poetry. He is expressly mentioned as having composed Saturae, according to the old Roman meaning of the word (Dio Dece. i. p. 162, ed. Putschius), and there seems no reason for doubting, as some modern writers have done, that he also wrote comedies. The Pseudo is expressly mentioned as a comedy of Pacuvius (Fulgentius, p. 562), and the Tarentillata may also have been a comedy. The fragments of Pacuvius are published in the collections of Stephanus, Fragmenta Vet. Polt., Paris, 1564, of Servrius, Trajectorum Vet. Frgm. Lugd. Batav. 1620, and of Boeth, Poet. Lat. Sonie. Frgm. vol. i. Lips. 1834. (The principal ancient authorities respecting Pacuvius are: Hieronym. in Euseb. Chron. Olymp. 156. 3; Plin. H. N. xxxv. 4. a 7; Vell. Pat. i. 9; Quintil. x. 1; Gell. viv. xii. 2, xvii. 21; Cic. de Optim. Gen. Orat. i. 6, Brut. 64, 74, de Anim. 7, Tusc. ii. 21, de Orat. i. 56, ad Herenn. iv. 4; Hor. Ep. i. 1. 55; Pers. i. 77. The chief modern writers are: Delrio, Syntagma. Trag. Lat. Antv. 1594, and Paris, 1620; Sotirgian. De Vita et Scriptior Libri Andromelic, M. Pacuvii, &c. Altem. 1672; Aminal di Leo, Memorie di M. Pacuvio Antichissimo Poeta Tragico, Napoli, 1763; Lange, Vindiciae Trag. Rom. Lips. 1822; Nake, Comment. de Pacuvi Dulorestae, Ind. Lect. Bonn. 1822; Stieglitz, de Pacuvi Dulorestae, Lips. 1826: Vater, in Ersch and Gruber's Encyclopaede, art. Pacuvius.)

PAEAN. 1 and 2. M. and Q. Pacuvius, with the cognomen CLAUDIUS, who subscribed the accusation of Valerius against M. Scaurus, b. c. 54. (Ascon. in Scarr. p. 19, ed. Orelli.)

3. Sex. Pacuvius, tribune of the plebs, b. c. 27, in which year Octavian received the title of Augustus, outdid all his contemporaries in his flattery of Augustus, and devoted himself as a vassal to the emperor in the Spanish fashion. (Dion Cass. liii. 20). Dion Cassius says, that according to some authorities his name was Apudius; but it would appear that Pacuvius is the right name, since Macrobius tells us (Sat. i. 12) that it was Sex. Pacuvius, tribune of the plebs, who proposed the plebiscitum by which the name of the month of Sextilius was changed into that of Augustus in honour of the emperor. This Sex. Pacuvius appears to be the same as the Pacuvius Taurus, upon whom Augustus perpetrated a joke, when he was one day begging a congarium from the emperor. (Macro. Sat. ii. 4.) The Sex. Pacuvius Taurus, plebeian aedile, mentioned by Pliny (H. N. xxxiv. 5. s. 11), was a different person from the preceding one, and lived at a more ancient time.

4. Pacuvius Labeo, to whom was addressed a letter of Capito, cited by A. Gellius (v. 21).

5. Pacuvius, a legate of Sentius in Syria, A. D. 19 (Tac. Ann. ii. 79), is probably the same Pacuvius who is mentioned by Seneca (Ep. ii. 12).

PACUVIUS, C. ATELIUS, was one of the pupils of Servius Sulpicius, who are enumerated by Pomponius. (Dig. i. tit. 2. s. 2 § 44.) This appears to be the Ateius, who is cited by Labeo (Dig. ii. tit. 3. s. 79) as authority for an opinion of Servius on the words "cum commodissimum esset," which were part of the terms of a gift of dos. Another opinion of Servius is cited from him also by Labeo (34. tit. 2. s. 39. § 2). This Pacuvius appears also to be the jurist quoted by Ulpian (13. tit. 6. s. 1).

PABANIUS (Papouv), the author of a translation of the history of Eutropius into Greek. It is quite uncertain who this Pacanius was, but it has been conjectured that he lived not long after Eutropius himself. This translation, of which Zonaras seems to have often availed himself, is not very accurate, but still not inelegant. It was printed for the first time by F. Syllburg in the third volume of his Romaniae Historiae Scriptores, Franc. 1590, and is also contained in the editions of Eutropius by Heare, Havercamp, and Verheyck. It has been printed in a separate form by Kaltwasser under the title, "Paeani Metaphrasis in Eutropii Historiam Romanam, in usum scholarum," Goth. 1780.

PAEAN (Papouv, Papow or Pavov), that is, "the healing," is according to Homer the designation of the physician of the Olympian gods, who heals, for example, the wounded Ares and Hades. (H. v. 401, 898.) After the time of Homer and Hesiód, the word Papov becomes a surname of Asclepius, who god the power of healing. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1494; Virg. Aen. vii. 769.) The name Papov or Pavov is also in the more general sense of deliverer from any evil or calamity. (Pind. Pyth. iv. 480.) and was thus applied to Apollo and Thanatos, or Death, who are conceived as delivering men from the pains and sorrows of life. (Soph. Oed. Tyr. 154; Paus. i. 34. § 3; Eurip. Hippol. 1373.) With regard to Apollo and Thanatos however, the name may at the same time contain an allusion to maevos, to strike, since both are also regarded as destroyers. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 137.) From Apollo himself the name
PAERISADES.

Paean was transferred to the song dedicated to him, that is, to hymns chanted to Apollo for the purpose of averting an evil, and to warlike songs, which were sung before or during a battle. [L. S.]

PAEDARITUS, a Numa Pompilius.

PAEON (Paiow), of Amathus, wrote an account of Theseus and Ariadne, referred to by Pitar收购 (Thes. 25).

1. A son of Antiochus, and grandson of Nestor. (Paus. ii. 18. § 7.)

2. A son of Endymion, and brother of Epeius, Aetolus, and Eurydice; from whom the district of Paeonia, on the Axios in Macedonia, was believed to have derived its name. (Paus. v. 1. § 2, &c.) [L. S.]

PAEON (Paiow). 1. A son of Poseidon by Helle, who fell into the Hellespont. In some legends he was called Edonus. (Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 20.)

PAEONIA (Paiowia), i.e. the healing goddess, was a surname of Athena, under which she had a statue at Athens, and an altar in the temple of Amphius at Oropus. (Paus. i. 2. § 4, 34. § 2.)

PAEONIUS, instructed the two young Ciceros, Marcus and Quintus, in rhetoric, n. c. 54 (Cic. ad Qu. Fr. iii. 3. § 4.).

PAEONIUS (Paiowios). 1. Of Ephesus, an architect, whose time is uncertain; most probably he lived between n. c. 420 and 330. In conjunction with Demetrus, he finally completed the great temple of Artemis, at Ephesus, which Chersiphron had begun [Chersiphron]; and, with Daphnis the Milesian, he began to build at Miletus a temple of Apollo, of the Ionic order. (Vitr. vii. Praef. § 16.) The latter temple, which was the famous Didymaenum, or temple of Apollo Didymus, the ruins of which are still to be seen near Miletus. The former temple, in which the Brahchiae had an oracle of Apollo (from which the place itself obtained the name of Brahchiae), was burnt at the capture of Miletus by the army of Dareus, n. c. 498, (Herod. vi. 19; see Böhr’s Note.) The new temple, which was on a scale only inferior to that of Artemis, was never finished. It was diternal, decastyli, hypaethral: among its extensive ruins two columns are still standing. (Strab. xiv. p. 634 ; Paus. vii. 5. § 4; Chandler, p. 151; Ionian Antiq. vol. i. c. 3. p 27; Hirt, Gesch. d. Baukunst, vol. ii. p. 62, and pl. ix. x.)

2. Of Mende, in Thrace, a statuary and sculptor, of whom we have but little information, but whose celebrity may be judged from the fact, that he executed the statues in the pediment of the front portico of the temple of Zeus at Olympia, those in the pediment of the portico of the opisthodomus being entrusted to Alcamenes (Paus. vi. 10). He also made the bronze statue of Nike, which the Messenians of Naupactus dedicated at Olympia. (Paus. x. 26. § 1.) He must have flourished about the 86th Olympiad, n. c. 435. (See further, Sillig, Catal. Art. s. v.; Müller, Archäol. de Kunst, § 112. n. 1. § 119, n. 2.) [P. S.]

PAERI’SADAS or PARI’SADAS (Пαιρίαδας or Παρηίαδας). The latter form is the more common; but the former, which is used by Strabo, is confirmed by the evidence of coins.

1. A king of Bosporus, son of Leucon, succeeded his brother Spartacus in n. c. 349, and reigned thirty-eight years. (Diod. xvi. 52.) No events of his reign have been transmitted to us, except that we find him at one period (apparently about n. c. 353) engaged in a war with the neighbouring Scythians (Dem. c. Phorm. p. 909), and he appears to have continued the same friendly relations with the Athenians which were begun by his father Leucon. (Id. Íp. p 917.) But we are told, in general terms, that he was a mild and equitable ruler, and was so much beloved by his subjects as to obtain divine honours after his death. (Strab. vii. p. 510.) He left three sons, Satyris, Eumelus and Prytanis. (Diod. xx. 22.)

He is probably the same person as the Biri-sades mentioned by Deimarchus (c. Dem. p. 95), to whom Demosthenes had proposed that a statue should be erected at Athens. (See Wesseling ad Diod. xiv. 93; Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. p. 284.)

2. Son of Satyris, and grandson of the preceding. He was the only one of the children of Satyris who escaped from the designs of his uncle Eumelus, and took refuge at the court of Agarbus king of Scythia, n. c. 308. (Diod. xx. 24.)

3. A second king of Bosporus, and the last monarch of the first dynasty that ruled in that country. He was probably a descendant of No. 1, but the history of the kingdom of Bosporus, during the period previous to his reign, is wholly lost. We only know that the pressure of the Scythian tribes from without, and their constantly increasing demands of tribute, which he was unable to resist, at length induced Paerisades voluntarily to cede his sovereignty to Mithridates the Great. (Strab. vii. pp. 309, 310.) The date of this event is wholly unknown, but it cannot be placed earlier than n. c. 112, nor later than n. c. 88. It is uncertain whether an anecdote related by Polyainus (vii. 37) refers to these Paerisades or to No. 1. [E. H. B.]

PAETUS. A lengthened form of Paetus [PAETUS], like Albinus of Albus, was a family name of the Fulvia gens. It superseded the family name of Currus, of which it was originally an agnomen, and was superseded in its turn by the name of Nobilior.

1. M. Fulvius Currus Paetinus, consul n. c. 305. [Fulvius, No. 2.]

2. M. Fulvius Paetinus, consul n. c. 299 with T. Manlius Torquatus. (Liv. x. 9.)

3. Sert. Fulvius Paetinus Nobilior, consul n. c. 255. [Nobilior, No. 1.]

PAETUS, a cognomen in many Roman gentes, was indicative, like many other Roman cognomens, of a bodily defect or peculiarity; as for instance, Capito, Fronto, Naso, Varus, &c. It signified a person who had a slight cast in the eye, and is accordingly classed by Riley with the word Strabo (H. N. xi. 37. s. 53), but that it did not indicate such a complete distortion of vision as the latter word is clear from Horace, who describes a father calling a son that was Strabo by the name of Paetus, when he wished to extenuate the defect (Sat. i. 3. 45). Indeed, the slight cast implied in the word Paetus was considered attractive rather than otherwise, and we accordingly find it given as an epithet to Venus. (Ov. Ar. Am. ii. 659; Auctor, Priapea, 36.)

PAETUS, AE’LIUS. The Paeti were the most ancient family of the Aelia gens, and some of them were celebrated for their knowledge of the Roman law. See below. a 2 PAETUS.

1. P. AELIUS PAETUS, consul b.c. 337, with C. Sulpicius Longus, and magistrate equum 321, to the dictator Q. Fabius Ambustus. He was one of the first plebeian augurs, a. c. 300. (Liv. viii. 15, ix. 7, x. 9.)

2. P. AELIUS PAETUS, plebeian aedile b.c. 296. (Liv. xxii. 28.)

3. C. AELIUS PAETUS, consul b.c. 290, with M. Valerius Maximus Pettius (Fasti).

4. Q. AELIUS PAETUS, a pontiff who fell in the battle of Cannae, b.c. 216. He had been a candidate for the consulship for this year. (Liv. xxiii. 21, comp. xxii. 35.)

5. P. AELIUS PAETUS, consul b.c. 201, a jurist. See below.

6. Sex. AELIUS PAETUS CATUS, consul b.c. 193, a jurist. See below.

7. Q. AELIUS P. P. Q. N. PAETUS (Fasti Capit.), son apparently of No. 5, and grandson of No. 4. He was elected augur b.c. 174, in place of his father P. Aelius Paetus (Liv. xii. 21), and was consul b.c. 167, with M. Junius Pennus. He obtained Gallia as his province, and his colleague Pius, but the two consuls performed nothing of importance, and returned to Rome after laying waste the territory of the Ligurians. (Liv. xiv. 16, 44; C. Brut. 28.) This is the Aelius of whom it is related by Valerius Maximus (iv. 3, § 7) and Pliny (H. N. xxiii. 11, s. 50), that the Aetolians called him in his consulship magnificent presents of silver plate, since they had in a former embassy found him eating out of earthenware, and that he refused their gift. Valerius calls him Q. Aelius Tubero Catus, and Pliny Catus Aelius; they both seem to have confounded him with other persons of the same name, and Pliny commits the further error of calling him the son-in-law of L. Aemilius Paullus, the conqueror of Macedonia. [TUBERO.]

8. AELIUS PAETUS TUBERO. [TUBERO.] The annexed coin belongs to P. Aelius Paetus, but it is uncertain to which person of the name. It bears on the obverse the head of Pallius, and on the reverse the Dioscuri.

COIN OF P. AELIUS PAETUS.

PAETUS, AELIUS, jurists. 1. P. AELIUS PAETUS, was probably the son of Q. Aelius Paetus, a pontifex, who fell in the battle of Cannae. (Liv. xxiii. 21.) Publius was plebeian aedile b.c. 204, praetor b.c. 203 (Liv. xxix. 38), magistrate equum b.c. 202, and consul with C. Cornelius Lentulus b.c. 201. Paetus held the urbana jurisdiction during his year of office as praetor, in which capacity he published an edict for a supplication at Rome to commemorate the defeat of Syphax. (Liv. xxx. 17.) On the departure of Hannibal from Italy in the same year, Paetus made the motion for a five days' supplication. The year of the election of Paetus to the consulship was memorable for the defeat of Hannibal by P. Cornelius Scipio at the battle of Zama. (Liv. xxx. 40.) Paetus during his consulship had Italy for his province; he had a conflict with the Boii, and made a treaty with the Ingauni Ligures. He was also in the same year appointed a decemvir for the distribution of lands among the veteran soldiers of Scipio, who had fought in Africa. (Liv. xxxi. 4.) He was afterwards appointed a commissioner (tribunum) with his brother Sextus and Cn. Cornelius Lentulus to settle the affairs of Narbona, the people of which place complained that there was not the proper number of colonists (coloni), and that certain persons, who were not coloni, were passing themselves off as such. (Liv. xxxii. 2.) In b.c. 199, he was censor with P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus. He afterwards became an augur, and died b.c. 174, during a pestilence at Rome. (Liv. xii. 26.) Paetus is mentioned by Pomponius (Dig. 1. tit. 1. s. 2. § 37) as one of those who professed the law (maximam scientiam in profetendo habuerunt), in the Roman sense of that period.

2. Sex. AELIUS PAETUS, the brother of Publius, was curule aedile b.c. 200, consul b.c. 193, with T. Quinctius Flamininus (Liv. xxxii. 7), and censor b.c. 195 with Cn. Cornelius Cethegus. (Liv. xxxiv. 44, xxxv. 9.) During their censorship, the censors gave orders to the eurile aediles to appoint distinct seats at the Ludi Romani for the senators, who up to that time had sat promiscuously with others. The marks of these seats and the Villa Publica were also repaired and enlarged by the censors. Sextus had a reputation as a jurist and a prudent man, whence he got the cognomen Catus.

Egregie cordatus homo Catus Aelius Sextus (Cic. de Orat. i. 45), which is a line of Ennius. Sextus was a jurist of eminence, and also a ready speaker. (Cic. Brut. c. 20.) He is enumerated among the old jurists who collected or arranged the matter of law (juris antiqui conditor; Cod. 7. tit. 7. s. 1), which he did in a work entitled Tripartita or Jus Aelianum. This was a work on the Twelve Tables, which contained the original text, an interpretation, and the Legis actio subjoined. It still existed in the time of Pomponius (Dig. 1. tit. 2. s. 2. § 38); and was probably the first commentary written on the Twelve Tables. Cicero (de Or. i. 50) speaks of his Commentarius, which may or may not be a different work from the Tripartita. Gallus (iv. 1) quotes Servius of Piacet, as citing an opinion of Catus Aelius (or Sextus Aelius) on the meaning of the word Penus. The same passage is quoted by Ulpian, De Pen. legata (33. tit. 9. s. 3. § 9), where the common reading is Sextus Cæcilius, which, as Grotius contends, ought to be Sextus Aelius. He is also cited by Celsus (Dig. 19. tit. i. 33), as the text stands. The Aelius quoted by Cicero (Top. c. 2) as authority for the meaning of “assi-dus,” is probably Sextus Aelius.

Zimmern takes the Aelius mentioned in Cicero's Brutus (c. 46) to be the jurist, but this is obviously a mistake. (Brutus, ed. Meyer, c. 20, 46.) Meyer also denies that the whole work of Sextus on the Twelve Tables was called Jus Aelianum; he limits the name to that part which contained the Actions. Pomponius speaks of three other "libri" as attributed to Sextus, but some denied that they were his. Cicero (de Or. iii. 35) refers to Sextus as author of those who were consulted after the old fashion. (Grotius, Vitea Jurisconsultorum; Zimmern, Geschichte des Rom. Privatrechts, i. p. 279.) (G.L.) Vologeses cut to pieces, and then proceeded to lay siege to the town of Rhandia or Arasosanta on the river Arasania, in which Paetus had taken refuge. The place was well supplied with provisions, and Corbulo was at no great distance; but such was the pusillanimity of Paetus that he was afraid to wait for the assistance of Corbulo, and purchased peace from the Parthians on the most disgraceful terms. In consequence of this conduct Paetus was deprived of his command and expected severe punishment on his return to Rome, but Nero dismissed him uninjured with a few insulting words (Tac. Ann. xv. 6, 8—15, 17, 25; Dion Cass. lxxi. 21, 22; Suet. Ner. 39.) After the accession of Vespasian, Caesennius Paetus was appointed governor of Syria, and deprived Antonius IV., king of Commagene, of his kingdom. (Joseph. B. J. vii. 7.) [See Vol. I. p. 194, b.]

The name of Caesennius Paetus, proconsul, occurs on the coins of Ephesus and Smyrna, struck in the reign of Domitian. This Caesennius Paetus may have been a son of the preceding Paetus; for Tacitus makes mention of one of his sons who was with his father in Armenia (Ann. xv. 10), and also of a son, apparently a different one, who was serving as Tribune of the soldiers under Corbulo (Ann. xv. 28).

PAETUS, L. CASTRINIUS, mentioned by Caesar in a letter to Cicero (ad Fam. viii. 2) in b. c. 51, may perhaps be the same person as the L. Castrinius Paetus, the leading man in the municipium of Lucu, whom Cicero recommended to Brutus in b. c. 46 (ad Fam. xiii. 13).

PAETUS, C. CONSIDIUS, known only from coins, a specimen of which is annexed. The obverse represents the head of Venus, and the reverse a sella curulis.

test was introduced for the first time. (Paus. v. 3. § 7.)

2. The father of Pindar, according to Eustathius (Prooem. Comment. Pind.),

3. A native of Thebes, the son of Aeoladas. He was one of the Boeotarchs in the year B.C. 414, when the Athenian expedition to Delium took place. After the fortification of Delium the Athenian troops received orders to return, and the light troops proceeded without stopping to Attica. The heavy-armed infantry halted a short distance from Delium to wait for the Athenian general Hipponetas. Montferrat then had assembled at Tanagra. Most of the Boeotarchs were unwilling to attack the Athenians. But Pagondas, who was one of the two Thesban Boeotarchs, and was commander-in-chief of the Boeotian forces, wishing that the chance of a battle should be tried, by an appeal to the several divisions of the army persuaded the troops to adopt his views. His harangue is reported by Thucydides (iv. 92). The day being far advanced, he led the main body of his troops at full speed to meet the Athenians, despatching one portion to keep in check the cavalry stationed by Hippocrates at Delium; and, having reached a spot where he was only separated by a hill from the enemy, he drew up his army in battle array, and reached the summit of the ridge when the Athenian line was scarcely formed. As the Boeotian troops halted to take breath Pagondas again harangued them. The Thesban division, which was twenty-five deep, bore down all opposition, and the appearance of two squadrors of Boeotian cavalry, which Pagondas had sent round the back of the hill to support his left wing, threw the Athenians into complete confusion, and the rout became general. Seventeen days after the battle the fortress at Delium was also taken. (Thuc. iv. 91—96; Athen. v. p. 215 f.)

4. A man of the name of Pagondas is spoken of by Theodoretus (de Cur. Affect. Graec. lib. ix.), as a legislator among the Achaenians. But as nothing further is known of him, and Pagondas is a name that does not elsewhere appear in use among the Achaenians, all those bearing the name of whom we have any certain knowledge being Boeotians, it has been conjectured with some probability that the name Pagondas in the passage of Theodoretus has been substituted through some mistake for Charondas. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 36.)

PALAEOLOGUS (Παλαιολόγος) was the name of an illustrious Byzantine family, of which there are said to have been descendants still existing in the 17th century (Du Cange, Familiar Byzantinae, p. 255). This family is first mentioned in the eleventh century [see below No. 1], and from that time down to the downfall of the Byzantine empire the name constantly occurs. It was the last Greek family that sat upon the throne of Constantinople, and it reigned uninterruptedly from the year 1260 to 1453, when Constantinople was taken by the Turks, and the last emperor of the family fell while bravely defending his capital. A branch of this family ruled over Montferrat in Italy from A.D. 1305 to 1350, Theodorus Comnenus Palaeologus, the son of Andronicus II., taking possession of the principality in virtue of the will of John of Montferrat, who died without children. This branch of the family does not fall within the compass of the present work; and we can only mention the leading Palaeologi spoken of in Byzantine history. A full account of all of them is given by Du Cange, where all the authorities for the following particulars are collected (Familiar Byzantinae, pp. 230—349).

1. NICEPHORUS PALAEOLOGUS, with the title of Hypertimus, was a faithful servant of the emperor Nicephorus III. Botanites (A.D. 1076—1081), and was rewarded by him with the government of Mesopotamia. He perished in battle in the reign of his successor Alexius I. Comnenus, while defending Dyrrhachium (Durazzo) against the Normans, A.D. 1081.

2. GEORGIUS PALAEOLOGUS, the son of the preceding, was celebrated for his military abilities, and served with his father under the emperors Nicephorus III. and Alexius I. He married Irene, the daughter of the Protopotatarius Andronicus Ducas.

3. MICHAEL PALAEOLOGUS, with the title of Sebastos, probably a son of No. 2, was banished by Calo-Joannes or Joannaes II. Comnenus, the successor of Alexius I. Comnenus (A.D. 1118—1143), but was recalled from banishment by Manuel I. Comnenus, the successor of Calo-Joannes. He commanded the Greek forces in southern Italy, and carried on war with success against William, king of Sicily, but died in 1155, in the middle of his conquests, at the town of Bari, which he had taken a short time before.

4. GEORGIUS PALAEOLOGUS, with the title of Sebastos, was a contemporary of No. 3, was employed by Manuel I. Comnenus in many important embassies. He is supposed by Du Cange to be the same as the Georgius Palaeologus, who took part in the conspiracy by which Isaac II. Angelus was dethroned, and Alexius III. Angelus raised to the crown in 1195, and who was killed in the storming of Crizimmon in 1199.

5. NICEPHORUS PALAEOLOGUS, governor of Trapezus, about A.D. 1179.

6. ANDRONICUS PALAEOLOGUS, married the eldest daughter of the emperor Theodorus Lascaris.

7. ALEXIUS PALAEOLOGUS, married Irene, the eldest daughter of Alexius III. Angelus, and was destined by this emperor as his successor, but he died shortly before the arrival of the Crusaders at Constantinople.

8. ANDRONICUS PALAEOLOGUS, the ancestor of the imperial family of the Palaeologi, was Magnus Domesticus under the emperors Theodorus Lascaris, and the emperor Alexius III. Vatatzes. He assumed the surname of Comnenus, which was borne likewise by his descendants. He married Irene Palaeologina, the daughter of Alexius Palaeologus [No. 7], and the grand-daughter of the emperor Alexius III. His children being thus descended, both on their father’s and mother’s side, from the Palaeologi are called by Georgius Phranzes (i. 1) διπλολαμολογοι. The following steama, which has been drawn up by Wilken (in Ersch and Gruber’s Encyklopädie, art. Palaeologen) from Du Cange’s work, exhibits all the descendants of this Andronicus Palaeologus. The lives of all the emperors are given in separate articles, and the other persons are not of sufficient importance to require a distinct notice. Of course, all the persons on this steama bore the name of Palaeologus, but it is omitted here in order to save space.

Palaemon.

Palaemon (Παλαίμων), signifies the wrestler, as in the surname of Heracles in Lycephon (663); but it also occurs as a proper name of several

1. A son of Athamas and Ino, was originally called Melicertes. When his mother, who was driven mad by Heracles, had thrown herself with her son, who was either still alive or already killed, from the Mohrius rock into the sea, both became marine divinities, viz., Leucothea, and Melicertes became Palaemon. (Apollod. iii. 4. § 3; Hygin. Fab. 2; Or. Met. iv. 520, xii. 919.) According to some, Melicertes after his apotheosis was called Glaucus (Athen. vii. p. 296), whereas, according to another version, Glaucus is said to have leaped into the sea from his love of Melicertes. (Athen. vii. p. 297.) The apotheosis was effected by the Nereids, who saved Melicertes, and also ordered the institution of the Ne-rean games. The body of Melicertes, according to the common tradition, was washed by the waves, or carried by dolphins into port Schoenus on the Corinthian isthmus, or to that spot on the coast where subsequently the altar of Palaemon stood. (Paus. i. 44. § 11, ii. 1. § 3; Plut. Sympos. v. 3.) There the body was found by his uncle Sisyphus, who ordered it to be carried by Donacius and Amphimachus to Corinth, and on the command of the Nereids instituted the Isthmian games and sanctified a dock bull by Antenor, before Leucothea, and Melicertes became Palaemon. (Tzet. ad Lyc. 107, 229; Philostr. Her. 19. Iou. ii. 16; Paus. ii. 1. § 3; Schol. ad Eurip. Med. 1274; Eurip. Iph. Taur. 251.) On the isthmus of Corinth there was a temple of Palaemon with statues of Palaemon, Lencotha, and Poseidon; and near the same place was a submarine sanctuary, which was believed to contain the remains of Palaemon. (Paus. ii. 2. § 1.) In the island of Tenedos, it is said that children were sacrificed to him, and the whole worship seems to have had something gloomy and orgiastic about it. (Philostr. i. c.; Hom. Od. iii. 6.) In works of art Palaemon is represented as a boy carried by marine deities or dolphins. (Philostr. Iou. ii. 16.) The Romans identified Palaemon with their own god Portunus, or Portunus. [PORTUNUS.]

2. A son of Hephaestus, or Aeolus, or Lernus, was one of the Argonauts. (Apollod. i. 9. § 16; Apollon. Hl. i. 282; Orph. Argon. 206.)

3. A son of Anteros, the daughter of Peiren, or by Iphinoe, the daughter of Antaeus. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 6; Tzet. ad Lyc. 602.)

4. One of the sons of Pria. (Hygin. Fab. 90.) [L. S.]

Palaemon, Q. ReMMIUS, a celebrated grammarian in the reigns of Tibebirus, Caligula, and Claudius, is placed by Jerome (ad Euseb.) in the eighth year of the reign of Claudius, A. D. 48. He was a native of Vicentia (Vicenza), in the north of Italy, and was originally a slave; but having been manumitted, he opened a school at Rome, where he became the most celebrated grammarian of his time, and obtained great numbers of pupils, though his moral character was so infamous that Tibebirus and Claudius used to say that there was no one to whom the training of youths ought so little to be entrusted. Suettionius gives rather a long account of him (de Illust. Gram. 29), and he is also mentioned by Juvenal on many occasions, viz., vi. 43; vi. 528, —219). From the scholiast on Juvenal (vi. 451) we learn that Palaemon was the master of Quintilian.

Palaephatus.

Palaephatus (Παλαίφατος), the name of four literary persons in Suidas, who, however, seems to have confounded different persons and writings.

1. Of Athens, an epic poet, to whom a mythical origin was assigned. According to some he was a son of Actaeus and Boeo, according to others of Iocles and Metaneira, and according to a third statement of Hermes. The time at which he lived is uncertain, but he appears to have been usually placed after Phemione [PHEMONE], though some writers assigned him an earlier date. He is represented by Christodorus (Anth. Graec. i. p. 279, ed. Tauchnitz) as an old bard crowned with laurel.

2. Of Paros, or Priene, lived in the time of Ar- taxerxes. Suidas attributes to him the five books of Aepytus, but adds that many persons assigned this work to Palaephat of Athens. This is the work which is still extant, and is spoken of below.

3. Of Abydos, an historian (Istornocia), lived in the time of Alexander the Great, and is stated to have been loved (pandia) by the philosopher Aristotle, for which Suidas quotes the authority of Philo, Peri paraadhs Istoryes, and of Theodorus of Ilium, En deut~' Trews. Suidas gives the titles of the following works of Palaephatus: Kyp incarn, Aelhia, A'Twy, Arabica. Some writers believe that this Palaephat of Abydos is the author of the fragment on Assyrian history, which is preserved by Eusebius, and which is quoted by him as the work of Abydus. There can, however, be little doubt that Abydus is the name of the writer, and not an appellative taken from his native place. (Voss. de Hist. Graec. pp. 85, 375, ed. Westermann.) [AByDUSus.]

4. An Egyptian or Athenian, and a grammarian, as he is described by Suidas, who assigns to him the following works: (1) Aepyttika Theologia. (2) Mutilaia Bivbion a'. (3) A'wXs dos eul meliki- kov etpithx. (4) Ywvokes eis Zivwntin. (5) Trews, which some however attributed to the Athenian [No. 1], and others to the Parian [No. 2]. He also wrote (6)Ἱστορία Ιδία. It has been supposed that the Mouhiaka and the Δακ}s are one and the same work; but we have no certain information on the point. Of these works the Trews seems to have been the most celebrated, as we find it frequently referred to by the ancient grammarians. It contained apparently geographical and historical discussions respecting Asia Minor and more particularly its northern coasts, and must have been divided into several books. (Comp. Suidas, s. v. Μεκρορεφαλε; Steph. Byz. s. v. Хερματα; Hargocrat. s. v. Δωσαλης.)

There is extant a small work entitled Παλαίφατος περί ἀντίγωνων, or "Concerning Incredible Tales," giving a brief account of some of the most celebrated Greek legends. That this is merely an abstract of a much larger work is evident from the place assigned to it first, because Suidas speaks of it as consisting of five books [see above, No. 2]; secondly, because many of the ancient writers refer to Palæphatus for statements which are not found in the treatise now extant; and, thirdly, because the manuscripts exhibit it in various forms, the abridgement being sometimes briefer and sometimes longer. It was doubtless the original work to which Virgil refers (Ciris, 88):

"Docta Palæphatia testatur voce papyrōs."

Respecting the author of the original work there is however much dispute, and we must be content to leave the matter in uncertainty. Some of the earliest modern printers from Greek literature assigned the work to the ancient epic poet [No. 1]; but this untenable supposition was soon abandoned, and the work was then ascribed to the Parian, as it is by Suidas. But if this Palæphatus was the contemporary of Artaxerxes as Suidas asserts, it is impossible to believe that the myths could have been treated at so early a period in the rationalizing way in which we find them discussed in the extant epitome. In addition to which we find the ancient writers calling the author sometimes a peripatetic and sometimes a stoic philosopher (Theom, Prosγυν. 6, 13; Tzetzes, Chil. ix. 273, x. 20), from which we must conclude, if these designations are correct, that he must have lived after the time of Alexander the Great, and could not therefore even have been the native of Abydos [No. 3], as others have maintained. It is thus impossible to identify the author of the work with any of the three persons just mentioned; but from his adopting the rationalistic interpretation of the myths, he must be looked upon as a disciple of Eudemus (Evedeμος), and may thus have been an Alexandrine Greek, and the same person as the grammarians spoken of by Suidas, who calls him an Egyptian or Athenian. [No. 4.]

The work Πεπλώ ανιστρατώ consists of 51 sections, of which only the first 46 contain explanations of the myths. The remaining five sections are written in an entirely different style, without any expression of distrust or disbelief as to the common form of the myth; and as they are wanting in all manuscripts at present extant, they are probably the work of another hand. In the first 46 sections Palæphatus generally relates in a few lines the common form of the myth, introducing it with some such words as παρείχεν αὐτῷ, Αὐδναν αὐτός, &c., he then expresses his disbelief, and finally proceeds to give what he considers a rational account of the matter. The nature of the work is well characterized by Mr. Grote (Hist. of Greece, vol. i. p. 555, &c.):--"Another author who seems to have conceived clearly, and applied consistently, the semi-historical theory of the Grecian myths, is Palæphatus. In the short preface of his treatise "Concerning Incredible Tales," he remarks, that some men, from want of instruction, believe all the current narratives; while others, more searching and cautious, disbelieve them altogether. Each of these extremes he is anxious to avoid: on the one hand, he thinks that no narrative could ever have acquired credence unless it had been founded in truth; on the other, it is impossible for him to accept so much of the existing narratives as conflicts with the analogies of present natural phænomena. If such things ever had been, they would still continue to be—but they never have so occurred; and the extra-analogical features of the stories are to be ascribed to the licence of the poets. Palæphatus wishes to adopt a middle course, neither accepting all nor rejecting all; accordingly, he had taken great pains to separate the true from the false in many of the narratives; he had visited the localities wherein they had taken place, and made careful inquiries from old men and others. The results of his researches are presented in a new version of fifty legends, among the most celebrated and the most fabulous, comprising the Centaurs, Pasiphae, Actaeon, Cadmus and the Sparti, the Sphinx, Cymcus, Daedalus, the Trojan horse, Aeolus, Scylla, Geryon, Bellerophon, &c. It must be confessed that Palæphatus has given this promise of transforming the "Incrediblea" into narratives in themselves plausible and unobjectionable, and that in doing so he always follows some thread of analogy, real or verbal. The Centaurs (he tells us) were a body of young men from the village of Nepheles in Thessaly, who first trained and mounted horses for the purpose of repelling a herd of bulls belonging to Ixion, king of the Lapithæa, which had run wild and did great damage; they pursued these wild bulls on horseback, and pierced them with their spears, thus acquiring both the name of Procris and the imputed attribute of joint body with the horse. Actaeon was an Arcadian, who neglected the cultivation of his land for the pleasures of hunting, and was thus eaten up by the expense of his hounds. The dragon whom Cadmus killed at Thebes, was in reality Draco, king of Thebes; and the dragon's teeth, which he was said to have sown, and from whence sprung a crop of armed men, were in fact of real elephant's teeth, which Cadmus, as a rich Phoenician, had brought over with him: the sons of Draco sold these elephants' teeth, and employed the proceeds to levy troops against Cadmus. Daedalus, instead of flying across the sea on wings, had escaped from Crete in a swift-sailing boat under a violent storm. Cottus, Briareus, and Gyges were not persons with one hundred hands, but inhabitants of the village of Hecontontheira in Upper Macedonia, who warred with the inhabitants of Mount Olympus against the Titans. Scylla, whom Odyssey so narrowly escaped, was a fast-sailing piratical vessel, as was also Pegasus, the alleged winged horse of Bellerophon. By such ingenious conjectures, Palæphatus eliminates all the incredible circumstances, and leaves to us a string of tales perfectly credible and common-place, which we should readily believe, provided a modern mode of ascertaining of testimony could be produced in their favour. If his treatment not only disenchant the original myths, but even effaces their generic and essential character, we ought to remember that this is not more than what is done by Thucydides in his sketch of the Trojan war. Palæphatus handles the myths consistently, according to the semi-historical theory, and his results exhibit the maximum which that theory can ever present: by aid of conjecture we get out of the impossible and arrive at matters intrinsically plausible, but totally uncertified; beyond this point we cannot penetrate, without the light of extrinsic evidence, since there is no intrinsic mark to distinguish truth from plausible fiction."

It has been already remarked that the manuscripts of the Πεπλώ ανιστράτω present the greatest discrepancies, in some the work being much longer and in others much shorter. The printed editions in like manner vary considerably. It was first printed by Aldus Manutius, together with Aesop, Pharnesus, and other writers, Venice, 1505, vol, and has since that time been frequently reprinted. The following is a list of the principal editions:

PALAESTR/NUS (Παλαιστρόν), a son of Poseidon and father of Haliacmon. From grief at the death of his son, Palaeusinus threw himself into the river, which was called after him Palaeotinus, and subsequently Strymon. (Plut. De Flux. 11.)

PALAMAS, GREGORIUS (Γρηγόριος ὁ Παλαμᾶς), an eminent Greek ecclesiastic of the fourteenth century. He was born in the Asiatic portion of the now reduced Byzantine empire, and was educated at the court of Constantine, apparently during the reign of Andronicus Palaeologus the elder. Despising, however, all the prospects of worldly greatness, of which his parentage and wealth, and the imperial favour gave him the prospect, he, with his two brothers, while yet very young, became monks in one of the monasteries of Mount Athos. Here the youngest of the three died; and upon the death of the superior of the monastery in which the brothers were, which followed soon after the death of the youngest brother, the two survivors placed themselves under another superior, with whom they remained eight years, and on whose death Gregory Palamas withdrew to Scete, near Berroha, where he built himself a cell, and gave himself up entirely, for ten years, to divine contemplation and spiritual exercises. Here the severity of his regimen and the coldness of his cell, induced an illness which almost occasioned his death; and the urgent recommendation of the other monks of the place induced him then to leave Scete, and return to Mount Athos; but this change not being sufficient for his recovery, he removed to Thessalonica (Cantacuz. Hist. ii. 39).

It was apparently while at Thessalonica, that his controversy began with Barlaam, a Calabrian monk, who having visited Constantinople soon after the accession of the emperor Andronicus Palaeologus the younger in A.D. 1329 (Andronicus III.), and professed himself an adherent of the Greek church, and a convert from and an opponent of the Latin church, against which he wrote several works, obtained the favour and patronage of the emperor. Barlaam appears to have been a conceited man, and to have sought opportunities of decrying the usages of the Byzantine Greeks. To this supercilious humour the wild fanaticism of the monks of Athos presented an admirable subject. Those of them who aimed at the highest spiritual attainments were accustomed to shut themselves up for days and nights together in a corner of their cell, and abstracting their thoughts from all worldly objects, and resting their beards on their chest, and fixing their eyes on their bellies, imagined that the seat of the soul, previously unknown, was revealed to them by a mystical light, at the discovery of which they were rapt into a state of ecstatic enjoyment. The existence of this light, well described by Gibbon as "the creature of an empty stomach and an empty brain," appears to have been resented by the monks, and was only revealed to Barlaam by an incautious monk, whom Cantacuzenus abuses for his communicativeness, as being scarcely above the level of the brutes. Barlaam eagerly laid hold of the opportunity afforded by the discovery to assail with bitter reproaches the fanaticism of these Hesychasts (Histor. de Juvoutores) or Quietists, calling them "Ομφαλόφυγος, Ομφαλοψυχή, " "men with souls in their navels," and identifying them with the Massolians or Euchites of the fourth century. The monks were roused by these attacks, and as Gregory Palamas was eminent among them for his intellectual powers and attainments, they put him forward as their champion, both with his tongue and pen, against the attacks of the sarcastic Calabrian. (Cantacuz. l. c.; Niceph. Greg. Hist. Byz. xi. 10; Mosheim, Eccles. Hist. by Murdock and Soames, book iii. cent. xiv. pt. ii. ch. v. § 1, &c.; Gibbon, Dub. and Pall., c. 62.)

Palamas and his friends tried first of all to silence the reproaches of Barlaam, by ready remonstrance, and affirmed that as to the mystical light which beamed round the saints in their seasons of contemplation, there had been various similar instances in the history of the church of a divine lustre surrounding the saints in time of persecution; and that Sacred History recorded the appearance of a divine and uncreated light at the Saviour's transfiguration on mount Tabor. Barlaam caught at the mention of this light as uncreated, and affirmed that nothing was uncreated but God, and that inasmuch as God was invisible while the light of Mount Tabor was visible to the bodily eye, the monks must have two Gods, one the Creator of all things, confessedly invisible; the other, this visible yet uncreated light. This serious charge gave to the controversy a fresh impulse, until, after two or three years, Barlaam, fearing that his infuriated opponents, who flocked to the scene of conflict from all the monasteries about Thessalonica and Constantinople, would offer him personal violence, appealed to the Patriarch of Constantinople and the bishops there, and charged Palamas not only with sharing the fanaticism of the Omphalopsyche, and with the use of defective prayers, but also with holding blaspheinous views of God, and with introducing new terms into the theology of the church. A council was consequently convened in the church of St. Sophia at Constantinople (A.D. 1341) in the presence of the emperor, the chief senators, the learned, and a vast multitude of the common people. As it was not thought advisable to discuss the mysteries of theology before a promiscuous multitude, the charge against Palamas and the monks of blasphemous notions respecting God was suppressed, and only the charge of holding the old Massalian heresy respecting prayer, and of using defective prayers, was proceeded with. Barlaam first addressed the council in support of his charge; then Palamas replied, retorting... upon Barlaam the charge of blasphemy and perverseness. In the end the council decided in favour of the monks, and Barlaam, according to Cantacuzenus, acknowledged his errors, and was reconciled to his adversaries. Mortified, however, at his public defeat, he returned to Italy, and reconciled himself to the Latin church. Nicephorus Gregoras states, that the decision of the council on the question of the Massalian heresy charged against the monks, was deferred, that Barlaam was convicted of maliginty and arrogance, and that the heresy of Palamas and his party would probably have been condemned also, had not the completion of the business of the council been prevented by the emperor's death, A. D. 1341. (Cantacuz. c. 40 ; Niceph. Gregor. c. 11.)

The cause which Barlaam had forsaken was taken up by another Gregory, surnamed Acindynos [Acindynus, Gregorius]; but the party of the monks continued in the ascendant, and Palamas enjoyed the favour of John Cantacuzenus, who then exercised the chief influence at the court of the emperor, John Palaeologus, a minor [Joannes V. Cantacuzenus ; Joannes VI. Palaeologus], to such a degree that it was reported that Cantacuzenus intended to procure the deposition of the patriarch of Constantinople, Joannes or John Calecas or Aprenus [Calecas, Joannes], and to elevate Palamas to his seat (Cantacuz. Hist. iii. 17). In the civil war which followed (A. D. 1342—1347), between Cantacuzenus and the court (where the Admiral Apocacus had supplantcd him), Palamas, as a friend of Cantacuzenus, was imprisoned (A. D. 1346), not however on any political charge, but on the ground of his religious opinions; for the patriarch now supported Gregory Acindynus and the Barlaamites against the monks of Athos, who were favourable to Cantacuzenus. The Barlaamites consequently gained the ascendency, and in a council at Constantinople the Palamites, as their opponents were called, were condemned. The patriarch and the court were, however, especially anxious to clear themselves from the suspicion of acting from political feeling in the imprisonment of Palamas. When the entrance of Cantacuzenus into Constantinople, in January 1347, obliged the court to submit, Palamas was released, and sent to make terms with the conqueror. (Cantacuz. Hist. iii. 98 ; Niceph. Gregor. Hist. Byz. xxv. 7, 8.) The patriarch Calecas had been deposed by the influence of the emperor's mother, Anna, just before the triumph of Cantacuzenus, and Gregory Palamas persuaded Cantacuzenus to assemble a synod, by which the deposition was confirmed, and to banish Calecas to Didymotichum. Acindynus and the Barlaamites were now in turn condemned, and the Palamites became once more predominant. Isidore, one of their number, was chosen patriarch. (Cantacuz. Hist. iv. 3; Niceph. Gregor. xv. 10, 11.) Palamas himself was soon after appointed archbishop of Thessalonica; though, as that city was in the hands of some of the nobility who were hostile to Cantacuzenus, he was refused admittance, and obliged to retire to the isle of Lemnos, but he obtained admittance after a time. This was in A. D. 1349. (Cantacuz. c. 15; Niceph. Gregor. c. 12.) Meanwhile, the ecclesiastical troubles continued: the Barlaamites withdrew from the communion of the church; their ranks received continual increase, and Nicephorus Gregoras, the historian, adroitly drew over to their side the empress Irene, wife of Cantacuzenus, by persuading her that the recent death of her younger son, Andronicus (A. D. 1347), was a sign of the Divine displeasure at the favour shown by the emperor Cantacuzenus to the Palamites. To restore peace, if possible, to the church, a synod was summoned, after various conferences had been held between the emperor, the patriarch Isidore, Palamas, and Nicephorus Gregoras. Isidore died A. D. 1349, before the meeting of the synod, over which Callistus, his successor, presided. When it met (A. D. 1351) Nicephorus Gregoras was the champion of the Barlaamites, who numbered among their supporters the archbishop of Ephesus and the bishop of Gana or Gannus the archbishop of Tyre, who was present, appears to have been on the same side. Palamas was the leader of the opposite party, who having a large majority and the support of the emperor, carried every thing their own way; the archbishop of Ephesus and the bishop of Gana were deposed, Barlaam and Acindynus (neither of whom was present) were declared to be excommunicated, and their followers were forbidden to propagate their sentiments by speech or writing. (Cantacuz. Hist. iv. 23; Niceph. Gregor. Hist. Byz. xvi. 5, xviii. 3—8, xix., xx.) The populace, however, favoured the vanquished party, and Palamas narrowly escaped their violence. Of his subsequent history and death nothing appears to be known.

The leading events of the Palamites were the existence of the mystical light discovered by the more eminent monks and recluses, in their long exercise of abstract contemplation and prayer, and the uncreated nature of the light of Mount Tabor, seen at the transfiguration of Christ. The first attracted the notice and animadversion of their opponents, but the second, with the consequences really or apparently deducible from it, was the great object of attack. The last seven books (xviii.—xxiv.) of the Historia Byzantina of Nicephorus Gregoras are taken up with the Palamite controversy: and in the bitterness of his polemic spirit he charges Palamas with polytheism (xviii. 2 § 4); with converting the attributes of the deity into so many distinct and independent deities (xviii. 4 § 9); with affirming that the Holy Spirit was not one alone, or even one of seven (an evident allusion to Revel. 1. 4), but one of "seventy times seven" (xviii. 3 § 4); with placing an intermedium between God and angels a new and peculiar class of uncreated powers (κατά τον καὶ τοὺς ἀκτιστοὺς ἄγγελους ἐνεργείων) which he (Palamas) called "the brightness (λαμπρότητα) of God and the ineffable light" (φῶς ἀβάρτητον); with holding that any man by partaking of the stream of this light flowing from its inexhaustible source, could at will become uncreated and without beginning (ἀκτιστον ἐξουσίων γίνεσθαι καὶ ἀναφέρεσθαι) and with other errors which our limits do not allow us to enumerate (ibid.). It is plain, however, that these alleged errors were for the most part, if not altogether, the inferences deduced by Nicephorus Gregoras and other opponents from the Palamite dogma of the uncreated light, and not the acknowledged tenets of the Palamite party. The rise, continuance, and vehemence of the controversy is a singular manifestation of the subtility and misdirection of the Greek intellect of the period. The dogma of the uncreated light of Mount Tabor has apparently continued to be the recognised orthodox doctrine of the Greek Church (Capperonneris, Not. ad
PALAMAS.

Palamas was a copious writer; many of his works are extant in MS., and are enumerated by Wharton and Gery in the Appendix to Cave, and by Fabricius. Nicophorus Gregoras says (xxii. 3. § 3) that he wrote more than sixty libros, orationes; and Boivin, in a note on the passage (vol. ii. p. 1317, ed. Bonn.), states that one MS. in the king's library at Paris contained more than seventy, and a more highly finished text, and the statement of Gregoras must refer only to pieces written on occasion of Palamas' controversy with him, or must be very much below the mark. The following have been published. 1. Prosopopeia et Prosopo-pie, s. Orationes duas judiciales, Menius Corpus accusantium, et Corporis sese defendentis, una cum Judicium Sententiae; published under the editorial care of Adr. Turnebus, 4to. Paris, 1553, and given in a Latin version in many editions of the Bibliotheca Patrum, e. g. in vol. xxvi. p. 199, &c., ed. Lyon, 1677. 2. The Latin version was given in the Lyon edition of the Bibliotheca Patrum, fol. 1677, vol. xxvi. p. 209, &c. 3. These were published, 4to. London, without date (but stated by some of our authorities to be 1624), together with a number of other pieces of Barlam the Calvinian, Gabril Severus of Philadelphia, Melethus Pega of Alexandria, Maximus Marginius of Cercia, Nitus, and Georgius Scholarius (Γενναδίου τοῦ Κωνσταντινου, No. 2). Greek writers of comparatively recent period. This volume was dedicated to the four patriarchs of the Greek Church, Cyrilus Lu-γιναν, Epistola ad dictatius coronatas Augustum Dianum Paulalogenianum, printed by Boivin in his notes to the Hist. Byzant. of Nicophorus Gregoras, fol. Paris, 1702, p. 767; vol. ii. p. 1282, ed. Bonn. Boivin has also given two extracts, one of some length, from a writing of Palamas, Adversus Io-anneum Cauleam (p. 769, ed. Paris, 1283, ed. Bonn); the other, very brief, from an Epistolae ad Ioanneum Galbran (p. 1275, ed. Bonn). Various citations from his works, but without further specification, are given by Nicophorus Gregoras (Hist. Byzant., xxiv. 5, § 2, p. 697, &c., ed. Paris, 1112, &c., ed. Bonn). It is probable that the Tomos or declaration issued by the synod of Constantinople, A. D. 1351, against the Barlamites was drawn up by Palamas or under his inspection. It is given with a Latin version by Combe in his Auctarium Novissimum, fol. Paris, 1672, pars ii. p. 135, &c., and is entitled Τόμων ἐκτείνει παρά τ' Ζειας καὶ ιερᾶς συνυστού τιννυστήσεις κατά τ' ΦροντιστῶΝ τ' Βαρδαίην τ' Ακαιθονιν τ' ἐπί τ' Βασιλείας τ' ἑως καὶ δημοῦ δημού ἡμῶν Καπρακυμνίοι καὶ Παλαμαλόγιοι. longing to the Romish Church, as Allestis, Nicolas Commenues Papadopoli, and others, heap on Palamas every term of reproach: on the other hand, the orthodox Greeks extol him highly, and ascribe mi-lions to his heroical action. His works were published, fol. Oxford, 1740-43, vol. ii. Append. by Whar-plius and Clymene, the daughter of Aegeus (or Catreus, Τατσ. ad Lyco. 384), and brother of Oen.

He joined the Greeks in their expedition against Troy; but Agamemnon, Diomedes, and Odysseys, envious of his fame, caused a captive Phrygian to write to Palamedes a letter in the name of Priam, and then induced a servant of Palamedes by bribes to conceal the letter under his master's bed. Hereupon they accused Palamedes of treachery; they searched his tent, and as they found the letter which they themselves had dictated, they caused him to be stoned to death. When Palamedes was led to death, he exclaimed, 'Truth, I lament thee, for thou hast died even before me.' (Serv. ad Eur. Orest, 429; Philostr. Her. 10; Orig. Met. xiii. 56.) According to some traditions, it was Odysseus alone who hated and persecuted Palamedes. (Hygin. Fab. 105; Xenoph. Memor. iv. 2. § 23; Apol. § 26.) The cause of this hatred too is not the same in all writers; for according to some, Odysseys hated him because he had been compelled by him to join the Greeks against Troy (Hygin. Fab. 95; Orig. Met. xiii. 58; comp. Odysseus), or because he had been severely censured by Palamedes for returning from a foraging excursion into Thrace with empty hands. (Serv. ad Aen. ii. 31; comp. Philostr. Her. 10.) The manner of Palamedes' death is likewise related differently: some say that Odysseys and Diomedes induced him to descend into a well, where they pretended they had discovered a treasure, and as he was below they cast stones upon him, and killed him (Dict. Cret. ii. 15); others state that he was dined by them whilst fishing (Paus. x. 31, 1); and according to Dares Phrygus (28) he was killed by Paris with an arrow. The place where he was killed is either Colonae in Thrus, or in Tenedos, or at Geraneus. The story of Palamedes, which is not mentioned by Homer, seems to have been first related in the Cyripia, and was afterwards developed by the tragic poets, especially Euripides, and lastly by the sophists, who liked to look upon Palamedes as their pattern. (Paus. x. 31 § 1; Philostr. l.c.) The tragic poets and sophists describe him as a sage among the Greeks, and as a poet; and he is said to have invented light-houses, measures, scales, discus, dice, the alphabet, and the art of regulating settlements. (Philostr. Her. 10; Paus. ii. 20 § 3, x. 31 § 1; Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 422.) A sanctuary and a statue of Palamedes existed on the Aeolian coast of Asia Minor, opposite to Methymna in Lesbos. (Philostr. Vit. Apollon. iv. 13; Tzetze. ad Lyoph. 384.) [L. S.]

PALAMÆDES (Παλαμηδης), a Greek grammarian, was a contemporary of Athenaeus, who introduces him as one of the speakers in his work. Suidas says, that he wrote Κωμίκη καὶ παραγωγὴ λεξιῶν, ἄνωματολόγουν, and a commentary on Pindar. Suidas gives him the epitaph Εὐδέξιος, and Athenaeus terms him Εὐδέξιος. He was also called οὐματολόγους, that is, a "collector of words," probably because he gave in his writings an explanation of the difficult words in the tragic and comic poets. The passage in Suidas, in which he is said to have written a work called by his name, is probably corrupt. (Suidas, s. v. Παλαμηδης; Athen. ix. p. 397, α; Eutym. M. s. v. Αριάτενος μέλος, where for Παλαμηδης ιστοροῦκος we ought perhaps to read Παλαμηδης 'Ελεατοῦ; Schol. ad Apol. Rhod. i. 704, iii. 107, iv. 1563; Schol. ad Arist. Vesp. 706, 1103, 1117, Pac. 916; Helmer. ad Arist. Plat. p. 98.)

PALATI'NUS, a surname of Apollo at Rome, where Augustus, in commemoration of the battle of Actium, dedicated a temple to the god on the Palatine hill, in which subsequently a library was established. (Dion Cass. liii. 1; Horat. Carm. i. 91, Epist. i. 3. 17; Propert. iv. 6. 11; Ov. Ars Am. iii. 329.)

PALES, a Roman divinity of flocks and shepherds, is described by some as a male, and by others as a female divinity; whence some modern writers have inferred that Pales was a combination of both sexes; but such a monstrosity is altogether foreign to the religion of the Romans. (Virg. Aen. iii. i. 297, Georg. iii. i; Serv. ad Virg. Elog. v. 35; Ov. Fast. iv. 721, 746, 766; Dionys. i. 88; Athen. viii. p. 361.) Some of the rites performed at the festival of Pales, which was celebrated on the 21st of April, the birth-day of the city of Rome, would indeed seem to indicate, that the divinity was a female character; but besides the express statements to the contrary (Serv. ad Virg. Georg. iii. i; Arnob. adv. Gent. iii. 28; Martian. cap. i. p. 27), there also are other reasons for believing that Pales was a male divinity. The name seems to be connected with Palatinus, the centre of all the earliest legions of Rome, and the god himself was with the Romans the embodiment of the same idea as Pan among the Greeks. Respecting the festival of the Palilia see Dict. of Ant. s. v. (Hartung, Die Relig. der Röm. vol. ii. p. 148, &c.) [L. S.]

PALFURIUS SURA, one of the delatores under Domitian, was the son of a man of consular rank. It is related of him that he wrestled with a Lacedaemonian virgin in a public contest in the reign of Nero, and having been expelled from the senate by Vespasian, applied himself to the study of the Stoic philosophy, and became distinguished for his eloquence. He was restored to the senate by Domitian, became one of his informers, and after the death of the tyrant was brought to trial, apparently in the reign of Trajan, and condemned. This account is given by the Scholast on Juvenal (iv. 53) from the historian Marius Maximus. (Comp. Suet. Dom. 13.)

PALICANUS, M. LO'LLIUS, a Picentine of humble origin, was tribune of the plebs, b.c. 71, in which year he exerted himself most vigorously to obtain for the tribunes the restoration of those powers and privileges of which they had been deprived by a law of the dictator Sulla. On Pompey's return to Rome, towards the close of the year after his victory over Sertorius, Palicanus immediately held an assembly of the people outside the city-gates, in which Pompey promised the restoration of the tribunitian privileges, a promise which he fulfilled in his consulship in the following year. (Pseudo-Ascon. in Cic. Dicin. in C nuclei. p. 103, in Verr. p. 146, ed. Orelli.) Palicanus also supported the lex Iuctutaria of the praetor L. Aurelius Cotta, by which the senators were deprived of their exclusive right to act as judges, and the judicaria were given to courts consisting of senators, equites, and tribuni nemi. He further attempted to excite the indignation of the people against the aristocracy by recounting to them the tyrannical and cruel conduct of Verres; and to produce a still greater impression upon their minds he brought before them a Roman citizen whom Verres had scourged. (Cic. in Verr. i. 47, ii. 41; Schol. Gronov. in Cic. Verr. p. 386.) Such steady opposition, united with a humble origin, made him a special object of hatred to the aristocracy; and accordingly when he became a candidate for the consulship in b.c. 67, the consul Piso, who presided at the comitia, positively refused to announce his name if he should be elected (Val. Max. iii. 8, § 3). In b.c. 64, it was expected that he would again come forward as a candidate (Cic. ad Att. i. 1); but though he seems to have been very popular, he had not distinguished himself sufficiently to counterbalance his lowly birth, and to overcome the formidable opposition of the aristocracy. The last time he is mentioned is in b.c. 60, when he is said to have been abusing almost every day the consul Afranius (ad Att. i. 18). His powers as an orator are perhaps somewhat unduly depreciated through party-hatred: Cicero says of him (Brut. 62) Palicanus aptissimus auribus imperitorum, and Sallust describes him (ap. Quintil. iv. 2, init.) loquax magis quam facundus. The Lolliia, who was the wife of A. Gabinius, and who was debauched by Caesar, is supposed to have been the daughter of Palicanus. (Lollia, No. 1.) (Comp. Drumm. Geschichte Rom, vol. iv. p. 386.)

COIN OF M. LOLLIIUS PALICANUS.
The name of Pallasus, written with a κ, PALLADUS, occurs on several coins of the Lollia gens. The specimen, given on the preceding page, has on the obverse the head of Liberty, and on the reverse the Rostra in the forum. (Eckehl, vol. v. p. 236.)

PALADUS (Pallakos), commonly found in the plural Pallaci, Pallaka, were Sicilian daemons, twin-sons of Zeus and the nymph Thaleia, the daughter of Hephaestus. Sometimes they are called sons of Hephaestus by Aeta, the daughter of Oceanus. Thaleia, from fear of Hera, desired to be swallowed up by the earth; this was done, but in due time she sent forth from the earth twin boys, who were called Pallaco, from τοῦ πάλαι νέστα. They were worshipped in the neighborhood of mount Aeta, near Palice; and in the earliest times human sacrifices were offered to them. Their sanctuary was an asylum for runaway slaves, and near it there was gushed forth from the earth two sulphureous springs, called Deilloi, or brothers of the Pallaci; at which solemn oaths were taken, the oaths being written on tablets and thrown into one of the wells. If the tablet swam on the water, the oath was considered to be true, but if it sank down, the oath was regarded as perjury, which was believed to be punished instantaneously by blindness or death. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Paless; Aristot. Mirobl. Auscult. 58; Diod. xi. 89; Strab. vi. p. 275; Cie. De Nat. Deor. iii. 22; [Virg. Aen. ix. 585, with the note of Servius; Ov. Met. v. 406; Macrobr. Sat. v. 19.)

PALHINUS (Pallinophos), the son of Jesus, and helmsman of Aeneas. The god of Sleep in the disguise of Phorbas approached him, sent him to sleep at the helm, and then threw him down into the sea. (Virg. Aen. v. 535, &c.) In the lower world he saw Aeneas again, and related to him that on the fourth day after his fall, he was thrown by the waves on the coast of Italy and there murdered, and that his body was left unburied on the strand. The Sibyl prophesied to him, that by the command of an oracle his death should be averted for, that a tomb should be erected to him, and that a cave (Palhinus, the modern Punta della Spartivento) should be called after him. (Virg. Aen. vi. 337, &c.; Strab. vi. p. 252.)

PALLADAS (Palladias), the author of a large number of epigrams in the Greek Anthology, which some scholars consider the best in the collection, while others regard them as almost worthless: their real characteristic is a sort of elegant mediocrity. Almost all that we know of the poet is gathered from the epigrams themselves.

In the Vatican MS, he is called an Alexandrian. With regard to his time, he is mentioned by Tzetzes between Proclus and Agathias (Prolog. ad Lyceoph. p. 263, Müller); but a more exact indication is furnished by one of his epigrams (No. 115), in which he speaks of Hypatia, the daughter of Theon, as still alive: now Hypatia was murdered in A.D. 415. ([Hypatia]) He was a grammarian; but at some time he renounced the profession, which he complains that his poverty had compelled him to follow: a quarrelsome wife afforded him another subject of bitter complaint in his verses (Epig. 41—46; comp. 9, 14). The question has been raised whether he was a Christian or a heathen; but his epigrams leave little doubt upon the subject. To say nothing of a caustic distich on the number of the monks, which a Christian might very well have written (Ep. 84), there is another epigram, the irony of which is manifest, in which he refers to statues of heathen deities being rescued from destruction by their conversion to the images of Christian saints, an important testimony, by the way, to the practices referred to (Paralip. e Cod. Vat. No. 67, vol. iii. p. 661, Jacobs; it is worthy of remark that the title is Pallαδα του μετεφρου). But the clearest proof that he was not a Christian is furnished by his bitter epigram on the edict of Theodosius for the destruction of the pagan temples and idols (No. 70), the tone of which, and the reference of the last three lines, especially the middle one, it is impossible to mistake: —

Ελληνις έσεις άνδρες ιεσοδιωμων, νεκρων έχοντες ελπιδας αθεμικών. άνετρα γράφα πάντα τον τα πράγματα.

PALLADIUM (Palladion), is properly an image of Pallas Athena, but generally an ancient one, which was kept hidden and secret, and was revered as a pledge of the safety of the town or place where it existed. Among these ancient images of Pallas none is more celebrated than the Trojan Palladium, concerning which there was the following tradition. Athena was brought up by Triton, and his daughter, Pallas, and Athena once were wrestling together for the sake of exercise. Zeus interfered in the struggle, and suddenly held the aegis before the face of Pallas. Pallas, while looking up to Zeus, was wounded by Athena, and died. Athena in her sorrow caused an image of the maiden to be made, round which she hung the aegis, and which she placed by the side of the image of Zeus. Subsequently when Electra, after being dishonoured, fled to this image, Zeus threw it down from Olympus upon the earth. It came down at Troy, where Ilus, who had just been praying to the god for a favourable omen for the building of the city, took it up, and erected a sanctuary to it. According to some, the image was dedicated by Electra, and according to others it was given by Zeus to Dardanus. The image itself is said to have been three cubits in height, its legs close together, and holding in its right hand a spear, and in the left a spindle and a distaff. (Apollod. i. 12. § 3; Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 1129; Dionys. i. 69.) This Palladium remained at Troy until Odysseus and Diomedes contrived to carry it away, because the city could not be taken so long as it was in the possession of that sacred treasure, (Conon, Narr. 34; Virg. Aen. ii. 164, &c.) According to some accounts Troy contained two Palladias, one of which was carried off by Odysseus and Diomedes, and the other carried by Aeneas to Italy, or the one taken by the Greeks was a mure imitation, while that which Anæus brought to Italy was the genuine one. (Dionys. L. c.; Poll. ii. 23. § 5; Ov. Fast. vi. 421, &c.) But if we look back a little from this twofold Palladium, which was probably a mere invention to account for its existence in more than one place, several towns both in Greece and Italy claimed the honour of possessing the ancient Trojan Palladium; as for example, Argos (Poll. ii. 23. § 5), and Athens, where it was believed that Diomedes, on his return from Troy, landed on the Attic coast at night, without knowing what country it was. He accordingly began to plunder; but Demophon, who hastened to protect the country, took the Palladium from Diomedes. (Poll. i. 28. § 9.) This Palladium at Athens, however, was different from another image of Pallas there, which was also called Palladium, and stood on the acropolis. (Paus. L. c.) In Italy the cities of Rome, Lavinium, Luceria, and Siris likewise pretended to possess the Trojan Palladium. (Strab. vi. p. 264; Serv. ad Aen. ii. 166, &c.; Plut. Cim. mill. 20; Tac. Ann. x. 41; Dionys. ii. 66.) Figures reminding us of the description we have of the Trojan Palladium are frequently seen in ancient works of art. [L. S.]

PALLADIUS (Παλλάδιος), a Greek medical writer, some of whose works are still extant. Nothing is known of the events of his life, but, as he is commonly called Ἰατροφωσιτής, he is supposed to have gained that title by having been a professor of medicine at Alexandria. His date is also very uncertain; Choulant places him in the fourth century after Christ (Handb. der Bücherkunde fur die Ältere Medizin), but most other writers in the seventh or eighth. All that can be pronounced with certainty is that he quotes Galen, and is himself quoted by Rhases, and must therefore have lived between the third and ninth centuries. We possess three works that are commonly attributed to him, viz. 1. Σχολια εἰς τὸ περὶ Ἀργου Ἰπτωκράτους, "Scholia in Librum Hippocratis De Frac- turis!" 2. Εἰς Ἑκτον τῶν Ἐπίσημων Ἐπισκύμην, "In Sextum (Psendo-Hippocratis) Epidemieron Librum Commentarium!" and 3. Περὶ Πυρετῶν σύμπτωμα Σύνοψις, "De Febribus concisa Synopsis." His Commentaries on Hippocrates are in a great measure abridged from Galen, and of no particular interest or value; they appear to have been known to the Arabian writers, as he is mentioned among the Commentators on Hippocrates by the unknown author of the "Philosophorum Bibliothecam," quoted by Casiri, Biblioth. Arabico-Hisp. Exsor. vol. i. p. 257. They have both of them come down to us imperfect. That on the work "De Fracturis!" was translated into Latin by Jac. Sandalis, published by Pascoli but not of D. Pascoli in his edition of Hippocrates, Francof. 1592, fol. (sect. vi. p. 196, &c.;) it is also to be found (Gr. and Lat.) in the twelfth volume of Chartier's Hippocrates and Galen, Paris, 1679, fol. The commentary on the sixth book of the Epimédis was translated into Latin by J. P. Crassus, and published after his death by his son in the collection entitled "Medici Antiqui Graeci," &c. Basi, 1531, 4to.; the Greek text was published for the first time by F. K. Dietz in the second volume of his "Scholia in Hippocratem et Galenum," Regim. Pruss. 1834, 8vo. The treatise on Fevers is a short work, consisting of thirty chapters, and treats of the causes, symptoms, and treatment of the different kinds of fever. It is taken chiefly from Galen, and does not require any more special notice here. In most MSS. this work is attributed to Stephanus Alexandrinus or Theophilus; but, as it is probably the treatise referred to in the Commentary on the Epimédis (vi. 6, p. 164, ed. Dietz), it is tolerably certain that Palladius was the author. It was first published in Greek and Latin by J. Chartier, Paris, 1646, 4to.; an improved edition, Gr. and Lat., with notes, was published by J. S. Bernard, Lugd. Bat. 1745, 8vo.; and the Greek text alone is inserted in the first volume of J. L. Ideler's "Physici et Medici Graeci Minores!" Berol. 1841, 8vo. (Bernard's Preface; Freind's Hist. of Physi; Sprengel's Hist. de la Méd.; Haller's Biblioth. Medic. Prakt.; Dietz's Preface; Choulant's Handb. der Bücherkunde fur die Ältere Medizin.) [W. A. G.]

PALLADIUS (Παλλάδιος), literary. 1. Of ALEXANDRIA. Casper Bartholin (Adversor, lib. v. c. 3) has ascribed to Palladius of Alexandria the account of the discussion between Gregentius of Tephar and the Jew Heramab, in the sixth century. [Gregentius.] (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 115.) 2. Of ALEXANDRIA, called IATROSOPHIST, a Greek physician. [See above.] 3. Of ASPONA. [No. 7.] 4. CHRYSTOSTOM VITA SCRIPTOR. [No. 7.] 5. EPIGRAMMATICUS POETA [PALLADAS]. 6. GALATA, the GALATIANS. 7. Of HELENOPOLIS. The name of Palladius occurs repeatedly in the ecclesiastical and literary history of the early part of the fifth century. The difficulty is in determining whether these notices refer to one individual or to more. We include in this one article a notice of the author of the biographies usually termed the Lausiac History, the author of the Life of Chrysostom, and the bishop of Hellenopolis, and subsequently of Aspona, noticing, as we proceed, what grounds there are for belief or disbelieve as to their being one and the same person.

Palladius, who wrote the Lausiac History, states in the introduction, that he composed it in his fifty-third year; and as there is reason to fix the date of the composition in A. D. 419 or 420, his birth may be placed in or about 367. He adds also, that it was the thirty-third year of his monastic life, and the twentieth of his episcopate. It is this last date which furnishes the means of determining the others. The Latin versions of his history (c. 41, Meurs., 43, Bibl. Pat.) make him reply to a question of Joannes of Lycopolis, an eminent Egyptian solitary, that he was a Galatian, and a companion or disciple (ex sodalitate) of Evagrius of Pontus. But the passage is wanting in the Greek text, and next, as Tillemon thinks, from an error or omission of the printer, for the omission is found both in the text of Meursius (c. 41) and that of the Bibliotheca Patrum (c. 43); so that the statement is not free from doubt. In two other places he refers to his being a long time in Galatia (c. 64, Meurs., c. 113, Bibl. Pat.), and being at Ancyna (c. 98, Meurs., c. 114, Bibl. Pat.), but these passages do not prove that he was born there, for he was in that province in the latter part of his life. He embraced a solitary life, as already observed, at the age of twenty, which, if his birth was in A. D. 367, would be in A. D. 387. The places of his residence, at successive periods, can only be conjectured from incidental notices in the Lausiac History, Tillemont places at the commencement of his ascetic career his abode with Epiphanius of Cappadocia, in some caverns of Mount Lucas, near the banks of the Jordan (c. 70, Meurs., 106, Bibl. Patr.), and his residence at Bethlehem, and other places in Palestine. He supposes that it was at this time that he saw several other saints who dwelt in that country, and among them, perhaps (for Palladius does not directly say that he knew them personally), John, of whose impressions, derived chiefly, if not wholly, from the representations of Posidonius, were by no means favourable (c. 42, 50, Meurs., 78, 124, Bibl. Patr.). Palladius first visited Alexandria in the second consularia of the emperor Theodosius the Great, i.e. in A.d. 393 (c. 3, Meurs., 1, Bibl. Patr.), and by the advice of Isidorus, a presbyter of that city, placed himself under the instruction of Dorotheus, a solitary, whose mode of life was so hard and austere that Palladius was obliged, by sickness, to leave him, without completing the three years which he had intended to stay (c. 4, Meurs., 2, Bibl. Patr.). He remained for a short time in the neighbourhood of Alexandria, and then resided for a year among the solitaries in the mountains of the desert of Nitria, who amounted to five thousand (c. 9, Meurs., 6, Bibl. Patr.), of whose place of abode and manner of life he gives a description (ibid.). From Nitria he proceeded further into the wilder regions of Africa, to which he arrived the year after the death of Macarius the Egyptian, which occurred in A.D. 390 or 391. (Macarius, No. 1) Here he remained nine years, three of which he spent as the companion of Macarius the younger, the Alexandrian (Macarius, No. 2), and was for a time the companion and disciple of Evagrius of Pontus (Evagrius, No. 4), who was charged with entertaining Origenist opinions. (Origenes.) How long he remained with Evagrius is not known (c. 21, 22, 29, Meurs., c. 19, 20, 29, Bibl. Patr.). But he did not confine himself to one spot: he visited cities, or villages, or deserts, for the purpose of conversing with men of eminent holiness, and his history bears incidental testimony to the extent of his travels. The Thebaid or Upper Egypt, as far as Tabenna (Pachomius), and Syene, Lybia, Syria, Palestine, Mesopotamia, and even Rome and Campania, and as he vaguely and boastfully states, the whole Roman empire. He was visited by him, and that almost entirely on foot (c. 2, Meurs., Prooem. in Bibl. Patr. pp. 897, 898).

In consequence of severe illness, Palladius was sent by the other solitaries to Alexandria, and from that city, by the advice of his physicians, he went to Palestine, and from thence into Bithynia, where, as he somewhat mysteriously adds, either by human desire or the will of God, he was ordained bishop. He gives neither the date of his appointment nor the name of his bishops, but intimates that it was the occasion of great trouble to him, so that, “while hidden for eleven months in a gloomy cell,” he remembered a prophecy of the holy recluse, Joannes of Lyceopolis, who, three years before Palladius was taken ill and sent to Alexandria, had foretold both his elevation to the episcopacy and his consequent troubles. As he was present with Evagrius of Pontus, about the time of his death (c. 39, Bibl. Patr.), which probably occurred in A.D. 399 (Evagrius, No. 4), he could not have left Egypt till that year, nor can we well place his ordination as bishop before A.D. 400.

All the foregoing particulars relate to the author of the Lausiac History, from the pages of which the notices of them are gleaned. Now we learn from Photius (Bibl. Cod. 57), that in the Synod “of the Oak,” at which Joannes or John Chrysostom was condemned [Chrysostomus], and which was held in A.D. 403, one of the charges against him related to the ordination of a Palladius Bishop of Hellenopolis, in Bithynia, a follower of the opinions of Origen. The province in which the diocese was situated, the Origenist opinions (probably imbued from or cherished by Evagrius of Pontus), and the intimation of something open to objection in his ordination, compared with the ambiguous manner in which the author of the Lausiac History speaks of his elevation, are, we think, conclusive as to the identity of the historian with Palladius of Hellenopolis. He is doubtless the Palladius charged by Epiphanius (Epist. ad Joan. Jerosol. apud Hieronym. Opera, vol. i. col. 252, ed. Vallars.), and by Jerome himself (Prooem. in Dial. adv. Pelagianos) with Origenism. Tillemont vainly attempts to show that Palladius the Origenist was a different person from the bishop of Hellenopolis. Assuming this identity, we may place his elevation to the episcopacy in A.D. 400, in which year he was probably present at the Synod held at Constantinople, and was sent into Proconsular Asia to procure evidence on a charge against the bishop of Ephesus. (Pallad. Dial. de Vita S. Joan. Chrys. p. 131.) The deposition of Chrysostom involved Palladius also in troubles, to which, as we have seen, he refers in his Lausiac History. Chrysostom, in his exile, wrote to “Palladius the bishop” (Epist. cxxii. Opera, vol. iii. p. 655, ed. Benedictin., p. 790, ed. Bened. secund. Paris, 1838, &c.), exhorting him to continue in prayer, for which his seclusion gave him opportunity; and from this notice we could derive, if needful, a farther proof of the identity of the two Palladii, since the historian, as we have seen, speaks of his concealment for “eleven months in a gloomy cell.”

Fearful of the violence of his enemies, Palladius of Hellenopolis fled to Rome (Dialog. de Vita S. Chrysost. c. 3. p. 26, and Hist. Lausiac. c. 121, Bibl. Patr.) in A.D. 405; and it was probably at Rome that he received the letter of encouragement addressed to him by the other fugitive bishops, Cyrilus of Synnada, Alysius, or Eulysius of the Bithynian Apameia, and Demetrius of Pessinus. (Chrys. Epist. cxviii. Opera, vol. iii. p. 686, ed. Benedictin., p. 827, ed. Benedict. secund.) It was probably at this time that Palladius became acquainted with the monks of Rome and Campania. When some bishops and presbyters of Italy were delegated by the Western emperor Honorius, the pope, Innocentius I. [Innocenti], and the bishops of the Western Church generally, to protest to the Eastern emperor Arcadius against the banishment of Chrysostom, and to demand the assembling of a new council in his case, Palladius and his fellow-exiles returned into the East, apparently as members of the delegation. But their return was ill-timed and unfortunate: they were arrested on approaching Constantinople, and both delegates and exiles were confined at Athyn in Thrace; and then the four returning fugitives were banished to separate and distant places, Palladius to the extremity of Upper Egypt, in the vicinity of the Blemmyes. (Dial. de Vita Chrysost., c. 4, 19, pp. 30, &c., 192, &c.) Tillemont supposes that after the death of Theophilus of Alexandria, the great enemy of Chrysostom (A.D. 412), Palladius obtained some relaxation of his punishment, though he was not allowed to return to Hellenopolis, or to resume his episcopal functions. He places in the interval between 412 and 420, when the Lausiac History was written, a residence of four years at Antinoe or Antinoupolis, in the Thebaid (c. 81, Meurs., 96, Bibl. Pair.), and of three years in the Mount of Olives, near Jerusalem (c. 63, Meurs., 103, Bibl. Pair.), as well as the visits which Palladius paid to many parts of the East. After a time he was restored to his bishopric of Hellenopolis, from which he was translated to that of Aspuna or Aspuna in Galatia (Socrat. vit. 36): but the dates both of his restoration and his translation cannot be fixed: they probably took place after the healing of the schism occasioned by Chrysostom's affair, in A.D. 417, and probably after the composition of the Lausiac History, in A.D. 419 or 420. Palladius was probably dead before A.D. 451, when, in the third General (first Ephesian) Council, the see of Aspuna was held by another person. He appears to have held the bishopric of Aspuna only a short time, as he is currently designated from Hellenopolis.

The works ascribed to Palladius are the following: Παλάτταδιος Αυτοκράτορ και Καθηγητής Αθηναίων Πολιτείας. The Lausiac History. This work contains biographical notices or characteristic anecdotes of a number of ascetics, with whom Palladius was personally acquainted, or concerning whom he received information from those who had known them personally. Though its value is diminished by the records of miracles and other marvels to which the author's credulity (the characteristic, however, of his age and class rather than of the individual) led him to give admission, it is curious and interesting as exhibiting the prevailing religious tendencies of the time, and valuable as recording various facts relating to eminent men. Sozomen has borrowed many anecdotes from this work, but without avowedly citing it. Socrates, who mentions the work (H. E. iv. 23), describes the author as a monk, a disciple of Evagrius of Pontus, and states that he flourished soon after the death of Valens. The date, and the absence of any reference to his episcopal dignity, might induce a suspicion that the author and the bishop were two different persons; but the coincidences are too many to allow the casual and inaccurate notice of Socrates to outweigh them. The Lausana or Lauson (the name is written both ways, Λαύος and Λαύων), to whom the work is addressed, was chamberlain (πράγμαστον τοις αυτούς, praepositus cubiculi), apparently to the Emperor Theodosius the Younger. The Historia Lausiana was repeatedly translated into Latin at an early period. There are extant three ancient translations, one ascribed by Heribert Rosweyde, but improperly, to Rufinus, who died before the work was written; and two others, the authors of which are not known; besides a comparatively modern version by Gentianus Hervetus. The first printed edition of the work was in one of the ancient Latin versions, which appeared in the infancy of the typographic art in the Vitae Patrum, printed three times without mark of year or place, or printer's name. It was reprinted in the Protogyna Vetoria Ecclesiae of Theodoricus Loher a Stratis, fol. Colgum. 1547. The version ascribed by Rosweyde to Rufinus had also been printed many times before it appeared in the first edition of the Vitae Patrum of that editor, fol. Antwerp, a. D. 1615. The remaining ancient Latin version, with several other pieces, was printed under the editorial care of Faber Staupulensis, fol. Paris, 1504, under the following title: Paradysus Heracleidis (Panzer, Annal. Typ. vol. vii. p. 510), or more fully Heracleidis Eremitae Liber qui dicitur Paradysus, seu Palladit Galatae Historia Lausiana. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 194.) The first edition of the Greek text, but a very imperfect one, was that of Meursius, who added notes, small 4to. Leyden, 1616. Another edition of the Greek text, fuller than that of Meursius, was contained in the Auctarium of Fronto Duceaus, vol. ii. fol. Paris, 1624, with the version of Hervetus, which had been first published 4to. Paris, 1535, and had been repeatedly reprinted in the successive editions of the Bibliotheca Patrum, the Vitae Patrum of Rosweyde, and elsewhere. The Greek text and version were reprinted from the Auctarium of Duceaus, in the editions of the Bibliotheca Patrum, fol. Paris, 1644 and 1654. Our references are to the edition of 1654. Some additional chapters are given in the Ecclesiae Graecae Monuments of Cotelerius, vol. iii. 4to. Paris, 1686. It is probable that the printed text is still very defective, and that large additions might be made from MSS. 2. Διάλογος Ἰστορικὸς Παλλάδιου Αἴγυπτου περὶ τῶν σωματικῶν ἀκαμήλατων. The Dialogus Historicos Palladii epicori Hellenopolis cum Thodooro ecclesiae Romanae ducento, de vite et conversione Beati Joannis Chrysostomi, epicori Constantinopolitis. This inaccurate title of the work misled many into the belief that it was really by Palladius of Hellenopolis, to whom indeed, not only the name, but the text and version were attributed. Another work, an exile at Rome for his adherence to Chrysostom, it was naturally enough ascribed. Photius calls the writer a bishop (Bibl. cod. 96, sub init.), and Theodorus of Trithimus, a Greek writer of uncertain date, distinctly identifies him with the author of the Historia Lausiana. A more attentive examination, however, has shown that the author of the Dialogus was a different person from the bishop, and several years older, though he was his companion and fellow-sufferer in the delegation from the Western emperor and church on behalf of Chrysostom, which occasioned the imprisonment and exile of the bishop. Bigotius thinks that the work was published anonymously; but that the author having intimated in the work that he was a bishop was mistakenly identified with Palladius, and the title of the work in the MS. given accordingly. The Dialogus de Vita S. Chrysostomi first appeared in a Latin version by Ambrosius Camaldulensis, or the Camaldolite, 8vo, Venice, 1532 (or 1533), and was reprinted at Paris and in the Vitae Sanctorum of Lipomannus, and in the Latin editions of Chrysostom's works. The Greek text was published by Emericus Bigotius, with a valuable preface and a new Latin version by the editor, with several other pieces, 4to. Paris, 1680, and was reprinted 4to. Paris, 1738. Tillemont, assuming that the author of the Dialogue was called Palladius, thinks he may have been the person to whom Athanasius wrote in A. D. 371 or 372. 3. Peri τῶν τῆς ἱδίας ἑθῶν καὶ τῶν Βραγμάνων, De Gentibus Indicis et Bragmanibus. This work is, in several MSS., ascribed to Palladius of Helenopolis, and in one MS. is subjoined to the Historia Lusiana. It was first published with a Latin version, but without the author’s name, in the Liber Gnomologicus of Joachimus Camerarius, 8vo, Leipsic, without date, according to Fabricius, but placed by Niceron (Mémoires, vol. xix. p.112), in 1571. It was again printed, and this time under the name of Palladius, together with “S. Ambrosii De Moribus Brachiconorumin,” and “Anonymus, De Bragmanibus” by Sir Edward Bisse (Bissæns), Clarenceux King of Arms, 4to., London, 1665. Some copies were printed on large paper in folio. The editor was evidently ignorant of the work having been published by Camerarius, and consequently gave a new Latin version, which is not considered equal to that of his predecessor. The authorship of Palladius is doubted by Cave, and denied by Oudin. Lambeckus (De Biblioth. Caesarææ, vol. v. p. 181, ed. Kollar) ascribes the work to Palladius of Methone. [No. 5.] All that can be gathered from the work itself, is, that the author was a Christian (passim), and lived while the Roman empire was yet in existence (p. 7, ed. Biss.), a mark of time, of little value, as the Byzantine empire retained to the last the name of Roman; and that he visited the nearest parts of India in company with Moses, bishop of Adula, a place on the borders of Egypt and Aethiopia. If this be the Moses mentioned by Socrates (II. E. iv. 36) and Sozomen (II. E. vi. 38), he lived rather too early for Palladius of Helenopolis to have been his companion, nor is there any reason to suppose that the latter ever visited India, so that the work De Gentibus Indicis is probably ascribed to him without reason. The supposed work of St. Ambrose, published by Bisse, is repudiated by the Benedictine editors of that father, and has been shown by Kollar to be a free translation of the work ascribed to Palladius. (Cave, Hist. Litt. ad annum, 401, vol. i. p. 576, fol. Oxford, 1740-45; Palladius, ed. Gruter, 1747, vol. viii. p. 456, &c. p. 98, &c.; Oudin, Comment. de Scriptor. Eclez. vol. i. col. 908, &c.; Tilllemont, Mémoires, vol. xi. p. 500, &c.; Vossius, De Histor. Graecia, lib. ii. c. 19.)

8. IATROSOPISTHRA, of Alexandria. [See above.]

9. Of MENTHON, a sophist or rhetorician, was the son of Palladius, and lived in the reign of Constantine the Great. He wrote, (1) Peri τῶν παρα Ρωμαίους ευρηνικών, De Romanorum Festis; (2) Διαλέξεις, Disputatwns; and (3) Λόγοι διάφοροι, Ὀλυμπικοῦ, πανγυμνοῦ, διακυκλοῦ, Orationes Di- verse, Olympicæ, Panegyrici, Judicialis (Suidas, s. v. Pallaúdo; Eudocia Iwída, Violeum, s. v. Palladás o Ἡρωίν, apud Villaonius, Anecdot. Graec. p. 352). It is probable that what Suidas and Eudocia describe as Orationes Diverse are the Melœtæ Di- fóro, Exercitationes Diiverse, which Phothis (Bibl. codd. 132—135) had read, and which he describes as far superior in every respect to those of the rhetoricians Aphthonius, Aphasias, Eusebius, and Maximus, of Alexandria. Lambeckus ascribes, but without reason, to this Palladius the name De Gentibus Indicis, &c., published under the name of Palladius of Helenopolis [No. 7]. This Palladius of Methone must not be confounded with the Latin rhetorician Palladius, the friend of Symmachus, mentioned by Sidonius Apollinaris (Symmach. Epistol. passim; Sidon. Epistol. lib. v. ep. 10). (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 135, vol. xx. pp. 113, 716, &c.; Vossius, De Historia Graec. lib. iv. c. 18.)

10. Porta. In various collections of the minor Latin poets is a short lyric poem, Allegoria Orphei, in the same measure as Horace’s ode “Solvit aeris hiemis,” &c. Wernsdorf, who has given it in his Poetae Latinæ Minores, vol. iii. p. 396, distinguishes (ibid. p. 342, &c.) the author of it from Palladius Rutulus Taurus Aemilianus, the writer on Agriculture; and is disposed to identify him with the rhetorical Palladius who lived in the reign of Theodosius the Great, and to whom many of the letters of Symmachus are addressed. He thinks that he may perhaps be the Palladius to whom his father, Julius Nicephorus, erected a monument, with the inscription, given by Gruter and others—

If these conjectures are well founded, it may be gathered that Palladius was the son of a rhetorician, or at least sprung from a family which had produced some rhetoricians of eminence; that he was originally himself a rhetorician, but had been called to engage in public life, and held the praefectura or some other office in the town and port of Ostia. He is perhaps also the Palladius mentioned by Sidonius Apollinaris (lib. v. Epist. 10). Wernsdorf also identifies him with the PallADIUS “Poeta Scholasticus,” several of whose verses are given in the Anthologia of Burmann: viz. Epistoles Ciceronis, lib. vi. 161, Argumentum in Aeneidos ii. 195, Epitaphia Virgili, ii. 197, 198, De Ratione Fabulae, iii. 73, De Ortu Solis, v. 7, De Iride, v. 23, De Signis Coe- lestibus, v. 31, De Quatuor Temporibus, v. 58, De Anno Glacie Concreto, v. 87. (Burmann, Anthologia Latina, ii. c.c: Wernsdorf, Poetae Latinæ Minores, ii. c.c; Fabricius, Bibli. Med. et Insam Latinam, vol. v. p. 191, ed. Manal.)

11. Rhetor. [No. 9, 10.]

12. RUTILIUS TAVRUS AEMILIANUS, a writer on agriculture. [See above.]

13. SCOTORUM Episcopus. In the Chronicon of Prosper Aquitanus, under the consulsip of Bassus and Antiochus (A. D. 431), this passage occurs, “Ad Scotos in Christum credentes ordinatur a papa Coelestinio Palladius, et primus episcopus mititur.” In another work of the same writer (Contra Collatorem, c. 21, § 2), speaking of Coele- stine’s exerxyons to repress the doctrines of Pe- lagius, he says, “Ordinato Scotis episcopo, dum Romanam insulam studet servare Catholicam, fecit etiam barbarum Christianam.” (Opera, col. 363, ed. Paris, 1711.) To these meagre notices, the only ones found in contemporary writers (unless, with some, we refer to the conversion of the Scoti the lines of Prosper De Ingrisis, vss. 330—332), the chroniclers and historians of the middle ages have added a variety of contradictory particulars, so that it is difficult, indeed impossible, to extract the true facts of Palladius’ history. It has been a matter of fierce dispute between the Irish and the Scots, to which of them Palladius was sent; but the usage of the word “Scotti,” in Prosper’s time, and the distinction drawn by him between “insulam Romanam” and “insulam bar- baroram,” seem to determine the question in favour of the Scoti.
of the Irish. This solution leads, however, to another difficulty. According to Prosper, Palladius converted the Irish, "sicet barbarum (sc. insulam) Christianam;" while the united testimony of ecclesiastical antiquity ascribes the conversion of Ireland to Patricius (St. Patrick), who was a little later than Palladius. But possibly the success of Palladius, though far from bearing out the statement of Prosper, may have been greater than subsequent writers, zealous for the honour of St. Patrick, and seeking to exaggerate his success by extenuating that of his predecessors, were willing to allow. There is another difficulty, arising from an apparent contradiction between the two passages in Prosper, one of which ascribes to Palladius the conversion of the island, while the other describes him as being sent "ad Scotos in Christo credentes;" but this seeming contradiction may be reconciled by the supposition that Palladius had visited the island and made some converts, before being consecrated and again sent out as their bishop. This supposition accounts for a circumstance recorded by Prosper, that "Florentio et Dionysio Cos."

Liber, vii. p. 286, &c. Palladius is commemorated as a saint by the Irish Romanists on the 27th Jan.: by those of Scotland on July 6th. His shrine, or reputed shrine, at Fordun, in the Mearns, in Scotland, was regarded before the Reformation with the greatest reverence; and various localities in the neighbourhood are still pointed out as connected with his history. Jocelin, of Furness, a monkish writer of the twelfth century, states, in his life of St. Patrick (Acta Sanctor. Martii, vol. ii. p. 545; July, vol. ii. p. 289), that Palladius, disheartened by his little success in Ireland, crossed over into Great Britain, and died in the territory of the Picts; a statement which, supported as it is by the local traditions of Fordun, may be received as containing a portion of truth. The mediæval writers have, in some instances, strangely confounded Palladius, the apostle of the Scotti, with Palladius of Hellenopolis; and Trithemius (De Script. Eccl. c. 133), and even Baronius (Annal. Eccl. ad ann. 429. § 8), who is followed by Possennio, make the former to be the author of the Dialogus de Vita Chrysostomi. Baronius, also, ascribes to him (ibid.) Liber contra Pelagianos, Ho- miliarum Liber unus, and Ad Coelestinum Epist. harum Liber unus, and other works written in Greek. For these statements he cites the authority of Trithemius, who however mentions only the Dialogos. It is probable that the statement rests on the very untrustworthy authority of Bale (Bale, Script. Illustr. Maj. Britann. cent. xiv. 6; Usher, l.c.; Sollerus l.c.; Tillemont, Mém. vol. xiv. p. 154, &c. p. 737; Fabricius, Bibli. Med. et Infin. Latinit. vol. v. p. 191.)

14. Of SUERDA, in Pamphylia. Prefixed to the Anecroratus of Epiphanius of Salamis or Constantia [EPHIPANIUS], is a Letter of Palladius to that father. It is headed 'Επιστολή γραφεία παρά Παλλαδίου τῆς αὐτοῦ πλήθος Συνεχοῦς πολιτείω- μένου καὶ ἀποστολίσας τρός τούς αὐτοῦ ἄγον ἔσπανον αὐτής καὶ αὐτοῦ περὶ τῶν αὐτῶν, Palladii ejusdem Suedrorum urbis civis ad Sanctum Epiphaniun Epístola, qua idem ab eo postulat, i.e. in which he sends the request made by certain Presbyters of Suedra (whose letter precedes that of Palladius) that Epiphanius would answer certain questions respecting the Trinity of which the Anecroratus contains the solution. PALLADIUS, RUTULIUS TAURUS AEMILIANUS, the author of a treatise De Re Rustica, in the form of a Farmer's Calendar, the various operations connected with agriculture and a rural life being arranged in regular order, according to the seasons in which they ought to be performed. It is comprised in fourteen books: the first is introductory, the twelve following contain the duties of the twelve months in succession, commencing with January; the last is a poem, in eighty-five elegiac couplets, upon the art of grafting (De Insititum), each of these books, with the exception of the fourteenth, is divided into short sections distinguished by the term Tituli instead of chapters. The last book is headed 'Epistula ad Capitoliam, a circumstance which is by some critics regarded as a proof that the author belongs to a late period. That period may have been scholars have toiled hard to discover. The first writer by whom Palladius is mentioned is Isidorus of Seville, who refers to him twice, simply as Aemilianus ( Orig. xvi. 1. § 1, 10. § 8), the name under which he is spoken of by Cassiodorus also (Dioin. Lect. c. 28). Barthis supposes him to be the eloquent Gaulish youth Palladius, to whose merits Rutulius paya so warm a compliment in his Itinerary (i. 207), while Wernsdorf, advancing one step farther into the realms of fancy (Poët. Lat. Min. vol. v. p. 551), imagines that he may have been adopted by Rutulius, an idea which, however, he afterwards abandoned (vol. vi. p. 20), and rested satisfied with assigning him to the age of Valentinian or Theodosius. The internal evidence is by no means so copious as a confirmation for this discovery of information from without. The style, without being barbarous, is such as would justify us in bringing the writer down as low as the epoch fixed by Wernsdorf, although he might with equal propriety be placed two centuries earlier; but the controversy seems to have recently received a new light from the researches of Count Bartolommeo Borgesi, who, in a memoir published among the Transactions of the Turin Academy (vol. xxxviii. 1853), has pointed out that Pasiphilus, the person to whom in all probability Palladius dedicates his fourteenth book, was prefaet of the city in A.D. 355. We gather from his own words (iv. 10. § 16), that he was possessed of property in Sardini ‘a and in the territories territorii Nigeris, wherever that may have been or to which he had himself practised horticulture in Italy (iv. 10. § 24), but the expressions from which it has been inferred he was a native of Gaul (i. 13. § 1, vii. 2. § 2) by no means justify such a conclusion. Although evidently not devoid of a practical acquaintance with his subject, a considerable portion of the whole work is taken directly from Columella; in all that relates to gardening, and especially to the management of fruit trees he was deeply indebted to Gargilius Martialis; various recipes are extracted from the Greeks consulted by the compilers of the "Geoponica," and the chapters connected with architectural details are mere compendiums of Vitruvius. Palladius seems to have been very popular in the middle ages, a fact established by the great variety of readings afforded by different MSS; since these discrepancies prove that the text must have been very frequently transcribed, and by the circumstance that nearly the whole of the treatise is to be found included in the well-known "Speculum" of Vincentius of Beauvais. The name, as given at the head of this article, appears at full length both at the beginning and at the end of the Vatican Codex.

Palladius was first printed by Jenson in the "Rei Rusticae Scriptores," fol. Venet. 1472, and from that time forward was included in nearly all the collections of writers upon agricultural topics. The best editions are those contained in the "Scriptores Rei Rusticae veteres Latini" of Gesner, 2 vols. 4to. Lips. 1735, reprinted with additions and corrections by Ernesti in 1773, and in the "Scriptores Rei Rusticae" of Schneider, 4 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1794, in which the text underwent a complete revision, and appears under a greatly amended form.

There are translations into English by Thomas Owen, 8vo. London 1803, into German along with Columella by Maius, fol. Magdeb. 1612, into French by Jean Darces, 8vo. Paris, 1553, into Italian by Marino, 4to. Sien. 1526, by Nicolò di Aristotile detto Zoppino, 4to. Vineg. 1528, by San-sovino, 4to. Vineg. 1560, and by Zanotti, 4to. Veron. 1810. [W. R.]

PALLANTHA, a daughter of Evander, was beloved by Hercules, and said to have been born on the Palatine hill at Rome, which derived its name from her. (Serv. ad Aen. viii. 51.) Evander himself, being a grandson of Pallas, is also called Pallantius. (Ov. Fast. v. 647.) [L. S.]

PALLANTHA, a daughter of the giant Pallas, is sometimes designated. (Ov. Met. iv. 373, vi. 567, ix. 420.) Pallantias also occurs as a variation for Pallas, the surname of Athena. (Anthol. Palat. vi. 247.) [L. S.]

PALLAS (Πάλλας). 1. A son of Crius and Eurybia, was one of the Titans, and brother of Astraesus and Perses. He was married to Styx, by whom he became the father of Zelus, Cmotos, Biba, and Nice. (Hes. Theog. 376, 383; Paus. viii. 26. § 5, viii. 18, § 1; Apollod. i. 2. §§ 24.)

2. A son of Megamedes, and father of Selene. (Horn. Hymn. in Mer. 100.)

3. A giant, who, in the fight with the gods, was slain by Athena, and slain by her. (Apollod. i. 6. § 3.)

4. A son of Lycon, and grandfather of Evander, is said to have founded the town of Pallantium in Arcadia, where statues were erected both to Pallas and Evander. (Paus. viii. 3. § 1. 44. § 3.) Servius (ad Aen. viii. 54) calls him a son of Aeusges, and states that being expelled by his brother Theseus, he emigrated into Arcadia; and Dionysius of Halicarnassus (i. 33) confines him with Pallas, the son of Crius.

5. According to some traditions, the father of Athena, who slew him as he was on the point of violating her. (Cic. De Nat. Deor. iii. 23; Tzetz. ad Lyce. 353.)

6. A son of Heracles by Dyna, the daughter of Evander; from her some derived the name of the Palatine hill at Rome. (Dionys. i. 32.)

7. A son of Evander, and an ally of Aeneas, was slain by the Rutulian Turmus. (Virg. Aen. viii. 104, 514, xi. 140, &c.)

8. A son of the Athenian king Pandion, and accordingly a brother of Aegeus, Nisos, and Lyceus, was slain by Theseus. The celebrated family of the Pallantidae at Athens trace their origin up to this Pallas. (Apollod. iii. 15. § 5; Paus. i. 22. § 2, 26. § 10; Plut. Theor. 3; Euri. Hippol. 35.) [L. S.]

PALLAS (Πάλλας), a surname of Athena. In Homer this name always appears united with the name Athena, as Πάλλας Αθήνη or Πάλλας Αθηναῖα; but in writers we also find Pallas alone instead of Athena. (Pind. Ol. v. 21.) Plato (Cra- tyl. p. 406) derives the surname from παλλάω, to brandish, in reference to the goddess brandishing the spear or negis, whereas Apollodorus (i. 6. § 2) derives it from the giant Pallas, who was slain by Athena. But it is more probable that Pallas is the same word as παλλάξιος, i. e. a virgin or maiden. (Comp. Tzetz. ad Lyce. 355.) Another female Pallas, described as a daughter of Triton, is mentioned under PALLADIUS. [L. S.]

PALLAS, a freedman of the emperor Claudius, and one of his greatest favourites. He was originally the slave of Antonia, the mother of Claudius, and is first mentioned in A. D. 31, when Antonia entrusted to him the responsible commission of carrying a letter to the emperor Tiberius, in which she disclosed the ambitions projects of Sejanus, and in consequence of which the all-powerful minister was put to death. (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 7. § 9.)

The name of Pallas does not occur during the reign of Caligula, but on the accession of Claudius, whose property he had become by the death of Antonia, and who had meantime manumitted him, he played an important part in public affairs. Along with Narcissus and Callistus, two other freedmen, he administered the affairs of the empire, but Narcissus had more energy and resolution than the other two, and consequently took the leading part in the government during the early part of Claudius' reign. When they saw that the death of Messalina, the wife of the emperor, was necessary to their own security, Narcissus alone had the courage to carry it into execution. (Narcissus; Pallas was afraid to take any decisive step. The consequence was, that after the execution of the empress, the influence of Narcissus became superior to that of Callistus and Pallas, but the latter soon recovered his former power. The question was then, whether the weak-minded emperor should marry, and each of the three freedmen had a different person to propose. Pallas was fortunate enough to advocate the claims of Agrippina, who actually admitted the freedman to her embraces in order to purchase his support; and upon the marriage of Agrippina to the emperor in A. D. 50, Pallas shared in the good fortune of his candidate. He was now leagued with the emperor in order to oppose Narcissus; and Pallas and Agrippina became the real rulers of the Roman world. It was Pallas who persuaded Claudius to adopt the young Domitius (afterwards the emperor Nero), the son of Agrippina, and he thus paved the way for his accession to the throne. This important service did not go unrewarded. In A. D.
52, Claudius proposed a law in the senate respecting the punishment of women who had intercourse with slaves, and mentioned the name of Pallas as the author of the law, in order that the senate might confer some mark of favour upon him. This was done at the instigation of Agrippina, and the servile body forthwith conferred upon Pallas the insignia of a praetor, and voted him a sum of fifteen millions of sesterces. They even went so far, on the proposition of Cornelius Scipio, as to return thanks to Pallas, because he was willing to be numbered among the servants of the emperor, although descended from the kings of Arcadia! But as Claudius said that Pallas, contented with the honours, would continue in his former state of poverty, they passed a decree, praising for his frugality a freedman who possessed a fortune of 300 millions of sesterces. This decree of the senate was engraved on a brazen tablet, and placed near the statue of Julius Caesar, in one of the most frequented parts of the city, where it was seen in the time of the younger Pliny, who speaks of it in terms of the greatest indignation. (Tac. Ann. xxi. 35; Plin. Ep. viii. 29, viii. 6; comp. Plin. H. N. xxvii. 18, 58.)

As long as Claudius lived, Agrippina could not be certain of the succession of her son, and accordingly poisoned her husband, doubtless with the connivance and assistance of Pallas, in A.D. 54. Narcissus, who had remained true to the interests of Claudius and his son Britannicus, was also despatched immediately after the death of the emperor, and thus no one any longer stood in the way of Pallas. Agrippina had hoped to govern the Roman world in the name of her son, and Pallas expected to share in her power. But both were soon doomed to a cruel disappointment. Nero speedily became tired of his mother's control, and as one step towards emancipating himself from her authority, deprived her favourite Pallas of all his public offices, and dismissed him from the palace as early as the year 56. In the same year Pallas was accused, together with Burrus, by one Paeus, of a conspiracy to supplant Cornelius Nerva to the throne, but being defended by Seneca, according to Dion Cassius (lxi. 10), he was acquitted. From this time he was suffered to live unmolested for some years, till at length his immense wealth excites the rapacity of Nero, who had him removed by poison, in A.D. 63. His enormous wealth, which was acquired during the reign of Claudius, had become proverbial, as we see from the line in Juvenal (i. 107), ego possideo plus Pallante et Licinio; and when the poverty of the imperial treasury was complained of on one occasion in the reign of Claudius, it was said that the emperor would possess an abundance, if he were taken into partnership by his two freedmen, Narcissus and Pallas. (Suet. Claud. 28; comp. Plin. H. N. xxxii. 16. s. 47.) The arrogance and pride of Pallas are specially mentioned both by Tacitus and Dion Cassius, and it is related of him that he never gave any orders, even to his freedmen, by word of mouth; and that if a nod or a sign with his hand did not suffice, he signified in writing what he wished to be done. In this he seems to have adopted the imperial practice, which was first introduced by Augustus. (Comp. Suet. Aug. 84; Lipsius, ad Tac. Ann. iv. 39.) The brother of Pallas was Antonius or Claudius Felix, who was appointed by Claudius to the government of Judea, where, he committed such atrocities that he was accused by the Jews, and was saved only from condign punishment by the influence of Pallas. [Felix, Antoninus.] (Tac. Ann. xi. 29—38, xii. 2, 25, 52, 65, xiii. 14, 26, xiv. 2; Dion Cass. lxi. 2, xliii. 14; Suet. Claud. 28, Vell. 2; Joseph. Ant. xx. 8, § 9.)

PALLAS (Παλλάς), the author of a work on the mysteries of the god Mithras (Porphyry, de Abstin. ii. 56, iv. 16).

PALLÈNE (Παλλήνη). 1. A daughter of Sithon, from whom the town of Pallene in the peninsula of the same name was said to have derived its name. (Steph. Byz. s. v.)

2. A daughter of the giant Aleyoneus, and one of the Aleyonides. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 776; Suidas, s. v. Ἀλευώνης.)

PALLÉNIS (Παλλήνης), a surname of Athena, under which she had a temple between Athens and Marathon. (Herod. i. 62.)

PULLOR, i. e. paleness or pale fear, or a personification of it, was together with Pavor, i.e. Fear, a companion of Mars among the Romans. Their worship is said to have been venerated and instituted by the warlike King Titus Tatius, either on account of a plague, or at the moment when in battle he saw the Alban Mertius desert to the enemies. The Salii, Pallorii, and Pavorii were instituted at the same time. (Liv. i. 27; August. De Civ. Dei, iv. 23.)

PALMA, A. CORNELIUS, was consul in A.D. 99, and a second time in 109. Between his first and second consulships, he was governor of Syria, and conquered the part of Arabia in the neighbourhood of Petra, about A.D. 105 (Dion Cass. lxviii. 14). Pallam had always been one of Hadrian's enemies, and was therefore put to death by that emperor upon his accession to the throne in 117. (Dion Cass. lxix. 2.; Spart. Hadr. 4.)

P'AMMENES (Παμμήνης). 1. An Athenian, the son of Pammenes. He exercised the trade of a goldsmith, and was employed by Demosthenes to make for him a crown of gold, and a garment interwoven with gold, to wear at the Dionysia. When they were ready, Meidias entered by night into the workshop of Pammenes, and endeavoured to destroy the crown and garments, in which he was partially successful, but was interrupted by the appearance of Pammenes. (Dem. c. Meid. p. 521.)

2. A Theban general of considerable celebrity. He was connected with Epaminondas by political and friendly ties. When Philip, the future king of Macedonia, was sent as hostage to Thebes, he was placed under the care of Pammenes. (Plut. Pelop. c. 26.) In B.C. 571, when Megalopolis was founded, as it was apprehended that the Spartans would attack those engaged in that work, Epaminondas sent Pammenes to the head of 1000 picked troops to defend them. (Paus. viii. 27. § 2.) In B.C. 352, a party amongst the Megalopolitans were for dissolving the community, and returning to their own cantons, and called upon the Mantinians and other Peloponnesians, for aid. The Megalopolitans who opposed this dissolution of the state called in the aid of the Thebans, who sent Pammenes with 3000 foot soldiers and 300 cavalry to their assistance. With this force Pammenes overcame all resistance, and compelled those who had left Megalopolis to return. (Diod. xiv. 94, where by a mistake the Athenians, and not the Thebans, are represented as sending this assistance. Sir J. Thirlwall, Hist. of Greece, vol. v. p. 297, note.)

When Artabazus revolted against Ochus, Pammenes led a body of 5000 Thebans to the aid of the former, and overcame the forces of the king in two great battles. (Diod. xvi. 34.) But Artabazus, suspecting that he was intriguing with his enemies, arrested him, and handed him over to his brothers, Oxythras and Dibictus. (Polyaen. vii. 33. § 2. Some of the stratagems of Pammenes are described by Polyaeus, v. 16.)

Pammenes is spoken of as being greatly addicted to that paederastia which was the disgrace of Greece. It is difficult to say what degree of credit should be attached to the story, that, while Philip was under the charge of Pammenes, the latter maintained an illicit connection with the young prince. (Plut. Sympos. p. 618, d, Erotic. c. 17; Liban. Orig. in Aeschin. p. 102, d.)

3. An Athenian rhetorician, a contemporary of Cicero, who calls him by this descent: "the elephant man in Greece. He was a great admirer of Demosthenes, whose speeches he commended to the attention of his pupils. M. Brutus studied under him. (Cic. Brut. 97, Orig. c. 30.) It is probably another Pammenes, of whom we know nothing, who is mentioned by Cic. ad Att. v. 20. § 10, vi. 2. § 10.)

4. A citharoedus, who flourished in the time of Caligula, and was distinguished enough to have statues erected in his honour. When Nero made his musical expedition into Greece, Pammenes, though an old man, was one of those with whom he contended, as it appears, simply that he might have the pleasure of insulting his statues. (Dion Cass. liv. 8.)

[Pa-MPhila (Παμφίλη), a female historian of considerable reputation, who lived in the reign of Nero. According to Suidas she was an Epidaurian (a v. Παιμφίλης), but Photius (Cod. 175) describes her as an Egyptian by birth or descent: the two statements, however, may be reconciled by supposing that she was a native of Epidaurus, and that her family came from Egypt. She related in the preface to her work, for an account of which we are indebted to Photius (l. c.), that, during the thirteen years she had lived with her husband, from whom she was never absent for a single hour, she was constantly at work upon her book, and that she diligently wrote down whatever she heard from her husband and from the many other learned men who frequented their house, as well as whatsoever she herself read in books. Hence we can account for the statement of Suidas, that some authorities ascribed her work to her husband. The name of her husband is differently stated. In one passage Suidas (a v. Παιμφίλης), speaks of her as the daughter of Soteridas and the wife of Socratidas, but in another passage he describes her (a v. Σωτηρίδας) as the wife of Soteridas. The passage in Photius (cod. 161, p. 103, a, 35, ed. Bekker), where we read ἐκ τῶν Σωτηρίδα Παιμφίλης ἐπίτομων, leaves the question undecided, as Soteridas may there indicate either the father or the husband.

The principal work of Pamphila is cited by various names; sometimes simply as υπομυθημάτων λόγοι. The latter title gives a general idea of the nature of its contents, which are still further characterised by Photius. The work was not arranged according to subjects or according to any settled plan, but it was more like a commonplace book, in which each piece of information was set down as it fell under the notice of the writer, who stated that she believed this variety would give greater pleasure to the reader. Photius considers the work as one of great use, and supplying important information on many points in history and literature. The estimation in which it was held in antiquity is shown, not only by the judgment of Photius, but also by the references to it in the works of A. Gellius and Diogenes Laërtius, who appear to have availed themselves of it to a considerable extent. Modern scholars are best acquainted with the name of Pamphila, from a statement in her work, preserved by A. Gellius (xiv. 23), by which is ascertained the year of the birth of Helianicus, Herodotus, and Thucydides respectively. (Herodotus, p. 451, b.) But this account, though preserved by his Ypokes, seems to have been the result of his life of Thucydidès (p. 7), on account of the little confidence that can be placed in Pamphila's authority. The history of Pamphila was divided into many books. Photius speaks only of eight, but Suidas says that it consisted of thirty-three. The latter must be correct, since we find A. Gellius quoting the eleventh (xiv. 23) and twenty-ninth (xiv. 17), and Diogenes Laërtius the twenty-fifth (iii. 23) and thirty-second (v. 36). Perhaps no more than eight books were extant in the time of Photius. The work is likewise referred to by Diogenes Laërtius in other passages (i. 24, 68, 76, 90, 98, ii. 24). Comp. Vossius, De Historicis Graecis, p. 237, ed. Westermann.

Besides the history already mentioned, Pamphila wrote several other works, the titles of which are given by Suidas. 1. An Epitome of Ctesias, in three books. 2. Epitomes of histories and of other works, ἐπίτομα ἱστοριῶν τε καὶ ἄλλων βιβλίων, from which work Stephanus appears to have drawn his materials (Phot. cod. 161, p. 103). It is, however, not impossible that this work is the same as the υπομύθημα, and that Suidas has confounded the two. 3. Περὶ ἀμφισβητήσεων. 4. Περὶ ἀφροδισίων.

PAMPHILIDAS (Παμφιλίδας), a Rhodian, who was appointed together with Eudamus to command the Rhodian fleet in the war against Antonius, after the defeat and death of Pausistratus, b. c. 190. [Pausistratus.] He was a man of a prudent and cautious character, and in the conference held by the Roman general L. Aemilius Regillus, at Elaea, inclined to the side of peace. Shortly after he was despatched, together with Eudamus, to watch for and encounter the fleet which Hannibal was about to bring from Phoenicia to the support of Antonius. The two fleets met off Side in Pamphylia, and the Rhodians were defeated by Artabazus himself, Paphilidas and his colleague in the command prevented the victory from being as decisive as it might otherwise have proved. After this action Paphilidas was detached with a small squadron to carry on naval operations on the coast of Asia, and is the last mention that occurs of his name. (Polyb. xxi. 5, 8; Liv. xxxvii. 22—24, 25.)

[Παμφίλος, literary. 1. A disciple of Plato, who is only remembered by the circumstance that Epicurus, when a young man, heard him at Samos. Epicurus used to speak of him with great contempt, partly, according to Cicero, that he might not be thought to owe anything to his instruction; for it was the great boast of Epicurus, that he was the sole author of his own philosophy. (Diog. Laërt. x. 14; Suid. s. v. Εὐκόπος; Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 26.)

2. A rhetorician, and writer on the art of rhetoric, mentioned by Aristotle in conjunction with Callippos. (Rhet. ii. 23, § 21.) It is impossible to determine whether he is the same as the rhetorician of this name mentioned by Cicero (De Orat. ii. 61), who was among the orators and grammarians who fell into the extraordinary blunder of supposing that Pamphilus the painter is referred to); or as the one mentioned by Quintillian (iii. 6. § 34); or whether all three were different persons.

3. A philosopher, of Amphipolis, or Sicyon, or Nicopolis, surnamed Φιλοστράγματος, wrote the following works: εἰκόνες κατά στοιχεῖα, τέχνη γραμματική, περὶ γραφῆς καὶ γράφοντος ἐνδιάβασις, γεωργικά βιβλία γ'. (Suid. s. v., who confounds him with the teacher of Epicurus.) We have no other mention of any of these works, except the last, of which there are considerable fragments in the Geoponica of Bassus. As two out of the four works in the above list are upon art, and as Suidas calls Pamphilus an Amphipolian or Sicyonian, it has been conjectured that this Pamphilus was the great painter, who was a native of Amphipolis and the head of the Sicyonian school. Several of the great artists, and especially about the time of Pamphilus, wrote works on art, as, for example, Apelles and Melanthius; and it seems especially probable that Pamphilus, who was famed for the scientific character of his teaching, would do the same. The argument is good so far as it goes, but the best conclusion to draw from it seems to be, not that the whole article in Suidas is to be referred to the painter, but that the lexicographer has here, as frequently elsewhere, confounded different persons; namely, the painter, to whom we may ascribe the "Likenesses in Alphabetical Order," and the work on "Painting and Celebrated Painters," and a philosopher, or rather grammarian of Nicopolis, author of the other two works.

The latter, again, is perhaps the same person who wrote a work on plants (περὶ Βοτανῶν) in alphabetical order, and who is frequently mentioned and ridiculed by Galen. He is sometimes enumerated among the physicians, but Galen expressly says that he was a grammarian, and had never seen the plants about which he wrote. (Galen, περὶ τῆς τῶν ἀνάγκων φαρμάκων διανομῆς, pp. 67, &c.) His book found a place in the work of the younger Dioscorides, and considerable fragments of it are found in the Geoponica. A work of Pamphilus Περὶ φυτῶν is also cited in the Geoponica (xiii. 15). To this grammarian, who busied himself also with physical science, the epithet φιλοστράγματος, which Suidas tells us was given to Pamphilus of Nicopolis, might very well be applied, and the work on agriculture, which Suidas ascribes to the latter, may be, perhaps, the same as that on plants, which is cited by Galen. A further point of resemblance is, that the fragments of Pamphilus's work on agriculture in the Geoponica contain several examples of that superstition with which Galen charges the author of the work on plants. Whether they are to be identified or not, the latter writer must have lived about the first century of our era, since his work was copied by Dioscorides.

4. An Alexandrian grammarian, of the school of Aristarchus, and the author of a lexicon, which is supposed by some scholars to have formed the foundation of the lexicon of Hesychius. The list of his works, as given by Suidas, is rather obscure, but the following is probably the correct punctuation of the passage: ἣνας λέμανα (εἴτε δὲ ποικίλων περίπτωσιν), περὶ γλωσσῶν ἡν τοῦ λέξεων βιβλία ἔτε... εἰς τὰ Νικηφόρου ἀνεφήτη καὶ τὰ καλομένα ὑφικι, τέχνην κρίτης, καὶ ἄλλα πλείων ἡγεμόνων. The Λέξεων is supposed to doubt one of those miscellaneous collections of facts and discussions to which the ancient grammarians were fond of giving such fanciful titles. The correctness of the title ἀνεφήτη is questionable, as there is no other mention of such a work by Nicander. The next title is διώκα in most of the MSS., and has been variously corrected into ὑφικι, ὑφικι, and ὑφικικαί; one critic, Reinesius, even conjectures ὀρφικαί, which is a groundless fancy. [NICAN- DER.] Of the τέχνη κρίτη we have no other mention. With respect to Pamphilus's chief work, the lexicon, we learn from Suidas that it was in 95 books (other readings give 75, 205, and 405), and that it extended from ε to ο, the preceding part, from α to θ, having been compiled by Zopyrian. It is quoted under various titles, such as περὶ γλώσσων, περὶ υμνώματος, περὶ γλώσσων καὶ υμνώματος. It was arranged in alphabetical order, and particular attention was paid in it words peculiar to the respective dialects. The controversy respecting its relation to the work of Hesychius is too extensive and doubtful to be entered on here; a full discussion of it, with further information respecting the lexicon of Pamphilus, will be found in the works of Ranke and Welcker, already quoted under Ἡσυχιος, to which should be added the article Pamphilus, also by Ranke, in Erscb and Gruber's Encyclopädie. (See also Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. pp. 374, 631.) He appears to have lived in the first century of our era. He may be presumed to be the Pamphilus quoted in the Scholia on Homer. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 518.)

5. An epigrammatic poet, who had a place in the Garland of Meleager, and two of whose epigrams are contained in the Greek Anthology. (Bruneck, Amst. vol. i. p. 239; Jacobs, Ant. Graec. vol. i. p. 190.) Whether or not he is identical with either of the preceding writers, we have no means of determining.

6 Of Sicily, a sophist or grammarian, or poet, who is mentioned by Athenaeus for his strange conceit of always speaking in verse at table. (Ath. i. p. 4, d.; Suid. s. v. Πιμωδὸς ὀστρό; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 313.)

7. Presbyter of Caesarea, in Palestine, saint and martyr, and also celebrated for his friendship with Eusebius, who, as a memorial of this intimacy, assumed the surname of Παμπύλου. [EUSE- BIUS.] He was probably born at Berytus, of an honourable and wealthy family. Having received his early education in his native city, he proceeded to Caesarea, where he attended the instructions of Piereus, the head of the catechetical school. Afterwards, but at what time we are not informed, he became a presbyter under Agapius, H 4 the bishop of Caesarea in Palestine. In the fifth year of the persecution under Diocletian, towards the end of the year A.D. 307, he was thrown into prison by Ubarus, the governor of Palestine, for refusing to sacrifice to the heathen deities. Eusebius attended upon him most affectingly during his imprisonment, which lasted till the 16th of February, 309, when he suffered martyrdom by the command of Firmilianus, the successor of Ubarus.

The life of Pamphilus seems to have been entirely devoted to the cause of biblical literature, and of a free theology, but more especially the former: he was an ardent admirer and follower of Origen. Jerome tells us that he was always ready to show his friendship for studious men, and to supply their wants; and that he multiplied copies of the Holy Scriptures to such an extent that he was able not only to lend, but to give them away. He formed, at Caesarea, a most valuable public library, chiefly of ecclesiastical authors, a catalogue of which was contained in the lost work of Eusebius on the life of Pamphilus. Not only did the writings of Origen occupy an important place in this library, but the greater part of the library described by him was his own, as we learn from Jerome, who used these very copies. Perhaps the most valuable of the contents of this library were the Tetractyla and Hexapla of Origen, from which Pamphilus, in conjunction with Eusebius, formed a new recension of the Septuagint, numerous copies of which were put into circulation. Among the other treasures of this library was a copy of the so-called Hebrew text of the gospel of St. Matthew, as used by the Nazarenes. There is still extant one MS., if not two, which some suppose to have been transcribed by Pamphilus for his library (Montfacon, Bibl. Costil, p. 251; Proleg. ad Orig. Hexapl. pp. 14, 76). The library is supposed to have been destroyed at the taking of Caesarea by the Arabs, in the seventh century. Another eminent service which Pamphilus rendered to the Christians of Caesarea, was the foundation of a theological school, in which the exposition of the Scriptures formed the chief subject. The library which he left behind him was so free from his own, except a few letters, is certainly incorrect. Photius expressly states that the Apology for Origen was commenced by Pamphilus in prison, where he composed five books of it in conjunction with Eusebius, and that the sixth book was added by Eusebius after the martyrdom of Pamphilus. Of these six books the first only is extant, in the incorrect Latin version of Rufinus. It is printed in Delarue's edition of Origen, Galland's Bibliotheca Patrum, and Routh's Itelliquae Sacrae. The work was in the form of a letter to the Christian confessors condemned to the mines in Palestine. There is another work ascribed to Pamphilus by some writers, under the title of Expositio capitum Actuum Apostolorum, but it is quite impossible to decide whether this was really written by Pamphilus or by Euthalius.

Eusebius wrote a life of Pamphilus in three books, but it is entirely lost, excepting a few fragments, and even these are doubtful. All that we now know of him is derived from scattered passages in the works of Eusebius, Jerome, Photius, and others. (Euseb. H. E. vi. 32, vii. 32, de Mart. Palæst. 11; Hieron. de Vir. Illust. 73, adv. Rufin. L. vol. iv. p. 357, II. vol. iv. p. 419; Phot. Cod. 118; Acta S. Pamphili Martyris; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 712; Lardner, Tillemont, Schröck, and the other church historians.)

PAMPHILUS (Eusebius Pamphilus), Bishop of Caesarea, was born about 250, and died 309. Of Amphipolis (Suid. s. v. 'Αμφιλίας; Marcellus nat. Hist., Plin.), one of the most distinguished of the Greek painters, flourished about O. 97—107, B.C. 390—350. He was the disciple of Eupompus, the founder of the Sicilian school of painting [Eupompus], for the establishment of which, however, Pamphilus seems to have done much more than even Eupompus himself. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 10. s. 36, § 7, 11. s. 40; Plut. Arat. 18). Of his own works we have most scanty accounts; but as a teacher of his art he was surpassed by none of the ancient masters. According to Pliny, he was the first artist who possessed a thorough acquaintance with all branches of knowledge, especially arithmetic and geometry, without which he used to say that the art could not be perfected. All science, therefore, which could in any way contribute to form the perfect artist, was included in his course of instruction, which extended over ten years, and for which he was no less famous than Eupompus. Among those who paid this price for his tuition were Apelles and Melanthius. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 10. s. 36. § 8). Not only was the school of Pamphilus remarkable for the importance which the master attached to general learning, but also for the minute attention which he paid to accuracy in drawing. On this subject Pliny says that this artist's influence established the rule, first at Sicily, and afterwards throughout all Greece, that free-born boys were taught before anything else (in art, of course) the graphic art [graphia, drawing with the graphis], that is, painting on box-wood, and this art was received into the first rank of the studies of the free-born (Plin. L. c.). "Two things are clear from this passage. First, it proves the high and just view which Pamphilus took of the place which art ought to occupy in a liberal education: that, just as all learning is necessary to make an accomplished artist, so is some practical knowledge of art needful to an accomplished man: and, secondly, the words graphiken, &c est, picturam in buxo, while they are not to be restricted to mere drawing, are yet evidently intended to describe a kind of drawing or painting, in which the first requisites were accuracy and clearness of outline. (See Dict. of Ant. s. v. Painting, p. 692, note; Böttiger, Ideen zur Archäologie der Malerei, pp. 145, foll.; and Fusielli's First Lecture.)" Modern writers have taken great pains to ascertain how Pamphilus made arithmetic and geometry to contribute so essentially to the art of painting. Speaking generally, the words evidently describe the whole of the laws of proportion, as definitely determined by numbers and geometrical figures, which form the foundation of all correct drawing and composition. This subject is very fully illustrated in Flaxman's Fourth Lecture, where he remarks that the laws given by Vitruvius (vil. 1.) were taken from the writings of the Greek artists, perhaps from those of Pamphilus himself: and in another passage he observes, "Geometry enabled the artist scientifically to ascertain forms for the configuration of bodies; to determine the motion of the figure in leaping, running, striking, or falling, by curves and angles, whilst arithmetic gave the multiplication of measures in proportions.”

These being the principles of the school of Pamphilus, we can easily understand the fact stated by Quintilian (xii. 10) that he and his pupil Melanthius excelled all other painters in what he calls ratio, by which we must understand proportion in its widest sense, including composition (Pliny uses the word dispositio. See Melanthius).

Of his pictures Pliny only mentions four: a Cogmatio, by which we must probably understand a family group; a battle at Philus; a victory of the Athenians; and Ulysses on his raft. It is probable, though by no means certain, that we ought to add to the list a picture of the Heracleidae as suppliants at Athens, on the authority of the following passage in the Plutus of Aristophanes (383, 385):

‘Όρα τ’ άπ’ τού βήματος καθέδευμεν, εἰκερίαν ἔχοντα μετά τῶν παιδίων καὶ τῆς γυναικὸς, καὶ δίοικον’ ἀντικρίσι

Some of the Scholiasts thought that the Pamphilus here mentioned was a tragic poet, and Callistratus and Euriphonus are quoted as authorities for this statement: but, as a Scholastic remarks, there was no tragic poet of this name mentioned in the Diotacalci. Most of them, however, understand the allusion to be to a well-known picture of the celebrated Pamphilus; though one of them ascribes the picture to Apollodorus, observing that Pamphilus was younger than Aristophanes. Now, bearing in mind that these allusions of the comic poets are generally to the novelties of the day, we may fairly conjecture that Pamphilus, then a young artist, had just visited Athens for the first time, and had executed this picture of the Heracleidae for the Athenians. The date of the second edition of the Plutus was B. C. 383.

Taking, then, this date as about the commencement of the career of Pamphilus, we must, on the other hand, place him as low as B. C. 352, when his disciple Apelles began to flourish. And these dates agree with all the other indications of his time. Thus, he is mentioned by Quintilian (l. c.) among the artists who flourished in the period commencing with the reign of Philip II.; Pliny places him immediately before Echion and Therimachus, who flourished in the 107th Olympiad, B. C. 352; and the battle of Philus, which he painted, must have been fought between Ol. 102 and 104, B. C. 372 and 364 (Müller, Proleg. zu Mythol. p. 400). What victory of the Athenians formed the subject of the other picture mentioned by Pliny, is not known: it may be the naval victory of Chabiria, at Naxos, in B. C. 376.

Among the pupils of Pamphilus, besides Apelles and Melanthius, was Pausias, whom he instructed in encaustic painting.

2. A sculptor, who was the pupil of Praxiteles, and who therefore flourished probably about Ol. 112, B. C. 332. Pliny mentions his Jupiter Hospitalis in the collection of Asinius Pollio. (H. N. xxxvi. 5. s. 4. § 10.)

3. The engraver of a gem representing Achilles playing on the lyre (Bracci, Tab. 90; Stosch, Pierres Gravées, p. 157). [P. S.]

PAMPHILUS (Πάμφιλος), a physician and grammaturian at Rome, where he acquired a large fortune, probably in the second or first century n. c. (Galen, De Compos. Medicin. sec. Loc. vi. 3, vol. xii. p. 839; Aëtius, ii. 4. § 16. p. 375.) He wrote a work on plants (St. Epiphan. Adv. Haeres, i. init.), in which they were arranged in alphabetical order, and which Galen criticizes very severely, saying that Pamphilus described plants which he had evidently never seen, and that he mixed up a quantity of absurd and superstitious matter. (De Simplic. Medicin. Temper. Ac Facult. vi. praeef. vii. 10. § 31, vol. xi. pp. 792, 793, 796, 797, 798, xii. 31.) Several of his medical formulae are quoted by Galen. (De Compos. Medicin. sec. Loc. vi. 3, xii. p. 124, vii. 3, vol. xiii. p. 68.) He is probably the same person as the grammarian of Alexandria mentioned by Suidas. (See Lambeck, Biblioth. Vindobon. vol. ii. p. 141, sq. ed. Kollar.) [W. A. G.]

PAMPHOS (Πάμφος), a mythical poet, who is placed by Pausanius later than Olen, and much earlier than Homer. His name is connected particularly with Attica. Many of the ancient hymns, which were preserved by the Lycomidai, were ascribed to him; among these are mentioned hymns to Demeter, to Artemis, to Poseidon, to Zeus, to Eros, and to the Graces, besides a Litha-song. (Paus. passim; Ulrich, Gesch. d. Hell. Dietikon. vol. i.; Bode, Orpheus, und Gesch. d. Hell. Dietik. vol. i.; Bernhardy, Grundriss d. Griech. Litt. vol. i. p. 248; Preller, Demeter und Persephone.) It should be observed that the name is often incorrectly written Pamphus (Πάμφος), even by good scholars; but the above is the true form. [P. S.]

PAMPHYLUS (Πάμφυλος), a son of Aegimius and brother of Dymas, was king of the Dorians at the foot of mount Pindus, and among the Heracleidae invaded Peloponnesus. (Apollod. ii. 6. § 3; Paus. ii. 28. § 3; Pind. Pyth. i. 62.) After him, a tribe of the Skyconians was called Pamphylia. (Herod. v. 6b.) [L. S.]

PAMPREPIUS (Πάμπρεπιος), an Egyptian, eminent for his literary attainments and his political influence, in the latter half of the fifth century. Our knowledge of him is derived from Suidas (v. Pamprepios), who has embodied in his article three or four distinct accounts of him, not, however, very consistent with each other. One of these fragments is transcribed in the Iovae, Volutaria, of the emperor Eudocia (apud Villoison, Anecdotata Graeca, vol. i. p. 357). Suidas has also preserved (v. Λαδάωτος, τριλόφωρος) an anecdote of Pamprepius, and some further notices are obtained from the abstracts of the Historia of Candidus and the Vita Isidori of Damascius, preserved in the Bibliotheca of Photius (codd. 79, 242). Of the accounts preserved in Suidas, one states that he was born at Panopolis, another at Thebes in Egypt. The former is more probably correct. The third account states generally that he was an Egyptian, of which there can be no doubt. The year of his birth is not known. He was remarkable for the swiftness of his complexion and the ugliness of his features; but the endowments of his mind were of superior nature. Having devoted himself to literature, especially poetry, in which he acquired considerable reputation in his native country, he proceeded to Greece, where he spent a long time, chiefly, perhaps wholly, at Athens. Here he was chosen to a professorship, and appears to have studied philosophy at the same time, under the direction of Proclus. The expression used in one of the accounts preserved by Suidas, that his residence in Greece was the result of a marriage connection (κατ’ ἐγκρατίαν), intimates that he was married; but we have no account of his wife, and the circumstances of his life make it probable that he lost her before leaving Athens. His departure from that city was occasioned by some insult or injury which he received from Theagenes, a leading citizen, probably a magistrate of Athens, who had been prejudiced against him by some calumnies, propagated possibly by his brother philosophers, all of whom, except Proclus, he exceeded in reputation.

From Athens he removed to Constantinople, where he was introduced to Illus, at that time all-powerful with the Byzantine emperor Zeno [ILLUS], by one Marius or Marsus. Having attracted the admiration of Illus, either by a discourse on the soul, or by reading one of his poems, he received, through his instrumentality, an appointment as professor, with a salary, partly from the private liberality of Illus, partly from the public purse. But notwithstanding this powerful patronage, his open avowal of heathenism created many enemies; and the prejudice against him was increased by the belief that he practised magic. It is probable also that his novelty with which he induced him, and all who were jealous of that powerful person to be hostile to Pamprepius. The subsequent history and fate of Pamprepius are related elsewhere. [ILLUS.]

Suidas ascribes to Pamprepius two works:—1. Ἐνυμαλωγίαν ἀδιάβολα, Ἐνυμαλωγίας Ἕσποτιο. 2. Ισαύρικα, Iasurica. Suidas states that the latter work was in prose. Its title leads to the conjecture that it was a history of Iasiaur, the native country both of Zeno and Illus. Both works are lost. (Photius, Il. c.; Suidas, l.c.; Fabric, Bibli. Graec. vol. vi. pp. 375, 601.) [J. C. M.]

PAN (Πάν), the great god of flocks and shepherds among the Greeks; his name is probably connected with the verb πάω, Lat. pasco, so that his name and character are perfectly in accordance with each other. Later speculations, according to which Pan is the same as τὸ πῶ, or the universe, and the god the symbol of the universe, cannot be made to hold good. He was even called a son of Hermes by the daughter of Dryopaeus (Hom. Hymn. vii. 54), by Callisto (Schol. ad Theocrit. i. 3), by Oeneis or Thymbria (Apollod. iv. 4. § 1; Schol. ad Theocrit. l.c.), or as the son of Hermes by Penelope, whom the god visited in the shape of a ram (Hom. Hymn. ii. 145); Schol. ad Theocrit. i. 123; Serv. ad Aen. ii. 43), or of Penelope by Odysseus, or by all her suitors in common. (Serv. ad Virgil. Georg. i. 16; Schol. ad Lycoeph. 766; Schol. ad Theocrit. l.c.) Some again call him the son of Aether and Oeneis, or a Nereid, or a son of Uranus and Ge. (Schol. ad Theocrit. i. 123; Schol. ad Lycoeph. l.c.) From his being a grandson or great grandson of Cronos, he is called Κρόνος. (Eurip. Rhes. 36.) He was from his birth perfectly developed, and had the same appearance as afterwards, that is, he had his horns, beard, pock nose, tail, goats' feet, and was covered with hair, so that his mother ran away with fear when she saw him; but Hermes carried him into Olympus, where all (πᾶντες) the gods were delighted with him, and especially Dionysus. (Hom. Hymn. vii. 36, &c.; comp. Sil. Ital. xiii. 332; Lucian, Dial. Deor. 22.) He was brought up by nymphs. (Paus. viii. 30. § 2.)

The principal seat of his worship was Arcadia and from thence his name and his worship afterwards spread over other parts of Greece; and at Athens his worship was not introduced till the time of the battle of Marathon. (Paus. vii. 26. § 2; Virg. Aen. vi. 39; Pind. Frag. 63, ed. Bodeck; Herod. ii. 145.) In Arcadia he was the god of forests, pastures, flocks, and shepherds, and dwelt in grottoes (Eurip. Ion, 501; Or. Met. xiv. 515), wandered on the summits of mountains and rocks, and in valleys, either amusing himself with the chase, or leading the dances of the nymphs. (Aeschyl. Pers. 448; Hom. Hymn. vii. 6, 13, 20; Paus. viii. 42. § 2.) As the god of flocks, both of wild and tame animals, it was his province to increase them and guard them (Hom. Hymn. vii. 5; Paus. viii. 38. § 8; Or. Fast. ii. 271, 277; Virg. Eclog. i. 33); but he was also a hunter, and hunters owed their success to him, who at the same time might prevent their being successful. (Hesych. s. w. Ἀργεῦς.) In Arcadia hunters used to scourge the statue, if they hunted in vain (Theocrit. vii. 107); during the heat of mid-day he used to slumber, and was very indignant when any one disturbed him. (Theocrit. i. 16.) As god of flocks, bees also were under his protection. (Theocrit. vii. 107.) He was considered to be the inventor of the syrinx or shepherd's flute, which he himself played in a masterly manner, and in which he instructed others also, such as Daphnis. (Hom. Hymn. viii. 15; Theocrit. i. 3; Anthol. Palat. i. 237, x. 11; Virg. Eclog. i. 32, iv. 58; Serv. ad Virg. Eclog. v. 20.) He is thus said to have loved the poet Pindar, and to have sung and danced his lyric songs, in return for which Pindar erected to him a sanctuary in front of his house. (Pind. Pyth. iii. 139, with the Schol.; Piat. Num. 4.) Pan, like other gods who dwelt in forests, was dreaded by travellers to whom he sometimes appeared, and whom he startled with a sudden awe or terror. (Eurip. Rhes. 36.) Thus when Phleipides, the Athenian, was sent to Sparta to solicit its aid against the Persians, Pan accosted him and used to terrify him with the fright that the Athenians would worship him. (Herod. vi. 105; Paus. viii. 54. § 5, i. 28. § 4.) He is said to have had a terrible voice (Val. Flacc. iii. 31), and by it to have frightened the Titans in their fight with the gods. (Eustath. Catart. 27.) It seems that this feature, namely, his fondness of noise and riot, was the cause of his being considered as the minister and companion of Cybele and Dionysus. (Val. Flacc. iii. 47; Pind. Fragm. 63, ed. Bodeck; Lucian, Dial. Deor. 22.) He was at the same time believed to be possessed of prophetic powers, and to have even instructed Apollo in this art. (Apollod. i. 4. § 1.) While roaming in his forests he fell in love with Echo, by whom or by Peitho he became the father of Iynx. His love of Syrinx, after whom he named his flute, is well known from Ovid (Met. i. 691, &c.; comp. ad Virg. Eclog. ii. 31); and about him, if not in his other amours see Georg. iii. 391; Macrobi. Sat. v. 22.) Fir-trees were sacred to him, as the nymph Pitys, whom he loved, had been metamorphosed into that tree (Propert. i. 18. 20), and the sacrifices offered to him consisted of cows, rams, lambs, milk, and honey. (Theocrit. v. 58; Anthol. Palat. ii. 630, 697, vi. 96, 239, vii. 59.) Sacrifices were also offered to him in common with Dionysus and the nPynthia. (Paus. ii. 24. § 7; Anthol. Palat. vi. 154.)
The various epitaphs which are given him by the poets refer either to his singular appearance, or are derived from the names of the places in which he was worshiped. Sanctuaries and temples of this god are frequently mentioned, especially in Arcadia, as at Heraea, on the Nomian hill near Ly-cosura, on mount Parthenius (Paus. viii. 26. § 2, 38. § 8. 54. § 5), at Megalopoli (viii. 30. § 2. iii. 31.
§), near Aeacesium, where a perpetual fire was burning in his temple, and where at the same time there was an ancient oracle, at which the nym-phs Erato had been his priestess (viii. 37. § 6, &c.), at Troecene (ii. 32. § 5), on the well of Eresium, between Argos and Tegea (ii. 24. § 7), at Sicyon (ii. 10. § 12), at Orchis (i. 34. § 2), at Avals (i.
28. § 4; Herod. vi. 105), near Marathon (i. 32.
in fin.), in the island of Psyttaleia (i. 36. § 2; Aeschyl.
Persa. 448), in the Corycian grotto near mount Parnassus
(x. 32. § 5), and at Homala in Thessaly. (Theocr. vii. 103.)
The Romans identified with Pan their own god Inus, and sometimes also Faunus. Respecting the plural (Panes) or beings with goat's feet, see Satyri. In works of art Pan is represented as a voluptuous and sensual being, with horns, puck-nose,
and goat's feet, sometimes in the act of dancing, and sometimes playing on the syrinx. (Hirt, Mythol. Bilderb. ii. p. 161, &c.)

PANACHAEA (Paráxkia), that is, the god-ness of all the Achaeans, occurs as a surname of § 2), and of Athena at Laphria (Paus. vii. 30.
§ 2). [L. S.]

PANACEIA (Parákeia), i.e. "the all-healing," a daughter of Aesculapius, who had a temple at Oro-pus. (Paus. i. 3. § 2; Aristoph. Plit. 705, with the Schol.) [L. S.]

PANAEUS (Píaraos), a distinguished Athenian painter, who flourished, according to Pliny, in the 83rd Olympiad, n. c. 448 (II. N. xxxv. 8.
4). He was the nephew of Pheidias (δίδελφον, Strab.
viii. p. 334; δίδελφος, Paus. v. 11. § 2; frater, i.e. frater patrueinis, Plin. l.c. and xxxvii.
23. s. 55), whom he assisted in decorating the temple of Zeus, at Olympia; and it is said to have been in answer to a question of his that Pheidias made his celebrated declaration that Homer's description of the god of Zeus (II. 1. 528) gave him the idea of his statue of the god. With regard to the works of Panæus in the temple at Olympia, Strabo (l. c.) tells us that he assisted Pheidias in the execution of his statue of Zeus, by ornamenting it with colours, and especially the drapery;
and that many admirable paintings of his were shown around the temple (περὶ τὸ θείον), by which,
as Böttiger has pointed out (Arch. d. Maleres. p.
245), we must understand the paintings on the sides of the elevated base of the statue, which are described by Pausanias (v. 11). This author tells us that the sides of the front of this base were simply painted dark blue, but that the other sides were adorned with paintings of Panæus, which represented the following subjects:—A Atlas sustaining heaven and earth, with Hercules standing by, ready to relieve him of the burden; Theseus and Peiri-thoüs; Hellas and Salamis, the latter holding in her hand the ornamented prow of a ship; the contest of Hercules with the Nemean Lion; Ajax in sulting Cassandra; Hippodameia, the daughter of Oenomaus, with her mother; Prometheus, still bound, with Hercules about to release him; Pen-theseias expiring, and Hercules sustaining her;
and two of the Hesperides, carrying the apples,
which were entrusted to them to guard.

Another great work by Panæus was his painting of the battle of Marathon, in the Poe-cile at Athens (Paus. l. c.); respecting which Pliny says that the use of colours had advanced so far, and the art had been brought to such perfection, that Panæus was said to have introduced portraits of the generals (ἰκωνίκοι δικες), namely, Miltiades, Cullimachus, and Cynaegeirus,
on the side of the Athenians, and Dutis and Artaphernes, on that of the barbarians (H.N. xxxv.
6. s. 94). Pausanias gives a fuller description of this picture, but without mentioning the artist's name (i. 15). He says that the last of the paintings in the Poecile represented those who fought at Marathon: "the Athenians, assisted by the Pla-etaeans, join battle with the barbarians; and in this part (of the picture) both parties maintain an equality in the conflict; but, further on in the battle, the barbarians are fleeing, and pushing one another into the marsh: but last in the painting are the Phoenicians' ships, and the Greeks slaying
the barbarians as they rush on board of them.
There also is painted the hero Marathon, from whom the plain is named, and Theseus, like one ascending out of the earth, and Athena and Herculeis."
He then mentions the polemarch Cullimachus, Miltiades, and the hero Echecus, as the most conspicuous persons in the battle.
Böttiger (Arch. d. Maleres, p. 249) infers from this description, compared with Himerius (Orot.
vr. p. 564, Wermersdorff), that the picture was in four compartments, representing separate periods of the battle: in the first, nearest the land, appear Marathon and Theseus, Herculeis and Athene; in the next the battle is joined, Miltiades is conspicuous as the leader of the Athenians, and neither party has yet the advantage; in the third we have the route of the Persians, with the polemarch Cullimachus still fighting, but perhaps receiving his death-blow (πολεμώνις μάχαι ἐνικῶν ἐν τέτευχιν, Himer.; comp. Herod. vi. 14); and here, too, Böttiger places the hero Echecus, slaying the flying enemies with his ploughshare; in the fourth the final contest at the ships; and here was undoubtedly the portret of Cynaegeirus, laying hold of the prow of a ship (Herod. vi. 114). But it seems to us much better to view the whole as one picture, in which the three successive stages of the battle are represented by their positions, and not by any actual division, the necessary transition from one part to the other being left to the imagination of the spectator, as is not uncommon in modern battle pieces. Indeed Böttiger himself seems to have had this idea in his mind; and we can hardly understand how the writer, who seems so clearly that the scene of battle is marked by the land at one end, and the sea at the other, and who assigns so accurately to each of the three leaders their proper places in the picture, should at the same time think of cutting up the work into four tableaus, and imagine that "the same figures (i.e. of the chiefmen) were probably exhibited in other divisions of the picture." Böttiger's notion of placing Marathon and Theseus, Herculeis and Athene, in a separate tableaus, seems to us also quite arbitrary.
Pausanias says ἀνθρώποι καλ, that is, in the picture.
These deities and heroes no doubt occupied, like the chieftains, their proper places in the picture, although we cannot easily assign those places: this Böttiger himself has seen in the case of Echesus; and the apparition of Theseus rising out of the earth would no doubt be connected with the opening of the battle.

Another question arises, how the individual chieftains were identified. The expression of Pliny, leontos duses, can hardly be accepted in the sense of actual likenesses of the chieftains; for, to say nothing of the difficulty of taking likenesses of the Persian chieftains, the time at which Panaenaeus lived excludes the supposition that he could have taken original portraits of Miltiades and the other leaders, nor have any reason to believe that the art of portrait painting was so far advanced in their time, as that Panaenaeus could have had portraits of them to copy from. The true meaning seems to be that this was one of the earliest pictures in which an artist rejected the ancient plan (which we still see on vases, mirrors, &c.) of affixing to his figures the names of the persons they were intended to represent, and yet succeeded in indicating who they were by some other method, such as by an exact imitation of their arms and dresses (which may very probably have been preserved), or by the representation of their positions and their well-known exploits. This explanation is confirmed by the passages already cited respecting Hermoneus and Lycus, and still more strikingly by a passage of Aeschines (c. Clea, p. 437), who tells us that Miltiades requested the people that his name might be inscribed on this picture, but they refused his request, and, instead of inserting his name, only granted him the privilege of being painted standing first and exhorting the soldiers. (Comp. Nepos, Milt. 6.) We learn from an allusion in Persius (iii. 53) that the Medes were represented in their proper costume. Some writers ascribe parts of this picture to Micon and Polygnotus, but it was most probably the work of Panaenaeus alone. (Böttiger, Arch. d. Malerei, p. 251.)

Pliny, moreover, states that Panaenaeus painted the roof of the temple of Athena at Elia with a mixture of milk and saffron, and also that he painted the shield of the statue of the goddess, made by Colotes, in the same temple. (Plin. H. c.; Böttiger, Arch. d. Malerei, p. 243.)

During the time of Panaenaeus, contests for prizes in painting were established at Corinth and Delphi, that is, in the Isthmian and Pythian games, and Panaenaeus himself was the first who engaged in one of these contests, his antagonist being Timagoras of Chalcis, who defeated Panaenaeus at the Pythian games, and celebrated his victory in a poem. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 9. s. 35.)

Panaenaeus has been called the Cimabue of ancient painting (Böttiger, l. c. p. 242), but the title is very inappropiate, as he had already been preceded by Polygnotus, Micon, and Dionysius of Colophon, who, though his contemporaries, were considerably older than him.

His name is variously spelt in the MSS. Πάναιναος, Πάναιναῳς, and Πάναιναος, but Πάναιναος is the true reading. (See Siebenkees, ad Strab. vol. iii. p. 129.)

PANAETIUS (Παναίτιος), historical. 1. Tyrant of Leontini. He was the first who raised himself to power in that way in Sicily. The government of Leontini up to that time had been oligarchical (Arist. Politi. v. 10.) The occasion which Panaenaeus seized for making himself tyrant arose out of a war with Megara, in which he was created general. The oligarchs, who carefully prevented the commons from being on a par with themselves in point of military equipment. Panaenaeus, under the pretence of a review, found an opportunity for making an attack upon the oligarchs when they were unarmed; and, having a chance, he added them to pieces. Panaenaeus then, with the aid of his partizans, seized the city, and made himself tyrant, n. c. 608. (Polyeun. Strat. v. 47; Euseb. Arm. v. anno 1408; Clinton, F. H. vol. i. anno 608.)

2. A native of Tenos, the son of Socimenes. He commanded a vessel of the Tenians which accompanied the armament of Xerxes in his invasion of Greece, but apparently by compulsion; for just before the battle of Salamis, Panaenaeus with his ship deserted and joined the Greeks, fortunately just in time to confirm the intelligence of the movements of the Persian fleet which had been brought by Aristides, but which the Greeks at first could hardly believe. On account of this service the Tenians were recorded on the tripod set up at Delphi amongst those who had aided in destroying the forces of the barbarians. (Herod. viii. 61; Plat. Theod. p. 116. c.)

3. The name Panaetius occurs in the list of Tarentines who were accused by Andromachus of having been concerned in the mutiny of the Hermesthus at Athens. He, with the rest so charged, excepting Polystratus, escaped, and was condemned to death in his absence. There is also a person of the name of Panaetius, who, for aught that appears to the contrary, was the same person, and one of the four whose names were added by Andocides to the list of Teucer. (Andoc. de Myst. p. 7, 26, ed. Reiske.)

PANAETIUS (Παναιτίος), son of Nicogonos, descended from a family of long-standing celebrity, was born in the island of Rhodes (Suid. s. v.; Strab. xiv. p. 968.). He is said to have been a pupil of the grammarian Crates, who taught in Pergamum (Strab. xiv. p. 993, c.), and after that to have betaken himself to Athens, and there attached himself principally to the Stoic Diogenes, of Babylon, and his disciple Antipater of Tarsus (Suid. s. v.; Cie. de Divin. i. 5). He also avoided himself at Athens of the instruction of the learned Perigeote Polemo, according to Van Lynden's very probable emendation of the words of Suidas (š. k. comp. Van Lynden, Disputatio Historico-critica de Panaetio Rhodio, Lugd. Batav. 1802, p. 36, &c.). Probably through Laelius, who had attended the instructions, first of the Babylonian Diogenes, and then of Panaetius (Cie. de Fin. ii. 8), the latter was introduced to the great P. Scipio Aemilianus, and, like Polybius before him (Suid. s. v. Παναιτίος, comp. s. v. Πολλιδος, and Van Lynden, p. 40, &c.), gained his friendship (Cie. de Fin. iv. 9, de Off. i. 26, de Amic. 5, 27, comp. Orat. pro Muren. 81), and accompanied him on the embassy which he undertook, two years after the conquest of Carthage, to the kings of Egypt and Asia in alliance with Rome (Vell. Pat. i. 15. § 3; Cie. Acad. ii. 2; Plut. Apophth. 200, &c.; comp. Moral. p. 774, &c.). Panaetius appears to have spent the latter part of his life in Athens, after the death of Antipater, as head of the stoic school (Cie. de Divin. i. 3); at all events he died in Athens (Suid. s. v.).
and that before a. c. 111, in which year L. Crassus found there no longer Panaetius himself, but his disciple Mnesarchus (Cic. de Orat. i. 11). Neither the year when Panaetius was born, nor the age attained by him, is stated; all we know is, that he composed the books on Moral Obligations thirty years before his death (Cic. de Off. iii. 2, after Posidonius), and that in those books mention was made of Panaetius, following Aristippus, a name already dead (Cic. de Off. i. 36, ii. 22). He could scarcely have been much older or younger than Scipio Africanus, who died b. c. 129, and was born b. c. 185 (see Van Lynden, l. c. p. 11, &c. comp. p. 46, &c.). Suidas (s. v.) is the only one who knows anything of an older Panaetius of Rhodes; though in the passage referred to he does not distinguish these two Rhodians of the same name, whom he sets down, from one another. He was probably led to that statement by the erroneous assumption of an ignorant sophist, that Panaetius had been the instructor of the elder Scipio Africanus (Gell. xvii. 21; comp. Van Lynden, p. 6, &c.).

The principal work of Panaetius was, without doubt, his treatise on the theory of moral obligation (περὶ τοῦ καθήκους), composed in three books. In this he proposed to investigate, first, what was moral or immoral; then, what was useful or not useful; and, lastly, how the apparent conflict between the moral and the useful was to be decided; for, as a Stoic, he could only regard this conflict as apparent. The third investigation he had expressly promised at the end of the third book, but had not carried out (Cic. ad Att. xvi. 11, de Off. ii. 2, 3, comp. i. 3, iii. 7, ii. 25); and his disciple Posidonius seems to have only timidity (ib. iii. 2) and imperfectly supplied what was wanting; at least Cicero, who in his books on Moral Obligations intended, not indeed to translate, but to imitate in his own manner, our Rhodian (ib. ii. 17, iii. 2, i. 2, ad Att. i. c.), in the third section of the subject, which was not carried out by his guide, did not follow Posidonius, but declares that he had completed independently and without assistance what Panaetius had left untouched (de Off. iii. 7). To judge from the insignificant character of the deviations, to which Cicero himself refers attention, as for examination, the endeavour to define moral obligation (ib. i. 2), the completion of the imperfect division into three parts (i. 3, comp. ii. 25), the rejection of unnecessary discussions (ii. 5), small supplementary additions (ii. 24, 25), in the first two books Cicero has borrowed the scientific contents of his work from Panaetius, without any essential alterations. The Roman philosopher seems to have been induced to follow Panaetius, passing by earlier attempts of the Stoics to investigate the philosophy of morals, not merely by the superiority of his work in other respects, but especially by the endeavour that prevailed throughout it, laying aside abstract investigations and paradoxical definitions, to exhibit in an impressive manner the philosophy of morals in its application to life (de Off. ii. 10). Generally speaking, Panaetius, as it were, is only a vehicle of Xenocrates, Theophrastus, Dienearchus, and especially Plato, who softened down the harsh severity of the older Stoics, and, without giving up their fundamental definitions, had modified them so as to be capable of being applied to the conduct of life, and clothed them in the garb of eloquence (Cic. de Fin. iv. 28, Tuscul. i. 32, de Leg. iii. 6; comp. Plut. de Stoic. Renunciation. p. 1033, b.; and Van Lynden, p. 60, &c. 83, &c.). With him begins the endeavour to supply eclectically the deficiencies in the stoic theory, and to mould it into a new shape; so that among the Neo-Platonists he passed for a Platonist (Proclus, in Plat. Tim. p. 56). For this reason also he assigned the first place in philosophy to physics, not to dialectics (Diog. Laërt. vii. 41), and appears not to have undertaken any original treatise on the subject of which he wrote. In his writings he gave the stoic doctrine of the configuration of the world (Cic. de Nat. Deor. ii. 46, comp. 142; Stoabaeus, Est. Phys. i. p. 414), endeavoured to simplify the division of the faculties of the soul (Nemes. de Nat. Hom. c. 15; Tertull. de Anima, c. 14), doubted the reality of divination (Cic. de Divin. i. 3, ii. 42, 47, Acad. ii. 33, comp. Epiphanius, adv. Haeres. ii. 9). In ethics he recognised only a two-fold direction of virtue, the theoretical and the practical, answering to the dianoetic and the ethical of Aristotle (Diog. Laërt. vii. 92); endeavoured to bring the ultimate object of life into nearer relation to natural impulses (εὐεργείας ἐρωτηματικόν; Clem. Alex. Strom. ii. p. 497), and to render manifest by similes the inseparability of the virtues (Stoabaeus, Est. Eth. ii. p. 112); pointed out that the recognition of the moral, as something to be striven after for its own sake, was a leading fundamental idea in the speeches of Demosthenes (Plut. Demosth. p. 852, &c.), which Cicero could not admit the harsh doctrine of apathy (A. Gellius, xii. 5), and, on the contrary, vindicated the claim of certain pleasurable sensations to be regarded as in accordance with nature (Sext. Empir. adv. Math. xi. 73), while he also insisted that moral definitions should be laid down in such a way that they might be applied by the man who had not yet attained to wisdom (Seneca, Epist. 116). That Cicero has not reproduced the entire contents of the three books of Panaetius, we see from a fragment taken from them, which is not found in Cicero, but has been preserved by A. Gellius (xiii. 27), and which at the same time makes us acquainted with the Rhodian's treatment of his subject in its rhetorical aspects. A similar mode of setting forth his subject, directed to its concrete relations, and rendered intelligible by examples and similes, was to be found, if any judge by the scanty quotations from it that we possess, in this treatise on the immortality (πρὸς τὰ ἔνδουας; Diog. Laërt. ix. 20, which Plutarch probably had before him in that composition of his which bears the same name), and in those on the Magistrates (Cic. de Legg. iii. 5, 6), on Providence (Cic. ad Att. xiii. 8), on Divination (see above), and the letter to Q. Aelius Tubero. His work on the philosophical sects (περὶ ὑπάρχοντων, Diog. Laërt. ii. 87) appears to have been rich in facts and critical remarks (Van Lynden, p. 62, &c.), and the notices which we have about Socrates, and on the books of Plato and others of the Socratic school, given on the authority of Panaetius, were probably taken from that work. [Ch. A. B.]

PANAETOLOUS (Πάναετολος), an Aetolian in the service of Ptolemy Philopator, king of Egypt, who, together with his countrymen Thaumachus in betraying Coele-Syria into the hands of Antiochus III, and on the approach of the Syrian king surrendered into his hands the important city of Tyre. (Polyb. v. 61, 62.) From this time he held an important place in the service of Antiochus, and distinguished himself highly in the expedition of that monarch against Euthydemos, king of Bactria, about b. c. 211. (1d. x. 48.) [E. H. B.] PANCRATES.

PANAEUS, the engraver of a gem in the royal collection at Paris. (Clarac, p. 421.) [P. S.]

PA'NARES (Πανάρης), a Cretan, who together with Lasthenes was one of the leaders of his countrymen in their resistance to the Roman arms. [LASTHENES, No. 3]. After the defeat of their united forces near Cydonia, Panarés, who had taken refuge in that city, surrendered it to the Roman general, Q. Metellus, on condition that his life should be spared. (Diod. Exc. Leg. xl. p. 632; Appian. Sic. 6; Dion Cass. xxxvi. 2; Voll. Pat. ii. 34.) [E. H. B.]

PANA'RETUS (Πάναρέτος), a pupil of Arcesilaus, the founder of the new Academy. He was noted for the excessive slenderness of his person. He was intimate with Ptolemy Erymgetes (about b. c. 230), from whom he is said to have received twelve talents yearly. (Fabric. Bibli. Graec. vol. iii. p. 181; Athen. xii. p. 552, c.; Aelian, H. V. x. 6.) [W. M. G.]

PANA'RETUS, MATTHAEUS. [MAT- THEUS, No. 1.]

PANCRATES and PANCRATIUS (Παν- κράτης, Πάνκρατιος); these names are so much mixed up together by the ancient writers, that it is best to place under one head the few notices which we have respecting them.

1. An epigrammatic poet, who had a place in the Garland of Meleager, and three of whose epigrams are preserved in the Greek Anthology. (Brunck, Anal. vol. i. p. 259; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. i. p. 191.) We have no other indication of his time than that afforded by his being in Meleager's collection, which shows that he lived in or before the first century of our era. Some writers identify him with the following poet:—A poet or musician, who appears to have been eminent in his art, by the notice of him in Plutarch, who says that "he usually avoided the chromatic genus of music, not through ignorance of it, but from choice, and imitated, as he himself said, the style of Pindar and Simonides, and in a word that which is called the ancient by those of the present day." (De Mus. 20, p. 1137, e.) This notice seems to imply that Pancrates lived either at or just before the time of Plutarch, but whether he was simply a musician, or a lyric poet, or a tragedian, the context leaves us altogether in doubt.

3. Of Arcadis, the author of a poem on fishery (ἄλευρικα or σφάλδοια έργα), a considerable fragment of which is preserved by Athenaeus. (Ath. l. p. 13, b., vii. pp. 283, a. c., 305, c., 392, ff.) Several critics imagine him to be identical with one or both of the two preceding poets. (See Barette, in the Mén. de l'Acad. des Inscr. vol. xix. p. 441.) At least it is known to us from the first book of the Κοινορητών of Pancrates, whom the subject of the poem and the simple mention of the name in Athenaeus would lead us to identify with the author of the άλευρικα, while the metre suggests the probability that he was also the same as the epigrammatist.

4. An Alexandrian poet in the time of Hadrian, who, in acknowledgment of a curious discovery with which Pancrates made him acquainted in such a manner as to involve a compliment to himself and Antinoüs, gave him his maintenance in the Museum of Alexandria. (Ath. xv. p. 677, d. e.)

5. Of Athens, a cynic philosopher in the time of Hadrian and the Antonines. Philostratus relates, that when Lollianus was in danger of being stoned by the Athenians in a tumult about bread, Pancrates quieted the mob by exclaiming that Lollianus was not an ἄρσαλις but a λογοτάξις (Philosr. Vit. Sophist. p. 526; LOLLIANUS). Alciphron also mentions a cynic philosopher of this name (iii. 55, p. 406).

6. A sophist and rhetorician, who wrote a commentary (ἐπιδιηγία) on the τεχνη βουνωτη of Minucianus. (Suid. s. v.; Eudoc. p. 353.) [P. S.]

PA'NCRATIUS (Πανκράτιος έ Πανκρατίας), a daughter of Alcaeus and Iphimeidea, in the Phthiotic Achaia. Once when Thracian pirates, under Butes, invaded that district, they carried off from Mount Drius the women who were solemnizing a festival of Dionysus. Among them was Iphimeidea, the daughter of Pancratius, who were carried to Strongyle or Nazare, where king Agy- sanemos made Pancratis his wife, after the two chiefs of the pirates, Sicelus and Hectorestus (or Seclis and Cassamenus), who were likewise in love with her, had killed each other. Ous and Ephialtes, the brothers of Pancratius, in the meantime came to Strongyle to liberate their mother and sister. They gained the victory, but Pancratis died. (Diod. v. 50, &c.; Parthen. Evrot. 19.) [L. S.]

PANCRATIUS. [PANCRA'TIUS.]

PANDA. [EMPANDA.]

PANDAREOS (Πανδάρεως), a son of Merops of Miletus, is said to have stolen the golden dog which Hephaestus had made, from the temple of Zeus in Crete, and to have carried it to Tantalus. When Zeus sent Hermes to Tantalus to claim the dog back, Tantalus declared that it was not in his possession. The god, however, took the animal by force, and threw mount Sipylos upon Tantalus. Pandareos fled to Athens, and thence to Sicily, where he perished with his wife Harmoniee. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1875; comp. TANTALUS.) Antoninus Libernia (11) calls him an Ephyesian, and relates that Demeter conferred upon him the benefit of never suffering from indigestion, if he should take ever so much food. The whole scene of his story lies in Crete, and hence Pausanias (x. 30. §1) thinks that the town of Ephyes is not the famous city in Asia Minor, but Ephyes in Crete. The story of Pandareos derives more interest from that of his three daughters. Aëdon, the eldest of them, was married to Zethus, the brother of Amphion, by whom she was the mother of Itysyl. From envy of Amphion, who had many children, she determined to murder one of his sons, Amaleus, but in the night she mistook her own son for her nephew, and killed him. Some add, that she killed her own son after Amaleus, from fear of the vengeance of her sister-in-law. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1875.) The two other daughters of Pandareos, Merope and Cleodora (according to Pausanias, Cameira and Clytia), were, according to Homer, deprived of their parents by the gods, and remained as helpless orphans in the palace. Aphrodite, however, fed them with milk, honey, and wine. Hera gave them beauty and understanding far above other women. Artemis gave them dignity, and Athena skill in the arts. When Aphrodite went up to Olympus to arrange the nuptials for her maidens, they were carried off by the Harpies. (Hom. Od. xx. 67, &c., xix. 518, &c.) Polygnotus painted them in the Lesche of Delphi in the act of playing at dice, and adorned with wreaths of flowers. [L. S.]
PANDUS.

PANDUS (Πανδος). 1. A son of Ly- cion, a Lycian, commanded the inhabitants of Zelea on mount Ida, in the Trojan war. He was distinguished in the Trojan army as an archer, and was said to have received his bow from Apollo. He was slain by Dromedes, or, according to others, by Bhæneas. He was afterwards honored as a hero at Pinara in Lycia. (Hom. Ill. ii. 324, &c.; v. 292; comp. ad Aen. v. 496; Strab. xiv. p. 665; Philost. Her. iv. 2.)

2. A son of Alcman, and twin-brother of Bitas, was one of the companions of Aeneas, and slain by Turnus. (Virg. Aen. ix. 672, 758.)

PANDEMOS (Πάνδημος), i.e. "common to all the people," occurs as a surname of Aphrodite, and that in a twofold sense, first describing her as the goddess of low sensual pleasures as Venus vulgivaga or popularis, in opposition to Venus (Aphrodite) Urania, or the heavenly Aphrodite. (Plat. Sympos. p. 180; Lucret. iv. 1067.) She was represented at Elis by Scopas riding on a ram. (Paus. vi. 23. § 2.) The second sense is that of Aphrodite uniting all the inhabitants of a country into one social or political body. In this respect she was worshipped at Athens along with Peitho (persuasion), and her worship was said to have been instituted by Theseus at the time when he united the scattered townships into one great body of citizens. (Paus. ii. 22. § 3.) According to some authorities, it was Solon who erected the sanctuary of Aphrodite Pandemos, either because her image stood in the agora, or because the hetairaee had to pay the costs of its erection. (Harpocrat. and Suid. s. v.; Athen. xiii. p. 569.) The worship of Aphrodite Pandemos also occurs at Megalopolis in Arcadia (Paus. viii. 32. § 1), and at Thebes (ix. 16. § 2). A festival in honour of her is mentioned at Athenaea (xiv. 569). The sacrifices offered to her consisted of white goats. (Lucian, Dial. Meret. 7; comp. Xenoph. Sympos. 8. § 9; Schol. ad Soph. Oed. Col. 101; Theocrit. Epigr. 13.) Pandemos occurs also as a surname of Eros. (Plat. Sympos. l. c.) [L. S.]

PANDI'ON (Πάνδιον). 1. A son of Aegyptus and Phaeacine... (Apol. ili. 1. § 5.)

2. A son of Phineus and Cleopatra. (Apol. ili. 15. § 3; Schol. ad Soph. Ant. 980; comp. Phrinos.)

3. One of the companions of Teucer. (Hom. Ill. xii. 372.)

4. A son of Eriochthonius, the king of Athens, by the Naiaid Pasithea, who was married to Zeuxippe, by whom he became the father of Proco and Philomela, and of the twins Erechtneus and Butes. In a war against Labdacus, king of Thebes, he called upon Tereus of Dalis in Phocis, for assistance, and afterwards rewarded him by giving him his daughter Proco in marriage. It was in his reign that Dionysus and Demeter were said to have come to Attica. (Apol. ili. 14. § 6, &c.; Paus. i. 5. § 3; Thucy. ii. 20.)

5. A son of Cecrops and Metiadusa, was likewise a king of Athens. Being expelled from Athens by the Metionidae, he fled to Megara, and there married Pyla, the daughter of king Pyla. When the latter, in consequence of a murder, emigrated into Peloponnesus, Pandion obtained the government of Megara. He became the father of Aegeus, Pallas, Nisia, Lycur, and a natural son, Oeneus, and also of a daughter, who was married to Sciron (Apol. ili. 15. § 1, &c.; Paus. i. 5. § 2, 29. § 5; Eurip. Med. 660). His tomb was shown in the territory of Megara, near the rock of Athena Aethyia, on the sea-coast (Paus. i. 5. § 3), and at Megara he was honoured with an heroem (i. 41. § 6). A statue of him stood at Athens, on the acropolis, among those of the eponymic heroes (i. 5. § 3, &c.).

PANDIONIDAE (Πάνδιονιδαί), a patronymic of Pandion, i.e. the sons of Pandion, who, after their father's death, returned from Megara to Athens, and expelled the Metionidae. Aegeus, the eldest among them, obtained the supremacy, Lycur the eastern coast of Attica, Nisia Megaras, and Pallas the southern coast. (Apol. ili. 15. § 6 &c.; Paus. i. 5. § 4; Strab. i. p. 392; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 285; Dionys. Perieg. 1024.) [L. S.]

PANDO'RA (Πάνδορα), i. e. the giver of all, or endowed with every thing, is the name of the first woman on earth. When Prothenna had stolen the fire from heaven, Zeus in revenge caused Hephæastus to make a woman out of earth, who by her charms and beauty should bring misery upon the human race (Hes. Theog. 571, &c.; Stob. Serm. 1.). Aphrodite adorned her with beauty, Hermes gave her boldness and cunning, and the gods called her Pandem, as each of the Olympians had given her some power by which she was to work the ruin of mankind. Having taken her to Epimetheus, who was on the advice of his brother Prothennus, not to accept any gift from Zeus, and from that moment all miseries came down upon men (Hes. Op. et Dies, 50, &c.). According to some mythographers, Ephemethus became by her the father of Pyrrha and Deucalion (Hygin. Fab. 142; Apollod. ii. 7. § 2; Procl. ad Hes. Op. p. 30, ed. Heinsius; Vv. Met. i. 350) others make Pandem a daughter of Pyrrha and Deucalion (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 23). Later writers speak of a vessel of Pandem, containing all the blessings of the gods, which would have been preserved for the human race, had not Pandem opened the vessel, so that the winged blessings escaped irrecoverably. The birth of Pandem was represented on the pedestal of the statue of Athenæ, in the Parthenon at Athens (Paus. i. 24. § 7); In the Orphic system Pandem was the eldest of the atri. divinity, and is associated with Hecate and the Erinyes (Orph. Argon. 974). Pandem also occurs as a surname of Gea (Earth), as the giver of all. (Schol. ad Aristoph. Av. 970; Philos. Vit. Apoll. vi. 39; Hesych. s. v.) [L. S.]

PANDO'RUΣ (Πάνδορος). 1. A son of Erechtheus and Praxithene, and grandson of Pandem, founded a colony in Euoboea. (Apol. ili. 15. § 1; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 281.)

2. A surname of the Earth, in the same sense as Pandem, and of Aeæ, or Fnte. (Hom. Iliad. 7; Stob. Ecol. i. p. 165, ed. Heeren.) [L. S.]

PANDRÓSOΣ (Πάνδροσος), i. e. "the all-bedewing," or "refreshing," was a daughter of Cecrops and Agranos, and a sister of Erysichthon, Herse, and Aiganiros. According to some accounts she was by Hermes the mother of Ceryx (Pollux, Onom. viii. 9). She was worshipped at Athens, along with Thallo, and had a sanctuary there next to the temple of Athena Polias (Apol. ili. 14. §§ 2, 6; Paus. i. 2. §§ 27, 3, ix. 35. § 1). Respecting her probable representation in one of the pediments of the Parthenon, see Welcker, in the Class. Mus. vol. iii. p. 380, &c. [L. S.]

PANDUS, LAT'NIUS, propraetor of Moesia in the reign of Tiberius, died in his province, A. d. 19. (Tac. Ann. ii. 66.)
PANHELLENUS (Πανηλῆένυς), i.e. the god common to, or worshipped by all the Hellenes or Greeks, occurs as a surname of the Dodecanean Zeus, whose worship had been transplanted by the Hellenes, in the emigration from Thessaly, to Aegina. Subsequently, when the name Hellenes was applied to all the Greeks, the meaning of the god’s surname likewise became more extensive, and it was derived from the propitiatory sacrifice which Aeacus was said to have offered on behalf of all the Greeks, and by the command of the Delphic oracle, for the purpose of averting a famine (Paus. i. 16. § 9). Müller, Hes. and [L. Plut. and Macrobi. Lycophr. name. 25) Dion latters.($$9.5.6,9).]

In Aegina there was a sanctuary of Zeus Panellenius, which was said to have been founded by Aeacus; and a festival, Panhellenia, was celebrated there. (Paus. i. 18. § 9; Müller, Auginet. p. 18, &c. 155, &c.) [L. S.]

PANIDES (Πανῆδης), a king of Chalcis in the Eupirus, who is said to have given his opinion that Hesiod was superior as a poet to Homer, and hence became proverbial as a man of pervasive taste and judgment. (Philol. Her. xviii. 2.) [L. S.]

PANODUS/RUS, an Egyptian monk in the reign of the emperor Arcadius, wrote a χρωσυγράφων, in which he found great fault with Eusebius, from whom, however, he took many of his statements. He is frequently mentioned by Syncellus. (Voss. de Hist. Graec. p. 308, ed. Westermann; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 444.)

PANOPEUS (Πανόπεος), i.e. the author of all signs and omens, occurs as a surname of Helios (Quint. Smyrn. v. 624), and of Zeus, who had a sanctuary on the Hellespont between capes Rhoeetum and Sigemum. (Hom. Il. viii. 250; Orph. Argon. 660; Or. Met. xi. 198.) [L. S.]

PANOPE (Πανόπη), the name of two mythical personages, one a daughter of Nereus and Doris (Hom. Il. xviii. 45; Hes. Theog. 250), and the other a daughter of Thespius. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 8.) [L. S.]

PANOPEUS (Πανοπεύ), a son of Phoecus and Asteropea, and brother of Crisus or Crissus, with whom he is said to have quarrelled even when yet in his mother’s womb. He accompanied Amphitryon on his expedition against the Taphians or Teleobans, and took an oath by Athene and Ares not to embroil any part of the booty. But he broke his oath, and as a punishment for it, his son Epieus became unwarlike. He is also mentioned among the Cyclopians (Paus. Hom. Il. xxiii. 665; Lycephr. 935, &c.; Apollod. ii. 4. § 7; Paus. ii. 29. § 4, x. 4. § 1; Or. Met. viii. 312; Schol. ad Eur. Orest. 33.) [L. S.]

PANOPTION, URBINUS, was proscribed by the triumvirs in B.C. 43, but was preserved by the extraordinary fidelity of one of his slaves who exchanged dresses with his master, dismissed him by the back-door as the soldiers were entering the villa, then placed himself in the bed of Panopton, and allowed himself to be killed as if he were the latter. Panopton afterwards testifieth his gratitude by erecting a handsome monument over his slave (Val. Max. vi. 8. § 6; Macrobi. Saturn. i. 11). Appian calls the master Appius (B.C. iv. 44); and Dion Cassius (xivii. 10) and Seneca (de Benef. iii. 25) relate the event, but without mentioning any name.

PANOPEUS. [ARGUS.]

PANSA, a cognomen in many Roman gentes, indicated a person who had broad or splay feet. Pliny classes it with the cognomens Plancus, Plautus, Squarvis (Plin H. N. xi. 45. s. 105).

PANSA. Q. APPULEIUS, consul, b.c. 300, with M. Valerius Corvus V. He laid siege to Nequinum in Umbria, but was unable to take the place (Liv. x. 5, 6, 9).

PANSA, C. CORELLIUS, consul, a.d. 122, with M. Acilus Aviola (Fasti).

PANSA, L. SESTITUS, whose demand was resisted by Q. Cicerro in b.c. 54 (Cic. ad Qu. Fr. I. 11).

PANSA, L. TITINIUS, with the cognomen Saccus, one of the consulares b.c. 400, and a second time in b.c. 396. (Liv. x. 12, 18; Fasti Capit.)

PANSA, C. VIIBIUS, consul b.c. 43 with A. Hirrtius. His father and grandfather also bore the praenomen Caius, as we learn from coins in which the consul is designated c. f. c. n. (see below); but we know nothing of the history of his family, save that his father was proscribed by Sulla (Dion Cass. xiv. 17), which was probably one reason that led Pansa to espouse the side of Caesar, of whom he was always a faithful adherent, and to whom he was indebted for all the honours he obtained in the state. Pansa was tribune of the plebs b.c. 51, in which year he took an active part, in conjunction with M. Caesius, and some of his other colleagues, in opposing the measures which the consul M. Marcellus and others of the aristocratic party were directing against Caesar. (Cic. ad Fam. viii. 8. §§ 6, 7.) Pansa was not employed by Caesar in any important military command during the civil war, but he continued to enjoy his confidence and esteem, and received from him in b.c. 46 the government of Calsipina Gaul as successor to M. Brutus. Cicero speaks of his departure from the city at the end of December in that year to take the command of the province, and says “that he was followed by extraordinary good wishes on the part of all good men, because he had relieved many from misery, and had shown great good feeling and kindness in the recent calamities.” (Cic. ad Fam. xvi. 17.) Pansa returned to Rome in b.c. 45; and in b.c. 44 Caesar nominated him and Hirrtius, his colleague in the augurate, consuls for b.c. 43. From that time the name of Pansa becomes so closely connected with that of Hirrtius, that it is impossible to relate the history of the one without giving that of the other. The reader is therefore referred to the article HIRRTIUS, where he will find an account of the events of the years b.c. 44 and 43, till the fall of both the consuls at Mutina in the month of April in the latter year, together with references to all the ancient authorities.

There is a large number of coins bearing the name of Pansa, of which we give three specimens below. The first of these has on the obverse the head of Apollo, and on the reverse Pallas in a chariot drawn by four horses; it is supposed by Eckhel more ancient than the time of the consul, and is therefore referred by him to the father or grandfather of the latter. The next two coins belong to the consul. The former bears on the obverse the head of Bacchus, and on the reverse Ceres in a chariot drawn by two dragons: the latter has on the obverse a youthful head, and on the reverse Ceres with a torch in each of her hands and with a pig by her side. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 339.)

PANTACES (Παντάκης), an Athenian, immortalized by Aristophanes as a pre-eminent stupid man, who, preparing to conduct a procession, put on his helmet before he fixed the crest to it. He was ridiculed also for his stupidity by Eupolis in the Χρονικαὶ γονατί, (Arist. Ran. 1084 ; Schol. ad loc.) comp. Meineke, Fragm. Comm. Graec, vol. i. p. 145. ii. p. 544.) [E. E.

PANTAENUS (Πανταενος), the favourite preceptor of Clemens Alexandrinus. Of what country he was originally, is uncertain. Cave endeavours to reconcile the various accounts by conjecturing that he was of Sicilian parentage, but that he was born in Alexandria. In this city he was undoubtedly educated, and embraced the principles of the stoical school of philosophy. We do not find it mentioned who the parties were that instructed him in the truths of Christianity, but we learn from Photius (Cod. 119) that he was taught by those who had seen the Apostles, though his statement that he had heard some of the Apostles themselves justly appears to Cave chronologically impossible. About A. D. 181, he had acquired such eminence that he was appointed master of the catechetical school in Alexandria, an office which he discharged with great reputation for nine or ten years. At this time the learning and piety of Pantaenus suggested him as a proper person to conduct a missionary enterprise to India. Of his success there we know nothing. But we have a singular story regarding it told by St. Jerome. It is said that he found in India a copy of St. Matthew's Gospel, written in Hebrew, which had been left by St. Bartholomew, and that he brought it back with him to Alexandria. He probably resumed his place in the catechetical school, which had been filled during his absence by his pupil and friend Clemens. The persecution under Severus, A. D. 202, drove both Pantaenus and Clemens into Palestine; but that he resumed his labours before his death appears from an expression of Eusebius (H. E. v. 10), τελευτῶν ἔφειτα. We do not know the exact date of his death, but it cannot have been prior to A. D. 211, as he lived to the time of Caracalla. His name has a place in the calendar of the Roman Church, on the seventh of July. He was succeeded by Clemens Alexandrinus. This, with some other points, has been disputed by Dodwell (ad Ireneum, p. 501, &c.), who makes Pantaenus to be not the predecessor, but the successor of Clemens. He was a man of much eloquence, if we may trust the opinion of Clemens, who calls him a Sicilian bee.

Both Eusebius and Jerome speak of his writings, the latter mentioning his Commentaries on the Scriptures, but we have not even a fragment of them. Cave states that he is numbered by Anastasius of Sinai among the commentators who referred the six days' work of the Creation to Christ and the Church. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 569; Cave, Apostolica, p. 127, &c., Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 81, &c.; Euseb. H. E. v. 10.) [W. M. G.]

PANTALEON (Πανταλεως), historical. 1. A son of Alyattes, king of Lydia, by an Ionian woman. His claim to the throne in preference to his brother Croesus was put forward by his partisans during the lifetime of Alyattes, but that monarch decided in favour of Croesus, (Herod. i. 92.)

2. Son of Omphalos, king or tyrant of Pisa in Elis at the period of the 34th Olympiad (b. c. 644), assembled an army, with which he made himself master of Olympia, and assumed by force the sole presidency of the Olympic games on that occasion. The Eleans on this account would not reckon this as one of the regular Olympiads. (Paus. vi. 21 § 1, 22. § 2.) We learn also from Strabo that Pantaeleon assisted the Messenians in the second Messenian war (Strab. viii. p. 362), which, according to the chronology of Pausanias, followed by Mr. Clinton, must have been as much as thirty years before; but C. O. Müller and Mr. Grove regard the intervention of Pantaeleon as furnishing the best argument for the real date of the war in question. (Clinton, F. H. vol. i. p. 188; Müller's Dorians, vol. i. p. 171; Grove's Greece, vol. ii. p. 574.)

3. A Macedonian of Pydna, an officer in the service of Alexander, who was appointed by him governor of Memphis, b. c. 331. (Arr. Anab. iii. 5. § 4.)

4. An Aetolian, one of the chief citizens and political leaders of that people, who was the principal author of the peace and alliance concluded by the Aetolians with Anatus and the Achaeanes, b. c. 230. (Plut. Aret. 33.) He was probably the same as the father of Archidamus, mentioned by Polybius (iv. 57).

5. An Aetolian, probably a grandson of the preceding, is first mentioned as one of the ambassadors charged to bear to the Roman general, M. Acilius Glabrio, the unqualified submission of the Aetolians, b. c. 191. (Polyb. xx. 9.) Again, in b. c. 169 he appears as one of the deputies at Thermopoe before C. Popilius, when he uttered a violent harangue against Lycius and Thoas. (Id. xxviii. 4.) He is also mentioned as present with Eumenes at Delphi, when the life of that monarch was attempted by the emissaries of Perseus. On this occasion he is termed by Livy "Aetolii princeps." (Liv. xliii. 13.)

6. A king of Bactria, or rather perhaps of the Indo-Caucasian provinces south of the Paropamisus, known only from his coins. From these it appears probable that he was the successor of Agamemnon, and his reign is referred by Professor Wilson to about B.C. 120 (Arist. p. 300); but Lassen would assign it to a much earlier period. (Lassen, Zur Gesch. d. Griechischen Königten v. Baktrien, pp. 192, 263.) The coins of these two kings, Agamemnon and Pantaleon, are remarkable as bearing inscriptions both in the Greek and in Sanscrit characters. [E. H. B.]

PANTELEON, (Panteleão), literary. 1. A writer on culinary subjects, mentioned by Pollux (vi. 70), where the old reading, Panteleión, is undoubtedly inaccurate. 2. A Constantinopolitan deacon and cartophyllax, who probably lived in the middle of the thirteenth century. Several works of his, principally sermons, have been published, both in the original Greek, and in Latin, for which consult Fabricius, Bibl. Graec. vol. x. pp. 292, 247, 258, vol. xi. p. 455, and Cave, H. I. et Lit. vol. ii. pp. 145, 156. [W. M. G.]

PANTELEON, St. (Panteleão), or PANTOLEON (Panteleão), or PANTHELemon (Panteléimon), a physician of Nicomedia in Bithynia, in the third century after Christ, the son of Eustorgius, a person of wealth and consequence, but strongly devoted to paganism. His mother, whose name was Eubula, was a zealous Christian, and educated him in the Christian faith; she died, however, while he was yet young, and he was in danger of relapsing into paganism. After receiving a good preliminary education, he studied medicine under a physician named Euphresynus, and by his engaging manners and good conduct attracted the notice of the Emperor Maximian, so that he was intended for the post of one of the royal physicians. About this time he became acquainted with an aged Christian priest, named Hermolaus, by whom he was confirmed in his attachment to the Christian faith, and his conversion was ended. He was induced to convert his father from paganism, in which attempt he at last succeeded. He made himself an object of dislike and envy to the other physicians by the number of cures he effected, and was at last denounced to the emperor as a Christian. After being in vain tempted to embrace paganism, and suffering many tortures (from some of which he is said to have been miraculously delivered), he was at last beheaded, probably A.D. 303. The name of Panteleimon was given him on account of his praying for his murderers. His memory is celebrated in the Roman church on July 27. A very interesting account of his life and martyrdom is given in the "Acta Sanctorum" (Jul. 27, vol. vi. p. 397), taken chiefly from Simeon Metaphrastes. (See Beovius, Nomenclator Sanctor. Professores Medicorum.; C. B. Carpoovuus, De Medicis ad Eccles. pro Sanctis habitis, and the authors there referred to.) [W. A. G.]

PANTAUCHUS (Πανταύχος). 1. A Macedonian of Alorus, son of Nicodamus, an officer in the service of Alexander, was one of those appointed to the command of a trireme on the descent of the Indus, B.C. 327. (Arr. Ind. 18.) Though this is the only occasion during the wars of that monarch on which his name is mentioned, yet we are told that he had earned a great reputation both for ability as a commander and for his personal strength and prowess. These qualities obtained for him a high place among the generals of Demetrius Poliorcetes, who in B.C. 289 left him with a large force to hold possession of Aetolia against Pyrrhus. On the approach of that monarch, Pantauchus hastened to meet him, and gave him battle, when a single combat ensued between the young king and the veteran officer, in which the former was victorious. Pantauchus was carried off the field severely wounded, and his army was totally routed. Whether or not he died of his wounds we know not, but his name is not again mentioned. (Plut. Pyrrh. 7, Demetr. 41.)

2. Son of Balacrus, one of the chief friends and counsellors of Perseus, king of Macedonia, by whom we find him employed on various important confidential occasions. Thus in B.C. 171 he was one of the hostages given by the king during his conference with the Roman deputy Q. Marcian, and subsequently one of the ambassadors sent to P. Licinius Crassus with proposals for peace: and three years later (B.C. 168) he was despatched to Gentius, king of Illyria, to secure the adherence of that monarch, at whose court he remained for some time, stimulating him to acts of open hostility against Rome, and urging him to throw his whole power into the contest in favour of Persians. (Polyb. xxvii. 8, xxix. 2, 3; Liv. xlii. 39, xlii. 23.) [E. H. B.]

PANTHEIA. [Panteleòn,] PANTHEUS (Πάνθεος), the author of nine verses in the Greek Anthology, the first two of which stand in the Vatican MS. as an epigram on Callimachus and Cynegarius, the well-known leaders of the Athenians at the battle of Marathon (Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 404, Anth. Pol. App. No. 56). There can be no doubt that the lines are a fragment of an heroic poem on the battle of Marathon, or the Persian war in general; but we have no indication of the author's age. (See Jacobs, Comment. in Anth. Graec. vol. ii. pt. 5, p. 193, vol. iii. pt. 5, p. 329; Vossius, Crit. des Cyprioter. Poet. 380, ed. Westermann; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 436.) [P. S.]

PANTHEUS. [Panteleòn,] PANTHEUS (Πάνθεος), of Chios, a poet, one of the elders at Troy, was married to Phrontis, and the father of Euphorbus, Polydamas, and Hypermen. (Horn. Il. i. 146, xiv. 450, xvii. 24, 40, 81.) Virgil (Aen. ii. 319) makes him a son of Othrys, and a priest of Apollo, a dignity to which, according to Servius on this passage, he was raised by Priam; originally he was a Delphian, and had been carried to Troy by Antenor, on account of his beauty. (Comp. Lucian, Gall. 17.) [L. S.]

PANTHIAS (Πάνθιας), of Chios, a grammarian of the school of Sicyon, who is only mentioned as the maker of some statues of athletes. He was instructed in his art by his father, Sostratus, who was the seventh in the succession of disciples from Aristocles of Cydona: Panthias, therefore, flourished probably about B.C. 420—338. (Paus. vii. 3, 1, 9, § 1, 14, § 3; Thiersch, Epochen, pp. 143, 278, 282; Aristocles.) [P. S.]

PANTOLEON. [Panteleon,] PANTOLEUS, A sculptor, who lived in PANYASIS.

Greece in the reign of Hadiad, whose statue he made for the Milesians. (Bockh, Corp. Inser. vol. i. No. 339.) [P. S.]

PANURGUS, the name of the slave of Pammus Chaerea, whom the latter entrusted to Roscinius, the actor, for instruction in his art. [Chareas, p. 677, b.]

PANYASIS (Papanis).—1. A Greek epic poet, lived in the fifth century before the Christian aera. His name is also written Panois or Panois, but there can be no doubt that Panyas is the correct way. According to Suidas (s. v.), he was the son of Polycarus and a native of Halicarnassus; and although the historian Duris stated that he was a Samian and the son of Diocles, yet the authority of Suidas is to be preferred, at least as far as respects his birth-place, since both Pausanias (x. 8, § 5) and Clemens Alexandrinus (vi. 2, § 52) likewise call him a native of Halicarnassus. Panyasis belonged to one of the noblest families at Halicarnassus, and was a relation of the historian Herodotus, though the exact relationship in which they stood to one another is uncertain. One account made the poet the first cousin of the historian, Panyasis being the son of Polycarus, and Herodotus the son of Lyxes, the brother of Poly- archus. Another account made Panyasis the uncle of Herodotus, the latter being the son of This or Dryo, who was the sister of the poet (Suidas, s. v.). These conflicting accounts have given rise to much dispute among modern writers, but the latter statement, according to which Panyasis was the uncle of Herodotus, has been usually preferred. Panyasis began to be known about B. C. 489, continued in reputation till B. C. 467, in which year he is placed by Suidas, and was put to death by Lygdamis, the tyrant of Halicarnassus, probably about the same time that Herodotus left his native town, that is about B. C. 457 (Clinton, F. H. sub annis 489, 457).

Ancient writers mention two poems by Panyasis, Of these the most celebrated was entitled Heracleia (Ἡρακλεια, Athen. xi. pp. 409, d. 498, c.) or Her- ocleia (Ἡροκλεια, Suidas), which gave a detailed account of the exploits of Heracles. It consisted of fourteen books and nine thousand verses; and it appears, as far as we can judge from the references to it in ancient writers, to have passed over briefly the adventures of the hero which had been related by previous poets, and to have dwelt chiefly upon his exploits in Asia, Libya, the Hesperides, &c. An outline of the contents of the various books, as far as they can be restored, is given by Muller, in an appendix to his work on the Dorians (vol. i. p. 532, Engl. transl. 1st ed.). The other poem of Panyasis bore the name of Ionica (Ἰωνικα), and contained 7000 verses; it related the history of Neleus, Codrus, and the Ionic colonies, probably much in the same way as others had described in poetry the πτέρεια or ἄσκολογυς of different states and countries. Suidas relates that this poem was written in pentameters, but it is improbable that at so early a period a poem of such a length was written simply in pentameters;

* The quantity of the name is doubtful. A late poet (Avien. Arat. Phaen. 175) makes the penultimate short:—

"Panyasi sed nota tamen, cu longiora metra," but it was probably long in earlier times.

still, as no fragments of it have come down to us, we have no certain information on the subject.

We do not know what impression the poems of Panyasis made upon his contemporaries and their immediate descendants, but it was probably not great, as he is not mentioned by any of the great Greek writers. But in later times his works were extensively read, and much admired; the Alexander, indeed, compared him with Homer, Hesiod, Pindar, and Antimachus, as one of the five principal epic poets, and some even went so far as to compare him with Homer (comp. Suidas, s. v.; Dionys. de Vet. Script. Cons. c. 2, p. 419, ed. Reiske; Quintil. x. 1, § 54). Panyasis occupied an intermediate position between the later cyclic poets and the studied efforts of Antimachus, who is stated to have been his pupil (s. v. Antimachos). From two of the longest fragments which have come down to us (Athen. ii. p. 36; Stobaeus, xvii. 22), it appears that Panyasis kept close to the old Ionic form of epic poetry, and had imbibed no small portion of the Homeric spirit.

The fragments of the Heroeia are given in the collections of the Greek poets by Winterton, Bruneck, Boissonade, and Gaisford; in Dünitzer's Fragments of Greek epic poetry, and in the works of Tzschirmer and Funcke, quoted below. (The histories of Greek literature by Bode, Ulrici, and Bernhardy; Tzschirmer, De Panyasidii Vita et Carminibus Dissertation, Vratial, 1836, and Fragmenta, 1842; Funcke, De Panyasidii Vita et Poesi Dissert. Bonn. 1837; Eckstein, in Ersch and Gruber's Encyclopaedia, art. Panyasis.)

2. A philosopher, also a native of Halicarnassus, who wrote two books "On Dreama" (Περὶ ὕπνων, Suidas, s. v.). This must be the Panyasis, whom Artemidorus refers to in his Ἱεροκριτικα (i. 64, ii. 53), and whom he expressly calls a Halicarnassian. Tzschirmer conjectures that the passage of Duris above referred to has reference to this Panyasis; that the poet had a son named Diocles, and that the philosopher was therefore a grandson of the poet, and was called a Samian by Duris from his residence in that island. That Suidas has confounded the two persons, as he frequently does, seems probable from his calling the poet ταυτοτόκως, an epithet which would be much more appropriate to the philosopher, who wrote upon dreams.

PAPAEUS or PAPAS (Παπαῖος or Πατας), "father," a surname of Zeus among the Sycthians (Herod. iv. 59), and of Attis. (Diod. iii. 58). [L. S.]

PAPHIA (Παφία), a surname of Aphrodite, derived from the celebrated temple of the goddess at Paphos in Cyprus. A statue of Aphrodite Paphia also stood in the sanctuary of Isis, between Ogyius and Thalamae in Laconia. (Paus. iii. 36; Tac. Hist. ii. 2; Hom. Hymn. in Ven. 59, Apollod. iii. 14. § 2; Strab. iv. p. 683.) [L. S.]

PAPHUS (Πάφος), a son of Pygmalon and the statue into which life had been breathed by Aphrodite. From him the town of Paphus is said to have derived its name; and Pygmalon himself granted the Paphian hero Oy. Met. xii. 290, &c.) The father of Cinyras, the founder of the temple of Aphrodite at Paphos, is likewise called Paphus. (Hygin. Fab. 242; Apollod. iii. 14. § 2.) [L. S.]

PAPIA, the wife of Oppianicus. (Cic. pro Cluent. 9.)

PAPIA GENS, plebeian, was originally a Samnite family. In the Samnite wars a Papius | 2
Brutulus is mentioned, who endeavoured to persuade his countrymen to renew the struggle against the Romans, in B. C. 322 [Brutulus], and in the great Social War, B. C. 90, Papias Mutilus was the leader of the Sammites against Rome [Mutilus]. Some of the Papii probably settled at Rome soon after this event, and one of them finally obtained the consularship in A. D. 9. The Roman Papii were divided into two families, the Celsi and Mutili: the former are given under Celsus, the latter are spoken of under Papius.

PAPIAS, one of the principal officers of Sex. Pompey, was one of the commanders of his fleet in the battle with Agrippa, off Mylæn, n. c. 36. (Appian, B. C. v. 194, 196, &c.) He appears to be the same person as the commander called Democles by Dion Cassius (xlix. 2, 3) and Suetonius (Aug. 16).

PAPIAS (Παπίας), an early Christian writer. He is described by Irenæus (adv. Haeræ, v. 33), whom Jerome calls a disciple of Papias, in a passage of which Eusebius (H. E. iii. 39) has preserved the original Greek, as "a hearer of John and a companion of Polycarp" [Polycarpus]. Irenæus also speaks of him as "an ancient man" (ἀρχαῖος ἄνθρωπος), an expression which, though ambiguous, may be understood as implying that he was still living when Irenæus wrote. It has been disputed whether the John referred to in the statement of Irenæus was the Apostle John, or John the Elder, an eminent Christian of the Church at Ephesus, to whom some have ascribed the book of Revelation (Euseb. l. c.). Jerome repeatedly describes Papias as a hearer of the Evangelist John; probably following Irenæus, whom he apparently understood as speaking of the Apostle. Eusebius also appears to have understood Irenæus to speak of the Apostle John, but he proceeds immediately to cite a passage from Papias himself, which indicates that he was never personally acquainted with John or with any of the Apostles. But it may be observed that the words of Papias equally exclude the supposition of his having been personally acquainted with John the Elder; though Eusebius, either not properly considering them, or referring to some other passage of his works now lost, says that he called himself a hearer of the elder John, as well as of Aristion, whom Papias mentions in conjunction with him. Eusebius states also that Papias embodied in his writings many particulars related by Aristion and John the Elder (ἀπὸ τῶν παραδόσεων), but it does not follow that he received them directly from their lips. (Euseb. l. c.) That Papias was a companion of Polycarp, his contemporary and the bishop of the same province, Proconsular Asia, is likely enough; and we think it probable that the statement of Irenæus (which with Eusebius and Jerome we understand of John the Apostle) was only a hasty and as (Papias' own words show) on erroneous inference that, as Polycarp had been a hearer of the Apostle, therefore his companion Papias must have been one too. Papias was bishop of Hierapolis, on the border of Phrygia (Euseb. H. E. iii. 36, 39), where he was acquainted with the daughters of the Apostle Philip, who had fixed his residence there, but must have died, as the passage referred to above as cited by Eusebius shows, before Papias' time. Papias speaks of himself as devoted more to inquiries about the traditions respecting the Apostles and their teachings, than to books; but his declaration must be understood as referring to other books than the Scriptures, and even then, must not be too strictly interpreted, for, according to Eusebius, he was not only well versed in the Scriptures, but was a man of great general information (τὰ πάντα δι᾽ ἑαυτοῦ λογοτάτος). Eusebius, indeed, has elsewhere spoken slightly of his intellects, saying (c. 39) that he appears to have been "of small understanding," σιμικρὸς ἄν τῶν νοοῦ. We have observed that Papias may have been still living when Irenæus wrote his book Adversus Haæreæ; but the Paschal or Alexandrian Chronicle states that Papias suffered martyrdom at Pergamus, with several other persons, in the same year (A. D. 177), in which Polycarp suffered at Smyrna. (Chron., Paschale, vol. i. p. 258, ed. Paris, p. 296, ed. Venices, p. 481, ed. Bonn.) He is called Martyr by Stephanus Gobarus the Tritheist (Phot. Bibl. Cod. 232). That he was bishop of the Church at Pergamus, and that he is rebuked in the epistle to that Church in the Apocalypse (c. ii.), is a mere conjecture, founded apparently on Papias' belief in the Millennium, and on the place of his martyrdom. Halloix (Illustror. Orient. Eccles. Scriptor. Vitate, S. Papis, c. 3) has cited, as referring to Papias of Hierapolis, a passage in certain Acta B. Onesimi, which states that he was taken to Rome, imprisoned and tortured for some time, and then released. But there is reason to believe that the Acta, if indeed they have any foundation in truth (comp. Tillenm., Mén. vol. ii. p. 298), refer to another Papias of much later date (Henschelius, in Acta Suntorum, Feburari, vol. iii. p. 297). He is called Saint by Jerome, and is conjectured to have lived in the twenty-second of February. The ancient Martyrologies, however, in many cases, assign him to other days.

Papias was a millenarian. "He says (we quote the words of Euseb. H. E. iii. 39) that there will be for a thousand years after the resurrection of the dead, a bodily reign of Christ on this earth." According to Stephanus Gobarus (apud Phot. l. c.) he held that there would be the enjoyment of sensible food in the Kingdom of Heaven, i.e. apparently during Christ's millennial reign. The Millenarians were sometimes called, from Papias, Papi- pianists, Παπιανισταί.

Papias wrote a work in five books, entitled Λόγοι κυριακῶν Ιησοῦς Χριστοῦ βιβλία τρία, Explanatorium Sermonum Domini Libri V. The work is lost, except a few fragments which have been preserved by Irenæus, Eusebius, Maximus Confessor, and other writers, down to Theophylact and Occumenius. The fragments are valuable for the early traditions which they contain respecting the writings of the New Testament, and which, in great degree, were derived from John the Elder. According to these traditions the Gospel of Matthew was written in Hebrew, and each one interpreted (ἐξηγήθη) it as he was able; an obscure declaration which has caused much perplexity. The evangelist Mark is described as the interpreter (ἐξηγηθη) of Peter, and as writing from his dictate. Papias also cited or mentioned the first Epistle of Peter and the first of John; and refers to the history of the woman taken in adultery contained in the Gospel of John, ch. viii. vs. 2, &c.

Several fragments of Papias were published by Halloix (Illustr. Orient. Eccles. Scriptor. Vitate) Grabe (Spicilegium SS. PP. vol. i.), and Münter PAPINIANUS.

PAPIAS, sculptor. [ARISTEAS.]

PAPINIANUS, AEMILIUS was a pupil of Q. Cervidius Scareola. An inscription records his parents to be Papinianus Hostilis and Eugenia Gracilis, and that they survived their son Aemilius Paulus Papinianus, who died in his thirty-seventh year. Aemilius Papinianus succeeded Septimius Severus, afterwards emperor, as Advocatus Fisci (Spartian, Cars. 8). Now Severus held this office under Marcus Antoninus, and he was employed in various high capacities by Marcus during his lifetime. Papinianus therefore was Advocatus Fisci during the reign of Marcus, who died A.D. 180. Severus became emperor A.D. 192, and died A.D. 211. There is therefore an interval of about thirtytwo years between the death of Marcus and that of Severus, and consequently Papinianus, who held office under Marcus, and was put to death by Caracalla, the successor of Severus, must have been much more than thirty-six when he died. Papinian is said to have been related to Julia Domna, the second wife of Severus. (Spart. Cars. 8.) He was highly esteemed by Severus, under whom he was Libellorum magister (Dig. 20. tit. 5. s. 12), and afterwards praefectus praetorio. (Dion Cass. ixvii. 10. 14.) Paulus (Dig. 12. tit. 1. s. 40) speaks of having delivered an opinion in the auditorium of Papinian. Paulus and Ulpian were both assessors to Papinian (Papinianus in consilio furent; Spart. Proc. Niger, 7.) Lampriodis (Alex. Severus, 68) enumerates the "juris professores," as he terms those who were pupils of Papinian: in the list are the names of Ulpian, Paulus, Pomponius, Africanus, Florentinus and Modestinus, the most distinguished among the great Roman jurists.

Severus came to Britain A.D. 208, in which year his sons M. Antoninus Caracalla and P. Septimius Geta were consuls, and he died at York A.D. 211. As Papinian was praefectus praetorio under Severus, and is mentioned as being summoned to the emperor's presence, when the design of Caracalla against his father's life was discovered, we may conclude that the illustrious jurist was in Britain during the residence of Severus; and he may have drawn up the rescript given by Severus in the last year but one of his reign, at York (A.D. 210), in one Cassius (Cod. 3. tit. 32. s. 1.) It is also said that the emperor commended his two sons to the care of Papinian, which seems to imply that he was at York when Severus died there.

On the death of his father, Caracalla, according to Dion, dismissed Papinian from his office, and in the second year of his reign he murdered his brother Geta, while he was clinging to his mother for protection. Papinian also was soon after put to death by the emperor's orders. The reasons given for his death were various, but it is easy to conceive that a tyrant like Caracalla would be satisfied with any excuse for getting rid of so stern a monitor and so honest a man. The pretext may have been that he was a partisan of Geta, or that he refused to comply with the emperor's order to make a defence before the senate and the people of his brother's assassination (Spart. Cars. 8.); but Papinian's real crime was his abilities and his integrity. His biographer states (Spart. Cars. 4.) that Papinian was beheaded in the emperor's presence, and that his son, who was then queuestor, perished about the same time. The dying words of Papinian warned his successor in the office of what his own fate might be, and they were prophetic; for Macrinus, who did succeed him, reigned the empire of its tyrannical master by assassination. (Spart. Cars. 8, 6.) Spartanus apparently supposed that Papinian was praefectus praetorio at the time of his death, (Dion Cass. ixxvii. 1, and the note of Reimann.)

These are the thirtyseven excerpts from Papinian's works in the Digest. These excerpts are from the thirtyseven books of Questions, a work arranged according to the order of the Edict, the nineteen books of Responsa, the two books of Definitiones, the two books De Adulteriis, a single book De Adulteriis, and a Greek work or fragment, entitled κατά τὸν ἀτάνωμον χορηγόν τοῦ Παπινίανο, a work which probably treated of the office of aedile both at Rome and in other towns. Papinian is chiefly cited by Paulus and Ulpian; and he is also cited by Marcian. All these three jurists wrote notes on the works of Papinian, and in some cases at least dissented from him. The following references contain instances of annotations on Papinian: — Dig. 22. tit. 1. s. 1. § 2; 18. tit. 1. s. 72; 1. tit. 21. s. 1. § 1; 3. tit. 5. s. 31, § 2.

No Roman jurist had a higher reputation than Papinian. Spartanus (Severus, 21) calls him "juris auxilium et doctrine legalis thesaurus." The epithet "juris praedecessorum" is "consaluitissimus," " desertissimus," and others to the like effect, are bestowed upon him by various emperors. (Cod. 5. tit. 71. s. 14; 7. tit. 32. s. 3; 6. tit. 25. s. 9.)

As a practical jurist and a writer, few of his countrymen can be compared with him. Indeed the great commentator, who has devoted a whole folio to his remarks upon Papinian, declares that he was the first of all lawyers who have been or are to be, that no one ever surpassed him in legal knowledge, and no one ever will equal him. (Cujacius, Opera, vol. iv., In Proem, ad Quaest. Papinian.) Nor is the reputation of Papinian unmerited. It was not solely because of the high station that he filled, his penetration and his knowledge, that he left an imperishable name; his excellent understanding, guided by integrity of purpose, has made him the model of a true lawyer. The fragments of Papinian are sometimes obscure, and require the aid of a commentator; but they will amply repay the labour that is necessary to seize the fullness of the meaning of this great master of jurisprudence.

A constitution of Theodosius and Valentinian (Cod. Theod. 1. tit. 4, De Responsis Prudentium) declared all the writings of Papinian, Paulus, Caecus, Ulpian and Modestinus to be authority for the judge; the opinions of those jurists also were to have authority, whose discussions and opinions (tractus et opiniones) all the five mentioned jurists had inserted in their writings, as Scevela, Sabinius, Julian and Marcellus; if the opinions of these jurists, as expressed in their writings, were not unanimous, the opinion of the majority would prevail; if there was an equal number on each side, the opinion of that side was to prevail on which Papirian was (si numerus [auctorum] aequalis sit, ejus partes preceederat auctoris in qua excellentissimi ingenii vir Papirianus eminent, qui, ut singulos vindic, ita cedit duolos). It was one of the characteristics of Papirian not to consider himself infallible, and he did not hesitate to change his opinion, when he found a better reason, of which there is an instance in the passages here referred to. (Dig. 18. tit. 7. s. 6 § 1; and Cod. 6. tit. 2. s. 22. § 3.) His strong moral feeling is indicated in another passage (Dig. 28. tit. 7. s. 15), where he is speaking of conditions under which a heres may be instituted: conditions which are opposed to filial duty, to one’s good name, to regard to decency, and generally, those which are against good morals (boni mores), must not be considered as conditions that a man can fulfil.

In the four years’ course of study, as it existed before the time of Justinian, Papirian’s Respensa formed part of the third year’s course, but only eight books out of the nineteen were explained to the students; and even this was done very imperfectly. In Justinian’s course of studies, among other parts of the Digest, there were read in the third year, the twentieth, twenty-first and twenty-second books, which were intended to change the place of the exposition of Papirian formerly given in the third year’s course; and it is stated that the students will in this manner become much better acquainted with Papirian. To make this intelligible, it should be observed, that all the titles of the twentieth book begin with an excerpt from Papirian, as Blume observes (Zeitschrift, vol. iv. p. 294, Über die ordnung der fragmente im Pantheleten); but he appears not to have observed that one of the titles of this book neither begins with nor contains any excerpt from Papirian. The students were also to retain the old designation of Papirinians, which denoted students of the third year; and the festival which they used to celebrate on commencing their third year’s course was still to be observed. (Const. Iunni Reipublicae, s. 4, &c; Gratius, Vitae Jurisconsultorum; Zimmer, Geschichte des Römischen Privatrechts, vol. i. p. 301; Puchta, cursus, &c. vol. i. p. 543; Cuijcius, Opusc. iv. [N. 2. 86. ] [G. L.]

PAPIRIUS. 1. L. PAPIRIUS, a wealthy Roman eques, plundered by Verres (Cic. Vet. iv. 21). In some manuscripts he is called Papirius.

2. PAPIRIUS, the author of an epigram in four lines, upon Casca, which is preserved by Varro (L. L. vii. 28, ed. Müller). Priscian, in quoting this epigram from Varro, calls him Pomponius (p. 692, ed. Patachius).

3. Sex. PAPIRIUS ALIENUS, consul a. d. 36, with Q. Plautius (Tac. Ann. vii. 40; Dion Cass. lixiii. 26). Pliny relates (H. N. xxv. 14) that this Papirius was the first person who introduced taboris (a kind of apple) into Italy, and he likewise states that he saw him in his consulship. The Sex. Papirius of a consular family, who threw himself down headlong from a height (a. d. 37), in order to escape from the unhallowed lust of his mother, was probably a son of the consul above-mentioned (Tac. Ann. viii. 49). [G. L.]

PAPIRIUS STATIUS. [Statius.]

PAPIRIA GENS, patrician, and afterwards plebeian also. The history of this gens forms the subject of one of Cicero’s letters to Papirius Paetus, who did not know that any of the Papirii had ever been patricians (ad fam. ix. 21). Cicero states that the Papirii were originally called Papilii, and that the first person who adopted the former form of the name was L. Papirius Crassus, consul, b. c. 336.

We learn from the same authority that the patrician Papirii belonged to the minores gentes, and that they were divided in the time of Cassius, Curson, Maso, and Mugillanus; and that the plebeian Papirii consisted of the families of Carro, Paetus, and Turdus. The most ancient family was that of Mugillanus, and the first member of the gens who obtained the consularship was L. Papirius Mugillanus, in n. c. 444. The gens, however, was of still higher antiquity than this, and is referred to tradition by the kingly period. The Papirii who composed the collection of the Leges Regiae, is said to have lived in the reign of Tarquinius Superbus (see below); and one M. Papirius was the first rex sacrificialis appointed on the expulsion of the kings (Dionys. v. 1.)

PAPIRIUS, C. or S. EX., the author of a supposed collection of the Leges Regiae, which was called Jus Papirianum, or Jus Civile Papirianum. Dionysius (tii. 36) states that the Pontifex Maximus, C. Papirius, made a collection of the religious ordinances of the kings, and that the Ordinances of Tarquin, which had been cut on wooden tablets by the order of Ancus Marcus (Liv. i. 20, 32; Dionys. ii. 63). Pomponius (Dig. 2. tit. 2. s. 2. § 26) states that Sex. or P. Papirius, in the time of Superbus, the son of Dementus (but Superbus was not the son of Dementus), made a compilation of all the Leges Regiae. Though much has been written in modern times about this compilation, nothing certain is known; and all conjecture is fruitless. A work of Granius Flaccus, " Liber de Jure Papirino," is quoted as a commentary on the Jus Papirianum (Dig. 50. tit. 16. s. 144). It appears that there were Leges enacted in the time of the kings, or there were laws which passed as such, for they are sometimes cited by writers of the imperial period. Thus Marcellus (Dig. 11. tit. 8. s. 2) quotes a Lex Regia, which provides that a pregnant woman who dies must not be buried before the child is taken out of her. The passage cited by Macrobius (Sat. vii. 11) from the Jus Papirianum is manifestly not the language of a period so early as that of Papirius, and accordingly the critics suppose that Macrobius refers to the commentary of Granius, though Macrobius refers distinctly to the Jus Papirianum. The Lex Papiria of Servius (ad Virg. Aen. xii. 836) appears to refer to the Jus Papirianum. (Gotius, Vitae Jurisconsult.; Zimmer, Geschichte des Römischen Privatrechts, vol. i. pp. 86, 83.) [G. L.]

L. PAPIRIUS, of Fregellae, lived in the time of Tib. Gracchus, the father of the two tribunes, and was reckoned one of the most eloquent orators of his time. Cicero mentions the speech which Papirius delivered in the senate on behalf of the inhabitants of Fregellae and the Latin colonies (Brut. 46). If that speech was delivered when Fregellae revolted, b. c. 125, Papirius must then have been a very old man, since Tib. Gracchus, in whose time he is placed by Cicero, was consul a second time in n. c. 163. But the speech may perhaps have reference to some earlier event which is unknown. (Meyer, Ort. Rom. Fragment. p. 154, 2nd ed.)

PAPYRIUS. 1. C. PAPIUS, a tribune of the plebs b. c. 65, was the author of a law by which all peregrini were banished from Rome. This was the renewal of a similar law which had been proposed by M. Junius Pennus, in b. c. 126. The Papia lex also contained provisions respecting the punishment of those persons who had assumed the Roman franchise without having any claim to it (Dion Cass. xxvii. 9; Cic. de Off. iii. 11, pro Balb. 23, pro Arch. 5, de Leg. Agr. i. 4, ad Att. iv. 16). If we are to believe Valerius Maximus (iii. 4. § 5), this law must have been passed at a much earlier period, since he relates that the father of Perperna, who was consul b. c. 130, was accused under the Papia lex after the death of his son, because he had falsely assumed the rights of a Roman citizen. But since Dion Cassius (i. c.) expressly states the law in b. c. 65, and Cicero speaks of its proposer as a contemporary (de Off. iii. 11), we may conclude that there is some mistake in Valerius Maximus.

2. M. PAPIUS MUTULUS, consul successively in a. d. 9, with Q. Poppeus Secundus. They gave their names to the well known Papia Poppaea lex, which was passed as a kind of supplement to the Lex Julia de Marianditis Ordinibus. Hence arose the title Lex Julia et Papia Poppaea, under which title its provisions are explained in the Dict. of Ant. The Papius Mutilus who is mentioned as a flatter of Tiberius in the senate, a. d. 16, is probably the same as the consul of a. d. 9. (Tac. Ann. ii. 16.)

3. PAPIUS FUSTUS, slain by the emperor Severus. (Spartian. Sever. 13.)

PAPIUS MUTULUS, the commander in the Social War. [MUTULUS.]

PAPPUS (Παππος), of Alexandria, the same of one of the later Greek geometers, of whom we know absolutely nothing, besides his works, except the fact that Suidas states him to have lived under Theodosius (a. d. 379—405). From an epigram of the second century a. d. a little later, in which one Pappus is lauded, Reiske thought that this must be the geometry, who ought, therefore, to be placed in the latter half of the second century. And Harless, in confirmation, that of all the authors named by Pappus, no one is known to have flourished later than the second century. This is but poor evidence, and, on the other hand, the authority of Suidas is by no means of the first order on a point of chronology. We may, therefore, look to other sources of probability, and the only one we can find at all to the purpose is as follows.

Pappus has left a short comment upon a portion of the fifth book of Ptolemy's Syntaxis: or rather of the comment which Suidas states him to have written upon four* books, nothing is left except a small portion which Theon has preserved and commented on (Syntaxis, Basle, 1538, p. 235 of Theon's Commentary). Now Euocles mentions Theon and Pappus in the same sentence, as commentators on Ptolemy; and puts them thus together in two different places. This is some presumption against Pappus having been nearly a contemporary of Ptolemy, and in favour of his standing in that relation to Theon. A commentator generally takes an established author, except when the subject of comment is itself a comment, and then he generally takes his own contemporaries. And moreover, those writers who are often named together are more likely than not to be near together in time. The point is of some importance; for Pappus is our chief source of information upon the later history of Greek geometry. It makes much difference as to the opinion we are to form on the decay of that branch of learning, whether the summary which he gives is to be referred to the second or the fourth century. If he lived in the fourth century, it is a very material fact that he could not find one geometry in the two preceding centuries whom he then considered as of note.

* This portion is on the fifth book: perhaps the four books were not the first four books.

The writings mentioned as having come from the pen of Pappus are as follows:—1. Μαθηματικων συναγωγών βιβλία, the celebrated Mathematical Collections, of which we shall presently speak. It is not mentioned by Suidas, but is referred to by Marinus at the end of his preface to Euclid's Data. 2. Χρονογραφία οἰκουμενική. 3. Εἰς τὰ τέσσαρα αὐτοῦ τοῦ Πολεμαίου μεγάλα Σωματών εἰόμενα. 4. Πολυμελές τοῦ Ἀριστοτελείου. 5. Χρονογραφία αἰτωλική.

The Collections, as we have them now in print, consist of the last six of eight books. Whether there were ever more than eight is not certain: from the description of his own plan given by Pappus, more might be suspected. No Greek text has been printed: an Oxford edition is long overdue. We cannot make out the negative entirely as to whether the existing Greek manuscripts contain the first and second books: most of them still at least do not. Gerard Vossius thought these books lost. Accounts of the manuscripts will be found in Fabricius (Harless, vol. i. p. 171), and, with interesting additions, in an appendix to Dr. Wm. Trail's Life of Robert Simson, Bath, 1812, 4to. In the portion which exists the text is as corrupt and mutilated as any Greek author who is said to have left more than fragments; and the emendations are sometimes rather inventive than conjectural, if properly named. Occasional portions of the Greek text have been published at various times, as follows:—1. Meibomius, De Proportionibus, Copenhagen, 1655, 4to, p. 155, has given three lemmas from the seventh book (Gr. Lat.). 2. Wallis found in a Savilian manuscript a part of the second book (prop. 16—27), and published it (Gr. Lat.) at the end of his edition of Aristarchus [Oxford, 1688, 8vo.], and again in the third volume of his

† So it is customary to say; but the words of Marinus would admit a suspicion that he refers to a separate commentary on Euclid, written by Pappus.

The duty which Savile and Bernard imposed upon that university in the seventeenth century, of printing a large collection of Greek geometry, has been performed hitherto precisely in the order laid down; and the editions of Euclid, Apollonius, and Archimedes, which are the consequence, are confessedly the best products of the press as to their subjects, and in the second case the only one. The next volume was intended to contain Pappus and Theon.

collected works, Oxford, 1699, folio. The subject of this fragment is the mode of multiplying large numbers; from which it has been suspected that the first two books treated of arithmetical only. 3. Part of the preface of the seventh book is given (Gr. Lat.) by Gregory in the introduction to the Oxford Euclid [Euclides]. 4. The complete preface of the seventh book, with the lemmas given by Pappus, as introductory to the subject of analysis of loci (τῶν ἀναλυόμενων τότοι), are given by Halley (Gr. Lat.), in the preface to his version of Apollonius, de Lineatione Rationum, Oxford, 1706, 8vo. So far Fabricius, verified by ourselves in every case except the part in [1]: we may add that Dr. Trail gave (op. cit. p. 182) two passages (Gr. Lat.) on the classification of lines, which had been much alluded to by Robert Simson: and that Dr. Trail also states, that in the preface of an edition of Vieta’s Apollonius Gallus, 1795, J. G. Camerer gave the Greek of the preface and lemmas relating to Tuctions (πεῖν έταγώνιον). Hoffman and Schweiger mention the second part of the fifth book as published (Gr.) by H. J. Eisenmann, Paris, 1824, folio.

There are two Latin editions of Pappus. The first, by Commandine, and published by his representatives, was made apparently from one manuscript only. Its description is “Pappi Alexandrini Mathematicae Collections a Federico Commandino ....commentariis illustratis,” Pisauri, 1568 (folio size, quarto signatures). This edition shows, in various copies, three distinct title pages, the one above, another Venetiis, 1589, a third Pisauri, 1602. It is remarkably erroneous in the paging and the catch-words; but it does happen, we find, that when at the other is corrected in every case. There is a cancel which is not found in some copies. The second edition, by Charles Malolessius, has the same title, augmented, Bononiae, 1660 (larger folio, quarto signatures). It professes to be cleared from innumerable errors. We cannot find any appearance of the use of any additional manuscripts, or any thing except what is usual, namely, correction of obvious misprints and commission of others. And we find that Dr. Trail formed the same judgment. The first edition is the more clearly printed. What Merennes gives, sometimes called an edition, is a mere synopsis of enunciations. An intended edition by John Gallesius, mentioned by Fabricius, never appeared.

The third book of Pappus treats on the duplication of the cube, geometrical constructions connected with the three kinds of means, the placing in a triangle two lines having a sum together greater than that of the two sides (which was regarded as a sort of wonder), and the inscription of the regular solids in a sphere. The fourth book treats of various subjects of pure geometry, as also of several extra-geometrical curves, as that called the quadratrix, &c. The fifth book treats of the properties of plane and solid figures, with reference to the greatest content under given boundaries, &c., at great length. The sixth book is on the geometry of the sphere. The seventh book is on geometrical analysis, and is preceded by the curious preface, which, mutilated as it is in parts, is the principal source of information we have on the history and progress of the Greek analysis. The eighth book is on mechanics, or rather on machines. A great deal might be written on Pappus, with reference to the effect his work has produced on modern geometry by the spirit of inquiry and conjecture which its appearance at once excited. But, unless a full account were given of the contents of the Collections, any such digression would be useless. (Suidas; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. ix; Trail, Life of Simon, &c.) [A. De M.]

PAPUS, the name of a family of the patrician Aemilia Gens.

1. M. Aemilius Pappus, was created dictator in B.c. 321, in which year the Romans received their memorable defeat from the Samnites near Caudium. (Liv. ix. 7.)

2. Q. Aemilius Pappus, twice consul, first in B.c. 392, and again in 276, and censor in 275. In both his consulships and in his censorship he had been in very close alliance with Fabricius Luscinus. In his second consulsip he was employed against the Etruscans and Boians, while Fabricius was engaged in Southern Italy. He completely defeated the allied forces, and the chastisement which the Boians received was so severe, that Cisalpine Gaul remained quiet for upwards of fifty years (Dionys. xviii. 5; comp. Polyb. ii. 20). The passage in Frontinus (1. 2. § 7) which speaks of the defeat of the Boii by Aemilius Paullus (an error for Pappus), is rightly referred by Niebuhr (Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. p. 430) to the above-mentioned victory, though most modern writers make it relate to the conquest of the Gauls by the consul of B. c. 225 [see below, No. 3]. In B.c. 280 he accompanied Fabricius, as one of the three ambassadors who were sent to Pyrrhus. The history of this embassy, as well as of his second consulsip and censorship, is given in the life of his colleague. [Luscius, No. 1.]

3. L. Aemilius Pappus, Q. P. Cn. n. Pappus, grand-son of L. Aemilius Paullus, was consul B.c. 223, and fell in battle with C. Attilius Regulus. This was the year of the great war in Cisalpine Gaul. The Cisalpine Gauls, who had for the last few years shown symptoms of hostility, were now joined by their brethren from the other side of the Alps, and prepared to invade Italy. The conduct of this war was assigned to Aemilius, while his colleague Regulus was sent against Sardinia, which had lately revolted. Aemilius stationed himself near Arimum, on the road leading into Italy by Umbria, and another Roman army was posted in Etruria, under the command of a praetor. The Gauls skilfully marched between the two armies into the heart of Etruria, which they ravaged in every direction. They defeated the Roman praetor when he overtook them, and would have entirely destroyed his army, but for the timely arrival of Aemilius. The Gauls slowly retreated before the consul towards their own country; but, in the course of their march along the coast into Liguria, they fell in with the army of the other consul, who had just landed at Pisa, having been lately recalled from Sardinia. Thus placed between two consular armies, they were obliged to fight, and though they had every disadvantage on their side, the battle was long contested. One of the consuls, Regulus, fell in the engagement; but the Gauls were at length totally defeated with great slaughter. Forty thousand of the enemy are said to have perished and ten thousand to have been taken prisoners, among whom was one of their kings, Concitulanus. Aemilius followed up his victory by marching through Liguria and invading the country of the Boii, which he laid waste in every direction. After remaining there a few days he returned to Rome and triumphed. (Polyb. ii.
Eutrop. 23—31; Oros. iv. 13; Eutrop. iii. 5; Zonar. viii. 20; Flor. ii. 4; Appian, Celt. 2.)

Aemilius Papus was censor b.c. 220, with C. Flaminius, two years before the breaking out of the second Punic War. In the census of that year there were 270,213 citizens. (Liv. Epit. 20, xxiii. 22.) In b.c. 216 Papus was one of the triumviri, who were appointed in that year on account of the dearth of money. (Liv. xxiii. 23.)

5. L. Aemilius Papus, prætor b.c. 205, obtained Sicily as his province. It was under this Aemilius Papus that C. Octavius, the great-grandfather of our Augustus, served in Sicily. (Liv. xxviii. 38; Suet. Aug. 2.) [Octavius, No. 12.] The L. Aemilius Papus, decemvir suorum, who died in b.c. 171, is probably the same person as the preceding. (Liv. xlii. 28.)

Papirus, a physician, born at Thyatira in Lydia, of respectable parents, who was ordained deacon by St. Cupus, in the second century after Christ. He was put to death by the profeft Valerius, together with his sister Agathone and many others, after being cruelly tortured, in or about the year 166. An interesting account of his martyrdom is given in the "Acta Sanctorum," taken chiefly from Simeon Metaphrastes. His memory is celebrated by the Roman church on the 13th of April. (See Acta Sanctor. April, vol. ii. p. 120, &c.; Bzovius, Nomencl. Sanctor. Profess. Medico.; C. B. Carpovius, De Medicis ab Eccles. pro Sanctis habitis, and the authors there referred to.) [W. A. G.]

Paralos, king of Armenia. ([Arsacidae, p. 364, a.])

Paralus (Πάραλος). 1. The younger of the two legitimate sons of Pericles. He and his brother were educated by their father with the greatest care, but they both appear to have been of inferior capacity, which was anything but compensated by worth of character, though Papus seems to have been a somewhat more hopeful youth than his brother. Both of them got the nickname of Βαςτουμάς. Both Xanthippus and Papus fell victims to the plague b.c. 429. (Plut. Peric. 24, 36, de Consolat. p. 118, e.; Plut. Alcib. c. 118, e., with the scholar on the passage, Protag. p. 319, e.; Athen. xi. p. 505, 506.)

2. A friend of Dion of Syracuse [Dion], who was governor of Minor under the Carthaginians at the time when the Dion landed in Sicily and gained possession of Syracuse. See Vol. I. p. 1026. (Diod. xvi. 9.)

[Parcae. [Moirae.]

Pardus, Gregorius or Georgius (Γρηγόριος εφ. Γεώγγας Παρδος), archbishop of Corinth, on which account he is called in some MSS. Georgius (or Georgius) Corinthus (Κόρινθιος), and, by an error of the copyist, Corinthus (Κόρινθου, in Gen.) and Curutus (Κορύτου, in Gen.), or Corvus, a Greek writer on grammar of uncertain date. The only clue that we have to the period in which he lived is a passage in an unpublished work of his, De Constructione Orationis, in which he describes Georgius Pisida [Georgies, No. 44], Nicolaus Callidius, and Theodorus Protusinus as * more recent writers of Ionic verse.* Nicolaus and Theodorus belong to the reign of Alexius I. Comnenus (a. p. 1081—1118), and therefore Pardus must belong to a still later period; but his vague use of the term "more recent," as applied to writers of such different periods as the seventh and eleventh or twelfth centuries, precludes us from determining how near to the reign of Alexius he is to be placed. It was long supposed that Corinthus was his name; but allatus, in his Diastrica de Georgius, pointed out that Pardus was his name and Corinthus that of his see; on his occupation of which he appears to have disused his name and designated himself by his episcopal title. His only published work is Peri dialekton, De Dialectis. It was first published with the Erodunta of Demetrius Chalcondylas and of Moschopulus, in a small folio volume, without note of time, place, or printer's name, but suppose to have been printed at Milan, A. D. 1493 (Panzer, Annal. Typogr. vol. ii. p. 96). The full title of this edition is Peri dialekton tov parakorinthiev, De Dialectia a Corintho descritpsit. It was afterwards frequently reprinted as an appendix to the earlier Greek dictionaries, or in the collections of grammatical treatises (e. g. in the Theaurum Chungiopis of Aldus, fol. Venice, 1496, with the works of Constantine Lascaris, 4to. Venice, 1512; in the dictionaries of Aldus and Asulunus, fol. Venice, 1524, and of De Sesia and Ravanis, fol. Venice, 1525), sometimes with a Latin version. (Sometimes in the Greek Lexicon of Stephanus and Scapula) the version only was given. All these earlier editions were made from two or three MSS., and were very defective. But in the last century Gisbertus Koenuis, Greek professor at Emneker, by the collation of fresh MSS., published the work in a more complete form, with a preface and notes, under the title of Γρηγορος Μητροπολιτος Κτιτων Περι Περι Διαλεκτων, Georgius Corinthis Metropilita de Dialectis, 8vo. Leyden, 1766. The volume included two other treatises or abstracts on the dialects by the anonymous writers known as Grammatici Leidensia and Grammatici Meermannianus. An edition by G. H. Schaeffer, containing the treatises published by Koenuis, and one or two additional, among which was the tract of Manuel Moschopulus, De Vocum Passionibus [Moschopulus], was subsequently published, 8vo, Leipzig, 1811, with copious notes and observations, by Koenuis, Bastius, Boissoneade, and Schaeffer. and a Commentatio Palaeographica, by Bastius. Several works of Pardus are extant in MSS.; they are on Grammar; the most important are apparently that Peri συναγωγας ἐνδών ήτοι των μετα σωλυσην καὶ περὶ βαρβαρωμον, κ. τ. λ., De Constructione Orationis, vol de Solocismo et Barbarismo, &c.; that Peri τρόνους τονωτων, De Tropho Poetico; and especially that entitled Εξουσιες εις των κανώνων των διεκεραυνων φορτων, κ. τ. λ., Expositiones in Canones s. Hymnorum Dominici Festorumque toto Anni, at et in Triodia Magnae Heldomadis ac Festorum Deiparum, a grammatical exposition of the hymns of Cosmas and Damascenus [Cosmas or Jerusalem; Damascenus, Joanna], used in the Greek Church; a work which has been, by the oversight of Possevino, Sixtus of Sena, and others, represented as a collection of Hymni et Sermones. (Allatius de Georgia, p. 416, ed. Paris, and apud Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xii. 122, 125; &c. Koenuis, Praef. in Gregor. Corinthis, 8vo. Paris. Fol. Graec. vol. vi. pp. 195, 320, 341, vol. ix. p. 742.) [J. C. M.]

Paregoros (Παρεγόρος), i. e., "the addressing," is the name of a goddess whose statute, along with that of Peitho, stood in the temple of Aphrodite at Megara. (Paus. i. 43. § 6.) [L. S.]

PAREIA (Παρεία), a surname of Athena, under which she had a statue in Lacedaemon, and so called only from its being made of Parian marble. (Paus. iii. 20. § 8.) Pareia is also the name of a nymph by whom Minos became the father of Erinyemon, Nephelion, Chrysyes and Philoelus. (Apollod. iii. 1. § 2.) [L. S.]

PARIS (Παρῖς), also called Alexander, was the second son of Priam and Hebe. Previous to his birth Hebe dreamed that she had given birth to a firebrand, the flames of which spread over the whole city. This dream was interpreted to her by Aescacus, or according to others by Casuaris (Eurip. Androm. 298), by Apollo (Cic. De Divin. i. 21), or by a Sibyl (Paus. x. 12. § 1), and was said to indicate that Hebe should give birth to a son, who should bring about the ruin of his native city, and she was accordingly advised to expose the child. Some state that the soothsayers urged Hebe to kill the child, but as she was unwilling to destroy the child she exposed him. (Suid. s.v.) (Hygin. Fab. 921.) Paris was brought up by a shepherd, Agelaus, who was to expose him on Mount Ida. But after the lapse of five days, the shepherd, on returning to Mount Ida, found the child still alive, and fed by a she-bear. He accordingly took back the boy, and brought him up along with his own child, and called him Paris. (Eurip. Troed. 921.) When Paris had grown up, he distinguished himself as a valiant defender of the flocks and shepherds, and hence received the name of Alexander, i.e. the defender of men. He now also succeeded in discovering his real origin, and found out his parents. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 5.) This happened in the following manner:—"Priam, who was going to celebrate a funeral solemnity for Paris, whom he believed to be dead, ordered a bull to be fetched from the herd, which was to be given as a prize to the victor in the sacrifice. This bull was Paris's father, the favourite bull of Paris, who therefore followed the men, took part in the games, and conquered his brothers. One of them drew his sword against him, but Paris fled to the altar of Zeus Herceius, and there Cassandra declared to him to be his brother, and Priam now received him as his son. (Hygin. Fab. 91; Serv. ad Aen. v. 370.) Paris then married Oenone, the daughter of the river god Cebren. As she possessed prophetic powers, she cautioned him not to sail to the country of Helen; but as he did not follow her advice (Hom. II. v. 64), she promised to heal him if he should be wounded, as that was the only aid she could afford him. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 6; Parthen. Erotes 4.) According to some he became, by Oenone, the father of Corythus, who was afterwards sent off by his mother to serve the goddess as guide on their voyage to Troy. (Tzetz. ad Lyce. 51.) Paris himself is further said to have married Helen's son from jealousy, as he found him with Helen. (Conon, Narr. 25; Parthen. Erot. 34.) It should, however, be mentioned that some writers call Corythus a son of Paris by Helen.

When Peleus and Thetis solemnized their nuptials, all the gods were invited, with the exception of Eris. But the latter appeared, nevertheless, but not being admitted, she threw a golden apple among the guests, with the inscription, "to the fairest." (Tzetz. ad Lyce. 93; Serv. ad Aen. i. 27.) Here, Aphrodite and Athena began to dispute as to which of them the apple should belong. Zeus ordered Hermes to take the goddesses to mount Gargarus, a portion of Ida, to the beautiful shepherd Paris, who was there tending his flocks, and who was to decide the dispute. (Eurip. Iphig. Aul. 1302, 1298; Paus. v. 19. § 1; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 986.) Hera promised him the sovereignty of Asia and great riches, Athena great glory and renown in war, and Aphrodite the fairest of women, Helen, in marriage. Hereupon Paris declared Aphrodite to be the fairest and deserving of the golden apple. This judgment called forth in Hera and Athena fierce hatred of Troy. (Hom. II. xxiv. 23, 29; Schol. ad Iliad. 637, Troyad. 925, &c., Helen. 23, &c., Androm. 284; Hygin. Fab. 92; Lucian, Dial. Deor. 20.) Under the protection of Aphrodite, Paris now carried off Helen, the wife of Menelaus, from Sparta. (Hom. II. iii. 46, &c.; Apollod. iii. 12. § 5.) In the presence of Paris, beautiful Helen was disrobed by her suitors in all writers, for according to some Helen followed her seducer willingly and without resistance, owing to the influence of Aphrodite (Hom. II. iii. 174), while Menelaus was absent in Crete (Eurip. Troyad. 939); some say that the goddess deceived Helen, by giving to Paris the appearance of Menelaus (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1946); according to others Helen was carried off by Paris by force, either during a festival or during the chase. (Lycoph. 106; Serv. ad Aen. i. 526; Dict. Cret. i. 3; Ptolem. Hephaest. 4.) Respecting the voyage of Paris to Greece, there likewise are different accounts. Once, it is said, Sparta was visited by a famine, and the oracle declared that it should not cease, unless the sons of Prometheus, Lycus and Chimaerae, who were buried at Troy, were propitiated. Menelaus accordingly went to Troy, and Paris afterwards accompanied him from Troy to Delphi. (Lycoph. 152; Eustath. ad Hom. ii. 113.) In other accounts Helen was say to have been voluntarily killed his beloved friend Antheus, and therefore fled with Menelaus to Sparta. (Lycoph. 134, &c.) The marriage between Paris and Helen was consummated in the island of Cruana, opposite to Gytheium, or at Salamin. (Hom. II. iii. 445; Paus. ii. 22. § 2; Lycoph. 110.) On his return with his bride to Troy, Paris passed through Egypt and Phoenicia, and at length arrived in Troy with Helen and the treasures which he had treacherously taken from the hospitable house of Menelaus. (Hom. Od. iv. 228, II. vi. 291; Herod. ii. 113; Dict. Cret. i. 5.) In regard to this journey the accounts again differ, for according to the Cyprians Paris and Helen reached Troy three days after their departure (Herod. ii. 117), whereas, according to later traditions, Helen did not reach Troy at all, for Zeus and Hera allowed only a phantom resembling her to accompany Paris to Troy, while the real Helen was carried to Proteus in Egypt, and remained there until she was fetched by Menelaus. (Eurip. Elect. 1280, &c., Helen. 33, &c., 243, 584, 670; Herod. ii. 118, 120; Lycoph. 113; Philostr. Hero. ii. 20, Vit. Apoll. iv. 16; Serv. ad Aen. i. 651, ii. 592.)

The carrying off of Helen from Sparta gave rise to the Trojan war. When the Greeks first appeared before Troy, Paris was bold and courageous but when Menelaus advanced against him, he took to flight. As Hector upbraided him for his cowardice, he offered to fight in single combat with Menelaus for the possession of Helen (iii. 79). Menelaus accepted the challenge, and Paris though conquered was removed from the field of battle by Aphrodite (iii. 330). The goddess then brought Helen back to him, and as she as well as Hector stirred him up, he afterwards returned to battle, and slew Menestheus (vi. 503, vii. 2, &c.). He steadily refused to give up Helen to the Greeks, though he was willing to restore the treasures he had stolen at Sparta (vii. 347, &c.). Homer describes Paris as a handsome man, as fond of the female sex and of music, and as not ignorant of war, but as dilatory and cowardly, and detested by his own friends for having brought upon them the fatal war with the Greeks. He killed Achilles by a stratagem in the sanctuary of the Thymbraean Apollo (Hom. ii. xxxii. 359; Dict. Cret. iv. 11; Serv. ad Aen. iii. 65, 322, vi. 57); and when Troy was taken, he himself was wounded by Philoctetes with an arrow of Hercules (Soph. Phileb. 1426), and then returned to his long abandoned first wife Oenone. But she, remembering the wrong she had suffered, or according to others being prevented by her father, refused to heal the wound, or could not heal it as it had been inflicted by a poisoned arrow. He then returned to Troy and died. Oenone soon after changed her mind, and hastened after him with remedies, but came too late, and in her grief hung herself. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 6; Dict. Cret. iv. 19.) According to others she threw herself from a tower, or rushed into the flames of the funeral pile on which the body of Paris was burning. (Lycoph. 63; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 617; Q. Smyr. x. 1; Helена, Paris is said to have been the father of Bunius (Banomus or Banochus), Corythus, Agamemnon, Helen, and of a daughter Helena. (Dict. Tzetz. v. 5; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 851; Parthen. Erot. 34; Ptolem. Hæmæst. 4.) Paris was represented in works of art as a youthful man, without a beard and almost feminine beauty, with the Phrygian cap, and sometimes with an apple in his hand, which he presented to Aphrodite. (Comp. Mus. Pio-Clément. ii. 37.) [L. S.]

PARIS, the name of two celebrated pantomimes in the time of the early Roman emperors.

1. The elder Paris lived in the reign of the emperor Nero, with whom he was a great favourite. He was originally a slave of Domitia, the aunt of the emperor, and he purchased his freedom by paying her a large sum of money. Domitia availed herself of his influence with Nero to attempt the ruin of Agrrippina, whom she hated. The plot, however, failed, and Agrrippina demanded the punishment of her accusers; but Paris stood too high in the monarch's favour to experience the punishment which was inflicted on his accomplices. Shortly after this Paris was declared, by order of the emperor, to have been free-born (ingeninus), and Domitia was compelled to restore to him the large sum which she had received for his freedom (Tac. Ann. xiii. 19—22, 27; Dig. 12. tit. 4. s. 3. § 5). Paris, however, was not fortunate enough to retain the favour of the emperor. The silly man wished to become a pantomime himself; and as he was unable to profit by the lessons in dancing which Paris gave him, and looked upon the latter as a dangerous rival, he had him put to death towards the end of his reign. (Dion Cass. lxxiii. 18; Suet. Ner. 54.)

2. The younger Paris, and the more celebrated of the two, lived in the reign of Domitian. He was originally a native of Egypt (hence called Nili by Martial, xi. 13), and repaired to Rome, where his wonderful skill in pantomimic dances gained him the favour of the public, the love of the profligate Roman matrons, and such influence at the imperial court that he was allowed to promote his creatures to places of high office and trust. It is stated by the Pseudo-Suetonius, in his life of Juvenal, and by the ancient commentators, that this poet was banished to Egypt on account of his attack upon Paris (vii. 86—91), but there seems good reason for rejecting this story, as we have shown in the life of Juvenal (Juvenalis). The popularity of Paris was at length his ruin. Domitia, the wife of the emperor, fell desperately in love with him; but when Domitian became acquainted with the intrigue, he divorced his wife, and had Paris murdered in the public street. So infuriated was he against the actor, that he even put to death a youth who was a pupil of Paris, merely because he bore a resemblance to his master in form and in skill. The people deeply deplored the death of their favourite; some strove to spot where he fell with flowers and perfumes, for which act they were killed by the tyrant; and Martial only expressed the general feeling of the city, when he called him in the epitaph (xi. 13) which he composed in his honour.

"Romani decus et dolor theatris." (Dion Cass. lxxvii. 3; Suet. Dom. 3, 10; Juvi. vi. 82—87, and Schol.)

PARIS, JULIUS, the abbreviary of Valerius Maximus, a man of letters, celebrated for his work in the life of the latter. (Vol. II. p. 1002.)

PARISIDES [PARRISIDES.]

PARME'NIDES (Piäuevordn), a distinguished Greek philosopher, the son of Pyrrhus. He was born in the Greek colony of Elea in Italy, which had probably been founded not long before (Ol. 61), and was descended from a wealthy and illustrious family (Diog. Laërt. ix. 21—25, with Sim. Karnen's emendation in PARMENIDES Eleæae carminei Religionis, Amstelodami, 1635, p. 3, note). According to the statement of Plato, Parmenides, at the age of 63, came to Athens to the Panathenaea, accompanied by Zeno, who was 40 years old, and became acquainted with Socrates, who at that time was quite young. This statement, which is designedly repeated by Plato (Plat. Parm. p. 127, b., Soph. p. 217, c. Theaet. p. 158, e), may very well be reconciled with the apparently discrepant chronology in Diogenes Laërtius (ix. 23), and has without reason been assailed by Athenaeus (xi. 15, p. 565, f., comp. Macrobius, Saturn. i. 1). According to the chronology of Plato the journey of Parmenides would fall in the 80th or 81st Olympiad (Socrates was born in the 4th year of the 77th Olymp.), his birth in the 65th Olympiad, and the period when he flourished would only be set down by Diogenes Laërtius a few Olympiads too soon (Ol. 69). Eusebius gives the fourth year of the 80th Olympiad as the period when he flourished, connecting him very accurately with Empedocles, Zeno, and Heraclitus; whereas Theophrastus is stated to have seen him down as a hearer of Anaximander (Diog. Laërt. ix. 21). The former statements, considering the indefiniteness of the expres-tion flourish, may at any rate be referred to Parmenides' residence in Athens; the latter must be entirely rejected, whether it be that Theophrastus made a mistake, or, what is much more likely, that Diogenes copied the statement carelessly. The same Theophrastus had spoken of him as a disciple of Xenophanes, with whom Aristotle, with a caution it is said, connects him (Metaph. i. 5, p. 986, b. l. 22). Theophrastus, according to Alexander: see Schol. on Aristotle, p. 536, 8; comp. Sext. Empir. adv. Math. vii. 111; Clemens Alex. Strom. i. 301; Diog. Laërt. ix. 21); and it is impossible not to see that the Colophonian did open that path of investigation which we see our Eleatic pursuing, whether the former influenced the latter through personal intercourse, or only by the written exposition of his doctrine. Considerably more doubt rests upon the relation in which Parmenides stood to the Pythagoreans, of whom two, entirely unknown to us, Ameinias and Diochaeas, are spoken of as his instructors (Sotion, in Diogenes Laërt. ix. 21). Others content themselves with regarding Parmenides as belonging as belonging to the Pythagorean school (Callimachus ap. Procl. in Parmenid. iv. p. 51, comp. Strub. vi. init.; Iamb. VII. Pythag. § 166, &c., with others), or with speaking of a Parmenidean life, in the same way as a Pythagorean life is spoken of (Cebet. Tabul. c. 2); and even the censourous Timon (in Diog. Laërt. ix. 23) allows Parmenides to have been a high-minded man; while Plato speaks of him with veneration, and Aristotle and others give him an unqualified preference over the rest of the Eleatics (Plat. Theaet. p. 183, e.; Soph. p. 237, comp. Aristotle. Metaph. A. 5, p. 986, b. l. 25; Phys. Auscult. i. 23; Clem. Alex. Strom. v. p. 603). His fellow-citizens, the inhabitants of Elea, must have been penetrated by similar feelings with regard to him, if they every year bound their magistrates to render obedience to the laws laid down by him (Speusippus in Diog. Laërt. ix. 23, comp. Strub. vi. p. 252; Plut. ad. Cebet. p. 1126). Thus Parmenides is presented as a religious and philosophical conviction in a didactic poem, composed in hexameter verse, entitled On Nature (Plut. de Pyth. Orac. p. 402), the poetical power and form of which even his admirers do not rate very highly (Proclus, in Parmen. iv. 62; Plut. de Auditi. 44, de audiend. Poet. p. 16, c.; comp. Cic. Acad. Quaest. iv. 23); and this judgment is confirmed by the tolerably copious fragments of it which are extant, for the preservation of which we are indebted chiefly to Sextus Empiricus and Simplicius, and the authenticity of which is established beyond all doubt by the entire accordance of their contents with the statements in Aristotle, Plato, and others, as well as by the language and style (the expressions of Diogenes Laërt. ix. 23, have reference to Pythagoras, not to Parmenides). Even the allegorical exordium is entirely wanting in the charm of inventive poetry, while the versification is all that distinguishes the argumentation from the baldest prose. That Parmenides also wrote in prose (Suid. s. v.) has probably been inferred only from a misunderstood passage in Plato (Soph. p. 227). In fact there was but one piece written by Parmenides (Diog. Laërt. i. 16, comp. Plat. Parmen. p. 128, a. e.; Theophrastus in Diog. Laërt. viii. 55; Simplicius on Arist. Phys. f. 31, a. and others); and the prose passage, which is found among the fragments (Simplic. l. c. f. 7), is without doubt of later origin, added by way of explanation (comp. Simon Karsten, l. c. p. 130).

In this allegorical introduction to his didactic poem, the Eleatic describes into what Hellenic virgin-conducted him on the road from Darkness to Light to gates where the paths of Night and Day separate; and, after Dike had unbolted the gates, to the goddess Wisdom. She greets him kindly, with the promise of announcing to him not only the unchangeable heart of truth (ἀληθείας εννεάδος ἄρτεν Ἱττορ, but also the truthless fancy of men (Parmenid. Relig. in Simon Karsten, l. c. 32, after Sextus Empiricus, adv. Math. vii. 111), and indicates in this way whither each of these opposite roads leads, while she at the same time points to the division of the poem into two parts. The path of truth sets out from the assumption that existence is, and that non-existence is inconceivable (Relig. l. 33, &c.), but only leads to the desired end by the avoidance, not merely of assuming a non-existence, but also of regarding existence and non-existence as on a par with each other, which is the back-leading road of the blind and erring crowd (ib. l. 43, &c.). On the former, Remus (Ἀγών, νόης) is our guide; on the latter the echo of the object (ἄκουσαν νομίμα), without change and limit (καὶ αἰτεῖς Ἰδιὸς ἄδελετορ), neither past nor future, entirely included in the present (ib. l. 56). For it is as impossible that it can become and grow out of the existent, as that it could do so out of the non-existent; since the latter, non-existence, is absolutely inconceivable, and the former cannot precede itself; and every coming into existence presupposes a non-existence (l. 61, &c.). By similar arguments divisibility (l. 77, &c.), motion or change, as also infinity, are shut out from the absolutely existent (l. 81, &c.), and the latter is represented as shut up in itself, so that it may not be compared to fire (l. 100, &c.); while Thought is appropriated to it as its only positive definition, Thought and that which is thought of (Object) coinciding (l. 93, &c.); the corresponding passages of Plato, Aristotle, Theophrastus, and others, which authenticate this view of his theory, see in Commentari. Elocut. by the author of this article, i. p. 133, &c., and in S. Karsten, l. c.). Thus to Parmenides the idea of Being had presented itself in its complete purity, to the exclusion of all connection with space, time, and multiformity, and he was compelled to decide upon regarding as human fancy and illusion what appears to us connected with time and space, changeable and multiform (l. 97, &c. 176), though he nevertheless felt himself obliged at least to attempt an explanation of this illusion. In this attempt, which he designates as mere mortal opinion and deceptive putting together of words, he lays down two (μεταφανη, the fine, and light, and thoroughly uniform aetherial fire of flame (Δαίμων αἰθήριον πῦρ, and the cold, thick, and heavy body (δυσμα) of dark night (l. 112, &c.),—represented by those who have preserved to us the in formation, as Warm and Cold, Fire and Earth (Arist. Phys. i. 3, Metaph. i. 5, de Gener. et Corrupt. i. 3; Theophrast. in Alex. l. c.) the former referred to the existent, the latter to the non-existent PARNEMIDES.

(Arist. and Theophr. l. c.). Although the latter expressions are not found in Parmenides, he manifestly regarded the former, the primordial principle of fire, as the active and real, the other as the passive, in itself unreal, only attaining to reality when animated by the former (l. 113, 129). The whole universe is filled with light and darkness (l. 123), and out of their "intermingling every thing in the world is formed by the Deity, who reigns in their midst (l. 127. en de μετὰ τῶν δαίμων ἡ πάντα κυβερνήσας), the primary source of the fateful preformation and intermingling (συνεγερητὸν τῶν καὶ μέλους δρῶν, l. 127, &c.). As the first of the gods, this deity devised Eros, the principle of union between the mutually opposed primordial principles (Arist. Metaph. i. 4; Sext. Empir. adi. Math. l. l. 6; Plut. de Primo Prigito, p. 948, c.) and after him other gods, doubtless to represent powers and gradations of nature (Plato, Symp. p. 195, c.; Menand. de Encom. i. c. 5), amongst which Desire, War, and Strife may very well have been found (Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 11; S. Karsten's Conjecture, l. c. p. 239, does not seem requisite). But the ultimate explanatory principle of the world of originated existence must, in his view, have been necessity, or destiny, and as such he may very well have designated at one time that deity that holds sway between the opposites (Stobaeus, Eclog. l. c. 23, p. 482; comp. Plato, Symp. p. 195, c.), at other times the opposed principles themselves (Plut. de Anim. Proc. c. Τίμαιος, p. 1026, b.). Of the cosmogony of Parmenides, which was carried out very much in detail, we possess only a few fragments and notices, which are difficult to understand (l. 132, &c.; Stob. Eel. Phys. l. c. 23, p. 492, &c.; Cic. de Nat. Deor. l. 11, &c.; comp. S. Karsten, l. c. p. 240, &c.), and with a preference to certain of the doctrines of the Pythagoreans, he conceived the spherical mundane system, surrounded by a circle of the pure light (Olympus, Uranus); in the centre of this mundane system the solid earth, and between the two the circle of the milky-way, of the morning or evening star, of the sun, the planets, and the moon; which circle he regarded as a mixture of the two primordial elements. As here, so in his anthropological attempts, he deduced the differences in point of perfection of organisation, from the different proportions in which the primordial principles were intermingled (S. Karsten, p. 257, &c.), and again deduced the differences in the mental capacities from the more or less perfect intermixture of the members (ὡς γὰρ ἐκαστὸν ἔχει καθάρισις μελέων πολυγλυκτίνων, τῶν ὑδάτων πυρόσ, l. 145, &c.; comp. S. Karsten, p. 266, &c.); laying down in the first instance that the principal principles are animated, and that all things, even those that have died, partake of feeling, not indeed for the warm, for light, for sound, but for the cold, for darkness, and for silence (Theophrastus, de Sensu Princ.). Accordingly, consciousness and thought also, in so far as, while conceived in a state of change, it is an object of appearance, is to be deduced from the primordial principles of the world of phaenomena, but must be abstracted from that Thought which is coincident with the absolutely existing. But, however marked the manner in which Parmenides separated the true, only, changeless Existence from the world of phaenomena, which passes off in the change of forms, and however little he may have endeavoured to trace back the latter to the former, the possibility of its being so traced back he could not give up, and appears for that very reason to have designated the primordial form of the Warm as that which was real in the world of phaenomena, probably not without reference to Heraclitus' doctrine of perpetual coming into existence, while he placed along with it the opposite primordial form of the Ἀφθονος, because it was only in this way that he could imagine it possible to arrive at coming into existence, and change. Thus, however, we find in him the germs of that dualism, by the more complete carrying out of which the later Ionians, Empedocles, Anaxagoras, and others, imagined that they could meet the Eleatic doctrine of the absolute. Empedocles seems more immediately, and to a greater extent than the rest, to have further developed these germs; and he also, just like Parmenides, set down necessity or predestination as the ultimate ground of originated existence and change, and in like manner agreed with his Eleatic predecessor in this, that like is recognised by like; a presupposition in which, as it occurs in Parmenides, we can scarcely fail to recognise a reference to his conviction that Thought and Existence coincide. But, little as he could deny that the really existing must in some way or other lie at the basis of change and the multiformity of phaenomena, he could not attempt to deduce the latter from the former so long as he maintained the idea of the existent as single, indivisible, and unchangeable; and this idea, again, he could not but maintain, so long as he conceived it in a purely abstract manner as pure Position. But, however insufficient this idea is, it was necessary to develop it with sharpness and precision before it would be possible to make any successful attempts to find the absolutely existing in place of the existent, and therefore as something multiform. The first endeavours to define the idea of the existent are found in Xenophanes, and with them begins that course of development peculiar to the Eleatics. But Parmenides was the first who succeeded in developing the idea of the existent purely by itself and out of itself, without carrying it back and making it rest upon a support, like the Deity in Xenophanes. It is only from inaccurate or indistinct statements that it has been concluded that Parmenides represented the absolutely existent as a deity (Ammonius, in Arist. de Interp. f. 58; Arist. de Xenoph. Gorg. et Melissa, c. 4). So that he was the only philosopher who with distinctness and precision recognised that the existent, as such, is unconnected with all separation or juxtaposition, as well as with all succession, all relation to space or time, all coming into existence, and all change from which arose the problem of all subsequent metaphysics, to reconcile the mutually opposed ideas of Existence and Coming into Existence.

After the scanty collection in H. Stephens' Poëtic Philosophy, 1573, the fragments of Parmenides were collected and explained more fully by G. G. Fülleborn (Beiträge zur Gesch. der Philos. vi.; comp. C. Fr. Heinrich, Spicilegium Observationum, ib. viii.). A more complete collection was then made

* It may be necessary to suggest to the reader who is unaccustomed to the terminology of metaphysics, that in connection with this word Position he must dismiss all notion of locality, and look upon it as a noun whose meaning answers to that of the adjective position.

PARMENION (Παρμενίων). I. Son of Phi-lotas, a distinguished Macedonian general in the service of Philip of Macedon and Alexander the Great. Notwithstanding the prominent place that he holds in history we know nothing either of his family and origin, or of the services by which he had attained the high reputation of which we find him possessed when his name first appears. As he was considerably older than Philip, having been born about B. c. 400 (see Curt.
vi. 2. § 33) it is probable that he had already distinguished himself during the reign of Amyntas II, but the first mention of his name occurs in the year 356, when we find him entrusted with the chief command in the war against the Illyrians, whom he defeated in a great battle (Plut. Alex. 3).
Throughout the reign of Philip he enjoyed the highest place in the confidence of that monarch, both as his friend and counsellor, and as a general:
the king's estimation of his merits in the latter capacity may be gathered from his well-known remark, that he had never been able to find more than one general, and that was Parmenion. (Plut.
Apoll. p. 177, c.) Yet the occasions on which his name is specially mentioned during the reign of Philip are not numerous. In B. c. 346 we find him engaged in the siege of Halus in Thessaly (Dem. de P. L. p. 392), and shortly after he was sent by Philip, together with Antipater and Eu-rylochus, as ambassador to Athens, to obtain the ratification of the proposed peace from the Athenians and their allies. (Id. ib. p. 362; Arg. ad Or. de F. L. p. 336.) In B. c. 342, while Philip was in Thrace, Parmenion carried on operations in Euoboa, where he supported the Macedonian party at Eretria, and subsequently besieged and took the city of Oreus, and put to death Euphrines, the leader of the opposite faction. (Dem. Phil. iii.
p. 126; Athen. xi. p. 508.) When Philip at length began to turn his views seriously towards the conquest of Asia B. c. 336, he sent forward Parmenion and Attalus with an army, to carry on preliminary operations in that country, and secure a firm footing there by liberating some of the Greek cities. (Diod. xvi. 91, xvi. 2; Justin. ix. 5.)
They had, however, little time to accomplish anything before the assassination of Philip himself entirely changed the aspect of affairs: Attalus was bitterly hostile to the young king, but Parmenion was favourably disposed towards him, and readily joined with Hephaestus, who was sent by Alexander to Asia, in effecting the removal of Attalus by assassination. By this means he secured the attachment of the army in Asia to the young king: he afterwards carried on some military operations of little importance in the Troad, but must have returned to Europe before the commencement of the year 334, as we find him taking part in the deliberations of Alexander previous to his setting out on his expedition into Asia. (Diod. xvi. 2, 5, 7, 16; Curt. vii. 1. § 3.)

Throughout the course of that expedition the services rendered by Parmenion to the young king were of the most important kind. His age and long established reputation as a military commander naturally gave great weight to his advice and opinion; and though his counsels, leaning generally to the side of caution, were frequently overruled by the impetuosity of the youthful monarch, they were always listened to with deference, and sometimes followed even in opposition to the opinion of Alexander himself. (Arrian.
iii. 9.) His special post appears to have been that of commander-in-chief of the Macedonian infantry (Diod. xvii. 17), but it is evident that he acted, and was generally regarded as second in command to Alexander himself. Thus, at the three great battles of the Granicus, Issus and Arbela, while the king in person commanded the right wing of the army, Parmenion was placed at the head of the left, and contributed essentially to the victory on all those memorable occasions.
(Arr. Anab. i. 14, ii. 8, iii. 11, 14, 15; Curt. iii.
9. § 8, iv. 13. §§ 85, 15, § 6, 16. § 1—7; Diod. xvii. 19, 60.) Again, whenever Alexander divided his forces, and either hastened forward in person with the light-armed troops, or on the contrary, despatched a part of his army in advance, to occupy some important post, it was always Parmenion that was selected to command the division where the king was not himself present. (Arr. Anab.
i. 11, 17, 18, 24, ii. 4, 5, 11, iii. 18; Curt. iii. 7.
§ 6, v. 3. § 16; Diod. xvii. 82.) The confidence reposed in him by Alexander appears to have been unbounded, and he is continually spoken of as the most attached of the king's friends, and as holding, beyond all question, the second place in the state. Among other important employments we find him selected, after the battle of Issus, to take possession of the treasures deposited by Dareius at Damascus (Arr. ii. 11, 15; Curt. iii.
12, 13; and again at a later period when Alexander himself determined to push on into the wilds of Parthia and Hyrcania in pursuit of Dareius, he left Parmenion in Media with a large force, with instructions to see the royal treasures taken in Persia safely deposited in the citadel of Ecbatana, under the charge of Harpalus, and then to rejoin Alexander and the main army in Hycania. (Arr. iii. 19; Justin. xii. 1.)

But before the end of the year 330, while Parmenion still remained in Media in pursuance of these orders, the discovery took place in Drángiata of the plot against the king's life, in which Philotas, the only surviving son of Parmenion, was supposed to be implicated [Philotas]: and the confession wrung from the latter by the torture not only admitted his own guilt, but involved his father also in the charge of treasonable designs against the life of Alexander. (Curt. vii. 11, § 21 —30.) Whether the king really believed in the guilt of Parmenion, or deemed his life a necessary sacrifice to policy after the execution of his son, it is impossible for us to decide, but the sentence of the aged general was pronounced by the assembled Macedonian troops, and Polydamas was despatched in all haste into Media with orders to the officers next in command under Parmenion to carry it into execution before he could receive the tidings of his son's death. The mandate was quickly obeyed, and Parmenion was assassinated by Cleander with his own hand. (Arr. Anab. iii. 26;
Curt. vii. 2. § 11—33; Diod. xvii. 80; Plut.
Alex. 49; Justin. xii. 5; Strab. xv. p. 724.)
The death of Parmenion, at the age of seventy years, almost the whole of which period had been spent in the service of the king himself or of his father, will ever remain one of the darkest stains upon the character of Alexander. Nothing can be less probable than that the veteran general who, on two occasions, had been the first to warn the king against the real or supposed designs of his enemies (Arr. Anab. i. 25, ii. 4; Curt. iii. 6, § 4, vi. 10, § 33; Plut. Alex. 19), should have now himself engaged in a plot against the life of his sovereign.
Indeed it is certain even if we admit the very questionable evidence that Philotas was really concerned in the conspiracy of Dимmus, that with that plot at least Parmenion had no connection.
(Curt. vi. 11. § 53.) The confessions extorted from Philotas on the rack amounted only to some vague and indefinite projects said to have been entertained by his father at the suggestion of Hegelochus, and which, if they were not altogether a fiction, had probably been made more than a temporary ebullition of discontent. (Id. ib.
§ 22—29.) Yet on this evidence not only was Parmenion condemned unheard, but the mode of his execution, or rather assassination, was marked by the basest treachery.

But however unjust was the condemnation of Parmenion, and great as were the services really rendered by him to Alexander, it is certain that his merits are unduly extolled by Quintus Curtius, as well as by some modern writers; and the assertion of that author that the king had done nothing great without his assistance (multa sine rege prospere, rex sine illo nihil magnum rei gesserat, vii. 2. § 33) is altogether false. On the contrary, many of the king's greatest successes were achieved in direct opposition to the advice of Parmenion; and it is evident that the prudent and cautious character of the old general rendered him incapable of appreciating the daring genius of his young leader, which carried with it the assurance of its own success. Had Alexander uniformly followed the advice of Parmenion, it is clear that he would never have conquered Asia. (See Arrin. Anab. i. 13, ii. 25; Plut. Alex. 16, 29, Apophth. p. 180, b.; Diod. xvii. 16, 54.)

Three sons of Parmenon had accompanied their father to Asia; of these the youngest,
Hector, was accidentally drowned in the Nile,
B.C. 331. (Curt. iv. 8. § 7.) Nicaros was carried off by a sudden illness on the march into Hy-caia, and Philotas was put to death just before his father. We find also two of his daughters mentioned as married, the one to Atalus, the uncle of Cleopatra, the other to the Macedonian officer, Coenus. (Curt. vi. 9. §§ 17, 30.)

2. One of the deputies from Lampacenus, who appeared before the Roman legates at Lysimachia to complain against Antiochus, B.C. 196. (Polyb.
xiv. 35.)

3. One of the ambassadors sent by Gentius, knight of Illyria, to receive the oath and hostages of Perseus, B.C. 168. He afterwards accompanied the Macedonian ambassadors to Rhodes. (Polyb. xxix. 2, 5.)

PARMÈNION (ΠΑΡΜΕΝΙΟΝ), literary. 1. Of Macedonia, an epigrammatic poet, whose verses were included in the collection of Philip of Thessalonica; whence it is probable that he flourished in, or shortly before, the time of Augustus. Brunc gives fourteen of his epigrams in the Anthologia (vol. ii. pp. 201—203), and one more in the Lexicon (p. 177; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. ii.
pp. 134—137). Relius refers to him one of the anonymous epigrams (No. cxxi.), on the ground of the superscription ΠΑΡΜΕΝΙΟΝ [in the Vatican MS., but that is the name, not of the author of the epigram, but of the victor who dedicated the statue to which it forms the inscription, as is clear from the epigram itself (comp. Brunck, Lect. p. 265; Jacobs, Animado, in Anth. Graec. vol. iii. pt. i.
pp. 336). The epigrams of Parmenion are characterized by brevity, which he himself declares (Ep. 1) that he aimed at; unfortunately, they want the body, of which brevity is said to be the soul,—wit.

2. A grammarian and glossographer (γλωσσο-γράφος), who is quoted in theVenetian Scholia on Homer. (H. i. 591.)

[ P. S. ]

PARMÈNION (ΠΑΡΜΕΝΙΟΝ). 1. A partner of Dionysodorus, against whom Demosthenes pleaded in the speech Kard Diovnetròpov. (Dem.
p. 1282—1293, ed. Reisk.)

2. Of Metapontum, who probably lived about the middle of the fifth century B.C. Iamblichus (Vis. Pythagor. c. 36) calls him (according to the common reading) Παρμίκος, and ranks him
among the celebrated Pythagorean philosophers.
Athenaeus, (who, iv. 156, c. &c., gives a quotation from a letter of a man of this name, containing an account of a Cynic banquet,) narrates (xiv. p. 614,
a. b.) an incident in his life, connected with a descent into the cave of Trophonius, and calls him rich and high born. He is also mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius, iv. 20.

3. A grammarian and commentator, of whom we have fragments and notices in the Schol. Hom.
Od. § 242, H. § 513, Α. 424; Eustath. ad II. pp.
384; Schol. Enirip. Med. 10, 276, Trod. 222, 230, Ithes. 524; Ed. Mag. s. v. Ἄρεω; Steph. Byz.
v. s. v. Ἀλος, Ἑρώφα, Φίλα. Hyginus, when speaking (Poet. Astron. ii. 2, 13) of his history of the stars, probably refers to a lost commentary on Aratus. Varro (de L. L. x. 10) refers to him as making the distinctive characteristics of words to be eight in number. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i.
p. 461, ed. Westermann.)

[ W. M. G. ]

P;&nbsp;ô;&nbsp;ΜΈΝΙΟΝ (ΠΑΡΜΕΝΙΟΝ). 1. Of Byzantion, a choliambist poet, a few of whose verses are cited by Athenaeus (iii. p. 75, f.; x. pp. 203, c. 321, a.), by the scholiasts on Pindar (Pyth. iv. 97), and on Nicander (Ther. 306), and by Stephanus of Byzantium (s. v. Βυζάντιον, Φίλικος, Χείρων, reading the last passage Παρμένιον for Μελιγέαρα). These few fragments are collected by Meineke (Choliambica Poesis Graecorum, Berol. 1845).

2. Of Rhodes, the author of a work on cookery (μαγειρική διδασκαλία) quoted by Athenaeus
(vii. p. 308, f.)

3. A grammarian, the author of a work περί διαλέκτου (Ath. xi. p. 500, b.) who is not improbably the same person as the glossographer Par-Mènion.

PARRHASIUS.

PARMENIS, CA'SSIUS. [CASSIUS PAR-

MENSIS,] PARMYS (Πάρμυς), daughter of Smerdis, the son of Cyrus. She became the wife of Dareius Hystaspis, and was the mother of Aromardos. (Herod. iii. 86, vii. 78.) [C. P. M.]

PARMENISS (Παρμησίς), a son of Cleopompus or Poseidon and the nymph Cleodora, is said to have been the founder of Delphi, the inventor of the art of foretelling the future from the flight of birds, and to have given the name to Mount Parnassus. (Paus. x. 6, § 1.) [L. S.]

PARNETHUS (Παρνηθέως), a surname of Zeus, derived from Mount Parnes in Attica, on which there was a bronze statue of the god. (Paus. i. 32. § 2.) [L. S.]

PARNOPIUS (Παρνοπίους), i.e. the expeller of locusts (παρνοπίων), a surname of Apollo, under which he had a statue on the acropolis at Athens. (Paus. i. 24. § 8.) [L. S.]

PAROREL'S, a son of Tricolonus, and the reputed founder of the town of Parorion in Arcadia. (Paus. viii. 35. § 6.) [L. S.]

PARRH'A'SIUS (Παρράθαιος). 1. A surname of Apollo, who had a sanctuary on Mount Lyceius, where an annual festival was celebrated to him as the epicurius, that is, the helper. (Paus. viii. 38.
§s 2, 6.)

2. A son of Lycaon, from whom Parrhasia in Arcadia was believed to have derived her name. (Steph. Byz. s. v.); some call him a son of Zeus, and father of Arcas and Parus, from whom the Island of Paros derived its name. (Serv. ad Aen.
xi. 31; Steph. Byz. s. v. Πάρος.) [L. S.]

PARRA'SIUS (Παρραθάιος), one of the most celebrated Greek painters, was a native of Ephesus, the son and pupil of Evener (Paus. i. 28. § 2; Strab. xiv. p. 642; Harpocr. s. v.) He belonged, therefore, to the Ionic school; but he practised his art chiefly at Athens: and by some writers he is called an Athenian, probably because the Athenians, who, as Plutarch informs him, held him in high honour, had bestowed upon him the right of citizenship (Senec. Controv. v. 10; Acro, Schol. ad Horat. Carm. iv. 8; Plut. Theor. 4; Junius, Catal.
Artif. s. v.). With respect to the time at which he flourished, there has been some doubt, arising from a story told by Seneca (l. c.), which, if true, would bring down his time as late as the taking of Olynthus by Philip. in Ol. 106, 2, or n. c. 347.
But this tale has quite the air of a fiction; and it is rejected, as unworthy of attention, by all the authorities except Sillig and Meyer, the latter of whom makes the extraordinary mistake of bringing down the life of Parrhasius as late as the time of Alexander the Great. On the other hand, the statement of Pausanias (i. 28. § 2), that he drew the outlines of the chasing on the shield of Phei-dias's statue of Athena Promachus, would place him as early as Ol. 84, or n. c. 444, unless we accept the somewhat improbable conjecture of Müller, that the chasing on the shield was executed several years later than the statue. (Comp. Mys, and Sillig, Catal. Artif. s. v. Mys.) Now this date is probably too early, for Pliny places Parrasiuss's father, Evener, at the 90th Olympiad, b. c.
420 (II. N. xxxv. 9. s. 36. § 1). According to this date Parrhasius himself must have flourished about the 95th Olympiad, b. c. 400, which agrees with all the certain indications which we have of his time, such as his conversation with Socrates

(Xen. Mem. iii. 10), and his being a younger contemporary of Zeuxis: the date just given must, however, be taken as referring rather to a late than to an early period of his artistic career; for he had evidently obtained a high reputation before the death of Socrates in b. c. 399.

Parrhasius belongs to that period of the history of Greek painting, in which the art may be said to have reached perfection in all its essential elements, though there was still room left for the display of his own extraordinary genius. The artist, who had yet attained, by the genius of an Apelles. The peculiar merits of Parrhasius consisted, according to Pliny, in accuracy of drawing, truth of proportion, and power of expression. " He first (or above all) gave to painting true proportion (symmetria), the minute details of the countenance, the elegance of the hair, the beauty of the face, and by the confession of artists themselves obtained the palm in his drawing of the extremities." (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 9. s. 36. § 5.) His outlines, according to the same writer, were so perfect, as to indicate those parts of the figure which they did not express. The intermediate parts of his figures seemed inferior, but only when compared with his own perfect execution of the extremities.

Parrhasius did for painting, at least in pictures of gods and heroes, what had been done for sculp}ure by Phidias in divine subjects, and by Poly-cletus in the human figure: he established a canon of proportion, which was followed by all the artists that came after him. Hence Quintilian (xii. 10) calls him the legislator of his art; and it is no doubt to this that Pliny refers in the words of the above quotation (primum symmetria picturae de-dit). Several interesting observations on the principles of art which he followed are made in the dialogue in the Memorabilia, already referred to.

The character of Parrhasius was marked in the highest degree by that arrogance which often accompanies the consciousness of pre-eminent ability:
"Quo nemo insolentius sit usus gloria artis," says Pliny. In epigrams inscribed on his works he not only made a boast of his luxurious habits, calling himself Ἀρήσιαταῖος, but he also claimed the honor of having assigned with his own hand the precise limits of the art, and fixed a boundary which was never to be transgressed. (See the Epigrams in Ath. xii. p. 543, d.) He claimed a divine origin and divine communications, calling himself the de-scentant of Apollo, and professing to have painted his Hercules, which was preserved at Lindus, from the form of the god, as often seen by him in sleep.
When conquered by Timanthes in a trial of skill, in which the subject was the contest for the arms of Achilles, he observed that for himself he thought little of it, but that he sympathised with Ajax, who was a second time overcome by the less worthy, (Plin. l. c.; Ath. l. c.; Aelian, V. H. ix. 11; Eustath. ad Hom. Od. xi. 545.) Further details of his arrogance and luxury will be found in the above passages and in Ath. xxv. p. 687, b. c.
Respecting the story of his contest with Zeuxis, see Zeuxis. The numerous encomiums upon his works in the writings of the ancients are collected by Junius and Sillig.

Of the works of Parrhasius mentioned by Pliny,
the most celebrated seems to have been his picture of the Athenian People, respecting which the commentators have been sorely puzzled to imagine how he could have exhibited all the qualities enu-PARTHENIUS.

PARTHENIUS, occurs in Juvenal (Sat. 44) as the name of a silver-chaser, evidently of high repute at that time (comp. Schol.). Sillius (Append. ad Catal. Artif.) and the commentators on Juvenal, take the name either as entirely fictitious, or as meaning only a Samian artist, from Parthenia, the old name of Samos: but the same name occurs, in a slightly different form, C. Octavius Parthenio, with the epithet, Argentarius, in an inscription (Gruter, p. dxxxi. 5; R. Rocheote, Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 376, 377, 2nd ed. Paris, 1843). [P. S.]

PARTHENIUS (Παρθένιος), the chief chamberlain (cubiculo praepositus) of Domitian, took an active part in the conspiracy by which that emperor perished, a. d. 96. After the death of the tyrant he persuaded Nerva to accept the crown, but was himself killed shortly afterwards by the soldiers, together with other conspirators against Domitian, whom Nerva had not the courage to protect. The soldiers cut off the genitalia of Parthenius, threw them in his face, and then strangled him. (Dion Cass. lxvii. 15, 17; Suet. Dom. 16; Aurel. Vict. Epit. 11, 12; Eutrop. viii. 1; Mart. iv. 78, xi. 1.)

PARTHENIUS (Παρθένιος), literary. 1. Of Nicaea, or according to others, of Myrina, but more probably of the former, since both Suidas (s. v. Νέστωρ) and Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v. Νίκαια) make him a native of that town, and the ancient grammarians generally speak of him as the Nicaean. He was the son of Hercules and Endorn, or, as Hermippus stated, of Tetha; and Suidas further relates that he was taken prisoner by Cinna, in the Mithridatic war, was afterwards manumitted on account of his learning, and lived to the reign of Tiberius. The accuracy of this statement has been called in question, since there were seventy-seven years from the death of Mithridates to the accession of Tiberius; but if Parthenius was taken prisoner in his childhood, he might have been about eighty at the death of Augustus. His literary activity must at all events be placed in the reign of Augustus. He dedicated his extant work to Cornelius Gallus, which must, therefore, have been written before b. c. 26, when Gallus died. We know, moreover, that Parthenius taught Virgil Greek (Macrob. v. 17), and a line in the Georgics (i. 437) is expressly stated both by Macrobius (l. c.) and A. Gallius (xiii. 26), to have been borrowed from Parthenius. He seems to have been very popular among the distinguished Romans of his time; we are told that the emperor Tiberius also imitated his poems, and placed his works and statues in the public libraries, along with the most celebrated ancient writers (Suet. Tib. 70).

Suidas calls Parthenius an elegiac poet, and the author of verses in various kinds of measures (ἐλέγχειον καὶ μέτρων διαφόρων ποιητής); and although his only extant work is in prosa, it was as a poet that he was best known in antiquity. The following are the titles of his principal works:—1. Ἐλέγχειον εἰς Αἰσχρόνην (Suid.) for which we ought probably to read Ἐλέγχειον, Ἀφροδίτη, as two separate works, and this conjecture is supported by the way in which these works are quoted by the ancient writers (comp. Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἀφροδίτην;
3. The Grammarians, was a pupil of the Alexandrine grammarian, Dionysius, who lived in the first century before Christ (Suidas, s. v. Διονύσιος). This Parthenius is mentioned by Athenaeus, who quotes a work of his, entitled Περὶ τῶν παρὰ τὸ Ισοτορικοῦ Λέξεως ψηφοφορίαν (Athen. xi. p. 467, c. 501, a. xv. p. 660, d. e.), and also by Eustathius (ad II. xxii. p. 1412, ad Od. xv. p. 567).

4. The Phocabam, frequently quoted by Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v. Φοκαβάμ, Δεκέτυρος, Μοφανός). In the Greek Anthology there is an epigram of Erycinos (Ancyra, vol. ii. p. 297), addressed εἰς Παρθενίων Φοκαβάμ τὸν εἰς Όμχεον παραφθαινα. Brucke understands this to be the Parthenius who was taken in the Mithridatic War [No. 1], and Jacobs supposes him to be the same as the disciple of Dionysius [No. 3]; but neither of these opinions can be correct, as Clinton has observed (P. F. vol. iii. p. 549), since it appears from the authority of the Phocabam by Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v. Δεκέτυρος) that the Phocabam Parthenius lived after Magnentius, who slew Constans in A.D. 350.

PARTHENOSAEUS (Παρθενοςαῖος), one of the seven heroes that undertook the expedition against Thebes. He is sometimes called a son of Area or Meleagion and Atalante (Apollod. iii. 9, § 2, 6, § 3, &c.; Paus. iii. 12. § 7; Eurip. Suppl. 888; Serv. ad Aen. vi. 430), sometimes of Meleagron and Atalanta (Hygin. Fab. 70, 79), and sometimes of Talaius and Talaus (Apollod. i. 9, § 13; Paus. ii. 20. § 4, ix. 18. § 4; Schol. ad Oed. Col. 1383). His son, by the nymph Clymene, who marched against Thebes as one of the Epigoni, is called Promachus, Stratolus, Theisennes, or Tiesimenes. (Apollod. i. 9. § 13, iii. 7. § 2; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 489; Hygin. Fab. 71; Paus. iii. 12. § 7.) Parthenosaeus was killed at Thebes by Aspichodorus, Amphidicus or Pericylmenus. (Apollod. iii. 6. § 8; Paus. ix. 18, in fin.; Aeschyl. Sept. c. Theb.) [L. S.]

PARTHENONE (Παρθηνώνη). 1. A daughter of Stymphalus, and by Heracles the mother of Euerus. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 8.)

2. A daughter of Acanthus and Samia, became by Apollo the mother of Lycomedes. (Paus. vii. 4. § 2.)

3. One of the Seins (Schol. ad Hom. Od. xii. 39; Aristot. Mir. Aeq. 103). At Naples her temple was very famous, and a torch was held every year in her honour. (Strab. v. p. 246; Tzetz. ad Lyd. 732.)

PAR'RHENOS (Παρθήνος), i.e. the virgin, a surname of Athena at Athens, where the famous temple Parthenon was dedicated to her. (Paus. i. 24, vi. § 5, vii. 41. § 5, x. 34, in fin.) Parthenos also occurs as the proper name of the daughter of Apollo and Chrysothemis, who after her premature death was placed by her father among the stars. (Hygin. Poet. Astr. 25, in fin.)

PARYSATIS (Παρυσάτις or Παρύσατις, see Baehr ad Ctes. p. 186.) According to Strabo (xvi. p. 763), the Persian form of the name was Pharrasias.

1. Daughter of Artaxerxes I. Longimanus, king of Persia, was given by her father in marriage to her own brother Dareius, named Ochos, who in B.C. 424 succeeded Xerxes II. on the throne of Persia. (Ctes. Pers. 44, ed. Baehr.) The feeble PARYSATS.

character of Dareius threw the chief power into the hands of Parysats; whose administration was little else than a series of murders. It was at her express instigation that Dareius put to death his two brothers Sogdianus and Arsitès, as well as Ar- taphius and Artoxares, the chief eunuch. All the family of Stateia, who was married to her son Artaxerxes, were in like manner sacrificed to her jealousy, and she was found to have designed to spare the life of Stateia herself. (Id. ïk. 48—56.)
 She had been the mother of no less than thirteen children, of whom four only grew up to manhood. The eldest of these, Arscaces, who afterwards assumed the name of Artaxerxes, was born before Dareius had obtained the sovereign power, and on this pretext Parysatis sought to set aside his claims to the throne in favor of her second son Cyrus. Failing in this attempt, she nevertheless interposed after the death of Dareius B. C. 405, to prevent Artaxerxes from putting Cyrus to death; and prevailed with the king to allow him to return to his satrapy in Asia Minor. (Ctes. Pers. 57; Plut. Art. 1—3; Xen. Anab. i. 1. §§ 1—3.) During the absence of Cyrus, she continued to favour his projects by her influence with Ar- taxerxes, whom she prevented from listening to those who would have warned him of the designs of his brother; on which account she was loudly blamed by the opposite party at court as the real author of the war that ensued. Even after the battle of Cunaxa (B. C. 401), Parysatis did not hesitate to display her grief for the death of her favourite son, by bestowing funeral honours on his mutilated remains, as well as by acts of kindness to Clearchus, the leader of his Greek mercenaries, whose life she in vain attempted to save. It was not long before the weakness and vanity of Ar- taxerxes, who was ambitious of being thought to have slain his brother with his own hand, enabled Parysatis to avenge herself upon all the real au- thors of the death of Cyrus, every one of whom successively fell into her power, and were put to death by the most cruel tortures. Meanwhile, the dissensions between her and Stateia, the wife of Artaxerxes, had been continually increasing, until at length Parysatis was able to elude the vigilance of her rival, and effect her de- stuction by poison. (Ctes. 59—62; Plut. Art. 4, 6, 14—17, 19.)

The feeble and indolent Artaxerxes, though he was apparently fully convinced of his mother's guilt, was content to banish her to Babylon; and it was not long before he entirely forgot the past, and recalled her to his court, where she soon recovered all her former influence. Of this she soon availed herself to turn his sus- picions against Tissaphernes, whom she had long hated as having been the first to discover the designs of Cyrus to his brother, and who was now put to death by Artaxerxes at her instigation, B. C. 396. (Plut. Art. 19—23; Diod. xiv. 80; Polyæen. vii. 16, § 1.) This appears to have been the last in the long catalogue of the crimes of Parysatis; at least it is the last mention that we find of her name. The period of her death is wholly un- known. The history of her intrigues and cruel- ties, the outline of which is above given, is very fully related by Plutarch (Artaxerxes), who has followed the authority of Ctesias, a resident at the court of Persia throughout the period in question, and bears every mark of authenticity.

The abstract of Ctesias himself, preserved to us by Photius, records the same events more briefly.

2. The youngest daughter of Ochus (Arta- xerxes III.), king of Persia, whom according to Arrian (Anab. v. 4. § 5) Alexander the Great married at Susa, B. C. 325, at the same time with Barsine or Stateia, the daughter of Dareius. Arrian cites Aristotleus as his authority; but this marriage is not mentioned by any other author. [B. H. B.]

PASCHASINUS, together with Lucentus, bishop of Asculum, and Bonifacius, a presbyter, was despatched by Leo I. to represent him in the Council of Chalcedon, held A. D. 451. Paschasinus, of whose previous history and position in life we know nothing, seems to have held the chief place among the three legates since he subscribed the acts of the council in the name of the pope before the two others.

An epistle of Paschasinus, De Quaestionis Paschali, is still extant, addressed to Leo in reply to some inquiries from the pontiff with regard to the calcula- tions for determining the festival of Easter. It will be found under its best form in the editions of the works of Leo, published by Quesnel and by the brothers Ballerini. [Leo.] (Schölemann, Biblioth. Patrum Lat. vol. ii. § 49; Bähr, Gesch. der Homo. Edit. Suppl. Band. 2te Abth. § 166.)

PASÆAS. [ABANTIDAS.]

PASIAS, an eminent Greek painter, brother of the modeller Aeginetas, and disciple of Eriugon, who had been originally colour-grinder to the painter Neales (Plin. H. N. xxx. 11. s. 40, § 41). He belonged to the Sicyscanian school, and flourished about B. C. 220. [AEGINETA; ERIOGON; NE- ALCES.] [P. S.]

PASI/CRATES (Πασικράτης), prince of Soi in Cyprus, was one of those who submitted to Alex- ander, and repaired in person to meet the conqueror at Tyre, in B. C. 331, on which occasion he took a prominent part in the festivities and theatrical enter- tainments there celebrated on a scale of unpar- alleled magnificence. (Plut. Alex. 29.) His son Nicocles accompanied the king throughout his cam- paigns in Asia. (Art. Ind. 19.) He was succeeded by Eunoucias, probably before B. C. 315. (See Athen. xiii. p. 376 n.; Droysen, Hellasw. vol. i. p. 339 n.) [E. H. B.]

PASI/CRATES (Πασικράτης), literary. 1. Of Rhodes, who wrote a lost Commentary on the Cate- gories of Aristotle. For the opinion that he wrote the second book of the Metaphysics of Aristotle, see EUDERMUS. (Fabric. Bibli. Graec. vol. iii. pp. 211, 501.)

2. A servant of St. George of Cappadocia, to whom is attributed an account of his master's life, edited in Greek by Lipomann (in the Acta Sanc- torum, vol. iii.), and in Latin by Linus (sive supra, p. 117) and by Surius (vol. ii. ad 23 April). This life, as well as the others of St. George, are universally admitted to be unworthy of credit. (Fabric. Bibli. Graec. vol. x. p. 229; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 294, ed. Westermann.) [GEORGHUS, No. 7, p. 248.] [W. M. G.]

PASI/CRATES (Πασικράτης), a Greek phy- sician who appears to have given much attention to the preparation of surgical apparatus, as his name is several times mentioned by Oribasius in his book on that subject (De Medici. cc. 26, 29, 31, pp. 182, 183, 190, 192). He was the father of x 2
PA'SIDAS or PASHIDAS (Passides or Pasidias), an Achaean, was one of the deputies sent by the Achaeanas to Ptolemy Philometricor, to concurlate on his attaining to manhood, b.c. 170. During their stay in Egypt, they interposed their good offices to prevent the further advance of Antiochus Epiphanes, who had invaded the country, and even threatened Alexandria itself, but without effect. (Polyb. xxviii. 10, 16.)

PASIME'LUS (Pasimelos), a Corinthian, of the oligarchical party. When, in b.c. 393, the democrats in Corinth massacred many of their adversaries, who, they had reason to think, were contemplating the restoration of peace with Sparta, Pasimelus, having had some suspicion of the design, was in a gymnasium outside the city walls, with a body of young men assembled around him. With these he seized, during the tumult, the Arcocrinthus; but the brazen pillar of the capital of one of the columns, and the fierce signs of the sacred serpents, were omens which warned them to abandon their position. They were persuaded to remain in Corinth under assurances of personal safety; but they were dissatisfied with the state of public affairs, especially with the measure which had united Argos and Corinth, or rather had merged Corinth in Argos; and Pasimelus therefore and Alcimenes sought a secret interview with Praxitas, the Lacedaemonian commander at Sicyon, and arranged to admit him with his forces within the long walls that connected Corinth with its port Lechaenum. This was effected, and a battle ensued, in which Praxitas defeated the Corinthian, Boeotian, Argive, and Athenian troops (Xen. Hell. iv. 4. §§ 4, 6c; Diod. xiv. 86, 91; Andoc. de Pace, p. 25; Plat. Menex. p. 243). Pasimelus, no doubt, was one of the Corinthian exiles who returned to their city when the oligarchical party regained its ascendency there immediately after the peace of Antalides, b.c. 387, and in consequence of it (Xen. Hell. v. 1. § 34); and he seems to have been the person through whom Euphorion, having sent to Corinth for him, delivered up to the Lacedaemonians the harbour of Sicyon, in b.c. 367 (Xen. Hell. vii. 3. § 2). The language of Xenophon in this last passage is adverse to the statement made above in the article EUPHORION, and also in Thirlthe wealth of Pasion. His landed property amounted, we are told, to about 20 talents, or 487.5.; besides this he had out at interest more than 50 talents of his own (12,187. 10.), together with 11 talents, or 2681. 5., of borrowed money. His annual income from his banking business was 100 minae, or 406L. 5., and from his shield manufactury 1 talent, or 2431. 5s. (Dem. pro Phorm. pp. 945, &c., c. Steph. i. p. 1110, &c.) His elder son, Apollodorus, grievously diminished his patrimony by extravagance and lawsuits. (Dem. pro Phorm. p. 956.) On Pasion, see further, Dem. c. Aphob. i. p. 816, c. Nicost. p. 1249; Büchel, Publ. Econ. of Athens, Book i. chap. 12, 22, 24, iv. 3, 17; Rehdanz, Vit. Iph. Chalc. Tim. vi. § 111. [E. F.]

PASITELES (Πασιτέλες). 1. A daughter of Herodes and Persica, and a sister of Circe and Acetes, was the wife of Minos, by whom she was the mother of Androgeos, Catereus, Deenalion, Glauces, Minotaurus, Acalle, Xenodice, Ariadne, and Phaedra. (Apollon. Rhod. iii. 999, &c.; Apollod. i. 9. § 11 i. § 2; Ov. Met. xv. 501; Cic. De Nat. Doctr. iii. 19; Paus. v. 25, § 9.)

2. An ancillary goddess at Thalame in Laconia, was believed to be a daughter of Atlas, or to be the same as Cassandra or Daphne, the daughter of Amyclas. People used to sleep in her temple for the purpose of receiving revelations in dreams. (Plut. Agis, 9; Cic. De Dice. i. 43.) [L. S.]

PASIPHILUS (Πασιφίλος), a general of Agathocles, the tyrant of Syracuse, who was despatched by him with an army against Messana, where the Syracusan exiles had taken refuge. Pasiphilus defeated the Messanians, and compelled them to pay tribute (Diod. v. 58. 501.) He was shortly after sent a second time (together with Demophilus) to oppose the exiles, who had assembled a large force under Deinocrates and Philonides, and attacked and totally defeated them near Galaria. (Id. ib. 104.) At a subsequent period (b. c. 306), the disasters sustained by Agathocles in Africa induced Pasiphilus to despair of his cause, and he went over to Deinocrates, with the whole force under his command. But his treachery was justly punished, for the following year Deinocrates, having, in his turn, betrayed his associates, and made a separate peace with Agathocles, caused Pasiphilus to be arrested and put to death at Gela, b. c. 305. (Id. xx. 77, 90.) [E. H. B.]

PASIPPIDAS (Πασιππιδᾶς), a Lacedaemonian, was employed, in b. c. 410, after the battle of Cyzicus, in collecting ships from the allies, and appears to have been at Thasos when that island revolted from Sparta in the same year, for he was banished on an accusation of having joined with Tissaphernes in effecting the revolution. He did not, however, remain long in exile, since he is mentioned as the head of some ambassadors sent from Sparta to the Persian court, in b. c. 408, to counteract a rival embassy from Athens, which was also proceeding thither. The envoys, however, did not advance further than Gordium in Phrygia; for early in the next spring, b. c. 407, as they were resuming their journey, they met another Lacedaemonian embassy returning from the king, with the intelligence that they had already obtained from him all they wanted. (Xen. Hell. i. 1. § 52, 3. § 13, 4. § 1.) [E. E.]

PASITELES (Πασιτέλες). 1. A statuary, who flourished about Ol. 73, b. c. 468, and was the teacher of Colotes (Paus. i. 20, § 2). We know nothing further of him; and, in fact, we should be unable to distinguish him from the younger Pasiteles, were it not for the almost decisive evidence that the Colotes here referred to was the same as the Colotes who was contemporary with Phidias (see Colotes, and Sillig, Catal. Artif. s. v. Colotes). Some writers, as Heyne, Hirt, and Müller, imagine only one Pasiteles, and two artists named Colotes, but Thiersch (Epochen, p. 295) attempts to get over the difficulty by reading Πασιτέλεως and -η for Πασιτέλεως, &c., in the passage of Pausanias. It is true that the names are often confounded; but the emendation does not remove the difficulty, which lies in the fact that Colotes was contemporary with Phidias; besides, it is opposed to the critical criterion, Lectio incoherenter.

A statue, sculptor, and silver-chaser, of the highest distinction (in omnibus his summis, Plin. H. N. xxxv. 12. s. 45), flourished at Rome, in the last years of the republic. He was a native of Magna Graecia, and obtained the Roman franchise, with his countrymen, in b. c. 90, when he must have been very young, since he made statues for the temple of Juno, in the portico of Octavia, which was built out of the Dalmatic spoils, in b. c. 33; so that he must have flourished from about b. c. 60 to about b. c. 30 (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 5. s. 4. §§ 10, 12). This agrees very well with Pliny's statement, in another place, that he flourished about the time of Pompey the Great (H. N. xxxvii. 12. s. 55).

Pasiteles was evidently one of the most distinguished of the Greek artists who flourished at Rome during the period of the revival of art. It is recorded of him, by his contemporary Varro, that he never executed any work of which he had not previously made a complete model, and that he called the plastic art the mother of statuary in all its branches (Laudat [M. Varro] et Pasitelem, qui plasticem matrem caculatorum et statuariorum sculpturae esse dignit, et cum esset in omnibus his summis, nihil unquam fecit antiquum finit: Plinius, H. N. xxxv. 12. s. 45). Pliny tells us of an incident which proves the care with which Pasiteles studied from nature: as he was sitting in front of the cage of a lion, which he was copying on silver, he was nearly killed by a panther, which broke from a neighbouring cage (H. N. xxxvii. 5. s. 4. § 12). He is mentioned with distinction, in the lists of the silver-chasers and sculptors, by Pliny, who says that he executed very many works, but that the names of them were not recorded. The only work of his which Pliny mentions by name is the ivory statue of Jupiter, in the temple of Marcellus (l.c. § 10).

Pasiteles occupies also an important place among the writers on art. He was the author of five books upon the celebrated works of sculpture and chasing in the whole world (quinque volumina nobilium operum in toto orbe; Plin. l.c. § 12), which Pliny calls mirabilia opera, and which he used as one of his chief authorities (Elench. lib. xxxiii. xxxvi.). He stood also at the head of a school of artists, as we find from extant inscriptions, which mention Stephanus, the disciple of Pasiteles, and Meleenas, the disciple of Stephanus. [Stephanus.]

The MSS. of Pliny vary between the readings Pasiteles and Praxitelles in the passages quoted, in consequence of the well-known habit of writing σ for s. (See Oberlin, Proef. ad Tac. vol. i. p. xxv.) Sillig has shown that Pasiteles is the true reading.
in some excellent remarks upon this artist, in the Amathea, vol. iii. pp. 293—297. This correction being made also in a passage of Cicero (de Divin. i.
36), we obtain another important testimony respecting our artist; and we learn that in one of his silver-chasings he represented the prodigy which indicated the future renown of the infant Roscius as an actor. The true reading of this passage was first pointed out by Winckelmann (Gesch. d. Kunst, B. ix. c. 8 § 18). [P. S.]

PASITHEA (Πασιθέα). 1. One of the Charities. (Hom. H. xiv. 268, 276; Paus. ix. 35.

2. A daughter of Nereus and Doris. (Hes.
Theog. 247.)

3. A Naiad, the wife of Erichthonius and mother of Pandion. (Apollod. iii. 14. § 6; comp.
iii. 15. § 1, where she is called Praxithea.) [L. S.]

PASIE'NUS CRISPUS. [Crispus, p. 892,
b.]

PASSIE'NUS PAULUS. [PAULUS.]

PASSIE'NUS RUFUS. [RUFUS.]

PASSIE'NUS, VIBIUS, proconsul of Africa, under Gallienus, assisted Celsus in aspiring to the throne. (Trebell. Pollio, Trig. Tpry. 29.)

PASTOR. 1. A distinguished Roman equus, whose son Caligula put to death, and invited his father on the same day to a banquet (Senec. de Ira, iii. 33; comp. Suet. Cal. 27). Seneca does not mention his gentle name, but he was probably the father of No. 2, more especially as it is stated by Seneca that he had another son.

2. JULIUS PASTOR, was defended by the younger Pliny in the court of the Centumviri, in the reign of Domitian (Plin. Ep. i. 18, comp. iv. 24. § 1).
This is the same Pastor of whom Martial begs a present (ix. 23).

3. AIETIUS PASTOR, a rhetorician mentioned by the elder Seneca (Controv. 3), probably belonged to the same family.

4. P. Pastor, consul in A. D. 163, with Q. Mus-Itius Priscus, may have been a descendant of one of the praetors of that name. [P.]

PATAECHI (Παταίχοι), Phoenician divinities whose drayfish figures were attached to Phoenician ships. (Herod. iii. 37; Suid. and Hesych.
s. v.) [L. S.]

PATAECHUS (Παταεχός), a Greek writer, who said that he possessed the soul of Aeop, and from whom there is a long tale quoted by Plutarch, on the authority of Hermippus, respecting an interview between Thales and Solon. (Plut. Sol. 6.)

PATAEREUS (Παταερέως), a surname of Apollo, derived from the Lycian town of Pataro, where he had an oracle, and where, according to Servius (ad Aen. iv. 143), the god used to spend the six winter months in every year. (Hor. Carm. iii.
4. 64; Lycoph. 920; Herod. i. 162; Strab. xiv.
p. 665, &c.; Paus. ix. 41. § 1.) [L. S.]

PATELLA or PATELLANA, a Roman divinity, or perhaps, only a surname of Ops, by which she was described as unfolding or opening the stem of the corn plant, so that the ears might be able to shoot forth. (August. De Civ. Dei, iv. 8; Arnob.
Adv. Gent. iv. 1.) [L. S.]

PATELLA'RII, divinities to whom sacrifices were offered in daces (pateoata), were perhaps no others than the Larves. (Plant. Cistell. ii.
1. 45; Ov. Fast. i. 63.) [L. S.]

PATERCULUS, ALBNIUS. [ALBIATUS,
No. 1.]

PATERCULUS, C. SUL'PI'CIUS, consul
A. D. 258 with A. Attilus Calatinus in the first Punic war. (Pol. i. 24.) He obtained Sicily as his province, together with his colleague Attilus, but the latter took the chief management of the war, and is therefore spoken of by some writers as the sole commander in Sicily. Paterculus nevertheless obtained a triumph on his return to Rome, as we learn from the triumph Fasti. The history of the consulship of Paterculus and his colleague is given under CALATINUS.

PATERCULUS, C. VELLEI'US, a Roman historian, contemporary with Augustus and Tiberius. He is not mentioned by any ancient writer, with the exception of a solitary passage of Priscian, but his own work supplies us with the leading events of his life. He was descended from one of the most distinguished Campanian families. Decius Magius, the leader of the Roman party at Capua
in the second Punic war, was one of his ancestors;
and Minatius Magius, who did such good service to the Romans in the Social war (b. c. 90), and who was rewarded in consequence with the Roman command in Africa, and the subsequent praetorship, was the atavus of the historian. The grandfather of Paterculus put an end to his life at Naples, since he was unable, through age and infirmities, to accompany Claudius Nero, the father of the emperor Tiberius, in his flight from Italy in
b. c. 40. His father held a high command in the army, in which he was succeeded by his son, as is mentioned below, and his uncle Capito was a member of the senate, and is mentioned as a supporter of the accusation against C. Cassius Longi-inus under the Lex Pedia, on account of the latter being one of Caesars murderers. The family of Paterculus, therefore, seems to have been one of wealth, respectability, and influence.

Velleius Paterculus was probably born about
b. c. 19, the year in which Virgil died. He adopted the profession of arms; and, soon after he had entered the army, he accompanied C. Caesar in his expedition to the East, and was present with the latter at the surrender of the Parthian king, in A. D. 2. Two years afterwards, in A. D. 4, he served under Tiberius in Germany, succeeding his father in the rank of Praefectus Equitum, having previously filled in succession the offices of tribune of the soldiers and tribune of the camp. For the next eight years Paterculus served under Tiberius, either as praefectus or legatus, in the various campaigns of the latter in Germany, Pannonia, and Dalmatia, and, by his activity and ability, gained the favour of the future emperor. He was accordingly promoted to the quaestorship, and in A. D. 6, when he was quaestor elect, he conducted to Tiberius the forces which had been lately levied in the city. In his quaestorship in the following year,
A. D. 7, he was excused from drawing lots for a province, and continued to serve as legatus under Tiberius. He accompanied his commander on his return to Rome in A. D. 12, and mentions with pride that he and his brother Magius Celer took a prominent part in the triumphal procession of Tiberius, and were decorated with military honour.
Two years afterwards, in A. D. 14, the names of Vel-leius and his brother were put down by Augustus for the praetorship; but as that emperor died before the comitia were held, they were elected to this dignity at the commencement of the reign of Tiberius. We have no further particulars of the life of Paterculus, for there is no reason to believe that the P. Velleius or Vellaeus mentioned by Tacitus under A.D. 21 (Aen. iii. 39) is the same as the historian. Paterculus was alive in A.D. 30, as he drew up his history in that year for the use of M. Vinicius, who was then consul; and it is conjectured by Dodwell, not without probability, that he perished in the following year (A.D. 31), along with other friends of Sejanus. The favourable manner in which he had so recently spoken in his history of this powerful minister would be sufficient to ensure his condemnation on the fall of the latter.
PATERCULUS.

The work of Velleius Paterculus which is come down to us, and which is apparently the only one that he ever wrote, is a brief historical compendium in two books, and bears the title C. Velleius Pater-culi Historiae Romanae ad M. Vinicius Cos. Libri II., which was probably prefixed by some gram-marian. The work was not only dedicated to M. Vinicius, who was consul in A.D. 30, but it appears also to have been written in the same year, as has been already remarked. The beginning of the work is wanting, and there is also a portion lost after the eighth chapter of the first book. The object of this compendium was to give a brief view of universal history, but more especially of the events connected with Rome, the history of which occupies the main portion of the book. It commenced apparently with the destruction of Troy, and ended with the year A.D. 30. In the execu-tion of his work, Velleius has shown great skill and judgment, and has adopted the only plan by which an historical abridgement can be rendered either interesting or instructive. He does not at-tempt to give a consecutive account of all the events of history; but he omits entirely a vast number of facts, and seizes only upon a few of the more pro-minent occurrences, which he describes at sufficient length to leave them impressed upon the recollec-tion of his hearers. He also exhibits great tact in the manner in which he passes from one subject to another; his reflections are striking and apposite; and his style, which is a close imitation of Sallust's, is characterised by clearness, conciseness, and energy, but at the same time exhibits some of the faults of the writers of his age in a fondness for strange and out-of-the-way expressions. As an historian Velleius is entitled to no mean rank; in his narrative he displays impartiality and love of truth, and in his estimate of the characters of the leading actors in Roman history he generally ex-hibits both discrimination and judgment. But the case is different when he comes to speak of Augus-tus and Tiberius. Upon them, and especially upon the latter, he lavishes the most indiscriminate praises and fulsome flattery. There is, however, some extenuation for his conduct in the fact that Tiberius had been his patron, and had advanced him to the honours he had enjoyed, and also from the circumstance that it would have been danger-ous for a writer at that time to have expressed himself with frankness and sincerity.

The edict princeps of the history of Paterculus was printed at Basel, in 1520, under the editorship of Beatus Rhenanus, from a manuscript which he discovered in the monastery of Murbach. This is the only manuscript of Paterculus which has come down to us; and as this manuscript itself afterwards disappeared, all subsequent editions were neces-sarily taken from that of Rhenanus, till Orelli ob-

The edition of Rhenanus was reprinted at Basel in 1546, and the most impor-tant subsequent editions are those of Lipsius, Lugd. Bat. 1591, reprinted 1607; of Gruter, Francf. 1607; of Ger. Vossius, Lugd. Bat. 1639; of Boeclerus, Argent. 1642; of Thyssius, Lugd. Bat. 1653; of Heinmius, Amstel. 1678; of Hud-son, Oxon. 1693; of P. Burmann, Lugd. Bat. 1719; and of Ruhnken, Lugd. Bat. 1789, which is the most valuable edition on account of the excellent notes of the editor. This edition was reprinted by Frotscher, Lips. 1785—1839. Of the editions after Ruhnken's we may mention Jani and Krause's, Lips. 1800; Cludiu's, Hannov. 1815; Lemarré's, Paris, 1822; Orelli's, Lips. 1835; Kreyssig's, 1836; and Bothe's, Turici, 1837. Orelli collated for his edition a manuscript of Velleius, preserved in the public library of Basel, which was copied by Amerbachius, a pupil of Rhenanus, from the manuscript belonging to the monastery of Murbach. By means of this codex Orelli was able to introduce a few improvements into the text; but the text is still very corrupt, as the original manuscript abounded with errors, and was so faulty that Rhe-nanus tells us that he could take his oath that the copyist did not understand a word of the language. In illustration, see Dodwell, Annales Velleiand, Oxon. 1698, prefixed to most of the editions of the historian; Morgenstern, de Fide Hist. Vellei. Pat. Gedi. 1735.

PATERNUS. 1. An orator mentioned by the elder Seneca. (Conterr. v. Franc.)

2. A friend of the younger Pliny, who has ad-dressed three letters to him. (Ep. i. 21, iv. 14, viii. 16.) He may perhaps be the Paternus, whom Martial (xii. 53) satirizes as a miser.

3. Paternus also occurs in the Fasti as the name of several consuls, namely, in a.d. 233, 267, 268, 269, 279, and 443.

PATERNUS, TARRUNTEGRUS, a jurist, is probably the same person who was praefectus praetorio under Commodus (Lamprid. Commod. 4; Dion Cass. Ixxii. 5), and was put to death by the emperor on a charge of treason. He was the au-thor of a work in four books, entitled De Re Militari or Militaryum, from which there are two excerpts in the Digest. He is also mentioned by Vegetius (De Re Militari, i. 8), who calls him "Dignissimus assessor juris militiae." Paternus is cited by Macro (Dig. 49, tit. 16, a. 7), who wrote under Alexander Severus.

PATISCIUS, is first mentioned during Cicester's government of Cilicia (n. c. 51—50), who exten-sioned his authority in procuring panthers for the shows of the gladiators at Rome (Cic. ad Fam. ii. 11, viii. 9, § 8). His name next occurs as one of those per-sons who joined the murderers of Caesar after the assassination, wishing to share in the glory of the deed; and in the following year, b. c. 43, he served as praefectus in Asia in the republican army. (Appian, B. C. ii. 119; Cic. ad Fam. XII. 13, 15.)

Q. PATI(SIUS, was sent by Cn. Domitius Cal-vinus into Cilicia in b. c. 46, in order to fetch auxiliary troops (Hist. B. Ael. 34). It is not impossible that he may be the same person as the Patiscus mentioned above.

PATRICIUS [Parpcos], the second son of the patrician Aspar, so powerful in the reign of the emperor Leo I. [Leo I.], who owed his elevation to Aspar’s influence. Leo and Aspar had been estranged from each other; but a reconciliation having been effected between them, it was agreed that Patricius should receive the hand of one of Leo’s daughters. Nicephorus Calliati says he was to marry Ariadne, the elder of the two; but it was more probably Leontia, the younger, as Ariadne appears to have been already married to Zeno, afterwards emperor [Zeno]. It was also stipulated that Patricius should be raised to the rank of Caesar. As this would have been equivalent to pointing him out as Leo’s successor on the throne, and as Patricius held the Arian principles of his father and family, the arrangement was vehemently opposed by the orthodox clergy, monks, and populace of Constantinople, who required that the arrangement should be set aside, or, at least, that Patricius should make profession of orthodoxy as the price of his elevation. Leo appealed the malcontents by promising that their request should be complied with. Whether Patricius renounced Arianism is not stated; but he received the title of Caesar, and married, on the 3 July 461, to Leontia, who was only affianced to the emperor’s daughter. He soon after set out in great state for Alexandria; but he must soon have returned, as he was at Constantinople when Leo determined on the removal of Aspar and his sons by assassination. Aspar, and Ardashir, his eldest son, fell; and most writers state that Patricius was murdered also; but according to the more ancient, circumstantial, and, on the whole, more trustworthy narrative of Candidus, Patricius escaped, though not without many wounds. According to Nicephorus Calliati he was banished, and deprived of his affianced bride, who was given to Zeno; the statement that he was banished, and that his wife was taken from him, or that the marriage was not completed, is not improbable; but that she was given to Zeno is probably an error, arising from Nicephorus’s confounding Leontia and Ariadne. Valesius says that Patricius was father of Vitalian, who played so conspicuous a part in the church history of the successors of Anastasius and Justin I. He does not cite his authority, but he probably followed the statement of Theophanes, that Vitalian was the son of Patricianus, by which name Marcellinus calls our Patricius; but Theophanes never gives the name Patricianus to the son of Aspar, nor does there seem sufficient reason for identifying them. It is difficult to ascertain the dates of these transactions; the elevation of Patricianus is fixed by Cedrenus in the twelfth year of Leo, i.e. A.D. 469; the assassination of Aspar is placed by the Alexandrian Chronicle in the consulsiphip of Pusaeus and Joannae, A.D. 467; by Theophanes in A.M. 5964; Alex. era, A.D. 472; and by the Latin chroniclers, Marcellinus, Cassiodorus, and Victor of Tunes, whose date is adopted by Filimont, in A.D. 471; we do not attempt to reconcile these discrepancies. This Patricianus, the son of Aspar, is to be distinguished from Patricianus, magister officium, whom the intriguing empress Verina [Verina], Leo’s widow, after driving her son-in-law Zeno [Zeno] from his throne and capital, hoped to marry, but who was put to death by Basiliscus, Verina’s brother [Basiliscus]; from Pelagius Patricianus, the supposed author of the Homero-Centra [Patricianus, Literary, No. 51]; and from Patricianus, a distinguished general in the war carried on by Anastasius, Zeno’s successor, against the Persian king Caladæus. 5. PELAGIUS. According to Zonaras (Annales, lib. xiii. c. 23, vol. iv. p. 44, ed. Paris, p. 33, ed. Venice) the Homero-Centra, or Homero-Centrones, thepovekapeva & xal Ktewpoov, composed by the Empress Eudocia, wife of the younger Theodosius [Eudocia, No. 1], had been begun but left unfinished. Patricius, or, for the expression (Harpico[u]e) is ascribed to, or by, certain Patrician. If a MS. noticed below is right in terming him Sacerdos, Patricius must be understood as a name, not as a title. Cedrenus (p. 354, ed. Paris, 621, ed. Bonn) ascribes the Homero-Centra to a certain Pelagius Patricius, or (for there is the same ambiguity as in Zonaras), “Pelagius the Patrician” (Tendgos ton patriotismov), who was put to death by the Emperor Zeno. If we understand Zonaras to say that Patricius left the Homero-Centra unfinished at his death, and that they were afterwards finished by Eudocia, who herself died in A.D. 460 or 461, he must have been a different person from the Pelagius Patricius slain by Zeno, who did not become emperor till A.D. 474. But it is not necessary so to understand Zonaras. A MS. in the king’s library at Paris (formerly No. 2891) is supposed to contain the Homero-Centra as written by Patricius, consisting of only two hundred and three lines, yet notice of those events is inserted in the Chronicles, which are recapitulated in the Apostles’ and Nicene Creeds. Two other MSS. in the same library (formerly Nos. 2977 and 3260) are thought to contain the poem as completed by Eudocia, consisting of six hundred and fifteen verses, and comprehending not only the work of Patricius, but also narratives of many of the miracles of Christ inserted in the appropriate places, and a description of the last judgment. In the account of a MS. in the Escorial, the poem is described (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. xi. p. 706) as composed by “Patricius Sacerdos,” but arranged and corrected by Eudocia. It is not unlikely therefore that the poem of Patricius was not properly left unfinished, as Zonaras states, but composed on a less comprehensive plan, and that Eudocia enlarged the plan, and re-arranged the poem, inserting her own additions in suitable places. There is then little difficulty in believing that Patricius was contemporary with Eudocia, but survived to the reign of Zeno, and was put to death by him as related by Cedrenus. The difficulty would be removed by supposing the correctness of the title of one of the above MSS. in the king’s library at Paris (formerly No. 2977), which ascribes the poem in its complete state to the later Empress Eudocia of Macrembolus [Eudocia, No. 8]; but the supposition is contrary to all other evidence. The Homero-Centra, as they appear in the printed editions, are still further enlarged by the addition of prefixed narratives of the creation and the fall of man, and by the insertions of various episodes and descriptions. These Homero-Centra were first published with the Latin version of Petrus Candidus, 4to. Venice, 1502, in the second volume of the Collection of the ancient Christian Poets, printed by Aldus. It was reprinted 8vo. Frankfort, 1541 and 1554, by Henry Stephens, 12mo. Paris, 1578, and by Claudius Chaplet, 8vo. Paris, 1609, with various other pieces. In all these editions they were given anonymously. They were afterwards inserted in the Appendix to the Bibliotheca Patrum, ed. fol. Paris, 1624, and in vol. xi. of the edition of the Bibliotheca Patrum, fol. Paris, 1644, and vol. xiv. of the edition of 1654. The Latin version had appeared in the Bibliotheca as compiled by De la Bigne, A. p. 1375. In all the editions of the Bibliotheca the Homero-Centra are ascribed to Eudocia or to Patricius Pelagius and Eudocia conjointly. They were reprinted, 12mo. Leipzig, 1793, by L. H. Teucher, who professed to have revised the text. In this edition the poem consists of two thousand three hundred and forty-three lines. (Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. i. p. 552, &c. vol. xi. p. 706; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. i. p. 403, ed. Oxford, 1740–43; Olearius, De Poetris Graecis, c. 32, apud Wolfius, Poetiarum Oeto Fragmenta, 4to. Hamb. 1734, with Wolfius' notes.)

6. Of Prusa. In the Acta Sanctorum of the Bollandists (Aprilis, vol. iii. Appendix, p. lxv.) is given from a MS. in the Medicean Library at Florence, a narrative entitled Μαρτύριος τοῦ ἄγιου θεομάρτυρος Πατρικίου Πρωσίου. A Latin version is given in the body of the volume (ad diem xxviii. p. 570). Patricius was arraigned before Julian, proconsul, it may be supposed of Bithynia, who, having experienced great benefit from certain warm springs sacred to Asclepius and Hygeia, sent for him to urge upon him the proof which this circumstance afforded of the power of the god. Patricius replied to the proconsul's argument by an exposition of the cause of warm springs, which he ascribed to subterranean fires destined to be hereafter the place of torment to the souls of the wicked; and appealed to the flames of Aetna as evidence of the existence of this fire. Patricius was beheaded by the proconsul's order, on the 19th of May, but in what year or reign the record does not state. All that can be conjectured is that it was in one of the persecutions of the heathen emperors of Rome, and apparently before Diocletian fixed the seat of government at Nicomedia. The defence of Patricius of Prusa is cited by Glycas (Annal. pars i. p. 17, ed. Paris, p. 13, ed. Venice, p. 34, ed. Bonn), and at greater length by Cedrenus (Compend. p. 242, ed. Paris, vol. i. p. 425, ed. Bonn); but there are many discrepancies between the citation of Cedrenus and the text (c. 4, 5) given in the Acta Sanctorum. The Latin version from the Acta Sanctorum is given in Ruinart's Acta Prim. Martyr. p. 554, &c. (Fabric. Bibli. Graec. vol. x. p. 305; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad Ann. 859 (sub nom. Patricius Ararivus), vol. ii. p. 51.)

7. Petrus, the Patriarch. [PETRUS.]

8. Of St. Saba. In the imperial library at Vienna is a Greek version of the works or part of the works of Isaac the Syrian, bishop of Nineveh, who lived, according to Assemani (Biblioth. Orient. vol. iii. pars i. p. 104, note 3), about the close of the sixth century, but according to Nicephorus the editor of Isaac's Ascetica (Praef. p. viii) in the first half of that century. The Vienna MS. bears this title: Τοῦ ἐν ἀγίου πατρὸς ἴμων Ισακος Σαβαων καὶ ἀναφοράς ἃς τὸν γενομένων εὐσκόπων τῆς φιλοξενίας τῶν αὐτοῦ λόγων ἀμαρτικῶν, ἄρθρον ἅπαν ὑπὸ τῶν ἑπτά πατρῶν ἵμων τοῦ ἈΒΒΑ Πατρικίου καὶ τοῦ ἈΒΒΑ Αβραμίου τῶν φιλοσώφων καὶ ἑγκακῶν ἐν τῇ καθινα τοῦ ἐν ἄγιοι πατρὸς ἴμων Ἁγίας, Sancti Patris nostris Abbatis Isaci Syri et Anachoretae, qui fuit Episcopus urbis Christi-amantiis Nineve, Sermones ascetici, repetit a sancta patris nostris Abbote Patricio et Abbate Abramio suplementae Christianis et quieti monasticae deedit in Laura (sive Monasterio) Sancti Patris nostri Sable (Lambec. Commentar. de Biblioth. Caesar. vol. v. col. 158, ed. Kollar.) The MS. contains eighty-seven Sermones Ascetici, apparently translated from the Syrian text of Isaac by Patri- cius and Abramius; though the title of the MS. only alludes to them the finding of the work. In other MSS. however (e.g. in several Vatican, Assemani, Bibli. Orient. vol. i. p. 446, and one, perhaps two, Bodleian, Nos. 256 and 295, vol. Catalog. MStorum Angliae et Hiberniae, pp. 35, 44, fol. Oxford, 1697), they are described as translat- ors. Assemani, however, observes that they translated not the whole works of Isaac, which, according to Ebed-jesus (apud Assemani, l. c.), who has perhaps ascribed to Isaac of Nineveh the works of other Isaccs, extended to seven tomis or vo- lumes, and treated De Reginino Spiritualis, de Divinæ Mysteriæ (comp. Gennad. De Viris Illust. c. 26), de Judiciis et de Politia, but only ninety-nine of his Sermones. This is the number in the Vatican MSS.; in one of the Bodleian (No. 293, Catalog. MStor. Angiae, p. 44) there are ninety-nine, but it is to be observed that the division, as well as the number of these Sermones, which are also termed Λόγια, Orationes, differs in different MSS (Nic- ephorus, l. c.). The first fifty-three, according to the arrangement of the Vienna MS., are extant in a Latin version, as one work, under the title of Isaac Syri de Contemptu Mundi Libri; and this work, which appears in several collections of the works of the fathers, has been improperly ascribed by the respective editors of the Bibliotheca Patrum, except Galland, to Isaac of Antioch [ISACUS, No. 5], instead of their true author Isaac of Nineveh [ISACUS, No. 6]. It is to be observed, that Isaac of Nineveh was not the Isaac mentioned by Pope Gregory the Great as visiting Italy and dying near Spoletum [ISACUS, No. 6]. The Greek version of Isaac's ascetic works by Patri- cius and Abramius, as far as it is extant, was published by Nicephorus Theoctostus, a Greek monk, by direction of Ephraim, patriarch of Jerus-alem, 404, et pr. in spreig. 1770. The edition contains eighty-six Λόγια, Orationes, and four Εἰς τον Άγιον, Epipolae, which, in the two MSS. employed by Nicephorus, were reckoned as Λόγια, making ninety altogether. These were differently divided and arranged in his MSS. He followed the division (with one exception) and the text of one MS., giving the different readings of the other, but formed an arrangement of his own, differing from both the MSS. What portion of the seven tomis mentioned by Ebed-jesus is contained in this work cannot, from the various divisions and titles of the divisions in the MSS., be ascertained. Of the time when Patricius and his coadjutor Abramius lived, nothing can be determined, except that they were of later date than Isaac himself, whose period has been mentioned. If we adopt the reading of the Viennese MSS. episc.

theses, which, however, is most likely a transcriber’s error for episcopologizetēs, we must place them late enough for the works of Isaac, in the Greek version at least (of which, in such case, they would be not the authors, but only the discoverers), to have been previously lost. PATRICIUS, the apostle and patron saint of Ireland. The legends and traditions respecting this celebrated personage, preserved in the Acta Sanctorum, in his life by Jocelin, a monk of Furness abbey, in Lancahsire, who flourished during the twelfth century, and in the Irish annals and ecclesiastical records, present such a mass of con dictions and improbabilities, that many critics have been induced to deny his very existence; while others have supposed that a small portion of the diffi culties which embarrass the inquiry, by supposing that there were two, three, four, or even five indi viduals who flourished at periods not very remote from each other, who all bore the name Patricius, and who were all more or less concerned in the conversion of Ireland from paganism. The only document in which we can repose any confidence is an ancient tract entitled Confessio S. Patricii, a sort of autobiography, in which he gives an outline of his life and conversation. If we admit that this curious piece is genuine, we may perhaps learn from it that the author was a native of Scotland, born in the vil lage of Benaven or Bonaven Taberniae, which is generally believed to have occupied the site of the modern Killpatrick, situated on the right bank of the river Clyde, a few miles above Dumbarton, very near the point which marked the termination of the Roman wall. He was the son of Calpurnius, a deacon, the grandson of Pottius, a presbyter. At the age of sixteen years he was roused from his dreams by the voice of the priests, and conveyed along with a number of his countrymen to Ireland, where he was employed as a shepherd. Having made his escape, he reached home in safety; but in the course of a few years was again carried off, and in two months again obtained his freedom. During his first captivity he was led to meditate upon his own depraved and lost condition, was gradually awakened to a sense of the truth, and became filled with an earnest desire to proclaim the promises of the Gospel to the heathen by whom he was surrounded. Visions were vouchsafed to him from on high, on several occasions he was empowered to work miracles, and at length, under the conviction that he was directly summoned by Heaven, determined to de vote his life to the task thus imposed upon him by God. No allusion whatsoever is made to his visit to France and Italy or to his ordination by Pope Coememerus, upon which so much stress is laid in the later and more formal monkish compilations.

It must not be concealed, however, that although a lively local tradition supports the opinion that Kilpatrick in Dumbartonshire was the birth-place of the saint, and although the inhabitants of that district still point out a miraculous fountain and a rock bearing his name, many of the most learned Irish historians maintain that the epitaph Brito, upon which so much has been founded, refers not to Britain but to Armoricca, and bring forward strong evidence to prove that Bonavent Taberniae is Boulogne-sur-Mer on the coast of Picardy. The arguments are stated very fully in Lanigan’s Eccle siastical History of Ireland, chapter iii.

According to several of the most ancient national authorities the mission of St. Patrick commenced during the reign of Laoghaire, son of Niall of the Nine Hostages (A. D. 429—438) ; but the book of Lecan places him under Lughaidh, a son of the former (A. D. 484—508), while the Annals of Connaught assign his birth to A. D. 336, and his captivity to A. D. 352. Mr. Petrie, in his learned dissertation on the History and Antiquities of Tara Hill, enters deeply into the investigation, and arrives at the conclusion that if we assume that there was a second Patrick in Ireland during the fifth century, and that many of the acts of the first or great St. Patrick have been falsely ascribed to his namesake and successor, then Irish as well as foreign testimonies nearly concur in the follow ing facts. He was born in the year 372. 2. That he was brought captive into Ireland in the sixteenth year of his age, in 388, and that after four or seven years’ slavery he was liberated in 392 or 395. 3. That on the death of Pall adius, in 432, he was sent to Ireland as arch bishop, having been first, according to some autho rities, consecrated by Pope Coelestinus, or, as others state, in Gaul, by the archbishop Amator, or Amator. 4. That he arrived in Ireland in 432, and after preaching there for sixty years, died in the year 492 or 493, at the age of about one hun dred and twenty years. 5. That he was interred either at Saul or Down.

Several works still extant bear the name of Pa tricius.

I. Confessio S. Patricii de Vita et Conversazione sua. This, as may be gathered from what has been said above, is not, like many ecclesiastical Confessiones, to be regarded as an exposition of the views of the author upon difficult points of doc trine and discipline, but as an appropriate sketch of his own religious life, and especially as an account of the mental process by which he was first roused to spiritual exertion, the narrative being addressed to the people among whom he preached the Word. It was first published by Ware, in his edition of the Opuscula attributed to St. Patrick, from sev eral MSS. preserved in different parts of England and Ireland; among which is the renowned Book of Armagh, long believed to have been traced by the hand of the saint himself. To inquire into the authenticity of the Confession when so little can be ascertained with regard to the supposed author would be a mere waste of time; but it ought to be remarked that it is composed in a very rude style, and although evidently inter polated here and there, is to a considerable extent free from the extravagance which characterises the reflections of the Rollondists and the memoir of Jocelin. The writer, however, he may have been, alludes repeatedly to his own want of education and to his literary deficiencies.

Doubtful as every one of the pieces now enuncement must be considered, they possess more claims upon our attention than the following, which are also ascribed to St. Patrick, but are now generally admitted to be unquestionably spurious.
1. Charta s. Epistolae de Antiquitate Avalonica, a fragment of which was made known by Gerard Vossius in his Miscellanea sanctorum aliquid Patr Gr. et Latt., 4to. Mogunt. 1604, under the nole S. Patricii Legetio a Coelestino primo Papa ad Conversionem Hiberniae direcit s. Epistola S. Pa-tricii Apostoli Hiberniae ex Bibl. Monasterii Glastoniae in quo ipso Abbas fuit antequam esset Episcopus Hiberniae. It was first published entire by Ware. 2. De tribus Habitaculis s. De Gaudii Electorum et Poenis Damanindor Liber. Ascribed by some to Augustin. 3. De Absalonibus Sueclaei.
Ascribed by some to Cyprian, by others to Augustin.

The first complete edition of the tracts attributed to St. Patrick is that by Sir James Ware (Jacobus Warneus), 8vo. Lond. 1656. This was reprinted 159—182, fol. Venet. 1774, together with some remarks taken from the Bollandists. See also his Prolegg. cap. iv. The most recent and useful ed-finition is that of Joachimus Laurentius Villanueva, 8vo. Dublin, 1835, which contains a number of very serviceable annotations. For an account of the statements contained in the Irish records, consult the essay by Mr. Petrie quoted above, which is to be found in the 18th volume of the Transactions of the Royal Irish Academy. See also Schöne-mann, Biblioth. Patrum Lat. vol. ii. § 40. [W. R.]

PATROCLUS (Πατροκλῆς), one of the honourable, Neronianus, one of Nero's favourite freedmen, presided at the games which this emperor exhibited to Teridates at Patoeia. He was put to death by Galba on his accession to the throne in a. d. 68, after being previously led in chains through the city along with the other instruments of Nero's cruelty. On the murder of Galba shortly afterwards, a freedman of Patroclus purchased the head of this emperor for a hundred arei, and threw it away on the spot where his master had been put to death. (Dion Cass. lxxii.
3, iv. v. 3; Suet. Galb. 20; Tac. Hist. i. 49, ii.
95.) Pliny speaks (H. N. xxxv, 18. 47) of Pa-broclus introducing into Italy the fine sand of the Nile for the use of the palaestra, a circumstance to which Suetonius refers in his life of Nero (c. 45).

1. A Macedonian general in the service of Seleucus I, king of Syria, by whom he was appointed to command at Babylon, soon after he had recovered possession of that city, a. c. 312. On the advance of Demetrius, Patroclus being unable to face that monarch in the field, withdrew beyond the Tigris, whither Demet-trius did not think fit to follow him. (Diod. xix.
100.) Of his subsequent operations in that quarter we know nothing. His name next appears as one of the friends and counsellors of Seleucus in the war against Demetrius, b. c. 286 (Plut. Demetr. 47); and again in 280, after the death of Seleucus, we find him entrusted by Antiochus I. with the chief command of his army, and the conduct of the war in Asia. (Mammon. c. 15, ed. Orell.) We are also told that Patroclus held, both under Seleucus and Antiochus, an important government over some of the eastern provinces of the Syrian empire, including apparently those bordering on the Caspian Sea, and extending from the Euphrates to the frontiers of India. (Strab. ii. pp. 69, 74.)
During the period of his holding this position, he seems to have been at much pains to collect accurate geographical information, which he afterwards published to the world; but though his authority is frequently cited by Strabo, who as well as Emtosthenes placed the utmost reliance on his accuracy, neither the title nor exact subject of his work is ever mentioned. It seems clear, however, that it included a general account of India, as well as of the countries on the banks of the Oxus and the Caspian Sea. Strabo expressly calls him the most veracious (θυσιων Φρουδόλογος) of all writers considering India (ii. p. 70); and it appears that in addition to the advantages of his official situation, he had made use of a regular description of the eastern provinces of the empire, drawn up by command of Alexander himself. (ib. p. 69.)
In this work Patroclus regarded the Caspian Sea
a gulf or inlet of the ocean, and maintained the possibility of sailing thither by sea from the Indian Ocean; a statement strangely misinterpreted by Pliny, who asserts (H. N. vi. 17 (21)), that Pat-roclus had himself performed the circumnavigation.
Concerning the authority of Patroclus as a geographical writer, see Strabo ii. pp. 68, 69, 70, 74, Graeciae, p. 113; Ubert, Geogr. vol. i. p. 122.)

2. Of Antigoneia, an officer of Persesus, king of Macedonia. (Liv. xii. 58.)

1. Of Thuri, a tragic poet, was perhaps contemporary with the younger Sophocles, about the end of the fifth and the beginning of the fourth centuries b. c. (Clem.
Alex. Protrep. ii. 90, p. 9, Syll.) Besides the mention of his Dicascri in the above passage, and seven lines of his, preserved by Stobaeus (exi. 3), we have no information concerning him.

2. A teacher of rhetoric, mentioned by Quintilian (i. 15, 16, iii. 6, 44).

1. Of Patroclus (Πατροκλῆς), artists. 1. A statuary, who is placed by Pliny (H. N. xxiv.
8. 19), with Nauccyes, Deinomeneus, and Canachus II., at the Fifth Olympiad, a. c. 400, which exactly agrees with the statement of Pausanias, that he made some of the statues in the great group delicated by the Lacedaemonians at Delphi, in memory of the victory of Argosopati (Paus. x. 9.
§ 4). Pliny mentions among the artists who made athletas et armatores et venatores sacrificanti-quos (i. c. § 34). Pausanias mentions a son and disciple of Patroclus, named Dædalus, who flour-rished at the same time as his master. (Lamb.
Dales. No. 2.) Since Dædalus is called by Pausanias a Sicyones, Sillig supposes that Patrocles was of the same state. Thiersch (Eposhen, p. 125) suggests the ingenious, but unfounded idea, that he was the same person as Patroclus, the half-brother of Socrates on the mother's side; surely, if so, he would not have employed his art in celebrating the ruin of his own city! It is more probable that he was one and the same person with the following artist:—

2. Of Croton, a statuary, son of Catillus, made the statue of Apollo of box-wood, with a gilded head, which the Epizephyrian Locrians dedicated at Olympia (Paus. vi. 19. § 3). [P. S.]

PATROCLUS (Πατρόκλος or Πατρόκλης).

1. A son of Heracles by Pyrippe. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 8.)

2. The celebrated friend of Achilles, was a son of Menoeus of Opus (Hom. II. xii. 608; Ov. Her. i. 17), and a grandson of Actor and Aegina, whence he is called Actorides. (Ov. Met. xiii. 273.) His mother is commonly called Sthenoe, but some mention her under the name of Periaph or Polymele. (Hygin. Fab. 91; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1493.) Aecacus, the grandfather of Achilles, was a contemporary of Menoeus. During the xvi. 14, and, according to Hesiod (ap. Eustath. ad Hom. p. 112), Menoeus was a brother of Peleus, so that the friendship between Achilles and Patroclus arose from their being kinsmen.

When yet a boy Patroclus, during a game of dice, involuntarily slew Clysonymus, a son of Amphidamas, and in consequence of this accident Patroclus was taken by his father to Peleus at Phthia, where he was educated together with Achilles. (Hom. II. xxii. 85, &c.; Apollod. iii. 13. § 8; Ov. Ex P. Pont. i. 3. 73.) He is also mentioned among the suitors of Helen. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 8.) He is said to have taken part in the expedition against Troy on account of his attachment to Achilles. (Hygin. Fab. 257; Philostr. Her. 19. 9.) On their voyage thither, the Greeks plundered in Mysia the territory of Teleplus, but were repelled, and on their flight to their ships they were protected by Patroclus and Achilles. (Paus. v. 29. § 10;) and, in the interval, while the young Hector was absent, Troy he took an active part in the struggle, until his friend withdrew from the scene of action, when Patroclus followed his example. (Hom. II. ix. 190.) But when the Greeks were hard pressed, and many of their heroes were wounded, he begged Achilles to allow him to put on his (Achilles' armure, and with his men to hasten to the assistance of the Greeks (xvi. 20, &c.). Achilles granted the request, and Patroclus succeeded in driving back the Trojans and extinguishing the fire which was raging among the ships (xvi. 293). He slew many enemies, and thrice made an assault upon the walls of Troy (xvi. 293, &c., 702, 785); but on a sudden he was struck by Apollo, and became senseless. In this state Euphorbus ran him through with his lance from behind, and Hector gave him the last and fatal blow (xvi. 791, &c.). Hector also took possession of his armure (xvi. 125). And the struggle now ensued between the Greeks and Trojans about the body of Patroclus; but the former obtained possession of it, and when it was brought to Achilles, he was deeply grieved, and vowed to avenge the death of his friend (xvii. 735, xviii. 22). Thetis protected the body with ambrosia against decomposition, until Achilles had leisure solemnly to burn it with funeral sacrifices (xix. 38). His ashes were collected in a golden urn which Dionysus had once given to Theseus, and were deposited under a mound, where subsequently the remains of Achilles also were interred. (Paus. xi. 22, 124, 246, Od. xxiv. 74, &c.; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 273.) Funeral games were celebrated in his honour. (II. xxiii. 262, &c.) Achilles and Patroclus met again in the lower world (Od. xxiv. 15), or, according to others, they continued after their death to live together in the island of Leuce. (Paus. iii. 19. § 11.) Patroclus was represented by Polygnotus in the Lesche at Delphi (Paus. x. 26. § 2, 30. § 1; and on Cape Sigeum in Troas, where his tomb was shown, he was worshipped as a hero. (Hom. Od. xiv. 82; Strab. xiii. p. 596.) [L. S.]

PATROCLUS (Πατρόκλος), an officer in the service of Ptolemy Philadelphus, who commanded the fleet sent by that monarch to the assistance of the Athenians against Antigonus Gonatas (a. c. 306). He appears to have been unable to make himself master of any of the ports of Athens, and established his naval station at a small island near the ruins of the old town, which he called his name. (Paus. i. 1. § 1, 35. § 1; Strab. xiv. p. 398.) He urged Areus, king of Sparta, to make a diversion by attacking Antigonus on the land side, and it was probably on the failure of this attempt that he withdrew from the coast of Attica. We subsequently find him commanding the fleet of Ptolemy on the coast of Caria. (Paus. iii. 6. § 4—6; Athen. xiv. p. 621 a.; Droysen, Hellenis- mus. vol. ii. pp. 211, 219, 245.) [E. H. B.]

PATRON, a philospher of the Epicurean school. He lived for some time in Rome, where he became acquainted, amongst others, with Cicero, and with the family of C. Memmius. Either now, or subsequently, he also gained the friendship of Atticus. From Rome he either removed or returned to Athens, and there succeeded Phaedrus as president of the Epicurean school, a. c. 52. C. Memmius had, while in Athens, procured permission from the council of Areopagus to pull down an old wall belonging to the property left by Epicurus for the use of his school. This was regarded by Patron as a sort of desertion, and he accordingly addressed himself to Atticus and Cicero, to induce them to use their influence with the Areio- pagus to get the decree rescinded. Atticus also wrote to Cicero on the subject, which he took up very warmly. Cicero arrived at Athens the day after Memmius had departed for Mytilene. Finding that Memmius had abandoned his design of erecting the edifice with which the wall in question would have interfered, he consented to bestir himself in the matter; but thinking that the Areopagus would not retract their decree without the consent of Memmius, he wrote to the latter, urging his request in an elegant epistle, which is still extant (ad Fam. xiii. 1. Comp. ad Att. v. 11, 10). [C. P. M.]

PATROPHILUS (Πατροφίλος), bishop of Scythopolis, and one of the leaders of the Eusebian or semi-Arian party in the fourth century. He was deposed at the council of Seleucia (A. D. 359) for contumacy, having refused to appear before the council to answer the charges of the presbyter Dorotheus. (Sozet. H. E. ii. 40; Sozom. iv. 22.) He must have died soon after, for his remains were disinterred and insultingly treated (Theophanes, Chronographia) during the re-action which followed the temporary triumph of paganism (A. D. 561—563) under Julian the apostate [Julianus]. Patrophilus appears to have been eminent for scriptural knowledge. Eusebius of Emesa is said to have derived his expositions of Scripture from the instructions of Patrophilus and Eusebius of Caesarea (Socrat. H. E. ii. 9); but Sixtus Senensis is mistaken in ascribing to Patrophilus a translation of the Old Testament from Hebrew into Greek. (Sixtus Senens. Biblioth. Sacra, lib. iv.; Le Long, Biblioth. Sacra, recensita ab A. G. Masch. Pars ii. vol. ii. sect. i. § 23; Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. iii. p. 716. The scanty notices of the life of Patrophilus have been collected by Tillemont, Mém. div. vii.)

PATROUS, PATROA (Πατρούς, φίλος), and in Latin, Patrē, Diva, are, properly speaking, all the gods whose worship has been handed down in a nation or a family from the time of their fathers, whence in some instances they are the spirits of departed ancestors themselves. (Lucian, De Mort. Perg. 36.) Zeus was thus a ἱερός πατρῴος at Athens (Paus. i. 3. § 3, 43, § 5), and among the Heracleidae, since the heroes of that race traced their origin to Zeus. (Apollod. i. 8. § 4.) Among the Romans we find the divinities avenging the death of parents, that is, the Furies or Erinnyes, designated as Πατρῷ Δί. (Cic. in Verr. ii. 1. 3; comp. Liv. xl. 10.) But the name was also applied to the gods or heroes from whom the genealogy derived their origin. (Serv. ad Aen. iii. 832; Stat. Theb. iv. 111.) [L. S.]

Q. PATULCIIUS, one of the accusers of Mile. dog. V in n. c. 52 (Ascon. in M. Ter. p. 54, ed. Orelli). It may have been this same Patulcius who owed Cicero some money, which Atticus exerted himself in obtaining for his friend in n. c. 44 (Patulcianum nonem, Cic. ad. Att. iv. 13).

PATULEIUS, a rich Roman equest in the reign of Tiberius (Tac. Ann. ii. 48).

PATZO, GREGO'RIOUS. [Gregorius, No. 30, p. 310.]

PAULA, JULI'A CORNE'LLA, the first wife of Elagabalus, a lady, according to Herodian, of very noble descent. The marriage, which was celebrated with great pomp at Rome, took place, it would appear A. D. 219, soon after the arrival of the youthful emperor from Asia. Paula was divorced in the course of the following year, deprived of the title of Augusta, and reduced to a private station. Her subsequent history is unknown. (Herodian v. 6, § 1; Dion Cass. lxxx. 9; Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 259.) [W. R.]

COIN OF PAULA, WIFE OF ELAGABALUS. The latter coin was accidentally omitted in the article Elagabalus, and is therefore given here. PAULINA or PAULIL'NA. 1. DOMITIA PAULINA, the sister of the emperor Hadrian (Dion Cass. lix. 11; Gruter, Inscr. p. cclii. n. 4).

2. LOLLIA PAULINA. [Lollia, No. 2.]

3. POMPEDIA PAULINA, the wife of Annaeus Seneca the philosopher, whom he married rather late in life. She was probably the daughter of Pompeius Paulinus, who commanded in Germany in the reign of Nero. She seems to have been attached to her husband, who speaks of her with affection, and mentions in particular the care which she took of his health (Senec. Ep. 104). She was with her husband at dinner when the centurion came from Nero to tell Seneca that he must die. The philosopher received the intelligence with calmness, embraced his wife, and bade her bear her separation with firmness; but as she begged that she might die with him, he yielded to her entreaties, and they opened their veins together. Nero, however, unwilling to incur a reputation for unnecessary cruelty, commanded her veins to be bound up. Her life was thus spared; and she lived a few years longer, but with a paleness which testified how near she had been to death. This is the account of Tacitus (Ann. xv. 60—64), which differs somewhat from that in Dion Cassius (lxi. 10, lxii. 25), who relates the event to the disarray of Seneca.

PAULINNA. We learn from Ammianus Marcellinus that the wife of Maximinus I. was of amiable disposition, seeking to mitigate by gentle counsel the savage temper of her husband, by whom, if we can trust the statements of Syncellus and Zonaras, she was eventually put to death. No ancient historian, however, has mentioned her name, but numismatologists have conjectured that certain coins bearing on the obverse the words Diva Paulina, and on the reverse Conssecrato, a legend which proves that they were struck after the decease of the personage whose effigy they bear, ought to be considered as belonging to this princess. (Amm. Marc. xiv. 1. § 8; Zonar. xii. 16; Synccll. Chron. s. A. M. 5729; Eckhel, vii. p. 296.) [W. R.]

COIN OF THE EMPEROR ELAGABALUS.
PAULINUS or PAULIUS, a lengthened form of Paulus or Paulus, like Albinus of Albus. [Albinus, p. 90.] This cognomen only occurs under the empire. For the sake of uniformity we adopt the form Paulinus, but respecting the orthography, see PAULUS.

PAULLINUS (Paulinos), literary. 1. Of Antioch (1), better known as Paulinus of Tyre [No. 9.]

2. Of Antioch (2). Paulinus was ordained presbyter by Eustathius, bishop of Antioch [Eustathius], and was a leader among the Eustathians party in the city. When Athanasius, after his return from exile on the death of the emperor Constantius II. and the murder of George of Cappadocia, the Arrian patriarch [Georgius, No. 7], assembled a council at Alexandria, Paulinus sent two deacons, Maximus and Calimerus, to take part in its deliberation. He was shortly afterward ordained by the hasty and impetuous Lucifer of Cagliari [Lucifer] bishop of the Eustathians at Antioch; a step unwarrantable and mischievous, as it prolonged the schism in the orthodox party, which would otherwise probably have been soon healed. His ordination took place in A.D. 362. He was held, according to Socrates (I.H. E. iv. 2) and Sozomen (I.H. E. vi. 7), in such respect by the Arrian emperor Valens as to be allowed to remain when his competitor Meletius [Meletius] was banished. Possibly, however, the smallness of his party, which seems to have occupied only one small church (Socrat. I.H. E. iii. 99; Sozom. v. 13), rendered him less obnoxious to the Arrians, and they may have wished to perpetuate the division of the orthodox by exciting jealousy. Paulinus’s refusal of the proposal of Meletius to put an end to the schism is mentioned elsewhere [Meletius, No. 1] but he at length consented that whichever of them died first, the survivor should be recognized by both parties. On the death of Meletius, however (A.D. 381), this agreement was not observed by his party, and the election of Flavian [Flavianus, No. 1] disappointed the hopes of Paulinus, and embittered the schism still more. In A.D. 382 Paulinus was present at a council of the Western Church, which had all along recognised his title, and now ardently supported his cause; but the Oriental churches generally recognised Flavian, who was de facto bishop of Antioch. Paulinus died A.D. 386 or 389. His partisans chose Evagrius to succeed him [Evagrius, No. 1]. A confession of faith by Paulinus is preserved by Athanasius and Epiphanius in the works cited below. (Epiphanius, Haeres. lxxxvii. 21, ed. Petavi; Socrates, I.H. E. iii. 6, 9, iv. 2, v. 5, 9, 15; Sozomen, I.H. E. v. 12, 13, vi. 7, vii. 3, 10, 11, 15; Theodoret, I.H. E. iii. 5, v. 3, 23; Athanasius, Conv. Alexandria. Epistol.

COIN OF PAULINA, WIFE OF MAXIMINUS I.

4. Meropius Pontius Anicius Paulinus. [See below.]

5. Of Mediolanum or Milan. [See below.]

6. Of Nola. [See below.]

7. Of Pella or Poëntentis, the Pentent. A poem entitled Eucaristicon de Vita Sua, by a writer of the name of Paulinus, has been twice published. It appeared among the poems of Paulinus of Nola [see below] in the Appendix to the first edition of De la Bigne’s Bibliotheca Patrum, which Appendix was published, fol. Paris, 1579, but was omitted in the following editions of the Bibliotheca, whether published at Paris, Cologne, or Lyon, and also in the Bibliotheca Galliens, or Galliae, which was again printed by Christiansen Durand, but with the addition of Paulinus Petcorius [Petrocorius], 8vo, Leipzig, 1684. A full account of the author may be gathered from the poem, which is in hexameters, not as has been incorrectly stated, in elegiac verse. He was the son of Hesperius, proconsul of Africa, who was the son of the poet Ausonius. [Ausonius; Hesperius.] He was born in A.D. 376, at Pella in Macedonia; and after being at Carthage, where he remained a year and a half during his father’s consulship, he was taken at three years of age to Bourdeaux, where he appears to have been educated. An illness at the age of fifteen interrupted his studies, and the indulgence of his parents allowed him to pursue a life of ease and pleasure, in the midst of which, however, he kept up a regard to appearances. At the age of twenty he married a lady of ancient family, and of some property. At thirty he lost his father, whose death was followed by a dispute between Paulinus and his brother, who wished to invalidate his father’s will to deprive his mother of her dowry. In A.D. 414 he joined Attalus, who attempted to resume the purple in Gaul under the patronage of the Gothic prince Ataulphus [Ataulphus; Atellus], and from whom he accepted the title of Comes Rerum Privatarum, thinking thus to be secure from the hostility of the Goths. He was, however, disappointed. The city where he resided (apparently Bourdeaux) was taken, and his house plundered; and he was again in danger when Vasates (Bazas), to which he had retired, was besieged by the Goths and Alans. He proposed now to retire to Greece, where his mother had good estates, but his wife could not make up her mind to go. He then thought of becoming a monk, but his friends diverted him from this plan. Misfortunes now thickened about him; he lost his mother, his mother-in-law, and his wife; his very children forsook him, with the exception of one, who was a priest, and who died soon after suddenly. His estates in Greece yielded him no revenue; and he retired to Massilia (Marseille), where he hired and farmed some land, but this resource failed him, and alone, destitute and in debt, he was reduced to live on the charity of others. During his residence at Massilia, he became acquainted with many religious persons, and their conversation combined with his sorrows and disappointments to impress his mind deeply with religious sentiments. He was baptized in A.D. 422, in his forty-sixth year, and lived at least till his eighty-fourth year (A.D. 460), when he wrote his poem. Some have supposed, but without good reason, that he is the Benedictus Paulinus to whose questions of various points of theology and ethics Faustus Reinius wrote an answer. [Faustus Reinius.] (Our authority for this article is the Histoire Littéraire de la France, vol. ii. p. 343, &c, 461, &c., not having been able to get sight of the poem itself, which is very rare. See also Fabric. Biblioth. Med. et Insan. Lit. vol. iv. p. 296, &c; Mansi; and Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. v. p. 290, in his article on Paulinus Nolani.)

[3. PETROCORIUS. [PETROCORIUS.]

9. Of Tyre. Paulinus, bishop of Tyre, was the contemporary and friend of Eusebius of Caesarea, who addressed to him the tenth book of his Historia Ecclesiastica. Paulinus is conjectured, from an obscure intimation in Eusebius, to have been a native of Antioch (Euseb. Contra Marcel. Angyr. i. 4). He was bishop of Tyre, and the restorer of the church there after it had been destroyed by the heathens in the persecution under Diocletian and his successors. This restoration took place after the death of Maximian Daza [Maximianus II.] in A.D. 313, consequently Paulinus must have obtained his bishopric before that time. On the dedication of the new building, an oration, Hymnopyeus, Oratio Panegyrica, was addressed to Paulinus, apparently by Eusebius himself, who has preserved the prolix composition (Euseb. H.E. x. i. 4). On the outbreak of the Arian controversy, Paulinus is represented as one of the chief supporters of Arianism. But it is not clear that he took a decided part in the controversy; he appears to have been, like Eusebius, a moderate man, averse to extreme measures, and to the introduction of unscriptural terms and needless theological definitions. Arius distinctly names him among those who agreed with him; but then Arius gave to the confession to which this statement refers the most orthodox complexion in his power. (Theodoret. H.E. 1. 5). Eusebius of Nicomedia (ibid. 6) wrote to Paulinus, rebuking him for his silence and concealment of his sentiments; but it is not clear whether he was correctly informed what those sentiments were. Athanasius (De Synod. c. 17) charges Paulinus with having given utterance to Arian sentiments, but gives no citation from him. He certainly agreed with the bishops of Palestine in granting to Arius the power of holding assemblies of his partizans; but at the same time these prelates recommended the heresiarch to submit to his diocesan Alexander of Alexandria, and to endeavour to be re-admitted to the communion of the Church. Paulinus’s concurrence in these steps shows that if not a supporter of Arianism, he was at any rate not a bigoted opponent. (Sozomen. H.E. c. 15.) Paulinus was shortly before his death translated to the bishopric of Antioch (Euseb. Contra Marcel. i. 4; Philostorg. H.E. ii. fol. 15); but it is disputed whether this was before or after the council of Nice; some place his translation in a.d. 323, others in a.d. 331. Whether he was present at the council of Nice, or even lived to see it, is not determined. The question is argued at length by Valesius (not. ad Euseb. H.E. x. 1), Hanchius (De Rerum Byzant. Scriptor. Pars i. cap. i. § 255, &c.), and by Tillemont (Mém. vol. vii. p. 646, &c). We are disposed to acquiesce in the judgment of Le Quien, who places the accession of Paulinus to the see of Antioch in a.d. 323 or 324, and his death in the latter year. (Euseb. U. c.; Hieron. Chronicon, sub init.; Sozomen. Theodoret. Philostorg. U. c.; Tillemont, vol. vii. Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, vol. ii. col. 708, 803.)

[J. C. M.]

PAULINUS, Latin fathers. 1. Of Milan (Mediolanensis), was the secretary of St. Ambrose, after whose death he became a deacon, and repaired to Africa, where, at the request of Stint Augustine, he continued as his personal secretary. While residing at Carthage he encountered Coelestius, detected the dangerous tendency of the doctrines disseminated by that active disciple of Pelagius, and, having preferred an imprecation of heresy, procured his condemnation by the council which assembled in a.d. 212 under Aurelius. The accusation was divided into seven heads, of which six will be found in that portion of the Acts of the Synod, preserved by Marius Mercator. At a subsequent period (217—218) we find Paulinus appearing before Zosimus for the purpose of resisting the appeal against this decision, and refusing obedience to the adverse decree of the pope. Nothing further is known with regard to his history, except that we learn from Isidorus that he was eventually ordained a presbyter.

We possess the following works of this author: 1. Vita Ambrosii, which, although commenced soon after a.d. 400, could not, from the historical allusions which it contains, have been finished until 412. This piece will be found in almost all the editions of St. Ambrose. In many it is ascribed to Paulinus Nolani, and in others to Paulinus Episcopus.

3. De Benedictionibus Patriarcharum, is menmony of Isidorus (De Viris Iuustr. c. 4), but was not known to exist in an entire form until it was discovered by Mingarelli in a very ancient MS. belonging to the library of St. Salvador at Bologna, and inserted by him in the Antologa published at Bologna, 4to. 1751, vol. ii. pt. 1, p. 199. A corrupt fragment of this tract will be found in the fifth volume of the Benedictine edition of St. Jerome, where it is ascribed to Rufinus.

The three productions enumerated above are placed together in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, fol. Venet. 1773, vol. ix. p. 23. (Cassianus, de Incarn. c. 7; Isidorus, de Viris Iuustr. 4; Galland, Bibli. Patr. vol. ix. Proleg. c. ii; Schonemann, Bibli. Patrum Lat. vol. ii. § 21.)

2. Merosipius Pontius Anicius Paulinus, bishop of Nola in the early part of the fifth century, and hence generally designated Paulinus Nolanius, was born at Bourdeaux, or at a neighbouring town, which he calls Embriagomum, about the year A. D. 353. Descended from illustrious parents, the inher- itor of ample possessions, gifted by nature with good abilities, which were cultivated with affection and fidelity by his sedulous and receptive tastes, he entered life under the fairest auspices, was raised to the rank of consul suffectus, before he had attained to the age of twenty-six, and married a wealthy lady named Therapia, whose disposition and tastes seem to have been in perfect harmony with his own. After many years spent in the enjoyment of worldly honours, Paulinus became convinced of the truth of Christianity, was baptized by Delphinus, bishop of Bourdeaux, in A. D. 389, distributed large sums to the poor, and passed over with his wife to Spain. The death of an only child, which survived its birth eight days, with perhaps other domestic afflictions concerning which we are imperfectly informed, seem to have confirmed the dislike with which he now regarded the business of the world. After four years passed in retirement he resolved to withdraw himself entirely from the society of his friends, to apply his wealth to religious purposes, and to dedicate the remainder of his life to works of piety. This determination, while it called forth the earnest monstations of his kindred, excited the most lively admiration among all classes of the devout, and the dignity of Presbyter was almost forced upon his acceptance by the enthusiasm of the populace at Barcelona (A. D. 393). He did not, however, remain to exercise his clerical functions in this province, but crossed the Alps into Italy. Passing through Florence, where he was greeted with much cordiality by Ambrose, he proceeded to Rome, and, after meeting with a cold reception from Pope Sricius, who probably looked with suspicion on the hasty irregularity of his ordination, reached Nola, in Campania, where he possessed some property, soon after Easter A. D. 394. In the immediate vicinity of this city were the tomb and miracle-working relics of Felix, a confessor and martyr, over which a church had been erected with a few cells for the accommodation of pilgrims. In these Paulinus, while it called forth the earnest monstations of his abode, confirming in all points to the observances of monastic establishments, except that his wife appears to have been his companion. After nearly fifteen years passed in holy meditations and acts of charity, he was chosen bishop of Nola in A. D. 409 (or according to Pagi, A. D. 403), and when the stormy inroad of the Goths had passed away, discharged the duties of the office in peace until his death, which took place in A. D. 431.

The above sketch contains a narrative of all the facts which can be ascertained with regard to this father, but to what extent these may be checked out by laborious conjecture will be seen upon referring to biography compiled by Le Brun. The story told in the dialogues of St. Gregory, that Paulinus, having given away all his possessions, made a journey into Africa, and sold himself into slavery, in order to ransom the son of a poor widow, has, upon chronological and other considerations, been generally rejected as a fable, as well as numerous legends contained in the histories of the Saints.

The following works of Paulinus, all composed after he had quittd public life, are still extant, consisting of Epistola. Carmina, and a very short tract entitled Passio S. Genesii Arelatensis. 1. Epistola. Fifty, or, as divided in some editions, fifty-one letters, addressed to Sulpiicus Severus, to Delphinus bishop of Bourdeaux, to Augustine, to Rufinus, to Eucherius, and to many other friends upon different topics, some being compilations of the poet Ausonius, but while the greater number are of a serious cast, being designed to explain some doctrine, or to convey information upon some point connected with religion. Neither in style nor in substance can they be regarded as of much importance or interest, except in so far as they afford a fair specimen of the familiar correspondence of churchmen at that epoch, and convey a very pleasing impression of the writer. The most elaborate are the twelfth (to Amandus), which treats of the Fall and the Atonement, the thirtieth (to Sulpiicus Severus) on the Inward and Outward Man, and the forty-second (to Florentius, bishop of Cahors) on the Dignity and Merits of Christ; the most curious is the thirty-first (to Severus) on the Invention of the True Cross; the most lively is the forty-ninth (to Macarius) on a famous miracle performed by St. Felix. A summary of each epistle is to be found in Functionis, and longer abstracts in Duplicationum et Carmina. Thirty-two in number, composed in a great variety of metres. Of these, the most worthy of notice are the birthday addresses to St. Felix in heroic hexameters, composed regularly on the festival of the saint, and forming a series which embraces so complete an account of the career and achievements of that holy personage, that Bede was enabled from these documents alone to compile a prose narrative of his life. We have besides parahrases of three psalms, the 1st, 2d, and 136th; Epistles to Ausonius and to Gestidius, two Preca- tiones Matutinae, De S. Joanne Baptista Christi Præcocy et Legato, in 320 hexameters; an elegy on the death of a boy named Celsus; an epitaphin the nuptials of Julianus and In [Julianus Eclannersis. Ad Nicholam redactum in Duciam, Ad Joannium de Nolains Ecclesiæ, Ad Antonium contra Poæanos, while the list has been recently swelled by Mai from the MSS. of the Vatican, by the addition of some extent which may however be regarded with some suspicion; the one inscribed Ad Deum post Conversionem et Baptismum suum, the other De suis Domesticis Calamitatis. As in the case of the Epistolae, the above are differently arranged in different editions. Thus the Naliditia are sometimes condensed into thirteen, sometimes expanded to fifteen; and in like manner the letters to Anianus are distributed into two, three, or four, according to the conflicting views of critics.

3. The authenticity of the Passio S. Genesii has been called in question by Rosweyrd, and is vindicated by the concurring testimony of many MSS.

Among the lost works we may notice the following:—1. Ad Theodotium Paneurgicus, a congratulatory address composed in honour of the victory gained over Eugenius and Arbogastes. Although this piece is distinctly described by Honorius of Autun (De Script. Eccles. ii. 47; comp. Rufin. Hist. i. 27), Fuscianus maintains that an error has been committed as to the subject, and argues from the expressions of Paulinus himself (Ep. 9, and 29), that it was a funeral oration delivered after the death of the emperor. (See also Hieronym. Ep. 13; Cassiodor. L. S. c. 21; Gennadius, 48; Trithem. 117.) 2. De Poenitentia et de Laudae generali omnium Martyrum, affirmed by Gennadius to be the most important of all his productions. Here again we might conjecture that there was some confusion, and that the titles of two treatises, one De Poenitentia, the other De Laudae Martyrum, have been mixed up together. 3. Epist. ad Sororem, on the contempt of the world. 4. Epistolas ad Amicos. 5. Suetonii Libri III. de Regibus in epitomen versibus redactis, loudly commended by Anianus, who has preserved nine lines. 6. A translation of Recognitiones, attributed to Clemens [Clemens Romanus]. We hear also of a Sacramentarium and a Hymnarium.

The Epistles Ad Marcellum and Ad Columbanum, together with the poems, Exhortatio ad Conjugem, De Nomine Jesu, and a Vita S. Martini in six books, do not belong to this father.

The enthusiastic commendations bestowed upon the learning and genius of Paulinus by his contemporaries, and repeated by successive generations of ecclesiastical critics, if not altogether unmerited, have at least been too freely lavished. Although well versed in the works of the Latin writers, his knowledge of Greek was very imperfect, and he occasionally betrays much ignorance regarding the common facts of history. The quotations from Scripture so frequently adduced in support or illustration of his arguments, will be found in many instances to be strangely twisted from their true significance, while his allegorical interpretations are in the highest degree far-fetched and fantastic. His poetry, although offending grievously against the laws of prosody and metre, is in every respect far superior to his prose. The purity of the language proves how deeply he had studied the best ancient models; the descriptions are lively, the pictures vivid, but there is no creative power, no refined taste, no sublimity of thought, no grandeur of expression.

The early impressions of Paulinus, commencing with that printed at Paris by Badius Ascensius, 8vo. 1516, present the text in a most mutilated, corrupt, and disordered condition. Considerable improvements were introduced by the Jesuit Herbert Rosweyrd (8vo. Anv. 1623), who compiled some useful annotations and prefixed a biographical sketch by his friend Sarchini; but the first really valuable materials were furnished by another Jesuit, Peter Francis Chifflet, whose Paulinus Illustratus was published at Dijon, 4to. 1662. This was followed after a lapse of more than twenty years by the very elaborate and complete edition of Jean Baptiste Le Brun, 4to, Paris, 1685, which may still be regarded as the standard. It contains the text corrected by a collation of all the best MSS., voluminous commentaries, dissertations, indices, a new life of Paulinus, and a variety of documents requisite for the illustration of his works. The first volume of Muratori's Anecdota (4to, Mediol. 1697) exhibited in a complete form, from a MS. in the Ambrosian library, three of the Cartina Natalitiae (xi. xii. xiii.), which had previously appeared as disjointed fragments, and they are accompanied by twenty-two dissertations on all the leading events in the history of Paulinus and all the persons with whom he was in any way connected. These poems were afterwards republished, with emendations, by Mingarelli in his Anecdota Ramfusinum (4to, Rom. 1756), a book printed in his Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. viii. (fol. Ven. 1772) p. 211. There is a reprint of Le Brun with the additional matter from Muratori, fol. Veron. 1736. The two elegies contributed by Mai are to be found in "Episcoporum Nicetae et Paulini Scripta ex Vaticanis Codicibus edita," fol. Rom. 1827. (Ausson. Ep. 19, 23, 44; Paulin. PAULINUS, ANCIUS, consul in A.D. 498 with Janannes Scytta (Chron. Pasch.; Cod. Just. 5. tit. 30. s. 4.)

PAULINUS, M. AURELIUS, consul in A.D. 277 with the emperor M. Aurelius Probus. (Cod. Just. 8. tit. 56. s. 2.)

PAULINUS, LO/LLIUS. [LOLLIUS, No. 5.]

PAULINUS, POMPEIUS, commanded in Germany along with L. Antiustus Vetus in A.D. 58, and completed the dam to restrain the inundations of the Rhine, which Drusus had commenced sixty-three years before. In A.D. 62 he was appointed, along with L. Piso and Deucassius Gemmus, to the superintendence of the public revenues. On this occasion Tacitus calls him consultarius; but his name does not occur in the consular fasti (Tac. Ann. xiii. 53, xv. 18; Senec. de Brev. Vit. 18.) Seneca dedicated to him his treatise De Revivisc. Vitae; and the Pompeia Paulina, whom the philosopher married, was probably the daughter of this Paulinus. It is uncertain, however, whether the subject of this notice is the same as the Pompeius Paulinus, the son of a Roman eques of Arcalate of whom Pliny speaks (H. N. xxxii. 11. s. 50.)

PAULINUS, C. SUETO/NIUS, is first mentioned in the reign of the emperor Claudius, A.D. 42, in which year he was propretor in Mauritania; he conquered the Moors who had revolted, and advanced as far as Mount Atlas (Dion Cass. Ix. 9; Plin. H. N. v. 1.) In the reign of Nero, A.D. 59, Paulinus was appointed to the command of Britain. For the first two years all his undertakings were successful; he subdued several nations, and erected forts in various parts of the country; but when at length in A.D. 61 he crossed over to Mona (Anglesey), which was the great strong-hold of the Britons who still resisted the Roman arms, the other Britons took advantage of his absence to rise in open rebellion, and led on by Boadicea, the heroic queen of the Iceni, they captured the Roman colony of Camulodunum and defeated Petilius Cerealis, the legate of the ninth legion. The return of Paulinus, however, soon changed matters; and he at length finally defeated Boadicea with great slaughter, though not till Londinium and Verulamium had also fallen into the hands of the Britons. For further details see BOADICEA. He returned to Rome in the following year, and was succeeded by Petronius Turpilianus. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 29—37; Agric. 5, 14—16; Dio Cass. liii. 1—12; Suet. Ner. 39.)

6. Sextonius Paulinus was consul with C. Lucius Telesinus (Tac. Ann. xvi. 14; Dion Cass. xiii. 1.) Paulinus was now looked upon as one of the first generals of the time, and while in Britain he was regarded by the people as the rival of Corbulo in military glory. His services were accordingly called into exercise in the civil wars which followed Nero’s death. He was one of Otho’s generals and chief military advisers, although he was not able to overcome the intrigues and influence of Licinius Proculus, in whom Otho placed most reliance. The German legions, who had proclaimed Vitellius, were advancing into Italy, and Otho set out to meet them in the spring of A.D. 69, taking with him Paulinus and other generals of experience. The plain of the Po was the field of operation; an account of which is given under OVIJO, p. 67. As far as respects Paulinus, it is only necessary to mention here, that he and Marius Celsus defeated Caecina, one of the Vitellian generals, near Cremona; but as Paulinus would not allow his men to follow up their advantage, he was accused of treachery by his troops, though his conduct was probably the result of prudence. When Valens, the other general of Vitellius, had joined his forces to those of Caecina, Paulinus strongly recommended Otho not to risk a battle; but his advice was overruled, and the result was the defeat at Bedriacum, and the ruin of Otho’s cause. After the battle Paulinus did not venture to return to his own camp. He fell into the hands of Vitellius, and obtained his pardon by pleading, says Tacitus, “the necessary but not honourable excuse,” that the defeat of Otho’s army was owing to his treachery; for which self-acquamation, however, there was certainly no foundation. This is the last time that the name of Sextonius Paulinus occurs. (Tac. Hist. i. 87, 90, 23—26, 31—41, 44, 69.)

PAULI’NUS, M. VALE’RIUS, was a native of Forum Julii, where he possessed considerable estates. He was a friend of Vespasian before his accession; and having previously served as tribune of the praetorian tribunes, he was able to collect for Vespasian many of the Vitellian troops in Narbonnese Gaul, of which province he was appointed procurator, A.D. 69. He also served in the Jewish war, and was eventually raised to the consulship in the reign of Trajan, A.D. 101. He was a friend and correspondent of the younger Pliny, who has addressed five of his letters to him (Tac. Hist. iii. 42, 43; Joseph. B. J. iii. (14), 7. § 1; Plin. Ep. ii. 2, iv. 16, v. 19, ix. 3, 37.)

PAULILUS or PAULULUS, an agnomen of Sp. Postumius Albinius, consul B.C. 174. [ALBINUS, No. 14.]

PAULUS or PAULULUS, a Roman cognomen in many gentes, but best known as the name of a family of the Aemilii gens. [See below.] This surname was no doubt originally given to a member of the Aemilii gens on account of the smallness of his stature. The name seems to have been originally written with a double l, which is the form found on the republican denarii and in earlier inscriptions; but on the imperial coins, as in that of Paula [see above], and in later inscriptions, the word occurs with only one l. Paulus is also the form used by the Greek writers. As the name of many persons mentioned below is always written Paulus, it is thought better for the sake of uniformity to adopt in all cases the former orthography, though in some instances the latter would be the preferable form.

PAULUS (ΠΑΟΥΛΟΣ), literary and ecclesiastical.

1. AEGINEOTA, a physician. [See below.]

2. Of ALEXANDRIA, a Greek writer on astrology, who lived in the latter part of the fourth century. He wrote, according to Suidas (s. v. ΠΑΟΥΛΟΣ φιλόσοφος), two works, Εἰσαγωγὴ ἀστρολογίας, Introduzione Astrologia, and Αποτελεσματικα, Ape- tolematika. Fabricius suggests the reading ἀποτελεσματικὰ instead of καὶ ἀποτελεσματικὰ, and understands the passage not of two works, but of two titles of one work; and his correction is rendered probable by the title of the only published work of Paulus, which is entitled Εἰσαγωγὴ εἰς τὸν ἀποτελεσματικὸν, Ἐπειδήλεμα in Doctorum de praecipuis Nativitatis, 4to. Wittenberg, 1536. It was edited by Andreas Schatus or Schato, from a MS. in the library of Count Rantzau. The work appears to have gone through two editions in the author’s life-time: for in the printed text, which probably represents the second edition, it is preceded by a short preface addressed to the author’s son Cronamen (Κροναμοῦ), who had noticed some errors in the former edition. The time when the author lived is inferred with probability from a passage in the work. In exemplifying a rule given for finding the days of the week, he chooses the year 94 of the era of Dio-Cleietan (= A.D. 378), which is therefore supposed to be the year in which the work was written. If this inference is correct, Paulus must be distinguished from another astrologer of the same name mentioned by Suidas (s. v. Ιουνιουσίου δ. Πολυνίου), as having predicted the accession of the emperor Leontius [Βασιλεὺς Λεωντίου], and from a third Paulus, an astrologer, whom Riccioli, in his rapid Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 140, note 2) states to have written an introduction to Astrology in the ninth century after Christ. The work of Paulus of Alexandria is accompanied by Greek Schola, written by a Christian in the year 867 of the era of Dio-Cleietan, = A.D. 1151. Fabricius conjectured that they were by Stephanus of Athens (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xii. p. 693, ed. vett.), or by the Apomascar (Ahmed Ben Seirim) whose Oneirocritica was published by Rigaltus: but the date assigned to the Scholia is too late for these writers (see Biog. Dict. of U. K. Soc. s. v. Ahmed). If, on the authority of the text of Suidas, two works are ascribed to Paulus, the one published by Schatus will be the former of the two, the Introducunt Astrolagiae. (Suidas, ii. cc. ; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. ii. cc.)

3. APOSTOLUS, and [No. 17.]

4. APOSTOLUS. The life of the Apostle and his genuine works do not come within our plan, but the following indisputably spurious works require notice.

1. Al Παῦλου πράξεις, Acta Pauli, of which citations or notices are found in Origene (Tom. XXI, in Joan., De Principeis, i. 2), Eusebius (H. E. iii. 3, 25), and Philastrius (Haeres. lxxxvii). This work, which is lost, must not be confounded with No. 2. 2. Ἡ περίοδος Παῦλου καὶ Θείλας, Periodus Pauli et Theclae. This work is mentioned by Tertullian (De Baptismo, c. 17), and by Jerome (De Viris Illustr. c. 7). It was written, according to the former (i.e.), by a certain presbyter of Asia, who, when convicted of the forgery, acknowledged the fact, and said that he had done it out of love to the Apostle. He was deposed from his office. Jerome (i.e.,) citing this passage from Tertullian, adds, as if upon his authority, that the presbyter was convicted of the forgery before John (whether the Evangelist or the Elder, is not clear), which carries back the forgery almost, if not quite, to the Apostolic age. The work has perished. Whether there was such a person as Thecla, and whether she was connected with the Apostle Paul, has been disputed. Baro- nius and Grabe contend that there was; Stillling, in the Acta Sanctorum, Sept. vol. vi. p. 550, thinks that there is some truth in what is said of her; but Ittigius (De Biblioth. Patrum, p. 702) regards the whole story as a fable. She is mentioned by se- veral of the principal fathers of the fourth century, Epiphanius, Gregory Nazianzen, Gregory Nyssen, Chrysostom, Isidore of Pelusium, &c. In the fifth century, Basil of Seleucia (Basilii, No. 4) wrote a metrical history of Thecla (Phot. Bibl. Cod. 168), and Symeon Metaphrastes, at a later period, wrote her life. This latter biography, with another to which the name of Basil of Seleucia was prefixed, (but with very doubtful propriety, for it was not written in metre but the one mentioned by Photius,) were published in the original Greek, with a Latin version by Petrus Pantinii, 4to. Antwerp, 1608. Grabe inserted in the first volume of his Spicilegium SS. Patrum, pp. 95, &c., a history of Thecla, en- titled Μέταφρασις τῆς ἁγίας ἐν ἑνδείκτι πρωτομάρτυρος καὶ ἀποστόλου Θείλας, Martyrium sanctae et gloriosae Proto-Martyris et Apostolata defunctorum Virginis Theclae, and which he regarded as the very work to which the presbyter of Asia had prefixed the name of Paul. Grabe, however, was probably mistaken: the narrative makes no profession of being written by Paul, and there is no trace of an absurd story of the baptism of a lion ("baptismi leonis fabulam"), which Jerome expressly mentions as contained in the presbyter's narrative. The work is, however, of considerable antiquity, and probably furnished materials for the two biographies published by Pantinii. The Martyrium, as pub- lished by Grabe, was incomplete, having been taken from a mutilated MS., and a considerable supplementary passage was published by Hearne, in his appendix to Leland's Collectanea. The Mar- tyrium, thus completed, was reprinted by Galland, in the first volume of his Bibliotheca Patrum, p. 167, &c., (Grabe, Spicilegium, vol. i. p. 81, &c. Acta Sanctor. l. c.) 3. S. Pauli Prædictio, perhaps re- ferred to by Clement of Alexandria (Strorn. lib. vi.), certainly mentioned by the anonymous author of an ancient tract, De non iterando Baptismo Haeresi- torum (Fabric. Cod. Apocryph. N. T. vol. ii. p. 789). It is not extant. 3. Πρὸς Δαμασκὸν ἡπιστολή, Ad Dacilenses Epistola. This epistle, which of is ascribed to the same presbyter as the Martyrium, has been printed several times: in the Polyglot Bible of Elias Hutter, fol. Nurem- berg, 1589; in the Philologus Hedrao-Gracaeus of Leusden, 4to. Utrecht, 1670; in the Codex Apo- cryphi Novi Testamenti of Fabricius, and elsewhere, 4. Epistola Pauli ad Senecon et Senaecon ad Paulum, mentioned by Jerome (De Viris Illustr. c. 19) and Augustin (Epistol. ad Macedonion, 54, editt. vett., 153, edit. Benedictin.). These letters (five from Paul and eight from Seneca) are given in various editions of the works of Seneca; also by Sixtus Senensis, in his Bibliotheca Sancta, and by Fabricius, in his Codex Apocryphi N. T. 5. Ἀφανισταμένον Παῦλον, Aphanisticus Pauli, forged by the heretics whom Epiphanius calls Caiani, but used also by the Gnostics (Epiph. Haeres. xviii. c. 38). The book was founded on a passage in the genuine writings of the Apostle (2 Cor. xii. 4), in which he speaks of being caught up into the third heaven. It is now lost. 6. Apostolatopauli, apparently different from No. 5; mentioned by Augustin (Tract. XCVIII. in Joan.), Sozomen (H. E. vii. 19), Theophylact, and Oecumenius (Not. ad 2 Cor. xii. 4). It was said to have been found in Paul's house in Tarsus: but Sozomen found, on inquiry, that this story was untrue. 7. An Epistol Pauli ad Corinthios, different from the genuine epistle, and an Epistol Corinthiorum ad Paulum, are said to be extant in the Armenian language; and other epistles ascribed to the same Apostle are said to be extant in the Arabic. The Marcionites are said to have ascribed to Paul the gospel (formed from that of Luke) which was received among them. (Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. i. p. 12, ed. Oxford, 1740—43; Fabric. Cod. Apocryphi N. T.; Vossius, De Histor. Graec. lib. ii. c. 8.) 8. De Constantino (1). On the death of Alexander, patriarch of Constantinople (A.D. 336), Paul, one of the presbyters of that church, and comparatively a young man, was chosen to succeed him by the Homounousian or orthodox party, while the Arians were anxious for the election of the deacon Macedonius, who sought to prevent the election of Paul by some charge of misconduct, which, however, he did not persist in. Both men appear to have been previously marked out for the succession by their respective partizans; and Alex- ander had, before his death, passed a judgment on their respective characters, which is given elsewhere [Macedonius, No. 3]. The Homounousians had carried their point; but the election was annulled by a council summoned by the emperor, either Con- stantine the Great, or his son Constantius II., and Paul being ejected, was banished into Pontus (Athanas. Hilar. Arianor. ad Macedon. c. 7), and Eusebius, bishop of Nicomedia, was appointed by the council in his room. On the death of Eusebius, who died A.D. 342, the orthodox populace of Constantinople restored Paul, who appears to have been previously released from banishment, or to have escaped to Rome; while the bishops of the Arian party elected Macedonius. The emperor Con- stantius II. being absent, the contest led to many disturbances, in which a number of people were killed; and an attempt by Hermogenes, magister militum, to quell the riot and expel Paul, led to the murder of that officer by the mob. The emperor immediately returned to Constantinople, and expel- led Paul, without, however, as yet confirming the election of Macedonius. Paul hastened back to Rome and sought the support of Julius I., bishop of that city, who, glad to exercise the superiority im- plied in this appeal to him, sent him back with a letter to the bishops of the Eastern Churches, directing that he and some other expelled prelates should be restored to their respective sees, and bitterly accusing those who had deposed him. Paul regained possession of the church of Constantinople, but the Eastern bishops, in a council at Antioch, A.D. 343, returned a spirited answer to the arrogant pretensions of Julius; and the emperor, who was also at Antioch, wrote to Philippus, praefectus praetorio, to expel Paul again. Philippus, to avoid a commotion, sent the prelate away privately; but when he attempted to establish Macedonius in possession of the church, a riot occurred, in which above three thousand lives were lost. Paul was banished, according to Socrates, to Thessalonica, of which place Paul was a native, and then into the Western Empire, being forbidden to return into the East. But the account of Socrates is disputed, and Tilmént's opinion is probably correct, that it was at this time that Paul was loaded with chains and exiled to Singara in Mesopotamia, and afterwards to Emesa in Syria, as mentioned by Anastasius (c.c.). If Tilmént is correct, the banishment into the Western Empire may probably be referred to the former expulsion of Paul, when he appealed to Pope Julius I., or possibly Paul may have been released from banishment and allowed to retire to Rome, which, according to Photius, he did three several times. The cause of Paul and of Anastasius, who was also in banishment, was still supported by the Western church, and was taken up by the Western emperor Constans, brother of Constantius, and the Council of Sardica (A.D. 347) declared their restoration. Constantius, however, refused to restore them until compelled by the threats of his brother; upon whose death, shortly after, Paul was again expelled by Constantius, and exiled to Cucusus, in Cappadocia, amid the desiles of the Taurus, where it is said he was privately strangled by his keepers, A.D. 351, and buried at Ancyra. It was reported that his keepers, before strangling him, attempted to starve him to death. Great obscurity hangs over his death, and it is not clear whether he died by violence or by disease. But he was regarded by his party as a martyr, and when orthodoxy triumphed under the emperor Theodosius the Great, that prince brought his remains in great state to Constantinople, and deposited them in a church which was subsequently called by his name. 6. Of Constantine II. (2). When, on the accession of Constans II. as sole emperor, and the banishment of his colleague Henclemonas [Constans II.; Hieracleonas], the patriarch Pyrrhus was deposed, Paulus or Paul II. succeeded to the patriarchate of Constantinople, of the church of which he had previously been a presbyter, and also oecumenus. He was consecrated patriarch in October, A.D. 462. He is charged with being a monothelite; and with having induced the emperor (A.D. 648) to issue an edict prohibiting all discussion of the question whether there were in Christ one will or operation, or two. On account of his heretical opinions he was declared by the pope Theodore I., in a council held at Rome (A.D. 648), to be deposed; but as the pope had no power to enforce the sentence, though confirmed by the Lateran Council (A.D. 649), held under the papacy of Martin I., successor of Theodore, Paulus retained his patriarchate till his own death, A.D. 652. He even retaliated the attempts of the popes by urging the emperor to depose Martin, and exile him to Chersonae, where he died. Paul died not long after the banishment of Martin, and is said to have had repentance of the evil which he had brought upon his antagonist. There are extant of the writings of Paul:—1. Επιστολή Θεοδώρου, Epis- tola Theodoro, i.e. Pope Theodore, the predecessor of Martin. 2. Part of an Επιστολή Θεοδώρου, Epistola ad Theodorum, i.e. Theodore of Pharan, and 3. Part of an Επιστολή πρὸς Ἰάκωβον, Epistola ad Jacobum; all printed in the Collecta (Concil. Lateran. secret. iv., Concil. Constantin. III. act. x. vol. vi. ed. Hardouin, col. 815, 1246, 1247; Anastasius Bibliothecarius, Collectanea (Commemoratio eorum quo acta sunt in Martyrum Papam. &c.; apud John, until his death, vol. xiii. p. 47; idem, De Vitis Ruman. There were two other Pauli, patriarchs of Constantinople, viz. Paulus III., A.D. 686—692; and Paulus IV. A.D. 780—784.

7. CYRUS FLORUS. [No. 18.]

8. Of EMESA. Among the prelates who, at the General Council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, united with Joannes or John, patriarch of Antioch, in supporting the cause of Nestorius, was Paulus or Paul, bishop of Emesa. When negotiations were in progress for a reconciliation between John and the Oriental bishops [Joannes, No. 9] with Cyril of Alexandria [Cyrillus, St. of Alexandria], Paulus was sent by John to Cyril, but the latter would by no means comply with the solicitations of the Eastern prelates. Cyril, who was the only bishop of that name in the world, when he heard that Paul had delivered some homilies before him and presented to him a confession of faith, in which the term θεοπάπτωσις was applied to the Virgin Mary, and had joined in anathematizing Nestorius. Having satisfied Cyril in these points, Paul concluded the negotiations successfully. The few facts known of the life of Paulus are given by Tilmént (Mémoires, vol. xiv.), and by Christianus Lupus, in his Schola et Notae ad variar. PP. Epistolam, forming the second volume of the work cited below.

Paulus wrote:—I. Αβέλλος ἐπιστολὴ (σ. Αβελλος ἐπιστολῆς) ἐκ θυρεμασσάρι κυριακά παπάζου ἐπισκόπου ἕσυς τού ἀποστολεῖτο παρά τινων ἀντικυρίων ἐπισκοπῶν, Λιθέλες quæ (s. These pieces are given in the Collecta, vol. iii. pp. 1090, 1093, 1098, ed. Labbe. 4. Epistola Pauli Epmeni Episcopi ad Anathotum Magistrum Mi-Trithemius, as a native of Samosata, and that he neither inherited any property from his parents, nor followed any art or profession by which he could acquire wealth, before his exaltation to the bishopric of Antioch, apparently in A.D. 260. Cave ascribes his elevation to the influence of Zenobia [Zenobia], whose husband Odenathus [Odenathus] was all-powerful in the East. But although Pliny states that Paul was in favour with Zenobia (Athanas. Historia Arianor. ad Monachos. c. 71), he does not say that she procured his election to the bishopric, and in fact the context rather intimates that she did not procure or aid his elevation; and besides, it does not appear that either Odenathus or Zenobia had any power at Antioch till after A.D. 260. There is no reason, therefore, to doubt that the election of Paul was free and spontaneous on the part of the church at Antioch; and this circumstance, combined with the silence of the ecclesiastical writers, who would gladly have laid hold of any thing to his disadvantage, leads to the conclusion that his character before his elevation was not only free from any serious blemish, but so commendable as to lead to his being raised from an originally humble condition to the highest dignity in the church.

But this elevation was apparently the cause of his undoing. He manifested in his subsequent conduct great rapacity, arrogance, and vanity. To this his connection with Zenobia probably conduced, bringing him into contact with the corrupting influences of an Oriental court, and either awakening his ambition and avarice, or bringing them out more prominently. It is true that our knowledge of him is derived from the statements of his enemies; but, after making all reasonable abatements on this account, enough remains to show his general character, especially as the charges which are contained in the encyclical letter published by the council which deposed him, the greater part of which is given by Eusebius (H. E. vii. 30), were published at the time, and therefore, the allusion, although groundless, would have been open to denial or refutation. He obtained, while holding his bishopric, the secular office of procurator decuriorum, so called from the holder of it receiving a yearly salary of two hundred sesteria; and is said to have loved the pomp and state of this secular calling better than the humbler and more staid deportment which became his ecclesiastical office; and it was probably by the exercise, perhaps the abuse of his procuratorial power, that he amassed the immense wealth, which, contrasted with his original poverty, so scandalized his opponents. He was led also, by his habits of secular grandeur and the pride they inspired, to introduce into the church a greater degree of pomp than had as yet been allowed, erecting for himself an episcopal tribunal (βήμα) and a lofty seat (φιλοτιθήκη), and having this seat placed in a recess, screened from public observation (see Valesius on the word στήριγμα, not ad Euseb. H. E. vii. 30), in imitation of the higher judges and magistrates. When abroad he assumed all the airs of greatness; being attended by a numerous retinue, and affecting to read letters and to dictate as he went, in order to inspire the spectators with an idea of the extent and pressing character of his engagements. But if he expected to make by these proceedings a favourable impression, he was signally disappointed. The heathen and Jewish part of the population, hostile to Christianity, were excited to jealousy and indignation; and among the Christians themselves, the really humble were disgusted; and those who were most desirous of the elevation of the Church and its dignitaries, were scandalized at such vain ostentation. Only the weakest and most worldly were induced to admire. The decencies of public worship were violated; for Paul encouraged his admiring of both sexes to manifest their approval by waving their handkerchiefs, rising up and shouting, as in the theatres; and rebuked and insulted those whom a sense of propriety restrained from joining in these applause. — His style of preaching tended to aggravate the dissipation which his general deportment inspired. He was equally unprincipled in his strictures on those former teachers of the church whose memory was held in reverence, and in his praises of himself, “after the manner rather of a rhetorician or a mountebank, than of a bishop” (Euseb. ibid.). He allowed and excited women to sing his praises publicly in the church, amid the solemnities of Easter; and encouraged his flatterers among the neighbouring bishops to praise him in their discourses to the people, and extol him “as an angel from heaven.” To these charges of open and ascertainable character, his accusers add others of more secret, and therefore more dubious nature, resting in fact on suspicion. The intimacy which he cherished with a succession of young and beautiful women, and his encouragement of similar intimacy in his presbyters and deacons, gave rise to the most unfavourable surmises; and he was further charged with securing himself from being accused by the subscriptions of his name to the loading them with wealth, or by leading them so to commit themselves, that apprehension on their own account might make them silent as to him.

Probably, however, these offensive traits of his character would have excited less animadversion, had they not been connected with theological opinions, which excited great horror by their heterodoxy. In fact his accusers admit that, though “all groaned and lamented his wickedness in secret,” they feared his power too much to provoke him by attempting to accuse him; but the horror excited by his heresy inspired a courage which indig nation at his immorality had failed to excite; and they declare that when he set himself in opposition to God, they were compelled to depose him, and elect another bishop in his room (Euseb. ibid.).

The heresy of Paul is described by his opponents (Euseb. vii. 30; Epiph. Haer. ix. 1, ed. Patavi), as identical with that of Artemas or Artemon [Artemon, No. 3]. It is evident, from the portion of the letter of his accusers which is given by Eusebius, that he denied the divinity of Christ and his coming from heaven, and affirmed that he was “from beneath” (Λέγεται Ἱησοῦ Χριστοῦ καταλαβοῦντα), apparently meaning thereby, that he was in his nature simply a man. Epiphanius has given a fuller account of his opinions, but less trustworthy. The following passage (Haeres. lxv. 1) is, however, apparently correct. "He (Paul) affirms that God the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit are one God; and that his word (Λόγος) and the Spirit (πνεῦμα) exist continually (ἀεὶ δὴ) in God, as the word, or rather reason (λόγον) of man exists continually in his heart: that the Son of God has no distinct personality (μὴ ἐλευθερώθη τὸν Υἱὸν τοῦ appears to have presided. Eusebius expressly states that this second council was held after the accession of Aurelian, who came to the throne in A.D. 270 [Aurelianus], but Tillemont places it in A.D. 269 (see Vales. Annot. in Euseb. H. E. vii. 29). Whether a council was held between the two of which Eusebius speaks is not clear; some expressions of Rufinus, and the circumstance that Firmilian visited Antioch twice on this affair (Epist. Synod. opus Euseb. vii. 30), lead Tillemont to conclude positively that three councils were held, but we think the proof insufficient. At the last council Paul attempted to conceal his opinions, but they were detected by the skill of the presbyter Malchion, who was, or had been, the master of one of the schools of secular literature at Antioch. The decision of the council appears to have been unanimous: Paul was deposed, and Domnus, the son of Demetrius, one of the former bishops of Antioch, was appointed in his room. Paul appears to have denied the jurisdiction or disputed the sentence of the council; and, probably encouraged by the patronage of Zenobia, refused to give up possession of the church. The council, therefore, found it needful to address a letter to the universal Christian world, informing them of their proceedings, and inviting them to recognise Domnus; adding, with a sneer little becoming their dignity, "that Paul might, if he choose, write to Artemas (or Artemon), and that the follow of Artemon might hold communion with Paul." It is from this synodical letter, of which Eusebius has preserved (H. E. vii. 30) a considerable part, that our chief knowledge of Paul's character is derived. A letter of the council to Paul, before his deposition, is given in the Concilia of Labbe (vol. i. col. 344) and Mansi (vol. i. col. 1033).

When the power of Zenobia was overthrown, and the East subdued by Aurelian [Aurelianus], the council, or rather those with whom it rested to carry out their sentence, appealed to the emperor. Aurelian referred the matter to the bishops of Italy, and, upon receiving their decision against Paul, ordered him to be expelled (Euseb. H. E. vii. 30): after which event nothing more is known of him. A sect holding his opinions, and called from him Paulianii or Paulianitae (Paulaeistae), existed for a time, but they appear never to have become important; and in the fifth century were either entirely extinct, or were so few as to have escaped notice.

Paul does not appear to have written much. The ten questions or propositions extant under his name, and addressed, according to the existing title, to Dionysius of Alexandria, have been noticed. A Greek MS. work, ascribed by some to Joannes Damascenus, contains a fragment of a work of Paul, entitled of πρὸς Σακηνεβόν Νέων, Ad Sabineam Libri, and some fragments of his are recorded in the Concilia (vol. iii. p. 336, ed. Labbe). Vincentius Lirinensis, in his Consimilatorium, states that the writings of Paul abounded in quotations from the Scriptures both of the O.T. and N.T. (Euseb. ii. 15; Athanas. c. c. and Ad Epist. Orient. et Lyb.; c. 4. De Synodis. c. 4. § 43: contra Apollinar. lib. ii. c. 3; Epiphani. Haeres. lv. 42; Augustin. De Haeresibus. c. 44: Theodoret. Haeret. Fidel. Compend. lib. ii. c. 8. 11; I Philipp. Haeres. lxx.; Suidas, s. v. Paulus; Concilia, vol. i. p. 843, &c. ed. Labbe, p. 1031, &c. ed. Mansi; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 260, vol. i. p. 135; Le Quien, Oriens

18. Silentiarius (Sīlentāriōs). Vossius (De Historici Graeciis, iv. 20) and some other writers incorrectly call him Paulus Cyrilus Florus. Agathias, from whom what little we know of his personal history is derived, calls him (Hist. v. 9, 153, ed. Paris, p. 106, ed. Venice, p. 256; ed. Bonn), Paulus Constantinopolitans, who may be interpreted "Paul, the son of Cyrilus Florus," or more probably, "Paul, the son of Cyril, the son of Florus." It is supposed by Ducange that Cyrilus, the father of Paul, was the ἀρχιερατής, "consul cadillicarius," who wrote several of the Epigrammata in the Anthologia Graeca (vol. ii. p. 454, ed. Brunck, vol. iii. p. 159, ed. Jacobs). But if Jacobs is right in identifying the Cyrilus of the Anthologia with the Cyrilus of Panopolis, in Egypt, whose poetical talents are celebrated by Evagrius and Suidas [Cyrus, Christians, No. 1], and who lived in the time of the emperors Theodosius II. and Leo I., he can hardly have been the father of Paulus, who belongs to the time of Justinian I. Ducange seems disposed to identify Florus, the grandfather of Paulus, with the Florus, "bauerfamiliae," mentioned in several of the Novellae, and in the Codex of Justinian; but Fabricius thinks this Florus is of too late a date to be the grandfather of Paul. That the ancestors of Paul were illustrious, and that he inherited great wealth, are facts mentioned by Agathias (ibid.), who also tells us that he was chief of the silentarii, or secretaries of the emperor Justinian (δε δεχατωτα των εις τοις χρημα τον βασιλευς σημειωμενον). He wrote various poems, of which the following are extant:—1. "Εκφώρισις του αυτο της αγίας Εορλιας, Descriptio Magnae Ecclesiae s. Sancti Sophiae. This poem, consisting of 1029 verses, of which the first 134 are iambic, the rest hexameter, gives a clear and graphic description of the superb structure which forms its subject, and at the second dedication of which (A. p. 562), after the restoration of the dome, which had fallen in, it was recited by its author Agathias has attested: (l. c.) the completness and completeness of the description. He says, "If any one who happens to reside in some place distant from the city wishes to obtain a distinct notion of every part, as though he were there and looking at it, let him read what Paul the son of Cyril, the son of Florus, has composed in hexameter verse." Ducange adds his testimony also to the accuracy and clearness of the description, as well as to the elegance of the versification. The poem was first published by Ducange, from a transcript belonging to Salmasius, from a MS. in the Palatine Library. Ducange corrected the text of the MS., supplied the smaller lacunae, and added a valuable preface and Latin version, and a Descriptio Ecclesiae S. Sophiae, by way of commentary. With this illustrative apparatus, the work was published in the Paris edition of the Corpus Historiae Byzantinae, subjoined to the Historia of Cinnamus, fol. Paris, 1670; and was reprinted in the Venetian edition of the Corpus Historiae Byzantinae, with the works of Anna Comnena and Cinnamus, fol. 1729. It was again published, with the text revised by Bekker, in the Bonn edition of the Byzantine historians,
The assiduity of Paul in the exercises of an ascetic life was rewarded, according to his credulous biographer Palladius, with miraculous gifts, and “he surpassed even his master in vexing the demons, and putting them to flight” (Sozomen). The date of Paul’s retirement, and the time of his death, are not known; but an anecdote recorded in the Eccles. Graec. Monumenta of Cotelerius (vol. i. p. 351) shows that he was living at the accession of the emperor Constantius II., A. D. 337. (Palladius, Hist. Lausiaca. c. 28, in the Biblioth. Patrum, fol. Paris, 1654, vol. xiii. p. 941; Sozomen, Hist. E. E. i. 13; Tillemont, Mémoires, vol. vii. p. 144, &c.)

20. SOPISTHA. [No. 22.]

21. SOPISTHA, the Sophist, of Lycopolis in Egypt, son of Besarion or Didymus, lived in the reign of the emperor Constantine, and wrote a work now lost, described by Suidas as Ψευδαμα, Commentarium (Suidas, s. v., Paulus Alphæus). The work was entitled De praefectis, to put an end to the criticisms of the one who had written a book on the ancients, and to the assertions of those who had written on the national history.

22. Of Tyrr, a sophist or rhetorician of the time of Hadrian. He was deputed, apparently by his countrymen, as their delegate to the emperor, and succeeded in obtaining for Tyre the rank of a metropolis. He wrote the following works enumerated by Suidas, but all now lost. 1. Τέχνη ἄντροι-μοικ, Ars Rhetorica. 2. Πρωγνοματάσα, Prognomaseta. 3. Μελέται, Declarations. (Suidas, s. v.; Eudocin, Ιουνα, s. v.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 135; Tillemont, Hist. des Empereurs, vol. ii. p. 278.)

PAULUS AEGEIN'THA (Παῦλος Αἰγήνης), a celebrated Greek medical writer, of whose personal history nothing is known except that he was born in the island of Aegina, and that he travelled a good deal, visiting, among other places, Alexandria (iv. 49, p. 920). He is sometimes called Ἀιγώνοτος (see Dict. of Ant. s. v.) and Hερο-στρατής, a word which probably means a physician who travelled from place to place in the exercise of his profession. The exact time when he lived is not known; but, as he quotes Alexander Trallianus (iii. 28, 78, pp. 447, 495, vii. 5, 11, 19, pp. 650, 660, 687), and is himself quoted by Yahya Ibn Serâbi or Serapion (Franc. vii. 9, pp. 73, 74, ed. Lugd. 1525), it is probable that Abûl-Faraj is correct in placing him in the latter half of the seventh century after Christ. (Hist. Dýnast. p. 114.) Suidas says he wrote several medical works, of which the principal one is still extant, with no exact title, but commonly called De Re Medica Libri Septem.” This work is chiefly a compilation from former writers; and the preface contains the following summary of the contents of each book:— In the first book you will find everything that relates to hygiene, and to the preservation from, and correction of, distempers peculiar to the various ages, seasons, temperaments, and so forth; also the powers and uses of various topical articles of food, as is set forth in the chapter of contents. In the second is explained the whole doctrine of fevers, an account of certain matters relating to them being premised, such as excre-mentitious discharges, critical days, and other appearances, and concluding with certain symptoms which are the concomitants of fever. The third book relates to topical affections, beginning from the crown of the head, and descending down to the nails of the feet. The fourth book treats of those complaints which are external and exposed to view, and are not limited to one part of the body, but affect various parts. Also, of intestinal worms and dracunculi. The fifth treats of the wounds and bites of venomous animals; also of the distemper called hydrophobia, and of persons bitten by dogs which are mad; and also of persons bitten by men. Afterwards it treats of deleterious substances, and of the preservatives from them. In the sixth book is contained every thing relating to surgery, both what relates to the fleshy parts, such as the extraction of weapons, and to the bones, which comprehends fractures and dislocations. In the seventh is contained an account of the properties of all medicines, first of the simple, then of the compound, particularly of those which I had mentioned in the preceding six books, and more especially the greater, and, as it were, celebrated preparations; for I did not think it proper to treat of all these articles promiscuously, lest it should occasion confusion, but so that any person looking for one or more of the distinguished preparations might easily find it. Towards the end are certain things connected with the composition of medicines, and of those articles which may be substituted for one another, the whole concluding with an account of weights and measures." (Adams's Translation.) Of these books the sixth is the most valuable and interesting, and contains at the same time the most original matter. His reputation among the Arabians seems to have been very great, and it is said that he was especially consulted by midwives, whence he received the name of Al-bawadidi, or "the Acconcheur."

(Abi-l-Faraj, t. c.) He is said by the Arabic authorities to have written a work, "De Multorum Morbis," and another, "De Puerulorum Vindivi Ratione atque Curnatione." His great work was translated into Arabic by Honain Ibn Ishak, commonly called Joannitus. (See J. G. Weinrich, De Auctor. Graecor. Version, et Comment. Syriac. Arab. Armen. et Pers., Lips. 1842.) An account of the medical opinions of Paulus Aegineta may be found in Valerius de Mestra, Chirurg. vol. i., and Biblioth. Medic. Pract. vol. i.; in Sprengel's Hist. de la Méd. vol. i.; and especially in Freind's Hist. of Physic. vol. i. The Greek text has been twice published, Venet. 1528, fol. and Basil. 1538, fol. There are three Latin translations, which were published altogether nearly twenty times in the sixteenth century: 1. that by Alenus Torinus, Basil. 1532, fol.; 2. that by J. Guinierius Andracenus, Paris. 1532, fol.; and 3. that by Janus Corrarius, Basil. 1556, fol., which last translation is inserted by H. Stephens in his Medicae Artis Principes," Paris. 1567, fol. Separate editions have appeared in Latin of the first, second, sixth, and seventh books; and the sixth book has also been translated into French by Pierre Tolet, Lyons, 1539, 12mo. The whole work has been translated into English by Francis Adams, of Edinburgh, and published at Aberdeen, with a very copious and learned commentary, intended to furnish "a complete manual of the Surgery and Medicine of the Ancients, with a brief but comprehensive outline of the sciences intimately connected with them, especially Physiology, the Materia Medica, and Pharmacy." The first volume was published at London, 8vo, 1834, but this edition was never finished; of the second and improved edition, the first volume appeared in 1844, the second in 1846, and the third and last is expected to appear in the course of the present year, 1847, London, 8vo, "printed for the Sydenham Society." PAULUS, AEMILIUS. The annexed stemma exhibits all the persons of this name descended from the consul of B.C. 302. The only two sons that Paulus Macedonicus left were adopted into other gentes, and the family-name in consequence perished with him. It was, however, revived at a later period in the family of the Lepidi, who belonged to the same gens, and was first borne by L. Aemilius Paulus, the brother of the triumvir; but as this Aemilius and his descendants belonged to the family of the Lepidi, and not to that of the Pauli, they are inserted under the former head. [LEPIDUS, Nos. 16, 19, 22.]

1. M. Aemilius L. P. Paulus, consul B.C. 302 with M. Livius Denter, defeated near Thuriae the Lacedemonian Cleonymus, who was ravaging the coast of Italy with a Greek fleet. In the following year, B.C. 301, in which year there were no consuls, Paulus was magister equitum to the dictator Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus. While the dictator went to Rome for the purpose of renewing the suspicous, Aemilius was defeated in battle by the Etruscans. (Liv. x. 1—3.)

2. M. Aemilius M. P. L. N. Paulus, son of the preceding, was consul B.C. 255 with Ser. Fullius Paetinus Nobilius, about the middle of the first Punic war. The history of the expedition of these consuls to Africa, and of their shipwreck on their return, is given under NOBILIUS, No. 1.

3. L. Aemilius M. F. M. N. Paulus, son of No. 2, was consul the first time, B.C. 219, with M. Livius Salinator. He was sent against the Illyrians, who had risen again in arms under Demetrius of the island of Pharos in the Adriatic. Paulus conquered him without any difficulty; he took Pharos, reduced the strongholds of Demetrius, and compelled the latter to fly for refuge to Philip, king of Macedonia. For these services Paulus obtained a triumph on his return to Rome; but he was notwithstanding brought to trial along with his colleague M. Livius Salinator, on the plea that they had not fairly divided the booty among the soldiers. Salinator was condemned, and Paulus escaped with difficulty. (Polyb. iii. 16—19, iv. 57; Appian, Illyr. 3; Zonar. viii. 20; Liv. xxi. 33.) [DEMETRIUS, pp. 565, b., 566, a.]

In B.C. 216 Aemilius Paulus was consul a second time with C. Terentius Varro. This was the year of the memorable defeat at Cannae. [HAN- NIBAL, p. 336.] The battle was fought against the dominions of Paulus; and he was one of the many distinguished Romans who perished in the engagement, refusing to fly from the field, when a tribune of the soldiers offered him his horse. The heroism of his death is sung by Horace (Car. 1. 12):—

"animaeque magnae
Prodigum Paulum superante Poeno Gratus insigni referam Camena."

(Comp. Liv. xxii. 35—49; Polyb. iii. 107—116.)
Paulus was one of the Pontifices (Liv. xxiii. 21).
He was throughout his life a staunch adherent of the aristocracy, and was raised to his second consulship by the latter party to counterbalance the influence of the plebeian Terentius Varro. He maintained all the hereditary principles of his party, of which we have an instance in the circumstance related by Valerius Maximus. The senate always looked with suspicion upon the introduction of any new religious rites into the city, and accordingly gave orders in the (first) consulship of Paulus for the destruction of the shrines of Isis and Serapis, which had been erected at Rome. But when no workman dared touch the sacred buildings the consul threw aside his praetexta, or robe of office, seized a hatchet, and broke the doors of one of the temples. (Val. Max. i. 3. § 3).

4. L. AEMILIUS L. P. M. N. PAULUS, afterwards surnamed Macedonicus, was the son of No. 3, and the most distinguished member of his family. He was born about B.C. 230 or 229, since at the time of his second consulship, B.C. 168, he was upwards of sixty years of age. He was one of the best specimens of the high Roman nobles. He inherited all the aristocratical prejudices of his father, would not condescend to court and flatter the people for the offices of the state, maintained with strictness severe discipline in the army, was deeply skilled in the lore of the augurs, to whose college he belonged, and maintained throughout life a pure and unspotted character, notwithstanding the temptations to which his integrity was exposed on his conquest of Macedonia. His name is first mentioned in B.C. 194, when he was appointed one of the three commissioners for founding a colony at Croton. Two years afterwards, B.C. 192, he was elected curule aedile with M. Aemilius Lepidus, and possessed already so high a reputation that he carried his election against twelve competitors, all of whom are said to have obtained the consulship afterwards. His aedileship was distinguished for the zeal with which he prosecuted the pecunia. In the following year, B.C. 191, he was praetor, and obtained Further Spain as his province, whither he went with the title of proconsul. Here he had to carry on war with the Lusitani. At first he was unsuccessful, being defeated near Lyco, a town of the Bastetani, with a loss of 6000 of his men; but he subsequently retrieved this misfortune by gaining a great victory over the enemy, by which Spain was for a time rendered more tranquil. He returned to Rome in B.C. 189, and shortly afterwards became a candidate for the consulship. Several times, however, did he sue in vain for this honour (comp. Liv. xxxix. 32; Aur. Vict. de Vir. Ill. 56); and it was not till B.C. 182 that he obtained the consulship along with Cn. Baebius Tampilus. In the following year, B.C. 181, Paulus was sent against the Ingani, a Ligurian people, who possessed a considerable naval power, with which they were in the habit of plundering the merchant-vessels as far as the Atlantic. These people he entirely subdued, razed their fortifications, and carried off their shipping; and in consequence of his success he obtained a triumph on his return to Rome.

For the next thirteen years Aemilius Paulus lived quietly at Rome, devoting most of his time to the education of his children. During the latter part of this time Rome was at war with Persia, Aemilius Paulus was married twice. By his first wife, Papiria, the daughter of C. Papirius Maso, consul b.c. 231, he had four children, who are given in the preceding stanza. He afterwards divorced Papiria; and by his second wife, whose name is not mentioned, he had two sons, whose death has been mentioned above, and a daughter, who was a child at the time that her father was elected to his second consulship. [Aemilia, No. 3].

PAULUS, AVIDIE'NUS, a rhetorician mentioned by the elder Seneca (Controv. 17).

PAULUS CATENA, one of the ministers of the tyranny of the court under the emperor Constantius II. He was a natie either of Hispamia or Dacia (comp. Amm. Marc. xiv. 5, xv. 3), and held the office of notary. Ammianus describes him as a “smooth-faced” syconarch, who being sent into Britain, after the overthrow of Magnentius, treated the officers of the province with great cruelty, and enriched himself with their spoils. His cruelty provoked Martinus, pro-præfect of the province, whom he accused and thrown into fetters, to attempt his life; but the blow did not take effect. Paulus acquired his cognomen Catena, “the fetter,” from the skill with which he wound the chains of falsehood and calumny round his victims. After the death of Constantius, a.d. 361, Paul and some other of the ministers of his cruelty were burnt alive by order of Julian the Apostate. (Amm. Marc. ii. cc. and xxiii. 3.) [J. C. M.]

PAULUS, JULIUS, the brother of Claudius Civilis, who was the leader of the Batavi in their revolt from Rome, a.d. 69—70. On a false charge of treason Julius Paulus had been previously put to death by Nero’s legate, Fonteius Capito, in a. d. 67 or 68. (Tac. Hist. iv. 13, 82.)

[CIVILIS] PAULUS, JULIUS, one of the most distinguished of the Roman jurists, has been supposed, without any good reason, to be of Greek origin, and from a Phoenician town. Others conjecture that he was a native of Patavium (Padua), because there is a statue there, with an inscription, Paulus; but the statue and inscription may refer to another Paulus (Gellius, v. 4, xix. 7). Paulus was in the auditorium of Papinian (Dig. 29. tit. 2. s. 97; 49. tit. 14. s. 50), and consequently was acting as a jurist in the joint reigns of Septimius Severus and Antoninus Caracalla, and also during the reign of Caracalla. Paulus was exiled by Elagabalus, but he was recalled by Alexander Severus when he became emperor, and was made a member of his consilium (Aurel. Vict. De Caes. xxiv.; Lamprid. Alex. 23). Paulus also held the office of praefectus praetorio; he survived his contemporary Ulpian. In two passages of the Digest which have been already referred to, Paulus (Libro tertio Decretorum) speaks of two cases in which he gave an opinion contrary to Papinian, but the emperor decided according to Papinian’s opinion.

Paulus was perhaps the most fertile of all the Roman law writers, and there is more excerpted from him in the Digest than from any other jurist, except Ulpius. It is said that there are 2462 excerpts from Ulpius, in the Digest, and 2083 from Paulus, or 2800, according to Puchta (Carus, &c. vol. i. p. 438), which make about one sixth of the whole Digest. The excerpts from Paulus and Ulpius together make about one half of the Digest. Cervidius Senevola, Paulus, and Ulpius, are named by Modestinus (Dig. 27. tit. 2. s. 13. § 2), who was the last of the great jurists, τῶν ναύμων καρφωτόν: Paulus is honoured by Gordian with the title "prudentissimus" (Cod. 5. tit. 4. s. 6). It has been objected to him that his style is too condensed, and that he is sometimes obscure; but his style is as good as that of other writers of the period, though not so easy as that of Ulpius. Some writers have discovered something of Grecism in him, which is made an argument in favour of his Greek origin. The writings, like those of all the Roman jurists who are known to us only by excerpts, require a careful study, as we have the fragments detached from their context.

Paulus commented on Javolenus, Labeo, Salvius Julianus, C. Senevola, and Papinian. He is cited by Macer and Modestinus.

The writings of Paulus mentioned in the Florentine Index are the following: from some of which there is only a single excerpt or a few, and from some not one in the Digest. 1. His great work, Ad Edictum, in 80 books. 2. Quaestiones, in 26 books; both these works are commented on by Cujacius (Op. tom. v.). 3. Responsa, in 23 books. 4. Brevia, in 23 books. 5. Ad Plautium, in 18 books. 6. Libri ad Sabinium, in 16 books. 7. Ad Legem Jus. et Pap., in 10 books. 8. Regularia, in 7 books, and 9. Liber Singularis Regularium, both of which are excerpted in the Digest: the Index also mentions Regularia &c. 10. Sententiae sive Facta, in 6 books, but there is no excerpt in the Digest; and this work is conjectured to be the same as the Libri Imperialium Sententiarum, which are mentioned afterwards in this article. 11. Sententiar. Libri quingue, dedicated to his son; this work was used in the Visigoth collection called the Breviarium, where it is divided into titles, and called Sententiae Receputae, a name which may have been given to it on account of its importance, and in consequence of the sanction of Constantine and Valentinian. 12. Ad Vitellium, in 4 books. 13. Ad Neratium, in 4 books. 14. Fideicommissa, in 3 books. 15. Decretorum Libri III., of which it is conjectured that the Decretorum Libri sex, or Imperialium Sententiarum in Cognitibuss probaturum Libri sex, or Sententias sive Decretarum, may be a second edition. 16. De Adulteriis, in 3 books. 17. Libri trea Manualium. 18. Institutiones, in 2 books, from which there is a fragment in Appendix to Dig. 19. Of Decretal Points. Lib. 2 (ad c. 19.) 20. De Oficio Proconsul. in 2 books. 21. Ad Legem Aedilium Sententia, in 3 books. 22. Ad Legem Julianam, in 2 books: there is only a single excerpt in the Digest (48. tit. 9. s. 15). 22. De Jure Fisci, in 2 books: there is only one excerpt from this work (Dig. 34. tit. 9. s. 5). 23. Regularia Liber Singularis, which has been already referred to. 24. De Censibus, in 2 books, written in the time of Elagabalus (Dig. 50. tit. 15. s. 8).

All the following treatises were in single books:
—1. De Poenis Pagatorum. 2. De Poenis Milit. 3. De Poenis omnium Legum. 4. De Usuris. 5. De Gradibus et Affinibus: Cujacius (Op. tom. iii. Obscr. vi. c. 40) says that "a person worthy of credit, into whose hands this book had come entire, had affirmed that this work was almost entirely given in the 10th fragment De Gradibus" (Dig. 38. tit. 10): which, if true, shows that many of these single treatises were no more than chapters. 6. De Jure Codicillorum. 7. De Ex- cussionibus Tuteiarum (Vat. Frag. § 216). 8. Ad Regulam Catoniam. 9. Ad Set. Orfitianum. 10. Ad Set. Tertullianum. 11. Ad Set. Silvanium. 12. Ad Set. Vellicianum. 13. Ad Set. Libionianum, seu Claudianum; thus it stands in the Index. 14. De Officio Praefecti Vigilium. 15. De Officio Praefecti Urbii. 16. De Officio Praetorious Tuteiarum: there is no excerpt from this work in the Digest, but there are two excerpts in the Fragmenta Vaticana, §§ 244, 245. 17. De extraordinariis Criminalibus: there is no excerpt in the Digest. 18. Hypothecatoria, which should be Ad Hypothecorum: there is no excerpt in the Digest. 19. Ad Municipalibus: there is no excerpt in the Digest, but there is an excerpt in the Fragmenta Vaticana, § 237, the commencement of which is also in the Digest (27. tit. 1. s. 46. § 1), but it is cited from the Liber de Cognitionibus: there is also another excerpt in the Fragmenta Vaticana, § 243. 20. De Publicis Judiciis. 21. De Inofficioso Testamento. 22. De Septemviralibus Judiciis, which, as has been suggested by Gronovius, 'should doubtless be De Centumviralibus Judiciis. 23. De Jure Singul. 24. De Secundis Tabulis. 25. Ad Orationem D. Severi. 26. Ad Orationem D. Marci. 27. Ad Legem Velleitiam: there is no excerpt in the Digest. 28. Ad Legem Cinciam. 29. Ad Legem Puteatiam. 30. De tactio Fideicommissis. 31. De Portionibus quae Liberis Domanorum conceduntur. 32. De Juris et Pacti Ignorantia. 33. De Adulteriis (Dig. 48. tit. 16, et al). 34. There are excerpts from the Trea Libri de Adulteriis, which lead to the inference that there may be some error as to the Liber Singularis de Adulteriis. 34. De Instructo et Instrumento. 35. De Appellationibus: there is no excerpt from this work in the Digest. 36. De Jure Libellorum. 37. De Testamentis, by which is intended the Liber de Forma Testamenti (Dig. 32. s. 98). 38. De Jure Patronatus. 39. De Jure Patronatus quod ex Leg. Julia et Lapis vent. 40. De Actionibus. 41. De Concurrentibus Actionibus. 42. De Intercussionibus Femaninoribus: which is conjectured by Zimmer to be the same as the Ad Set. Velleianum. 43. De Donationibus inter Virum et Uxorem. 44. De Legibus. 45. De Legitimis Hereditatibus: there are no excerpts from the three last works in the Digest. 46. De Libertatibus dann. 47. De Senatus Consultis.

The Index does not contain the following works, unless it is mentioned, they ought to stand in place of some of the works which are named in the Index, and from which there are no excerpts:—
1. Libri ad Edictum Aedil. Curcul. 2. The excerpts from Alfenus and Labeo. 3. Libri de Oficio Consulat. 4. And the following Libri Singulares: De Liberati Causa, De Articulis Liberalis Causae (which seems to be the same work), De Asignatione Liberi- torum, De Conceptione Formularum, De Dotis Petitione, Ad Legem Fusian Caminiam, De Oficios Assessorum, Ad Set. Turpilianum, De Varia Lectionibus, and De Cognitionibus; and the notes to Julian, Papinian, and Senevola, which last, however, are merely cited. There is also a passage in the PAUSANIAS.

Fragmenta Vaticana, § 247, from the Lib. I. Editionis secundae de Jurisdictione singulari.

The enumeration of the works of Paulus is not made merely for the sake of completeness. To those who are conversant with the matter of jurisprudence it may aid with his wonderful fertility and the great variety of subjects on which he was employed. Cujacius has devoted to the Libri ad Edictum and the Quaestiones of Paulus the whole of the fifth volume of his works (ed. Neap. 1758), except a few pages, which are upon the Differentiae of Modestius. The sixth volume of the same edition contains the Recitationes Sollemnes of Cujacius (A. d. 1558) on the Responsa of Paulus. The first volume of Cujacius contains the Interpretationes in Jutili Pauli Receptarum Sententiarum Librorum quinque. The industry of Paulus must have been unremittent, and the extent of his legal learning is proved by the variety of his labours. Perhaps no legal writer, ancient or modern, has handled so many subjects, if we except his great commentator. (Grotius, Viteae Jurisconsultorum; Cujacius, Op. 4. Neap. 1758; Zimmerm, Geschicht des Romischen Privatrechts, 307, &c.; Paulus, Receptae Sententiae cum Interpretatione Vieguthorum, ed. L. Arndts, Bonn, 1833.)

PAULUS, PASSIENUS, a contemporary and friend of the younger Pliny, was a distinguished Roman eques, and was celebrated for his elegiac and lyric poems. He belonged to the same municipium (Mevania in Umbria) as Propertius, whom he numbered among his ancestors. Pliny bestows the most unbounded praises upon the character, life, and poems of Passienus. An anecdote which Pliny relates respecting the jurist Javolenus Priscus and Paulus has given rise to much discussion, of which some account will be found under Javolenus. (Plin. Ep. vi. 13, vii. 6, ix. 22.)

PAULUS, SERGIUS I. SERGIUS PAULUS, proconsul (Δημοκράτης) of Cyprus, whom the Apostle Paul converted to Christianity (Acts, xiii. 7). He is not mentioned by any other writer; but he may have been the father of the Sergius next mentioned.

2. L. SERGIUS PAULUS, one of the consuls subjecti in a. d. 94 (Fasti).

PAVOR, that is, Fear or Terror, was, together with Pallor or Paleness, a companion of Mars among the Romans. Their worship was believed to have been instituted by Tullius Hostilius during a plague, or at a critical moment in a battle. Their worship was attended to by Sali. called Pallorit and Pavorit. (Liv. i. 27; Aug. De Civ. Dei, iv. 15, 29; Stat. Thcb. iii. 425; Val. Flacc. iii. 89; Claudian, in Rufin. i. 544.)

PAUSANIAS, historical. 1. A Spartan of the Agid branch of the royal family, the son of Cleombrotus and nephew of Leonidas (Thuc. i. 94; Herod. ix. 10). His mother's name was Alcathia or Alethia (Schol. ad Thuc. i. 134; Schol. ad Aristoph. Equit. i. 84; Suidas calls her A'γγελα; Polyean. viii. 51, Theano). Several writers (Arist. Politi. v. i. § 5, vii. 13, § 13; Plut. Consol. ad Apollon. p. 182; Dem. in Neuer. § 97, p. 1378, ed. Reiske; Suidas, s. v. Παύσανιας, &c.) incorrectly call him king (Pans. iii. 4, § 9); he only succeeded his father Cleombrotus in the guardianship of his cousin Pleistarchus, the son of Leonidas, for whom he exercised the functions of royalty from c. 479 to the period of his death (Thuc. i. 94, 132; Herod. ix. 10). In c. 479, when the Athenians called upon the Lacedaemonians for aid against the Persians, the Spartans, after some delay won the motives for which Bishop Thrilwall, Hist. of Greece, vol. ii. p. 327, &c., has thrown considerable light), sent a body of five thousand Spartans, each attended by seven Helots, under the command of Pausanias. From Herodotus (ix. 53) it appears that Euryanax, the son of Dorieus, was associated with him as commander. At the Isthmus Pausanias was joined by the other Peloponnesian allies, and at Eleusis by the Athenians, and forthwith took the command of the combined forces (Thuc. i. 130; Herod. viii. 3; Paus. iii. 14. § 1; the words ηγεμονία and ηγείονται imply this), the other Greek generals forming a sort of council of war (Herod. ix. 50). The allied forces then crossed Cithæron, and at Erythme Pausanias halted and formed his line on the skirts of the mountain, his forces amounting to nearly 110,000 men. Here they were assailed by the Persians, and the young Masius, who were repulsed after the Athenians had reinforced the Megareans, who were being hard pressed (Olympiodorus), and Masius had fallen. For the purpose of being better supplied with water, Pausanias now descended into the territory of Plataeæ, and posted his army on the banks of a small stream, which Herodotus calls the Asopus, and which was probably one of its tributaries. Mardonius drew up his forces on the opposite bank of the stream. After a delay of ten days, during which the armies were kept inactive by the unfavourable reports of the soothsayers, Mardonius resolved to attack the Greeks. Information of his intention was conveyed by night to the Greeks by Alexander of Macedon. Accordingly, the next day the Persian cavalry made a vigorous attack upon the Greeks, and gained possession of the Gargaphian spring, on which the Greeks depended for their supply of water; and as there seemed no likelihood of a general engagement that day, Pausanias, with the concurrence of the allied generals, resolved to remove nearer to Plataeæ. This was done in the course of the ensuing night. On the following day the great battle of Plataeæ took place. The Persian forces were speedily routed and their camp stormed, where a terrible carnage ensued. The Spartans were judged to have fought most bravely in the battle, and among them, according to Diodorus (xi. 33), Pausanias was selected as having acquitted himself most valiantly. But Herodotus makes no mention of his name in this connection. An Aeginetan urged Pausanias to revenge the mutilation of Leonidas, by impaling the corpse of Mardonius; an advice which Pausanias rejected with abhorrence. Pausanias gave directions that all the spoil should be left to be collected by the Helots. Ten samples of all that was most valuable in this booty were presented to Pausanias. Herodotus has preserved a story, that, to exhibit the contrast between their modes of living, Pausanias ordered the Persian slaves to prepare a banquet similar to what they commonly prepared for Mardonius, and then directed his Helots to place by the side of it a Laconian dinner; and, laughing, bade the Greek generals observe the folly of the leader of the Medes, who, while able to live in such style, had come to rob the Greeks of their scanty stores. (Herod. ix. 10—85; Diod. xi. 29—33.)

As to the generalship of Pausanias in this action, Bishop Thirlwall remarks (Hist. of Greece, vol. ii. p. 332): "Whether Pausanias committed any considerable faults as a general, is a question still more open to controversy than similar cases in modern warfare. But at least it seems clear that he followed, and did not direct or control events, and that he was for a time on the brink of ruin, from which he was delivered more by the rashness of the barbarians than by his own prudence. In the critical moment, however, he displayed the firmness, and if, as appears manifest, the soothsayer was his instrument, the ability of a commander equal to the juncture."

Immediately after the battle a formal confederacy was entered into, on the proposition of Aristides (Plut. Arist. 21). The contingents which the allies were to maintain for carrying on the war against the barbarians, were fixed; deputies were to be sent from all the states of Greece every year to Plataea, to deliberate on their common interests, and celebrate the anniversary of the battle; and every fifth year a festival, to be called the Feast of Liberty, was to be celebrated at Plataea, the inhabitants of which place were declared inviolable and independent. It is this treaty which Thucydides calls τὰς παλαίς Παυσανίων μετὰ τῶν Μῆδων συνομήδας (Thuc. iii. 68, comp. ii. 71). Before the Greek forces withdrew, Pausanias led them to attack Thebes, and demanded the surrender of those who had been traitors to the cause of Greece. After a siege of twenty days, Timagenidas and Attagignias, who had been the leaders of the Median party, consented to be delivered up. The latter, however, made his escape. Pausanias dismissed his family unharmed; but the rest who were delivered up he had conveyed to Corinth and put to death there without any form of trial—"the first indication that appears of his imperious character" (Herod. ix. 88; Diod. xi. 33). It was speedily followed by another. On the tripod dedicated by the Greeks at Delphi from the spoil taken from the Medes he had the following inscription engraved:

'Ελληνων ἀρχηγός ἐνεπικράτων ἀληθῶν Μῆδων, Παυσανίας φίλε ἐμήν ἀνθέθηκε τὸδε.

The inscription was afterwards obliterated by the Lacedaemonians, and the names of the states which joined in effecting the overthrow of the barbarian substituted (Thuc. i. 132; Dem. in Neoteram, p. 1378, ed. Reiske; Corn. Nepos, Pass. 1; Herod. viii. 82). Simonides, with whom Pausanias seems to have been on terms of intimacy (Aelian, Var. Hist. ix. 41), was the composer of the elegy. (Paus. iii. 8. § 2.)

In B. C. 477 (see the discussion by Clinton On the Athenian Empire, Fasti Hellen. vol. ii. p. 248, &c.) the confederate Greeks sent out a fleet under the command of Pausanias, to follow up their success by driving the Persians completely out of Europe and the islands. Cyprus was first attacked, and the greater part of it subdued. From Cyprus Pausanias sailed to Byzantium, and captured the city (Thuc. i. 94). It was probably as a memorial of this conquest that he dedicated to Poseidon in a temple on the Thracian Bosporus, at a place called Exampooe, the bowl mentioned by Herodotus (iv. 81), the inscription on which is preserved by Athenaeus (xii. 9, p. 536, a. b.). It does not distinctly appear what could have induced Justin (ix. 1) to call Pausanias the founder of Byzantium (a statement which is repeated by Isidorus, Origines, xv. 1. § 42); though if, as Justin says, Pausanias held possession of the city for seven years, he may have had opportunities for effecting such alterations in the city and the government as nearly to have remodelled both, and the honours usually accorded to founders may have been conferred on him by the Byzantines.

The capture of Byzantium afforded Pausanias an opportunity for commencing the execution of the design which he had apparently formed even before leaving Greece. Dazzled by his success and reputation, his station as a Spartan citizen had become too restricted for his ambition. His position as regent was one which must terminate when the king became of age. As a tyrant over, not Sparta merely, but the whole of Greece (ἀρχισυνόρητος Ἑλληνικός ἀρχηγός, Thuc. i. 128), supported by the power of the Persian king, he hoped that the reward of his treachery to Greece would be ample enough to satisfy his overweening pride and arrogance.

Among the prisoners taken at Byzantium were some Persians connected with the royal family. These Pausanias, by the aid of Gongylus, whom he had made governor of Byzantium, sent to the king without the knowledge of the other allies, giving out that they had made their escape. Gongylus repeated them, and was the bearer of a letter from Pausanias to the king, in which the former offered to bring Sparta and the rest of Greece under his power, and proposed to marry his daughter (Herodotus, v. 32, mentions that he had proposed to marry the daughter of Megabates). He at the same time requested Xerxes to send some trusty person to the coast to treat with him. Xerxes sent Artabazus with a letter thanking Pausanias for the release of the prisoners, and offering him whatever amount of troops and money he required for accomplishing his designs. (According to Plutarch, Parall. 10, he actually received 500 talents of gold from the king.) Pausanias now set no bounds to his arrogant and domineering temper. He treated the allies with harshness and injustice, made himself difficult of access, and conducted himself so angrily and violently towards all alike, that no one could come near him; and with a rashness that even exceeded his arrogance assumed the dress and state of a Persian satrap, and even journeyed through Thrace with the army of Persians and Egyptians. The allies were so disgusted by this conduct, especially as contrasted with that of Cinon and Aristides, that they all, except the Peloponnesians and Aeginetans, voluntarily offered to transfer to the Athenians that precedence of rank which Sparta had hitherto enjoyed. In this way the Athenian confederacy first took its rise. Reports of the conduct and designs of Pausanias reached Sparta, and he was recalled; and as the allies refused to obey Dorcis, who was sent in his place, the Spartans declined to take any farther share in the operations against the Persians. Pausanias, on reaching Sparta, was put upon his trial, and convicted of various offences against individuals; but the evidence respecting his meditated treachery and Medism was not yet thought sufficiently strong. He however, without the orders of the ephors, sailed in a vessel of Hermone, as though with the intention of taking part in the war, and, returning to Byzantium, which was still in the hands of Gongylus, renewed his treacherous intrigues. According to Plutarch (Citizen, c. 6; comp. Moral. p. 555, b.), the immediate occasion of his expulsion from the city was an atrocious injury offered to a family of distinction in Byzantium, with which he ended in the tragic death of the victim of his lust and cruelty, at which the allies were so incensed, that they called upon the Athenians to expel him. He did not return to Sparta, but went to Colomne in the Troas, where he again entered into communication with the Persians. Having received an imperious recall to Sparta, and not thinking his plans sufficiently matured to enable him to bid defiance to the ephors, he returned at their command, and on his arrival was thrown into prison. He was, however, soon set at liberty; and, trusting to the influence of money, offered himself for trial. Still all the suspicious circumstances which were collected and compared with respect to his present and previous breaches of established customs did not seem sufficient to warrant the ephors in proceeding to execute their threat of a punishment with rashness. But even after this second escape Pausanias could not rest. He opened an intrigue with the Helots (comp. Arist. Politi. v. 1, 7), promising them freedom and the rights of citizenship, if they would rise and overthrow the government. But even when these designs were betrayed by some of the Helots, the ephors were still reluctant to act upon this information. Accident, however, soon furnished them with decisive evidence. Pausanias was still carrying on his intrigues with Persia. A man named Argillus, who was charged with a letter to Artaxerxes, having his suspicions awakened by noticing that none of those sent previously on similar errands had returned, counterfeited the seal of Pausanias and opened the letter, in which he found directions for his own death. He carried the letter to the ephors, and, in accordance with a plan suggested by himself, took refuge in the temple of Poseidon at Tenedos, in a hut which he divided by a partition, behind which he placed some of the ephors. Pausanias, as he expected, came to inquire the reason of his placing himself here as a suppliant. Argillus reproached him with his ungrateful disregard of his past services, and contrived that the ephors should hear from the lips of Pausanias himself the admission of his various intrigues with the barbarian. Upon this the ephors prepared to arrest him in the street as he returned to Sparta. But, warned by a friendly signal from one of the ephors, and guessing from the looks of another the purpose for which they were coming, he fled and took refuge in the temple of Athene Chalcioe, establishing himself for shelter in a building attached to the temple. The ephors, having watched for a time when he was inside, intercepted him, stripped off the roof, and proceeded to build up the door; the aged mother of Pausanias being said to have been among the first who laid a stone for this purpose. When he was on the point of expiring, the ephors took him out lest his death should pollute the sanctuary. He died as soon as he got outside. It was at first proposed to cast his body into the Caedus; but that proposal was overruled, and he was buried in the neighbourhood of the temple. Subsequently, by the direction of the Delphic oracle, his body was removed and buried at the spot where he died; and to atone to the goddess for the loss of her suppliant, two brazen statues were dedicated in her temple. (Thuc. i. 94, 95, 128—134; Diod. xi. 44, 45; Nepos, Paus. 5; Suidas, s. v. Haeor.; Polyv. viii. 51.) According to Plutarch (de serva triumvirum Vindicta, p. 560), an oracle directed the Spartans to propitiate the soul of Pausanias, for which purpose they brought necromancers from Italy. As to the date of the death of Pausanias, we only know that it must have been later than B. C. 471, when Themistocles was banished, for Themistocles was living in Argos at the time when Pausanias communicated to him his plans (Plut. Themist. p. 123), and before n. c. 466, when Themistocles took refuge in Asia. The accounts of the death of Pausanias given by Nepos, Aelian, and others, differ, and are doubtless erroneous, in some particulars.

Pausanias left three sons behind him, Pleistoanax (afterwards king; Thuc. i. 107, 114), Cleomenes (Thuc. iii. 20), and Aristocles (Thuc. v. 16). From a notice in Plutarch (Apopth. p. 239, c.) it has been concluded that on one occasion Pausanias was a victor at the Olympic games. But the passage may refer merely to his success at Plateae, having been publicly announced by way of honour at the games.

The character and history of Pausanias furnish a remarkable exemplification of some of the leading features and faults of the Spartan character and constitution. His pride and arrogance were not very different either in kind or in degree from that commonly exhibited by his countrymen. The selfish ambition which appears in him as an individual Spartan appears as characteristic of the national policy of Sparta throughout her whole history; nor did Sparta usually show herself more scrupulous in the choice of means for attaining her ends than Pausanias. Sparta never exhibited any remarkable fidelity to the cause of Greece, except when identical with her own immediate interests; and at a subsequent period of her history appears with the aid of Persia in a position that bears considerable analogy to that which Pausanias designed to occupy. If these characteristics appear in Pausanias in greater degree, their exaggeration was but a natural result of the influence of that position in which he was placed, so calculated to foster and stimulate ambition, and so little likely ultimately to supply it with a fair field for legitimate exertion.

2. Son of Pleistoanax, and grandson of the preceding. He succeeded to the throne on the banishment of his father (n. c. 444), being placed under the guardianship of his uncle Cleomenes. He accompanied the latter, at the head of the Lacedaemonian army, in the invasion of Attica, n. c. 427. (Thuc. iii. 26.) We next hear of him in n. c. 403, when Lysander, with a large body of troops, was blockading Thrasylus and his associates in Peiraeus. The king, the ephors, and many of the leading men in Sparta, being jealous of the increasing influence of Lysander, a plan was concerted for baffling his designs. Pausanias was sent at the head of an army into Attica, professedly to assist Lysander, but in reality to counteract his plans. He accordingly encamped near Peiraeus. The besieged, not knowing his intentions, attacked him as he was ostensibly reconnoitring the ground to make preparations for a circumvallation. He defeated the assailants with some slaughter, but did not follow up his victory, and secretly sent a message to the besieged. At his suggestion a deputation was sent by them to himself and the ephors, an armistice was concluded with the exiles, and their deputies were sent to Sparta to plead their cause. The result was, that fifteen commissioners were appointed, in conjunction with Pausanias, to settle the differences of the two Athenian parties. An amnesty was published, including all but the thirty tyrants, the Eleven, and the Ten who had been governors of Peiraeus. Pausanias then disbanded his forces (Xen. Hellen. ii. 4. § 28—39; Paus. iii. 5. § 1; Plut. Lyssand. c. 21). On his return to Sparta, however, the opposite party brought him to trial before a court consisting of the gerontes, the ephors, and the other king Agis. Fourteen of the gerontes, with king Agis, voted for his condemnation; the rest acquitted him. (Paus. iii. 5. § 2.)

In b.c. 395, when hostilities broke out between Phocis and Thebes, and the former applied to Sparta, war was decreed against Thebes, and Lysander was sent into Phocis, to raise all the forces he could in that quarter. Pausanias was to join him on an appointed day with the Peloponnesian troops. These collected so slowly, that when Lysander with the troops which he had raised reached Haliartus, Pausanias had not arrived. A battle ensued under the walls of Haliartus, in which Lysander was slain. Next day Pausanias reached the spot, but the arrival of an Athenian army rendered him unwilling to engage. A council of war was held, in which it was decided that application should be made for permission to carry away the dead bodies of those who had been slain in the late engagement. This was only granted on condition that Pausanias should withdraw his forces from Boeotia; and these terms were accepted. On his return to Sparta, Pausanias was impeached, and, besides his conduct on this last occasion, his leniency to Thrasybulus and his party at Peiraeus was again brought up against him; and Pausanias, seeing that a fair trial was not to be hoped for, went into voluntary exile, and was condemned to death. He sought shelter in the sanctuary of Athene Alea at Tegae, and was still living here in b.c. 335, when Mantinea was besieged by his son Agesipolis, who succeeded him on the throne. Pausanias, who had friendly relations with the leading men of Mantinea, interceded with his son on behalf of the city. (Xen. Hellen. iii. 5. § 17—25, v. 2. § 3—6; Paus. iii. 5. § 3—7; Plut. Lyssand. c. 51.) Dio- dorus (xiv. 17) erroneously substitutes Pausanias for Agis in connection with the quarrel between the Lacedaemonians and Eleans.

3. An Athenian of the Attic Dem outgoing, celebrated for his amorous propensities towards those of his own sex, and for his attachment to the poet Agathon. Both Plato (Convivium, p. 176, a., 180, c. ; comp. Prolag, p. 315, d.) and Xenophon (Convivium, 8. § 32) introduce him. It has been supposed that Pausanias was the author of a separate erotic treatise; but Atheneaus (v. p. 216) affirms that no treatise of the kind existed.

4. A son or brother of Derdas. (Schol. ad Thuc. i. 61.) He appears among the antagonists of king Perdiccas.

5. King of Macedonia, the son and successor of Aeropus. He was assassinated in the year of his accession by Amyntas II., b. c. 394. (Diod. xiv. 82, 84.)

COIN OF PAUSANIAS, KING OF MACEDONIA.

6. A pretender to the throne of Macedonia. According to the scholast on Aeschines (p. 754, ed. Reiske), he belonged to the royal family. He made his appearance in b. c. 358, after Alexander II., the son of Amyntas II., had been assassinated by Ptolemaeus; and, being supported by numerous adherents, gained possession of several towns. Eurydice, the widow of Amyntas, sent to request the aid of the Athenian general, Iphicrates, who expelled Pausanias from the kingdom. (Aeschines, de falsa Leg. c. 23, p. 31, ed. Steph.; Corn. Nepos, Iphicr. c. 3.)

7. A Macedonian youth of distinguished family, from the province of Orestis. He was one of the body-guard of king Philip, who, on account of his beauty, was much attached to him. Perceiving himself in danger of being supplanted in the affection of Philip by a rival also called Pausanias, he, in the most opprobrious manner, assailed the latter, who complained to his friend Attalus, and soon after perished in battle with the Illyrians. Attalus contrived to take the most odious revenge on Pausanias, who complained of the outrage to Philip. But, apparently on account of his relationship to Attalus, and because he needed his services, Philip declined to inflict any punishment on Attalus. Pausanias accordingly directed his vengeance against Philip himself. An opportunity presented itself at the festival held by Philip at Aegae, as, in a magnificent procession, Philip approached, having directed his guards to keep at a distance, as though on such an occasion he had no need of them. Pausanias rushed forwards from the crowd, and, drawing a large Celtic sword from beneath his dress, plunged it into the king's side. The murderer forthwith rushed towards the gates of the town, where horses were ready for him. He was, however, closely pursued by some officers of the king's guard, and, having stumbled and fallen, was dispatched by them on the spot. Suspicions rested on Olympias and Alexander of having been privy to the deed. According to Justin, it was Olympias who provided the horses for the flight of Pausanias; and when his corpse was crucified she placed a crown of gold upon the head, caused the body to be burnt over the remains of her husband, and erected a monument to him in the same place, and even instituted yearly rites in memory of him. The sword with which he had assassinated the king she dedicated to Apollo. The suspicion with regard to Alexander is probably totally unfounded. There was likewise a story that Pausanias, while meditating revenge, having asked the sophist Hermocrates which was the shortest way to fame, the latter replied, that it was by killing the man who had performed the greatest achievements. These occurrences took place in b.c. 336. (Diod. xvi. 93, 94; Justin. ix. 6, 7; Plut. Alex. c. 9, 10.)

8. An officer in the service of Alexander. On the capture of Sardes he was appointed to the command of the citadel. (Arrian, i. 17, § 8.)

9. A native of Thessaly, with whom the celebrated Laís fell in love. [Laís.]

10. According to some accounts (Paus. ii. 33, § 4), the assassinaker of Harpalus [Harpalus], was a man named Pausanias. [C. P. M.]

PAUSANIAS (Pausanias), the author of the 'Ελλάδος Περιηγήσεως, has been supposed to be a native of Lydия. The passage in which this opinion is founded is in his own work (v. 13, § 7). The time when he travelled and lived is fixed approximately by the latest passages in which Roman emperors whom he mentions are Antoninus Pius, whom he calls the former Antoninus (vii. 43, § 1), and his successor Marcus Antoninus, whom he calls the second Antoninus (viii. 43, § 6). He alludes to Antoninus leaving Marcus for his successor, and to the defeat of the Germans and Sarmatians by Marcus. The great battle with the Quadi took place A. D. 174. (Dion Cass. lxxi. 8.) Aurelius was again engaged in hostilities with the Sarmatians, Quadi, and other barbarians, in A. D. 179, but as he died in A. D. 180, and Pausanias does not mention his death, probably he refers to his earlier campaigns. He was therefore writing his eighth book after A. D. 174. In a passage in the seventh book (20, § 6) he says that he had not described the Οδειον of Herodes in his account of Attica (lib. i.), because it was not then built. Herodes was a contemporary of Pius and Marcus, and died in the latter part of the reign of Marcus.

The Itinerary of Pausanias, which is in ten books, contains a description of Attica and Megara (i.), Corinthia, Sicenia, Phliasia, and Argolis (ii.), Laconia (iii.), Messenia (iv.), Elis (v. vi.), Achaea (vii.), Arcadia (viii.), Boeotia (ix.), Phocis (x.). His work shows that he visited most of the places in these divisions of Greece, a fact which is clearly demonstrated by the minuteness and particularity of his description. But he also travelled much in other countries. A passage in the eighth book (46, § 4, 5) appears to prove that he had been at Rome, and another passage (x. 21, § 1) is still more to the purpose. He speaks of seeing a hymn of Pindarus on a triangular stele in the temple of the Libyan Ammon, near the altar which Ptolemaeus, the son of Lagus, dedicated to Ammon (ix. 16, § 1). He also visited Delos (ix. 40, § 5), as we infer from his mode of description, which is exactly like that of Herodotus in similar cases: "the Delians have a wooden statue (στάσον) of Apro- diote, of no great size, which has lost the left hand by reason of age, and it terminates in a quadrangular form instead of feet." It is probable that he also visited Syria and Palestine, for he contrasts the byssus that grew in Eleia with the byssus of the Hebrews (v. 5, § 2). He must of course have visited a great number of places which lay between the extreme points which have been mentioned. Nothing is known of Pausanias except what we learn from his own book.

The Periegesis is merely an Itinerary. Pausanias gives no general description of a country or even of a place, but he describes the things which come to them. His account is minute, but it mainly refers to objects of antiquity, and works of art, such as buildings, temples, statues, and pictures. He also mentions mountains, rivers, and fountains, and the mythological stories connected with them, which indeed are his chief inducements to speak of them. His religious feeling was strong, and his belief sure, for he tells many old legends in true good faith and seriousness. His style has been much condemned by modern critics, some of whom consider it a sample of what has been called the Asiatic style. Some even go so far as to say that his words are wrongly placed, and that it seems as if he tried to make his meaning difficult to discover. But if we except some corrupt passages, and if we allow that his order of words is not that of the best Greek writers, there is hardly much obscurity to a person who is competently acquainted with Greek, and it appears sometimes is owing to the matter. He makes no attempt at ornament; when he speaks of the noble works of art that he saw, thevery brevity and simplicity with which he describes many beautiful things, present them to us in a more lively manner than the description of a connoisseur, who often thinks more about rounding a phrase than about the thing which he affects to describe. With the exception of Herodotus, there is no writer of antiquity, and perhaps none of modern times, who has comprehended so many valuable facts in a small volume. The work of Pausanias is full of matter mythological, historical, and artistic; nor does he neglect matters physical and economical. His remarks on earthquakes (vii. 24), on the soft stone full of sea shells (Αλίβονα χέριτι) used in the buildings of Megara, on the byssus above referred to, and the worm of silk worn (vi. 26), show the minuteness of his observation.

When the Pausanias struck with the fact (vii. 21, § 14) that the females were double the number of the males; which is explained by the circumstance that the greater part of them got their living by making head-gear, and weaving cloth from the byssus of Eleia. He has thus preserved a valuable record of the growth and establishment of manufacturing industry in a small Greek town in the second century of our era.

When Pausanias visited Greece, it was not yet despoiled of all the great works of art. The country was still rich in the memorials of the unrivalled genius of the Greeks. Pausanias is not a critic or connoisseur in art, and what is better, he does not pretend to be one; he speaks of a thing just as he saw it, and in detail. His description of the works of Polygnotus at Delphi (x. 25—31), the paintings in the Poecile at Athens (i. 15), the treasures of art collected in Elis (v. vi.), among which was the Jupiter of Pheidias (v. 10), are valuable records, simply because they are plain facts. Greece was still richer in sculpture at the time of his visit than in painting, and he describes works of all the great Greek sculptors, both in marble and in bronze; nor does he omit to mention the memorials of the archaic style which were still religiously preserved in the temples of Greece.

The first edition of Pausanias was printed at Venice, 1516, fol., by Aldus, but it is very incorrect. Xylander (Holzmann) commenced an edition, which was finished by Sylvburg, and appeared with the Latin version of Romolo Amaseo, at Frankfurt, in 1583, fol., and at Pisa, 1613. The editions of Küchen, Leipzig, 1686, fol., also contains the Latin version of Romolo Amaseo, which was first published at Rome in 1547, 4to.
PAUSIAS.

The edition of C. G. Siebelis, Leipzig, 1822—1828, 5 vols. 8vo, has an improved text, and the corrected version of Amaseo, with a copious commentary and index. The edition of Imm. Bekker, Berlin, 1826—7, 2 vols. 8vo, is founded solely on the Paris MS. 1410, and the few deviations from the text are noted by the editor; there is a very good index to this edition. The latest edition is by J. H. C. Schubart and C. Walz, Leipzig, 1838—40, 3 vols. 8vo. There is a French translation by Clavier, with the Greek text collated after the Paris MSS, Paris, 1814, &c, 6 vols. 8vo. The latest German translation is by E. Wiedersch, Munich, 1826—29, 4 vols. 8vo. There is an English translation by Thomas Taylor, the translator of Plato and Aristotle, which in some passages is very incorrect.

PAUSANIAS (Παυσανίας). 1. A commentator on Heracleitus, hence surnamed 'Hρακλειστής.
(Diog. Laërt. ix. 15.)

2. A Lacedaemonian historian, who, according to Suidas (s. v.), wrote Περὶ Ἑλλησποντίων, Δακι-νικά, χρονικά, περὶ Αἰσθήτων, περὶ τῶν ἐν Ἀ-κωνίῳ ἔργασιν. He is probably the author referred to by Aelian and Arrian (Tactic. c. 1) as having written on the subject of Tactics. [W. M. G.]

PAUSANIAS (Παυσανίας), the name of two Greek physicians.

1. A native of Sicily in the fifth century B.C., who belonged to the family of the Asclepiadai, and whose father's name was Anchitus. He was an intimate friend of Empedocles, who dedicated to him his poem on Nature. (Diog. Laërt. viii.
2. § 60 ; Suidas, s. v. 'Ἀντώνος ; Galen, De Med. Med. i. 1. vol. x. p. 6.) There is extant a Greek epigram on this Pausanias, which is attributed in the Greek Anthology to Simonides (vii. 508), but by Diogenes Laërtius (L. c.) to Empedocles. The latter opinion appears to be more probable, as he could hardly be known to Simonides, who died B.C. 467. It is also doubtful whether he was born, or buried, at Gela in Sicily, as in this same epigram Diogenes Laërtius reads ἀφέσει Γέλα, and the Greek Anthology ἀφαίσε Γέλα. Perhaps the former reading is the more correct, as it seems to be implied by Diogenes Laërtius that Pausanias was younger than Empedcocles, and we have no notice of his dying young,
or being outlived by him.

2. A physician who attended Craterus, one of the generals of Alexander the Great, and to whom the king addressed a letter when he heard he was going to give his patient heliobore, enjoining him to be cautious in the use of so powerful a medi-cment, probably about B.C. 324. (Plut. Alex.
c. 41.)

PAUSANIAS (Παυσανίας), artists. 1. A statuary, of Apollonia, made the statues of Apollo and Callisto, which formed a part of the great votive offering of the Tegens at Olympia. He flourished, therefore, about B.C. 400. (Paus. x. 9.
§ 3 ; Dædalus II.)

2. A painter, mentioned by Athenaeus as a πορφύραγγος, but otherwise unknown. (Ath. xiii.
p. 567, b.)

PAUSIUS (Παυσίας), one of the most distinguished painters of the best school and the best period of Greek art, was a contemporary of Aristeides, Melanchius, and Apelles (about B.C. 360—330), and a disciple of Pampillus. He had previously been instructed by his father Briotes, who lived at Sicyon, where also Pausias passed his life. He was thus perpetually familiar with those high principles of art which the authority of Pampillus had established at Sicyon, and with those great artists who resorted to that city, of which Pliny says, ίαί φυί τίλα patria picturæ.

The department of the art which Pausias most practised, and in which he received the instruction of Pampillus, was painting in encaustic with the cestrum, and Pliny calls him primum in hoo genere nobilem. Indeed, according to the same writer, his restoration of the paintings of Polygnotus, on the walls of the temple at Thespiae, exhibited a striking inferiority, because the effort was made in a department not his own, namely, with the pencil.

Pausias was the first who applied encaustic painting to the decoration of the ceilings and walls of houses. Nothing of this kind had been practitised before his time, except the painting of the ceilings of temples with stars.

The favourite subjects of Pausias were small panel-pictures, chiefly of boys. His rivals impated his taste for such small pictures to his want of ability to paint fast; whereupon he executed a picture of a boy in a single day, and this picture became famous under the name of hemenesias (a day's work).

Another celebrated picture, no doubt in the same style, was the portrait of Glycera, a flower-girl of his native city, of whom he was enamoured when a young man. The combined force of his affection for his mistress and for his art led him to strive to imitate the flowers, of which she made the garlands that she sold; and he thus acquired the greatest skill in flower-painting. The fruit of these studies was a picture of Glycera with a garland, which is known to Pliny's time as the Stephanopellos (garland-weaver) or Stephanophila (garland-seller). A copy of this picture (apogra-phon) was bought by L. Lucullus at the Dionysia at Athens for the great sum of two talents.

Another painting is mentioned by Pliny as the finest specimen of Pausias's larger pictures: it was reserved in the portico of Pompey at Rome.
This picture was remarkable for striking effects of foreshortening, and of light and shade. It representing a sacrifice: the ox was shown in its whole length in a front and not a side view (that is, powerfully foreshortened): this figure was painted black, while the people in attendance were placed in a strong white light, and the shadow of the ox was made to fall upon them: the effect was that all the figures seemed to stand out boldly from the picture.
Pliny says that this style of painting was first invented by Pausias; and that many had tried but none with equal success. (Plin. H.N. xxxv. 11. s. 40.)

Pausiases (ii. 27. § 3) mentions two other paintings of Pausias, which adorned the Tholus at Epidaurus. The one represented Love, having laid aside his bow and arrows, and holding a lyre, which he has taken up in their stead: the other Drunkenness (Μεθύνη), drinking out of a glass goblet, through which her face was visible.

Most of the paintings of Pausias were probably transported to Rome, with the other treasures of Sicyonian art, in the aedileship of Scaurus, when the state of Sicyon was compelled to sell all the pictures which were public property, in order to pay its debts. (Plin. i. c.)

Pliny (l. c. § 31) mentions Aristolochus, the son and disciple of Pausias, and Mechopanes, another of his disciples.

[PAUS.] PAUSIRAS (Παυσηρᾶς), or PAUSIRIS (Παυςηρίς). 1. Son of Amyratus, the rebel satrap of Egypt. [AMYRATUS.] Notwithstanding his father's revolt, he was appointed by the Persian king to the satrapy of Egypt. (Herod. iii. 15.) 2. One of the leaders of the Egyptians in their revolt against Ptolemy Epiphanes. The rebel chiefs had made themselves masters of Lycopolis, but were unable to hold out against Polyercates, the general of Ptolemy, and they surrendered themselves to the mercy of the king, who caused them all to be put to death, n. c. 184. (Polyb. xxiii. 16.) Concerning the circumstances and period of this revolt, see Letronne (Comm. sur l'Inscription de Rosette, p. 23. Paris, 1841).

[E. H. B.] PAUSISTRATUS (Παυσίστρατος), a Rhodian, who was appointed to command the forces of that republic in n. c. 197; he landed in the district of Asia Minor called Peraea with a considerable army, defeated the Macedonian general Deinocrates, and reduced the whole of Peraea, but failed in taking Stratocein. (Liv. xxxiii. 18.) During the war with Antiochus he was appointed to command the Rhodian fleet (n. c. 191), but joined the Romans too late to take part in the victory over Polyxenidas. (Id. xxxvi. 45.) The following spring (n. c. 190) he put to sea early with a fleet of thirty-six ships, but suffered himself to be deceived by Polyxenidas, who pretended to enter into negotiations with him, and having thus lulled him into security suddenly attacked and totally defeated him. Almost all his ships were taken or sunk, and Pausistratus himself slain while vainly attempting to force his way through the enemy's fleet. (Liv. xxxvii. 9, 10—11; Appian. Syr. 23, 24; Polyb. xxi. 5; Polyean. v. 27.) Appian calls him Pausimachus. [E. H. B.]

PAUSON (Παύσων), a Greek painter, of whom very little is known, but who is of some importance on account of the manner in which he is mentioned by Aristotle in the following passage (Poet. 2. § 2), οὗτος οἱ γραφεῖς, Πολύγνωμος μὲν κρείττονς, Παύσων δὲ χρίτους, Διονύσως δὲ άνοιξας έπάθεν, which undoubtedly means that while, in painting men, Dionysius represented them just as they are, neither more nor less beautiful than the average of human kind, Polygnotus on the one hand invested them with an expression of ideal excellence, while Pauson delighted in imitating what was defective or repulsive, and was in fact a painter of caricatures. In another passage, Aristotle says that the young ought not to look upon the pictures of Pauson, but those of Polygnotus and of any other artist who is θεώδης. (Polit. viii. 5. § 7.)

From these allusions it may safely be inferred that Pauson lived somewhat earlier than the time of Aristotle. A more exact determination of his date is gained from two allusions in Aristophanes to a certain Pauson, if this person is, as the Scho- lials and Suidas supposed, the same as the painter (Aristoph. Acharn. 854; Plat. 602; Schol. ll. cc.; Suid. s. v. Παύσωνος πτωκεύτας); but this is very doubtful, and the passages seem rather to refer to some wretched parasite or mendicant. (Comp. Suid. s. v. Ασκληπιείου άνάγκαστος.) A curious anecdote is told of Pauson by Plutarch (de Pyth. Orae. 5. p. 396, d), Aelian (V. H. xiv. 13), and Lucian (Demosth. Encom. 24). In the MSS. of Aristotle and Lucian the name is frequently written Πάουςος and Πάουςος.

[PAV.] PAX, the personification of peace, was worshipped at Rome, where a festival was celebrated in her honour and that of Salus, on the 30th of April. (Ov. Fast. i. 711; Juv. i. 115; Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 5; Gall. xvi. 8.)

[PAV.] PAXAEAE, the wife of Pompionius Labeco. [LABEO, POMPIONIUS.]

PA'XAMUS (Πάξαμος), a writer on various subjects. Suidas (s. v.) mentions that he wrote a work called Φωτονεύξ, in two books; also two books on the art of dyeing (Βαφονεύξ), two on husbandry, and a work entitled διωδηκάτων, which Suidas explains (according to the emendation of Kuster, who gives ἐτοί for the old reading ἐτοῖ) to be an erotic work, περί αλεξανδρων χυμάτων. Some fragments from the treatise on husbandry are preserved in the Geoponica. Pauzamus also wrote a culinary work, entitled διωδηκάτων, which, Suidas states, was arranged in alphabetical order. To this work an allusion is probably made by Athenæus (ix. p. 576, d).

[W. M. G.]

PAXALIAS, an engraver on precious stones, whose time is unknown. There is a gem of his, representing a female bacchanal, riding on a centaur, which she governs with a thyrsus. (Spiliobury Gems, No. 26.)

[PAV.] PEDA'NIUS. 1. T. PEDANUS, the first centurion of the principes, was distinguished for his bravery in the second Punic war, b. c. 212. (Liv. xxv. 14; Val. Max. iii. 2. § 26.)

2. PEDANUS, one of the legates of Augustus, who presided in the court, when Herod accused his own sons. (Joseph. B. J. i. 27. § 3.)

3. PEDANUS SECUNDEUS, praefectus urbi in the reign of Nero, was killed by one of his own slaves. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 42.)

4. PEDANUS COSTA, known only from coins, from which we learn that he was legatus to Brutus in the civil wars.

COIN OF PEDANUS COSTA.

5. PEDANUS COSTA, was passed over by Vitel- lius in his disposal of the consulsip in a. d. 69, because Pedanias had been an enemy of Nero. (Tac. Hist. ii. 71.)

6. PEDANUS, a Roman horse-soldier, whose bravery at the capture of Jerusalem by Titus, is recorded by Josephus (B. J. vi. 2. § 8).

PEDA'RITUS or PAE'DA'RETUS (Παίδαιτος, Παίδαιτος), a Lacedaemonian, the son of Leon, was sent out to serve in conjunction with Asteo- chus, and after the capture of Iasus was appointed to station himself at Chios, late in the summer of b. c. 412. (Thuc. viii. 28.) Having marched by land from Miletus, he reached Ἐρυθραῖα, and then crossed over to Chios just at the time when application was made by the Lesbians to Asteochus for aid in a revolution which they mediated. But, through the reluctance of the Chians, and the refusal of Pedaritus, Asteochus was compelled to abandon the project (c. 32, 33). Irritated by his disappointment, Astyochus turned a deaf ear to the application which the Chians made for assistance when the Athenians fortified Delphinium, and Pedarius in his despatches to Sparta complained of the admiral's conduct, in consequence of which a commission was sent out to inquire into it. (Thuc. viii. 38, 40.) Pedarius himself seems to have acted with great harshness at Chios, in consequence of which some Chian exiles laid complaints against him at Sparta, and his mother Telentia administered a rebuke to him in a letter. Plut. Apophth. Loc. p. 241, d. Meantime the Athenians continued their operations at Chios, and had completed their works. Pedarius sent to Rhodes, where the Peloponnesian fleet was lying, saying that Chios would fall into the hands of the Athenians unless the whole Peloponnesian armament came to its succour. He himself meantime made a sudden attack on the naval rank of the Athenians, and stormed it; but the main body of the Athenians coming up he was defeated and slain, in the beginning of B. c. 411. (Thuc. viii. 55.) [C. P. M.]

PEDARIUS, L. COMI'NIUS. [Cominius, No. 8.]

PEDIA/NUS, ASCO'NIUS. [Asconius.]

PE'DIUS (Pe'di'ds), a daughter of Menys of La'cedæmon, and the wife of Cannus, king of Attica, from whom an Attic phyle and demos derived their name. (Apollod. iii. 14. § 5; Plut. Themist. 14; Steph. Byz. s. v.) [L. S.]

PE'DIAS, JOANNE'S. [Joannes, No. 61.]

PE'DIUS. 1. Q. Pe'dius, the great-nephew of the dictator C. Julius Caesar, being the grandson of Julia, Caesar's eldest sister. This is the statement of Suetonius (Caesar, 83), but Glandorp has conjectured (Onom. p. 492), not without reason, that Pedius may have been the son of the dictator's sister, and find him grown up and discharging important duties in Caesar's lifetime. The name of Pedius first occurs in B. c. 57, when he was serving as legatus to his uncle in Gaul. (Caes. B. G. ii. 1.) In B. c. 55, Pedius became a candidate for the curule aedileship with Cn. Plancius and others, but he lost his election. (Cic. pro Planc. 7, 22: respecting the interpretation of these passages, see Wunder, Prolegomena, p. lxxxiii, &c. to his edition of Cicero's oration pro Plancio.) On the breaking out of the civil war in B. c. 49, Pedius naturally joined Caesar. During Caesar's campaign in Greece against Pompey, B. c. 48, Pedius remained in Italy, having been raised to the praetorship, and in the course of that year he defeated and slew Milo in the neighbourhood of Thurii. At the beginning of B. c. 45, we find Pedius serving as legatus against the Pompeian party in Spain, and on his return to Rome with Caesar in the autumn of the year, he was allowed the honour of a triumph with the title of orator consul. (Fast. Capit.) In Caesar's will Pedius was named one of his heirs along with his two other great-nephews, C. Octavius and L. Pinarius, Octavius obtaining three-fourths of the property, and the remaining fourth being divided between Pinarius and Pedius, who resigned his share of the inheritance to Octavius. After the fall of the consuls, Hirtius and Pansa, at the battle of Mutina in the month of April, B. c. 43, Octavius marched to Rome at the head of an army (Augustus, p. 425, b.), and in the month of August he was elected consul along with Pedius. The latter forthwith, at the instigation of his colleague, proposed a law, known by the name of the Lex Pedius, by which all the murderers of Julius Caesar were punished with aqua et ignis interdictio. Pedius was left in charge of the city, while Octavius marched into the north of Italy, and as the latter had now determined to join Antonius and Lepidus, Pedius proposed in the senate the repeal of the sentence of outlawry which had been pronounced against them. To this the senate was obliged to give an unwilling consent; and soon afterwards towards the close of the year there was formed at Bononia the celebrated triumvirate between Octavius, Antonius and Lepidus. As soon as the news reached Rome that the triumvirs had made out a list of persons to be put to death, the utmost consternation prevailed, more especially as the names of those who were doomed had not transpired. During the whole of the night on which the news arrived, Pedius was with difficulty able to prevent an open insurrection; and on the following morning, being ignorant of the decision of the triumvirs, he declared that only seventeen persons should be put to death, and pledged the public word for the safety of all others. But the fatigue to which he had been exposed was so great that it occasioned his death on the succeeding night. (Cic. ad Att. ix. 14; Caesar, B. C. ii. 22; Auctor, B. Hisp. 2; Suet. Cæs. 83; Dion Cass. xiiii. 31, 42, xlvii. 46, 52; Appian, B. C. ii. 22, 94, 96, iv. 6; Plin. H. N. xxxv. 4. § 7; Vell. Pat. ii. 69; Suet. Ner. 3, Gall. 3.)

2. Q. Pedius, the grandson of No. 1, was a painter. [See below.]

3. PEDIUS POPPUREA, a celebrated orator mentioned by Horace (Serm. i. 10, 29), may have been a son of No. 1.

4. PEDIUS BLARRUS. [Blarrus, p. 492, a.]

5. CN. PEDIVS CASTUS, consul successively at the beginning of the reign of Vespasian, A. D. 71.

PEDIVS, Q., a Roman painter in the latter part of the first century B. C. He was the grandson of that Q. Pedius who was the nephew of Julius Caesar, and his co-heir with Augustus (see above, No. 1): but, as he was dumb from his birth, his kinsman, the orator Messala, had him taught painting: this arrangement was approved of by Augustus, and Pedius attained to considerable excellence in the art, but he died while still a youth (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 4. § 7). Müller places him at B. c. 34, but this is too early a date. [P. S.]

PE'DIUS, SE'XTUS, a Roman jurist, whose writings were apparently known to Pomponius (Dig. 4. tit. 3. s. l. § 4). His name Sextus appears in a passage of Paulus (Dig. 4. tit. 8. s. 32. § 20), and in other passages. Pedius was younger than Ollius [Ollius], or at least a contemporary (Dig. 14. tit. 1. s. l. § 9): and the same remark applies to Scaurus (Dig. 50. tit. 6. s. 13. § 1), where Massilius Sabinius is meant. He is also frequently cited by Paulus and Ulpius. He is also cited by Julian (Dig. 3. tit. 5. s. 6. § 9). We may, therefore, conclude that he lived before the time of Hadrian. He wrote Libri ad Edictum, of which the twenty-fifth is quoted by Paulus (Dig. 37. tit. 1. s. 6. § 2). He also wrote Libri de Stipulationibus (12. tit. 1. s. 6). The passages which are cited from him show that he had a true perception of the right method of legal interpretation; for instance, he says, in a passage quoted by Paulus, "it is best PEDUCAEUS, not to scrutinize the proper signification of words, but mainly what the testator has intended to declare; in the next place, what is the opinion of those who live in each district" (De Instructo vel Instrumento Legato, Dig. 33. tit. 7. s. 18. § 3). In another passage quoted by Uplian (Dig. 1. tit. 3. s. 13), Pedius observes "that when one or two things are introduced by a lex, it is a good ground for supplying the rest which tends to the same useful purpose, by interpretation, or at least by jurisdictio." (Grotius, Vitae Jurisconsuitorum; Zimmern, Geschichte des Röm. Privatrechts, p. 335; the passages of the Digest in which Sextus Pedius is cited are collected by Wiebel, Jurisprudentia Reußiana, p. 335.)

PEDO ALBINOVANUS. [ALBINOVANUS.]

PEDO, M. JUVENTIUS, a judex spoken of with praise by Cicero in his oration for Cluentius (c. 38).

PEDO, M. VERGLIA'NUS, consul A. D. 115 with L. Vipstanus Massalla.

PEDUCAEA'NUS, C. CURTIUS, praetor B. C. 50, to whom one of Cicero's letters is addressed (ad Fam. xiii. 59). He was probably a son of Sex. Peducaeus, who was praetor in Sicily B. C. 76-75 [PEDUCAEUS, No. 2], and was adopted by C. Curtius. In one of Cicero's speeches after his return from banishment, he speaks of M. Curtius or Currius, as some editions have the name, to whose father he had been quaeator (post Red. in Senat. 8). The latter person would seem to be the same as the praetor, and the praenomen is probably wrong in one of the passages quoted above.

PEDUCAEUS, a Roman name, which first occurs in the last century of the republic, is also written Poedocus; but it appears from inscriptions that Peducaeus is the correct form.

1. SEX. PEDUCAEUS, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 113, brought forward a bill appointing L. Cassius Longinus as a special commissioner to investigate the charge of incest against the Vestal virgins Licia inia and Marcia, whom the college of pontiffs had acquitted. (Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 30; Ascon. in Milon. p. 76, ed. Orelli.) For a full account of this transaction, see LICINIA, No. 2.

2. SEX. PEDUCAEUS, was praetor in Sicily during B. C. 76 and 75, in the latter of which years Cicero served under him as quaestor. His government of Sicily gained him the love of the provincials, and Cicero in his orations against Verres constantly speaks of his justice and integrity, calling him Vir optimus et innocensius. During his administration he took a census of the island, to which Cicero frequently refers. But in consequence of his being an intimate friend of Verres, he was rejected as judex by Cicero at the trial of the latter. At a later time Cicero also spoke of Peducaeus in terms of the greatest respect and esteem. (Cic. Verr. i. 7, ii. 56, iii. 93, iv. 64, de Fin. ii. 18, ad Att. x. 1.) There is some difficulty in determining in the letters of Cicero, whether this Peducaeus is meant or his son [No. 3]; but the two following passages, from the time at which the letters were written, would seem to refer to the father (ad Att. i. 4, 5). Besides the son Sextus mentioned below, Peducaeus appears to have had another son, who was adopted into the Curtia gens. [PEDUCAEANUS.]

3. SEX. PEDUCAEUS, was an intimate friend both of Atticus and Cicero, the latter of whom frequently mentions him in his correspondence in terms of the greatest affection. During Cicero's absence in Cilicia Peducaeus was accused and acquitted, but of the nature of the accusation we are not informed. (Caesius, ad Fam. viii. 14.) On the breaking out of the civil war between Caesar and Pompey, Peducaeus sided with the former, by whom he was appointed in B.C. 48 to the government of Sardinia. In B. C. 39, Peducaeus was proprietor in Spain, and this is the last time that his name is mentioned. (Cic. ad Att. vii. 13, a. 14, 17, ix. 7, 10, x. i. xiii. i, xv. 13, xvi. 11, 15, Fust. iv. 54, xvi. iv. 54.)

5. T. PEDUCAEUS, interceded with the judges on behalf of M. Scarrus, B.C. 54. (Ascon. in Sorvur. p. 29, ed. Orelli.)

6. C. PEDUCAEUS, was a legate of the consul, C. Vibius Pansa, and was killed at the battle of Mutina, B.C. 43. (Cic. ad Fam. x. 32.)

PEGANES, GEORGIUS. [GEORGIOUS, No. 18, p. 247, a.]

PEGASUS (Πηγασός), i. e. descended from Pegasus or originating by him; hence it is applied to the well Hippocrene, which was called forth by the hoar of Pegasus (Mosch. iii. 78; Od. Trist. iii. 7, 15). The Muses themselves also are sometimes called Pegasis, as well as other nymphs of wells and brooks. (Virg. Catul. 71, 2; Or. Hord. xv. 27; Propert. iii. i. 19; Quint. Smyrn. iii. 301; comp. Heyne, ad Apollo. p. 301.) [L. S.]

PEGASUS (Πηγασός). 1. A priest of Eleuther, who was believed to have introduced the worship of Dionysus at Athens. (Paus. i. 2, § 4.)

2. The famous winged horse, whose origin is thus related. When Perseus struck off the head of Medusa, with whom Poseidon had had intercourse in the form of a horse or a bird, there sprung forth from her Chrusnor and the horse Pegasus. The latter obtained the name Pegasus because he was believed to have made his appearance near the sources (ὕγατα) of Oceana. Pegasus rose up to the seats of the immortals, and afterwards lived in the palace of Zeus, for whom he carried thunder and lightning (Hes. Theog. 281, &c.; Apollod. ii. 3, § 4, § 5; Schol. ad Aristoph. Pan. 722; comp. Ov. Met. iv. 781, &c. vi. 119). According to this view, which is apparently the most ancient, Pegasus was the thundering horse of Zeus; but later writers describe him as the horse of Eos (Schol. ad Hom. H. i. vi. 155; Tzetz. ad Igc. 17), and place him among the stars as the heavenly horse (Amet. Phoen. 205, &c.; Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 18; Ov. Fast. iii. 457, &c.).

Pegasus also acts a prominent part in the fight of Bellerophon against the Chimaira (Hes. Theog. 239; Apollod. ii. 3, § 2.) After Bellerophon had tried and suffered much to obtain possession of Pegasus for his fight against the Chimaira, he consulted the seer T. Polydides at Corinth. The latter advised him to spend a night in the temple of Athena, and, as Bellerophon was sleeping, the goddess appeared to him in a dream, commanding him to sacrifice to Poseidon, and gave him a golden bridle. When he awoke he found the bridle, m 3 offered the sacrifice, and caught Pegasus, who was drinking at the well Peirene (Pind. Ol. xiii. 90, &c. with the Schol.; Strab. viii. p. 379). According to some Athena herself tamed and bridled Pegasus, and surrendered him to Bellerophon (Paus. ii. 4. § 1), or Bellerophon received Pegasus from his own father Poseidon (Schol. ad Hom. ii. vi. 155). After he had conquered the Chimera (Pindar says that he also conquered the Amazons and the Solyms, Ol. xii. 125), he endeavoured to raise up to heaven with his winged horse, but fell down upon the earth, either from fear or from goddessiness, or being thrown off by Pegasus, who was rendered furious by a god-fly which Zeus had sent. But Pegasus continued his flight (Hygin. Poes. Astr. ii. 18; Paus. vi. 6; Tzetz. ad Isp. 17; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 630). Whether Hesiod considered Pegasus as a winged horse, cannot be inferred with certainty from the word δρωμάευς; but Pindar, Euripides, and the other later writers, expressly mention his wings.

Pegasus lastly was also regarded as the horse of the Muses, and in this capacity he is more celebrated in modern times than he ever was in antiquity; for with the ancients he had no connection with the Muses, except that by his hoof he called forth the inspiring well Hippocrene. The story about this well runs as follows. When the nine Muses engaged in a contest with the nine daughters of Pierus on Mount Helicon, all became darkness when the daughters of Pierus began to sing; whereas during the song of the Muses, heaven, the sea, and all the rivers stood still to listen, and Helicon rose heavenward with delight, until Pegasus, on the advice of Poseidon, stopped its rising by kicking it with his hoof (Anton. Lib. 9); and from this kick there arose Hippocrene, the inspiring well of the Muses, on Mount Helicon, for which, in this reason, Persius (Prol. 1) calls fons caballius (Ov. Met. v. 256). Others again relate that Pegasus caused the well to gush forth because he was thirsty; and in other parts of Greece also similar wells were believed to have been called forth by Pegasus, such as Hippocrene, at Troezen, and Peirene, near Corinth (Paus. ii. 31. § 12; Stat. Theb. iv. 60). Pegasus is often seen represented in ancient works of art and on coins along with Athena and Bellerophon. [L. S.]

PE'GASUS, A Roman jurist, one of the followers or pupils of Proculus, and praefectus urbi under Domitian (Juv. iv. 76), though Pompianus says that he was praefectus under Vespasian (Dig. i. tit. 2. s. 2. § 47). Nothing is known of any writings of Pegasus, though he probably did write something; and certainly he must have given response, for he is cited by Valens, Pompianus, Gaius (iii. 64), Papinius, Paulus, and frequently by Ulpius. The Senatusconsultum Pegasianum, which was passed in the time of Vespasian, when Pegasus was consul suffectus with Pusio, probably took its name from him. (Gaius. i. 31. ii. 254; Inst. 2. tit. 23. § 5. 6, 7.)

The Schol. Veta of Juvenal (iv. 77) has the following comment: "Hinc est Pegasianum, scilicet jus, quod juria pertinuo fuerat;" and in v. 79, "juris pertitus fuit ut praefectus; unde jus Pegasianum," which Schopen proposes to emend: "juris pertitus, fuit urbis praefectus; unde et S. C. Pegasianum;" which is a probable emendation. The expression "jus Pegasianum" has been compared with "jus Aelianum," but we know of no writings of Pegasus which were so called. (Juvenal, ed. Heinrich; Grotius, Vitae Jurisconsult; Zimmern, Geschicht des Hom. Privatrechts, p. 322; Wieling, Jurisprudentia Restituta, p. 337, gives the citations from Pegasus in the Digest.) [G. L.]

PEIRAEUS (Πηγαες), a son of Clytius of Ithaca, and a friend of Telemachus. (Hom. Od. xv. 539, &c. xxvii. 55, 71.)

PEIRANTHUS (Πηγανθος), a son of Argus and Evadne, and the father of Callirrhoë, Argus, Arestoridae, and Triepis. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 2; Hygin. Fab. 145; Schol. ad Eurip. Or. 932, where he is called Peiraus, which name also occurs in Paus. i. 16. § 1, 17. § 5.)

PEIRASUS (Πηγαιας) or PEIRASES, a son of Argus, a name belonging to the mythical period of Greek art. Of the statues of Hera, which Pausanias saw in the Hereneum near Mycenae, the most ancient was one made of the wild pear-tree, which Peiraus, the son of Argus, was said to have dedicated at Tyrins, and which the Argives, when they took that city, transferred to the Hereneum (Paus. ii. 17. § 5). The account of Pausanias and the mythographers, however, does not represent Peiraus as the artist of this image, as some modern writers suppose, but as the king who dedicated it. (Comp. Paus. ii. 16. § 1; Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 920; Apollod. ii. 1. § 2; Euseb. Praep. Evan. iii. 8; Thiersch, Epochen, 20.) [P. S.]

PEIREN (Πηηρην), the name of two mythical personages, one the father of Io, commonly called Inachus (Apollod. i. § 2), and the other a son of Glaucus, and brother of Bellerophon. (Apollod. ii. 3. § 1; [L. S.]

PEIRENE (Πηηρηνη), a daughter of Chelebus, Oebalus, or Asopus and Methone, became by Poseidon the mother of Leches and Cenchreia (Paus. ii. 2. § 3; Diod. iv. 74). She was regarded as the nymph of the well Peirene near Corinth, which was believed by some to have arisen out of the tears which she shed in her grief at the death of her son Cenchreia. (Paus. iii. 3. § 5.) [L. S.]

PEIRITHOUS (Πηηρηθος), a son of Ixion or Zeus by Dia, of Larissa in Thessaly (Hom. II. ii. 741, xiv. 317; Apollod. i. 8. § 2; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 101). He was one of the Lapithae, and married to Hippodameia, by whom he became the father of Poly poets (Hom. II. ii. 740, &c. xii. 129). When Peirithous was celebrating his marriage with Hippodameia, the intoxicated centaur Barytion or Eurytus carried her off, and this act occasioned the celebrated fight between the centaurs and Lapithae (Hom. Od. xi. 630, xii. 296, Ili. ii. 263, 8.1; Ov. Met. xii. 224). He was worshipped at Athens, along with Theseus, as a hero. (Paus. iii. 30. § 4; comp. Apollod. i. 8. § 2; Paus. x. 29. § 2; Ov. Met. viii. 566; Plin. N. N. xxi. 4, and the articles ΗΡΑCLES and ΚΕΝΤΑΥΡΙΑ.) [L. S.]

PEIROOS (Πηηρος or Πηηρω), a son of Imbrassus of Aenus, and the commander of the Thracians who were allied with Priam in the Trojan war. (Hom. II. ii. 844, xx. 484.) [L. S.]

PEISANDER (Πηησανδρος), 1. A son of Maenalus, a Myrmidon, and one of the warriors of Achilles. (Hom. II. xvi. 193.)

2. A son of Antimachus, and brother of Hippo lochus, a Trojan, was slain by Agamemon. (Hom. II. xi. 122, &c. xiii. 601, &c. Paus. iii. 3. § 6.)

3. A son of Polyctor, and one of the suitors of Penelope. (Hom. Od. xviii. 290, &c. xxii. 268; Ov. Hor. i. 91.) [L. S.]
PEISANDER.

PEISANDER (Πεισάνδρος), historical. 1. An Athenian, of the demus of Acharnae. From a fragment of the Babylonians of Aristophanes (op. Schol. ad Arist. Aet. 1556) it would seem that he was satirised in that play as having been bribed to join in bringing about the Peloponnesian war (comp. Arist. Lysistr. 490; Schol. ad Arist. Poc. 309). Rapacity, however, was far from being the only point in his character which exposed him to the attacks of the comic poets. In the fragment of the Αστραστέων or Ανδρονίγαιν of Eupolis, which thus speaks of him,—

Πεισάνδρος εἰς Πακτελόν ἵπτατεν, Κατάντα τῆς στρατιάς κάστως Ἰην ἄμφε, his expedition to the Poetolus has indeed been explained as an allusion to his peculiable propensities; but others, by an ingenious conjecture, would substitute Σφτάτωνον Πακτελόν, and would understand the passage as an attack on him for cowardice in the unsuccessful campaign of the Athenians against the revoluted Chalcidians, in b.c. 429 (Thuc. ii. 79; comp. Meineke, Fragm. Com. Grac. vol. i. p. 177, ii. pp. 435, 436). It further appears, from a notice of him in the Symposium of Xenophon (ii. 14), that in b.c. 422 he shrank pusillanimously from serving in the expedition to Macedonia under Cleon (Thuc. v. 2). For this he was brought to trial on an ἀστραστεία γραφή, of which, however, we have no evidence, it is possible, as Meineke suggests (Fragm. Com. Grac. vol. i. p. 178; comp. vol. ii. pp. 501, 502), that the circumstance may be alluded to in the following line of the Μαρίον of Eupolis,—

Ἄκονο νῦν Πεισάνδρος ὁ ἀδόλλατος.

To about this period, too, Meineke would refer the play of the comic poet, Plato, which bears Peisander's name, and of which he formed the main subject. Aristophanes ridicules him also for the attempt to cloak his cowardice under a gasconading demeanour; and he gave further occasion for satire to Aristophanes, Eupolis, Hermippus, and Plato, by his gluttony and his unwieldy bulk, the latter of which procured for him the nicknames of διοκιόδος and δόσις κοῆθελος (donkey-driver and donkey), names the more appropriate, as the donkeys of Acharnae, his native demus, were noted for their size (Arist. Pas. 389, Aet. 1556; Meineke, Fragm. Com. Grac. ii. cc., vol. ii. pp. 384, 385, 648, 685; Ath. x. p. 415; e. Ael. V. H. i. 27, H. L. iv. 1; Suid. s. v. Δειλόττερος τοῦ παρακτοτοῦ. Εἶ τι Πακέρνδος, Πακέρνδος δειλόττερος, Ἀρκάδας μιμοῦσα, Ἑσυχ. s. v. Ἀχαρινός δοῖο). With this disputable character he was assailed by the arts of a demagogue (see Xen. L. c.), for we find him in b.c. 415 appointed one of the commissioners (Στρατηγαλ) for investigating the mystery of the mutiny of the Hermae, on which occasion he joined with Charicles in representing the outrage as connected with a conspiracy against the people, and thus inflaming the popular fury (Thuc. vi. 27—29, 53, 60, &c.; Andoc. de Myst. pp. 5, 6). In b.c. 414 he was archon eponymous (Diod. xiii. 72); and towards the end of 412 he comes before us as the chief ostensible agent in effecting the revolution of the Four Hundred, having been sent about that time to Athens from the army at Samos to bring about the recall of Alcibiades and the overthrow of the democracy, or rather, according to his own professions, a modification of it. On his arrival, he urged these measures on his countrymen as the only means of obtaining the help of Persia, without which they could not hope to make head against the Lacedaemonians; and at the same time he craftily suggested that it would be at their own option to recur to their old form of government after the temporary revolution had served its purpose. The people, pressed by the emergency, gave a reluctant consent, and entrusted Peisander with ten others with discretionary power to treat with Tissaphernes and Alcibiades. At his instigation also they took away the command of the fleet from Phrynichus and Scironides, who were opposed to the new movement, and the former of whom he accused of having betrayed Amogres and caused the capture of Iasus (comp. Thuc. viii. 28). Before he left Athens, Peisander organised a conspiracy among the several political clubs (Εὐπολίας) for the overthrow of the democracy, and then proceeded on his mission. The negotiation, however, with Tissaphernes failed, and he returned with his colleagues to Samos. Here he strengthened his faction in the army, and formed an oligarchical party among the Samians themselves. He then sailed again to Athens, to complete his work there, establishing oligarchy in all the cities at which he touched in his course. Five of his fellow envoys accompanied him, while the remainder were employed in the service of other quarters. On his arrival at Athens with a body of selected troops, drawn from some of the states which he had revolutionised, he found that the clubs had almost effected his object already, principally by means of assassination and the general terror thus produced. When matters were fully ripe for the final step, Peisander made the proposal in the assembly for the establishment of the Four Hundred. In all the measures of this new government, of which he was a member, he took an active part; and when Tharanes, Aristocrates, and others withdrew from it, he sided with the more violent aristocrats, and was one of those who, on the counter-revolution, took refuge with Agis at Deceleia. His property was confiscated, and it does not appear that he ever returned to Athens (Thuc. viii. 49, 53, 54, 56, 69—77, 89—93; Diod. xiii. 34; Plut. Ath. 26; Aristot. Rhet. iii. 18, § 6, Suid. v. 4, 6, ed. Bekk.; Schol. ad Aesch. Fals. Leg. 104, s. v. τεταδεκαετής, 103, e. Eurip. p. 136; Isocr. Aecrop. p. 151, c. d.).

2. An Athenian, nick-named "squinter" (στρατηγαλ). He was attacked by Plato, the comic poet, in his play called "Peisander," which, however, chiefly dealt with his more famous name-sake [No. 1], with whom he seems to have been contemporary. In the Μαρίον of Eupolis the two are thus distinguished,— ὁ στρατηγαλ ὁ δὲ μέγας, ἀνωκύνδιος.

3. A Spartan, brother-in-law of Agesilus II., who made him admiral of the fleet in b.c. 395, permission having been sent him from the government at home to appoint whomsoever he pleased to the office. This is an instance of the characteristic nepotism of Agesilus: for Peisander, though brave and enger for distinction, was deficient in the experience requisite for the command in question. In the following year, b.c. 394, he was defeated and slain in a sea-fight off Cnidus, against Conon and Pharnabazus (Xen. Hell. iii. 4. § 29, iv. 3, m 4).

PEISANDER (Πεισανδρός), literary. 1. A poet of Cameirus, in Rhodes. The names of his parents were Peisian and Aristaechna, and he had a sister called Dioclea; but beyond these barren facts we know nothing of his life or circumstances. He appears to have flourished about the 53rd Olympiad (B.C. 640—645), though, according to some, he was earlier than Hesiod, and was a contemporary and friend of EuMOLPUS. This latter statement, however, is only an instance of the way in which the great early masters of poetry and their followers in the same line were often represented as an actual personal relation. Peisander was the author of a poem in two books on the exploits of Hercules. It was called Ηδάλεια, and Clement of Alexandria (Strom. vi. p. 266, ed. Syll.) accues him of having taken it entirely from one Pisius of Lindus. In this poem Hercules was for the first time represented as armed with a club, and covered with the lion's skin, instead of the usual armour of the heroic period; and it is not improbable, as Müller suggests, that Peisander was also the first who fixed the number of the hero's labours at twelve (Strab. xv. p. 688; Suid. s. v. Πεισανδρός; Eratost. Catach. 12; Ath. xii. p. 512, f; Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. i. 1196; Theocr. Epygr. xx.; Müller, Hist. Gesch. Ch. Lit. ix. § 3, Dor. ii. 12, § 1). The Alexandrian grammarians thought so highly of the poem that they received Peisander, as well as Antimachus and Panyasis, into the epic canon together with Homer and Hesiod. Only a few lines of it have been preserved; two are given us by the Scholast on Aristophanes (Nab. 1034), and another by Stobaeus (Flor. xii. 6). Other poems which were ascribed to Peisander were, as we learn from Suidas, spurious, having been composed chiefly by Aristaeas. In the Greek Anthology (vol. i. p. 49, ed. Jacobs) we find an epigram attributed to Peisander of Rhodes, perhaps the poet of Cameirus; it is an epitaph on one Hippaemon, together with his horse, dog, and attendant. By some, moreover, it has been thought, but on no sufficient grounds, that the fragments pass as the 24th and 25th Idyllia of Theocritus, as well as the 4th of Moschus, are portions of the Ηδάλεια of Peisander (Paus. ii. 37, viii. 22; Phot. Bibl. 239; Ath. xi. p. 469, d; Strab. xiv. p. 655; Quint. i. 13; Apollod. Bibl. i. 8; Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 24; Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. i. 165; Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. iv. 1396; Steph. Byz. s. v. Κυμόρος; Heyne, Exc. i. ad Virg. Aen. ii.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. pp. 215, 590; Voss. de Poet. Graec. 3; Bode, Gesch. der Epischen Dichterlust, pp. 499, &c.). From Theocritus (Epygr. xx.) it appears that a statue was erected by the citizens of Cameirus in honour of Peisander.

2. A poet of Larnaca, in Ilycia or Lycania, was a son of NESTOR [No. 1. See above, Vol. ii. p. 1170, a], and flourished in the reign of Alexander Severus (A.D. 222—235). He wrote a poem, which, according to Zosimus (v. 29), was called Ηρωκαί Δειογαμία. In most copies of Suidas (s. v. Πεισανδρός) we find the title given as Ηρωκαί Δειογαμία, which, some have thought, derives confirmation from the statement in Macrobius (Sat. v. 2), that Peisander wrote a sort of universal history, commencing with the in ipitals of Jupiter and Juno. But it seems clear that Ηρωκαί is the right reading, and the work probably treated of the marriages of gods and goddesses with mortals, and of the heroic progeny thus produced. It would seem to have been a very voluminous performance, if we adopt the extremely probable alteration of Ηρωκαί for Ηρωκαί in Suidas, and so consider it as consisting of sixty books (Suid. s. v. 'Αγάθουρος ; Steph. Byz. s. v. 'Αγάθουρος, Απόνιος, Απόνεκος, Βοάλεια, Κυβέληα, Λούκηα, Οιλύγατρα, Νείφτηα). There are several passages making mention of Peisander, in which we have no means of ascertaining whether the poet of Cameirus or of Larnaca is the person alluded to; such are Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. i. 471, ii. 98, 1090, iv. 57; Schol. ad Eur. Phoen. 1748. Macrobius, in the passage above referred to, says that Virgil drew the whole matter of the second book of the Aeneid from Peisander. But chronology, of course, forbids us to understand this of Peisander of Larnaca; and we hear of no such work as that to which Macrobius alludes by any older poet of the same name, for the notion of Valkenaar seems quite untenable, viz. that the Ηρωκαί Δειογαμία was written, in spite of the testimony of Suidas, by Peisander of Cameirus, and was in fact one and the same poem with the Ηδάλεια (Valken. Diatrib. ad Eur. Hypp. p. 24; Heyne, Exc. i. iii. ad Virg. Aen. ii.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. pp. 215, 590, iv. p. 265; Voss. de Poet. Graec. 9; Bode, Gesch. der Epischen Dichterlust, p. 500, note 1). [E. E.]

PEISENOR (Πεισενόρ), 1. The father of Ophi and, grandfather of Euryclea, the nurse of Odysseus (Hom. Od. i. 429). 2. A herald of Telemachus in Ithaca. (Hom. Od. ii. 39.)

3. A distinguished Trojan, the father of Cleitus. (Hom. II. xv. 445.)

4. A centaur, mentioned only by Ovid. (Met. xii. 303.)

[LS.]

PEISIAS (Πείσιας). 1. An Argive general. In B.C. 366, when Epaminondas was preparing to invade Achia, Peisias, at his instigation, occupied a commanding height of Mount Oneium, near Cenchreae, and thus enabled the Thebans to make their way through the isthmus, guarded though it was by Lacedaemonian and Athenian troops. (Xen. Hell. vii. 1, § 41; Diod. xiv. 75.)

2. A stationary, is mentioned by Pausanias (i. 3) as having made a statue of Apollo, which stood in the inner Ceramicus at Athens. [E. E.]

PEISI'DICE (Πεισιδίκη). 1. A daughter of Aeolus and Enarete, was married to Myrmidon, by whom she became the mother of Antiphus and Actor. (Apollod. i. 7, § 3.)

2. A daughter of Polias and Anaxibia or Philomache. (Apollod. i. 9, § 10.)

3. A daughter of Nestor and Anaekia. (Apollod. i. 9, § 9.)

4. The daughter of a king of Methymna in Lesbos, who, out of love for Achilles, opened to him the gates of her native city, but was stoned to death, at the command of Achilles, by his soldiers. (Parthen. Erod. 21.) [LS.]

PEISISTRATA'IDAE (Πεισιστρατίδαι), the legitimate sons of Peisistratus. [See Peisistratia.]

The name is used sometimes to indicate only Hippias and Hipparchus, sometimes in a wider application, embracing the grandchilden and near connections of Peisistratus (as by Herodotus, vii.}
The legislation of Solon, the position of parties at Athens was well calculated to favour the ambitious designs of Peisistratus. The old contests of the rival parties of the Plain, the Highlands, and the Coast, had been checked for a time by the measures of Solon, but their rivalry had not been removed; and when Solon, after the establishment of his constitution, retired for a time from Athens, this rivalry broke out into open feud. The party of the Plain, comprising chiefly the landed proprietors, was headed by Lycenous; that of the Coast, consisting of the wealthier classes not belonging to the nobles, by Megacles, the son of Alcmene; the party of the Highlands, which aimed at more of political freedom and equality than either of the two others, was that at the head of which Peisistratus placed himself, not because their wishes and feelings corresponded with his own, but because they seemed the most likely to be useful in the furtherance of his designs; and indeed his lead of this faction seems to have been a mere pretext, to render it less obvious that he had in reality attached to himself a large party among the poorer class of citizens (Herod. i. 59. ἤγειες πρήτην στάνην, συνώνη αι δούλων, καὶ τῷ λόγῳ τῶν ὕπερκοψιν προστασίαν). These he secured by putting himself forward as the patron and benedactor of the needy; his son, Peisistratus, the most conspicuous of the three, addressed his orations, afterwards imitated by Cimon, he threw open his gardens to the use of the citizens indiscriminately (Theopompus ap. Athen. xii. p. 532. e. &c.), and, according to some accounts (Eustath. ad H. ii. xxiv. extr.), was always accompanied by two or three youths, with a purse of money to supply forthwith the wants of any needy citizen whom they fell in with. His military and oratorical ( Cic. de Orat. iii. 34, Brut. 7. § 27, 10. § 41; Val. Max. viii. 9. ext. 1) abilities, and the undoubtedly good qualities which he possessed (Solon, according to Plut. Solon. 29. declared of him that, had it not been for his ambition, Athens had not a more excellent citizen to show), backed by considerable powers of simulation, had led many of the better class of citizens, if not openly to become his partisans, at least to look upon him with no unfavourable eye, and to regard his domination as a less evil than the state of continued disturbance under which the constitution was then suffering. Solon, on his return, quickly saw through the designs of Peisistratus, who listened with respect to his advice, though he prosecuted his schemes none the less diligently. (According to Isocrates, Panath. p. 263, ed. Steph. one part of his procedure was to procure the banishment of a considerable number of influential citizens who were likely to oppose his plans.) Solon next endeavoured to arouse the people, by speeches and poetical compositions (Plut. Solon. 30; Diog. Laërt. i. 49, 50), to a sense of the danger to which they were exposed, but in vain. Some refused to share his suspicions, others favoured the designs of Peisistratus, others feared his power, or were indifferent. Even the senate, according to Diogenes Laërtius (i. 49), were disposed to favour Peisistratus, and declared Solon to be mad. When Peisistratus found his plans sufficiently ripe for execution, he one day made his appearance in the agora with his mules and his own person exhibiting recent wounds, pretending that he had been nearly assassinated by his enemies as he was riding.

into the country. The indignation of his friends was excited; an assembly was forthwith called, in which Ariston, one of his partisans, proposed that a body-guard of fifty citizens, armed with clubs, should be granted to Peisistratus. It was in vain that Solon opposed this; the guard was granted. Through the neglect or connivance of the people Peisistratus took this opportunity of raising a much larger force, with which he seized the citadel B.c. 500. (Plut. Sol. 50; Herod. i. 59; Aristot. Pol. v. 10; Diog. Laërt. i. 66; Polyena. i. 21. § 3.) A similar stratagem had been practised by Theseus of Megara, and was afterwards imitated by Dionysius (Diod. xiii. 97). Megacles and the Alcmeonidae took flight. Soon after another insufficient attempt to rouse the citizens against the usurper, placed his arms in the street before his door, saying that he had done his utmost to defend his country and its laws. Peisistratus, having secured to himself the substance of power, made no further change in the constitution, or in its laws, which he administered ably and well.

The first usurpation of Peisistratus lasted but a short time (Herod. i. 60. μετά οὐ παλαν χρόνων — ἐλευθερών μιν). Before his power was firmly rooted, the factions headed by Megacles and Lycurgus combined, and Peisistratus was compelled to evacuate Athens. As on his second expulsion, we are distinctly told (Herod. i. 61) that he quitted Attica. The presumption is, that on the first occasion he did not. His property was confiscated and sold by auction, when the only man who ventured to purchase it was Callias, the son of Hippocrates (Herod. vi. 121). How Peisistratus employed himself during his banishment, which lasted about six years, we do not know. Meanwhile, the factions of Megacles and Lycurgus, having accomplished their immediate object, revived their old feuds, and Megacles, finding himself the weaker of the two, made overtures to Peisistratus, offering to reinstate him in the tyranny, if he would connect himself with him by receiving his daughter Coetysyra (Suidas s. v. ἕρωκοςορωουράττων) in marriage. The proposal was accepted by Peisistratus, and the following stratagem was devised for accomplishing (as Herodotus supposes) his restoration. In what was afterwards the deme Peneia, they found a damsel named Phya, of remarkable stature and beauty (according to Athenaeus xiii. p. 609, a garland seller, the daughter of a man named Socrates). This woman they dressed up as Athens in a full suit of armour, and placed in a chariot, with Peisistratus by her side, instructing her how she was to maintain a suitable carriage. The chariot was then driven towards the city, heralds being sent on before to announce that Athens in person was bringing back Peisistratus to her Acropolis. The report spread rapidly, and those in the city believing that the woman was really their tutelary goddess, worshipped her, and admitted Peisistratus. (Herod. i. 60; Polyena. Strat. i. 21. § 1, where there is a good deal of blundering. * This story," remarks Bishop Thirlwall (Hist. of Greece, vol. ii. p. 60), "would indeed be singular, if we consider the expedient in the light of a stratagem, on which the confederates relied for overcoming the resistance which they might otherwise have expected from their adversaries. But it seems quite as likely that the pageant was only designed to add extraordinary solemnity to the entrance of Peisistratus, and to suggest the reflection, that it was by the especial favour of heaven that he had been so unexpectedly restored." It is said that Phya was given in marriage to Hipparchus (Athen. l. c.). Peisistratus nominally performed his part of the contract with Megacles; but not choosing to have children by one of a family which was accounted accursed, treated his wife in the most odious manner. She complained to her mother of the indignity to which she was exposed; and Megacles and the Alcmeonidae, incensed at the affront, again made common cause with Lycurgus, and Peisistratus was a second time compelled to evacuate Athens (Herod. i. 61). This time he left Attica, and retired to Eretria in Euboea. (The very extraordinary statement in Eusebius, Chron. Olymp. 54. 3, and Hieronymus, that Peisistratus went into Italy, is doubtless a blunder. Vater conjectures that the name Italy has been substituted by mistake for that of some place in Attica, perhaps Iaria, and that the statement refers to the first exile of Peisistratus.) His property was again offered for sale (ὅσοι έπιτοι, Herod. vi. 121), and again Callias, who had been one of his most active opponents, was the only purchaser.

On reaching Eretria Peisistratus deliberated with his sons as to the course he should pursue. The advice of Hippas, that he should make a fresh attempt to regain his power, was adopted. Contributions were solicited from the cities which were in his interest. Several furnished him with large sums. Thebes especially surpassed all the rest in the amount of money which she placed at his disposal. With the funds thus raised he procured mercenaries from Argos. Ten years elapsed before his preparations were complete. At last, however, with the forces which he had raised, a Naxian named Lygdamis having also of his own accord brought him both money and a body of troops, he crossed into Attica, and landed at Marathon. Here his friends and partisans flocked to his standard. His antagonists, who had viewed his proceedings with great indifference, when they heard that he was advancing upon Athens hastily marched out to meet him. The two armies encamped not far from each other, near the temple of Athenae, Pallas, and Peisistratus, seizing the opportunity with which the remissness of his antagonists furnished him, and encouraged by the soothsayer Amphillus of Acharnae, fell suddenly upon their forces at noon, when, not expecting anything of the kind, the men had betaken themselves after their meal to sleep or play, and speedily put them to flight. He then, with equal wisdom and moderation, refrained from pursuing the fugitives with his troops, but sent forward his sons on horseback, who, having overtaken the flying Athenians, told them they had nothing to fear if they would disperse quietly to their homes. The majority obeyed these directions, and Peisistratus entered Athens without opposition (Herod. i. 61—63; Polyena. Strat. i. 21. § 1). The account of the latter, however, is full of blunders. Lygdamis was rewarded for his zealous co-operation by being established as tyrant of Naxos, which island Peisistratus conquered. [LYG DAMIS.] Having now become tyrant of Athens for the third time, Peisistratus adopted measures to secure

the undisturbed possession of his supremacy. He took a body of foreign mercenaries into his pay, and seized as hostages the children of several of the principal citizens, placing them in the custody of Lygdamis, nable toxucy, as also the relative lengths of the periods during which he was in possession of the tyranny and in exile. Aristotle (Pol. v. 12, p. 1315, ed. Bekk.) says, that in the space of thirty-three years he was in possession of the tyranny during 17 years; his sons holding the tyranny after him for eighteen years, making thirty-five years in all. His tyranny commenced in n. c. 560; his dynasty having been established in n. c. 550 by three distinct periods of government, with two periods of exile, the latter amounting together to fifteen years. The second period of exile lasted ten years complete (Herod. i. 62). That would leave about five years for the first exile. Clinton (Fasti Hel len. vol. ii. p. 203) assigns six years for the first period of government, one for the second, and ten for the third. In doing this he assumes that Hippias was born in the first year of the tyranny of Peisistratus, and that it was in the first period of his rule that Croesus sent to Greece to form alliances against Cyrus. To this scheme it is objected by Vater (in Er sch and Gruber's Encyclopa. art. Peisistratus) that it is clear from the narrative of Herodotus (i. 59; comp. i. 65, init.), that it was in the third period of the government of Peisistratus that Croesus sent to Greece; that Peisistratus was expelled shortly after he seized the citadel, before his power was firmly rooted (a strange mode of describing a period of six years); and that on the occasion of his marriage with the daughter of Megacles, Hippias (according to Clinton) would be only thirteen years old, his brother Hipparchus still younger; and yet they are called vēnâs by Herodotus, and Hipparchus is stated to have married Phya; and when Peisistratus shortly after retired to Eretria they were both old enough to assist him with their advice (Herod. i. 61). The mention of Hippias in connection with the battle of Marathon is not in the least inconsistent with his being eightly or eighty-five years old (his teeth were then so loose from age that one of them dropped out when he sneezed). That Hippias was born before the year n. c. 560 is also shown by the fragments of the poetry of Solon, in which, immediately after the capture of the citadel by Peisistratus, he reproaches the Athenians with having themselves aggrieved their tyrants (Plut. Sol. 30). The plural would indicate that Peisistratus had sons at that time. Vater places the commencement of the tyranny of Peisistratus in the latter part of n. c. 561; assigns half a year for the first period of government; five years and a half for the first exile; half a year for the second tyranny; ten years and a quarter for the second exile; and sixteen years for the third tyranny. The embassy of Croesus is the only point that can occasion any difficulty; but the same writer has shown that it is probable that the capture of Sardes is placed a few years too early by Clinton. That a much shorter interval than Clinton supposed elapsed between the embassy of Croesus to Greece and the capture of Sardes, is shown by the circumstance that the presents sent by the Lacedaemonians to Croesus did not reach him before he was taken prisoner. (Herod. i. 70; comp. Clinton, Fasti Hellen. ann. b. c. 560, 546, 537, and appendix c. 2, p. 201, &c.)

PEISISTRATUS. in Naxos. Others of the Athenians either fled or were exiled. Among the latter was Cimon, the father of Miltiades, who, however, was afterwards permitted to return [Cimon]. The revenues which Peisistratus needed for the pay of his troops, were derived partly from Attica (the produce, very likely, in part at least, of the mines at Laureion), partly from some gold mines on the Strymon. How he became possessed of these we do not know. It is most likely that they were private property, and came into his hands during his second exile, somehow or other through his connection with the royal family of Macedonia, a connection of which we subsequently see a proof in the offer of the town to Alexander made by Amyntas to Hippias. (Herod. v. 94.) It appears to have been shortly after his restoration, that Peisistratus purified the island of Delos, in accordance with the directions of an oracle, by removing all the dead bodies which had been buried within sight of the temple to another part of the island. (Herod. i. 64; Thucyd. iii. 104.) Besides the subjugation of Naxos, the only other foreign military expedition which we hear of his undertaking in this third period of his tyranny was the conquest of Sigeum, then in the hands of the Mytileneans. The Athenians had long before laid claim to the island, and had waged war with the Mytileneans for the possession of it, and it was awarded to them through the arbitration of Periander. Peisistratus established his bastard son Hagesiarchus as tyrant in the town. (Herod. v. 94, 95; Polyænus (Strat. v. 14) mentions some operations conducted by his son Hippias, for the suppression of piracy. Having now firmly established himself in the government, Peisistratus maintained the form of Solon's institutions, only taking care, as his sons did after him (Thucyd. vi. 54), that the highest offices should always be held by some member of the family. He not only exacted obedience to the laws from his subjects and friends, but himself set the example of submitting to them. On one occasion he even appeared before the Areopagus to answer a charge of murder, which however was not prosecuted. (Arist. Pol. v. 12, p. 1313, ed. Bekker; Plut. Solon. 31.) His government seems to have been a wise admixture of stringency as regards the enforcement of the laws and the prevention of disorders, and leniency towards individual offenders; and indeed the laws are often quoted by the writers to prove that Peisistratus' government was more just and equitable than that of Solon. (Reiske. Polyæn. Strat. v. 14; Val. Max. v. i. ext. 2.) He enforced the law which had been enacted by Solon, or, according to Theophrastus (ap. Plut. Solon. 31) by himself, against idleness, and compelled a large number of the poorer class to leave Athens, and devote themselves to agricultural pursuits. (Aelian. V.H. ix. 25; Dion Chrysost. vii. p. 258, ed. Reiske. xxv. p. 520.) The stories of his compelling the people to wear the Cotonace (Hesychius and Suidas s. v. κατωδένης; Aristoph. Lysist. 1150, &c.; Ecles. 724; Schol. ad l. 735; Schol. ad Lysist. 619), probably have reference to this. Those who had no resources of their own he is said to have supplied with cattle and seed. His policy and taste combined also led him to encourage the poorer Athenians in building. Athens was indebted to him for many stately and useful buildings. Among these may be mentioned a temple to the Pythian Apollo (Suidas s. v. Πυθων); Hesych. s. v. ἐν Πυθωνισ χοῖρος. Vater has made a great mistake in supposing that Thucydides (vi. 54) states that this temple was built by Peisistratus, the son of Hippias: Thucydides only says that the latter set up an altar in it, and a magnificent temple to the Olympian Zeus (Arist. Pol. v. 11), for which he employed the architects Antistates, Callaechrus, Antimachides, and Perinus (Vitruvius, *I*rof. vi. § 15). This temple remained unfinished for several centuries, and was at length completed by the emperor Hadrian (Paus. i. 16. § 6; Strab. ix. p. 339). Besides these, the Lyceum, a building situated a short distance from the city, was the work of Peisistratus (Suidas, s. v. Δίκαιος), as also the fountain of the Nine Springs ("Εννεάκοινους, Thucyd. ii. 15; Paus. i. 14. § 1). The employment of the sons of Peisistratus in superintending works of this kind, or completing them after their father's death, will probably account for slight variations in the authorities as to whether some of these were built by Peisistratus himself or by his sons. According to most authorities (the author of the letter in Diog. Laërt. i. 53; Suidas, s. v. καλά κόμλοι πωνίδων εδέλεα; Diodor. Vatic. vii.—x. 53, not. Dind. p. 31) Peisistratus, to defray these and other expenses, exacted a tithe of the produce of the land, an impost which, so employed, answered pretty nearly the purpose of a poor's rate. He was also (Plut. Sol. c. 31) the author of a measure, the idea of which he had derived from Solon, according to which those disabled in war were maintained at the public expense.

Peisistratus likewise bestowed considerable attention upon the due performance of public religious rites, and the celebration of festivals and processions (Epist. ap. Diog. Laërt. i. 53), an example which was followed by his sons, who are even said to have invented Ἀδελία καὶ κάμους (Athen. xii. 44, p. 532). The institution of the greater Panathenaea is expressly ascribed to Peisistratus by the scholiast on Aristeides (p. 323, ed. Dind.) and before the time of Peisistratus we do not hear of the distinction between the greater and the lesser Panathenaea (Dictionary of Antiquities, art. Παναθηναείς). He at least made considerable changes in the festival, and in particular introduced the contests of rhapsodists. Peisistratus in various ways encouraged literature. It was apparently under his auspices that Thespis introduced at Athens his rude form of tragedy (v. c. 535, Clinton, F. H. sub anno), and that dramatic contests were made a regular part of the Attic Dionysia (Bode, Gesch. der Hellen. Dichtkunst, vol. iii. part i. p. 53; Dict. of Ant. art. Θραγματικός). "It is to Peisistratus that we owe the first written text of the whole of the poems of Homer, which, without his care, would most likely now exist only in a few disjointed fragments." (Respecting the services of Peisistratus in relation to the text of Homer, and the poets who assisted him in the work, see the article Homerus, Vol. ii. p. 507, and the authorities there referred to). Peisistratus is also said to have been the first person in Greece who collected a library, to which he generously allowed the public access (A. Gellius, N. A. vi. 17; Athen. i. p. 8, a.). The story that this collection of books was carried away by Xerxes, and subsequently restored by Seleucus (A. Gellius, L. c.), hardly rests on sufficient authority to deserve much notice. It was probably from his regard to religion and literature that many were disposed to class Peisistratus with the Seven Sages (Diog. Laërt. i. 122). Either from his patronage of diviners, or from his being, like his son Hipparchus, a collector of oracles, he received the surname of Bákas (Suid. s. v. Bákas; Schol. ad Aristoph. Pax, 1036 or 1071).

"On the whole, though we cannot approve of the steps by which he mounted to power, we must own that he made a princeely use of it, and may believe that, though under his dynasty, Athens could never have risen to the greatness she afterwards attained, she was indebted to his rule for a season of repose, during which she gained much of that strength which she finally unfolded." (Thirlwall, Hist. of Greece, vol. ii. p. 65.)

Peisistratus was thrice married (including his connection with the daughter of Megacles). The name of his first wife, the mother of Hippias and Hipparchus, we do not know. The statement of the Schoolist on Aristophanes (Equiv. 447) that her name was Myrrhine, arises probably from a confusion with the wife of Hippias. From Plutarch (Cato Major, c. 24) we learn that when Hippias and Hipparchus were grown up, Peisistratus married Timonassa, a lady of Argolis, and had by her two sons, Iophon and Thessalus. It is a conjecture of Vater's that Timonassa was connected with the royal house of Macedonia. Nothing more is known of Iophon; he probably died young. Hegesistratus, a bastard son of Peisistratus, has been already mentioned. Mention is also made of a daughter of Peisistratus, who was forcibly carried off by a youth named Thrasylus, or Thrasyomedes, and was afterwards married to him with the consent of her father, when, having put to sea, and fallen into the hands of Hippias, he was brought back. (Plut. Apopth. Peisistr., vol. ii. p. 189.) Thucydides (i. 20, vi. 54, &c.) expressly states, on what he declares to be good authority, that Hippias was the eldest son of Peisistratus (a statement which he defends by several arguments, not all very decisive, though they at least confirm it), contrary to the general opinion in his day, which assigned the priority of birth to Hipparchus. The authority of Thucydides is fully supported by Herodotus (v. 55) and Cleidemus (in Athen. xiii. p. 609, d.). Peisistratus died at an advanced age (Thuc. vi. 54) in b.c. 527 (Clinton, Fasti Hellen. vol. ii. App. c. 2), and was succeeded in the tyranny by his son Hippias (Herod. l. c.; Cled. l. c.), though the brothers appear to have administered the affairs of the state with so little outward distinction that they are frequently spoken of as though they had been joint tyrants. (Thucyd. l. c.; Schol. *ad Aristoph. Freg. 502, δὲ Ἰππίας ἑτέρας ἐπιβαίνουσαν, οὐδὲ ἰππαρχος κοίνως ἀναίτως πεισουστώς τύραννοι ἐλέγχοντο). They continued the government on the same principles as their father. Thucydides (vi. 54) speaks in terms of high commendation of the virtue and intelligence with which their rule was exercised till the death of Hipparchus; and the author of the dialogue Hipparchus (p. 229, b.) speaks of their government as a kind of golden age. There seems no reason to question the general truth of this description, though particular exceptions may be adduced, such as the assassination of Cimon, the father of Miltiades (Herod. vi. 39, 103. See Cimon). They exacted only one-twentieth of the produce of the land to defray their expenses in finishing the build-nings left incomplete by Peisistratus, or erecting new ones (though according to Suidas, s. v. τεράδιαν τεράδιον, Hipparchus exacted a good deal more money from the Athenians for building a wall round the Academy) for maintaining their mercenary troops, who bore the appellation ἄνωθοπόδες (Suid. s. v.; Schol. ad Aristoph. Lys. 664), and providing for the religious solemnities. Hipparchus inherited his father's literary tastes. It was he who erected on the roads leading to the country towns of Attica busts of Hermes, inscribed on one side with the distances from the city (which distances were measured from the altar of the twelve gods set up in the agora by Peisistratus, the son of Hippias, Thuc. vi. 54; Herod. ii. 7), and on the other side with some moral maxim in verse. (Pseudo-Plat. Hipparch. p. 228, d.) He also arranged the manner in which the rhapsodes were to recite the Homeric poems at the Panatheniac festival (ibid. p. 228, b). Several distinguished contemporary poets appear to have taken part at the court of the Peisistratids under the patronage of Hipparchus, as, for example, Simo-nides of Ceos (Pseudo-Plat. Hipparch. p. 228, c.; Aelian, V. H. viii. 2), Anacreon of Teos (ibid.), Lasus of Hermione, and Onomacritus (Herod. vii. 6). The latter was employed in making a collection of oracles of Musaeus, and was banished on being detected in an attempt to intercept them. [ONOMACRITUS.] This collection of oracles afterwards fell into the hands of Cleomenes. (Herod. v. 90.) The superstitious reverence for oracles and divination which appears to have led Hipparchus to banish Onomacritus again manifests itself in the story of the vision (Herod. v. 56). That he was also addicted to erotic gratification appears from the story of Harmodius, and the authority of Heraclides Ponticus, who terms him ἡφαιστίας.

Of the particular events of the first fourteen years of the government of Hippias we know scarcely anything. Thucydides (vi. 54) speaks of their carrying on wars, but what these were we do not know. It was during the tyranny of Hippias that Miltiades was sent to take possession of the Cher-soneus. [MILTIADES] But a great change in the character of his government ensued upon the murder of Hipparchus (b.c. 514), for the circumstances connected with which the reader is referred to the articles HARMODIUS and LEAENA. Hip-pías displayed on the occasion great presence of mind. As soon as he heard of the assassination of his brother, instead of rushing to the scene of it, he went quietly up to the armed citizens who were forming the procession, and, as though he intended to harrass them, directed them to go without their arms to a spot which he pointed out. He then ordered his guards to seize their arms, and to apprehend those whom he suspected of being concerned in the plot, and all who had daggers concealed about them. (What Polyaeus, i. 21. § 2, relates of Peisistratus has probably arisen out of a confusion with these events.) Under the influence of revengeful feelings and fears for his own safety Hippias now became a morose and suspicious tyrant. His rule became harsh, arbitrary, and exacting. (Thucyd. vi. 57—60.) He put to death great numbers of the citizens, and raised money by extraordinary imposts. It is probably to this period that we should refer the measures described by Aristotle (Oeconom. ii. p. 1347, ed. Bekker), such as having houses that were built so as to interfere with the public convenience put up for sale; and, under pretence of issuing a new coinage, getting the old coinage brought in at a low valuation, and then issuing it again without alteration. Feeling himself unsafe at Athens he began to look abroad for some place of retreat for himself and his family, in case he should be expelled from Athens. With this view he gave his daughter Archidice [ARCHIDICE] in marriage to Aeantides, the son of Hippoclaus, tyrant of Lampaspas, an alliance which he would doubtless have thought beneath him, had he not observed that Hippoculus was in great favour with Dareas.

The expulsion of the Peisistratids was finally brought about by the Alcmaeonidæ and Lacedaemonians. The former, since their last quarrel with Peisistratus, had shown unceasing hostility and hatred towards him and his successors, which the latter met by tokens of similar feelings, insomuch that they not only demolished their houses, but dug up their tombs. (Isocrates, de Bic. 26, p. 331, ed. Steph.) The Alcmaeonidæ were joined by other Athenian exiles, and had fortified a stronghold on the frontier of Attica, named Leipsydriion, on the heights of Parnes, above Paeonia (Aristot. ap. Schol. ad Aristoph. Lysist. 665; Suidas, s. v. ἄρθρον ἄρθρον καὶ ὄνομακροτέρον. Thirlwall, vol. ii. p. 70, note, remarks that the description seems to relate to some family seat of the Paeonii, who were kinsmen of the Alcmaeonidæ). They were, however, repulsed with loss in an atttempt to force their way back to Athens, and compelled to evacuate the fortress (Suidas, i. c.). Still they none the more remitted their machinations against the tyrants (Herod. v. 62). By well-timed liberality they had secured the favour of the Amphictyons and that of the Delphic oracle [ALCMENARIOIDE], which they still further secured by bribing the Pythia (Herod. v. 63). The repeated injunctions of the oracle to the Lacedaemonians to free Athens roused them at length to send an army under Anachomilus for the purpose of driving out the Peisistratids (though hitherto the family had been closely connected with them by the ties of hospitality). Anachomilus landed at Phalerus, but was defeated and slain by Hippias, who was assisted by a body of Thessalian cavalry under Cineas. The Lacedaemonians now sent a larger force under Cleomenes. The Thessalian cavalry were defeated on the borders, apparently at a place called Pallenion (Andoc. de Myst. 106), and returned home; and Hippias, unable to withstand his enemies in the field, retreated into the Acropolis. This being well supplied with stores, the Lacedaemonians, who were not prepared for a siege, would, in the judgment of Herodotus, have been quite unable to force Hippias to surrender, had it not been that his children fell into their hands, while being conveyed out of Attica for greater security, and were only restored on condition that Hippias and his connections should evacuate Attica within five days. They retired to Sigeeun, b.c. 510. (Herod. v. 64, &c.; Paus. iii. 4. § 2, 7, 8; Aristoph. Lysist. 1150, &c.). The family of the tyrants was condemned to perpetual banishment, a sentence which was maintained even in after times, when decrees of amnesty were passed (Andoc. de Myst. § 78). A monument recording the offences of the tyrants was set up in the Acropolis. (Thuc. vi. 55.)

The Spartans before long discovered the trick that had been played upon them by the Alcmeonidae and the Delphic oracle; and their jealousy of the Athenians being stimulated by the oracles, collected by Hipparchus, which Cleomenes found in the Acropolis, in which manifold evils were portended to them from the Athenians, they began to repent of having driven out their old friends the Peisistratidae, and accordingly sent for Hippias, who came to Sparta. Having summoned a congress of their allies, they laid the matter before them, and proposed that they should unite their forces and restore Hippias. But the vehement remonstrances of the Corinthian deputy Sosicles induced the allies to reject the proposal. Hippias, declining the offers that were made him of the town of Anthemus by Amyntus, and of Ioleos by the Thessalians, returned to Sigeum (Herod. v. 90—94), and addressed himself to Artaphernes. (Respecting the embassy of the Athenians to counteract his intrigues, see Artaphernes.) He had already formed a project to have gone to the court of Dareius (Herod. L. c.); while here they urged Dareius to inflict vengeance on Athens and Eretria, and Hippias himself accompanied the expedition sent under Datis and Artaphernes. From Eretria he led them to the plain of Marathon, as the most suitable for their landing, and arranged the troops when they had disembarked. While he was thus engaged, we are told, he happened to sneeze and cough violently, and, most of his teeth being loose from his great age, one of them fell out, and was lost in the sand; an incident from which Hippias augured that the expedition would miscarry, and that the hopes which he had been led by a dream to entertain of being restored to his native land before his death were buried with his tooth (Herod. vi. 102, 107). Where and when he died cannot be ascertained with certainty. According to Suidas (s. e. 'I AX'XON) he died at Lemnos on his return. According to Cicero (ad Att. ix. 10) and Justin (ii. 9) he fell in the battle of Marathon; though from his advanced age it seems rather unlikely that he should have been engaged in the battle. The family of the tyrant are once more mentioned (Herod. vii. 6) as at the court of Persia, urging Xerxes to invade Greece.

Hippias was in his youth the object of the affection of a man named Charmus (who had previously stood in a similar relation to Peisistratus; Plut. Solon. 1), and subsequently married his daughter (Athen. xiv. p. 609, d). His first wife was Myrrhine, the daughter of Callias, by whom he had five children (Thucyd. vi. 53). One of his sons, named Peisistratus, was Archon Epinymus during the tyranny of his father. Of Archidice, daughter of Hippias, mention has already been made. According to Thucydides (L. c.) Hippias was the only one of the legitimate sons of Peisistratus who had children.

What became of Thessalus we do not know. He is spoken of as a high-spirited youth (Heraclid. Pont. 1), and there is a story in Diodorus (Fragm. lib. x. Olymp. lxvi.) that he refused to have any share in the tyranny of his brothers, and was held in great esteem by the citizens. [C. P. M.]

2. A king of Orchomenus, in the time of the Polemoponnesian war, who became the object of the hatred of the oligarchical party, and was murdered in an assembly of the senate. To avoid detection his body was cut to pieces, and the parts of it carried away by the senators under their robes. Tlesimachus, the son of Peisistratus, who was privy to the conspiracy, quieted the populace, who were incensed at the disappearance of their king, by a story of his having appeared to him in a superhuman form after he had left the earth. (Plut. Parall. vol. ii. p. 313, b.)

3. A Boeotian statesman, who took the side of the Romans in the war between them and Philip, king of Macedonia. In conjunction with Zeuxippos, he was instrumental in inducing the Boeotians to attach themselves to Flumininus. After the battle of Cynoscephalae, when the faction of Brachyllas gained the upper hand, Peisistratus and Zeuxippos had Brachyllas assassinated, a crime for which Peisistratus was condemned to death (Liv. xxiii. 27, 28; Polyb. Libys. viii.).

4. A Spartan. In the war between the Romans and Mithridates, when Cyzicus was besieged by Mithridates (n. c. 74), Peisistratus was general of the Cyzicenes, and successfully defended the city against Mithridates (Appian, de Bello Mith. 73). [C. P. M.]

PEISON (Πείσων), one of the thirty tyrants established at Athens in b. c. 404. He was one of the authors of the proposal that, as several of the resident foreigners were discontented with the new government, and thus afforded a specious pretext for plundering them, each of the Thirty should select for himself one of the wealthy aliens, and, having put him to death, should appropriate his property. The proposal was adopted in spite of the opposition of Therenanes, and Peison went with Melobius and Mnesitheides to apprehend Lysias and his brother Polemarchus. Lysias, being left alone with Peison, bribed him with the offer of a talent to allow him to escape; but Peison, after the most solemn oath, seized all the money he could lay his hands upon, refusing to leave Lysias even as much as would serve for the expenses of his journey, and then delivered him up to Melobius and Mnesitheides. (Xen. Hell. ii. 3. §§ 2, 21, &c.; Lysias, c. Erotosth. pp. 120, 121.) [E. J.]

PEITHA'GORAS, or PEITHA'GORES (Πειθαγόρας, Πειθαγόρης). 1. A tyrant of Selinus in Sicily, from whom the Selinuntians freed themselves (n. c. 519) by the help of Eury Leon of Sparta (Herod. v. 46; Plat. Lyc. 20). (DORIEUS; EURLYON.)

2. A soothsayer, brother of Apollo dorus of Amphipolis, who was one of the generals of Alexander the Great. According to Aristobulus (ap. Arr. Anab. vii. 10), Apollodorus, having joined the king on his return from his Indian expedition and accompanied him to Ecbatana, imagined that he had grounds for defending his dismission. He wrote therefore to Peithagoras at Babylon, to inquire whether any danger threatened him from Alexander or Hephaestion. The answer was that he had nothing to fear from Hephaestion, who (so the victims portended) would soon be removed out of his way. The next day Hephaestion's death took place (b. c. 324,) and not long after Apollodorus received the same message from Peithagoras with respect to Alexander. Here again the event justified the prediction (Plut. Alex. 73). [E. J.] PEITHO (Πείθω). 1. The personification of Persuasion (Snodla or Swadela among the Romans), was worshipped as a divinity at Sicily, where she was honoured with a temple in the agora. (Herod. viii. 111; Paus. ii. 7. § 7.) Peitho also occurs as a surname of other divinities, such as Aphrodite, whose worship was said to have been introduced at Athens by Theseus, when he united the country communities into towns (Paus. i. 22. § 3), and of Artemis (ii. 21. § 1). At Athens the statues of Peitho and Aphrodite Pandemos stood closely together, and at Megara, too, the statue of Peitho stood in the temple of Aphrodite (Paus. i. 43. § 6), so that the two divinities must be conceived as closely connected, or the one, perhaps, merely as an attribute of the other.

2. One of the Synods. (Paus. ix. 35. § 1; Suid. s. v. Χαράδρης; comp. Charitès.)

3. One of the daughters of Oceanus and Theia. (Hes. Theog. 349.)

4. The wife of Phoroneus, and the mother of Aegeus and Aepia. (Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 920.) [I. S.]

PEITHON (Πείθων). 1. Son of Sosicles, was placed in command at Zarispa, where there were left several invalids of the horseguard, with a small body of mercenary cavalry. Arrian styles him the governor of the royal household at Zarispa. When Spitamenes made an irruption into Bactria, and advanced to the neighbourhood of Zarispa, Peithon, collecting all the soldiers he could muster, made a sally against the enemy, and having surprised them, recovered all the booty that they had taken. He was, however, himself surprised by Spitamenes as he was returning; most of his men were cut to pieces, and he himself, badly wounded, fell into the hands of the enemy. (Arrian, iv. 16.)

2. Son of Agenor. [See Python.] [C. P. M.]

PELAGIUS. Of the origin and early life of this remarkable man we are almost entirely ignorant. We know not the period of his birth, nor the precise date of his death, nor the place of his nativity, although the epithet Brio applied by his contemporaries has led to the belief that he was an Englishman, nor do we even know his real designation of which Pelagius (Πελάγιος) is supposed to be a translation, since the tradition that it was Morgan seems to be altogether uncertain. He first appears in history about the beginning of the fifth century, when we find him residing at Rome, not attached to any coenobitical fraternity, but adhering strictly to the most stringent rules of monkish self-restraint. By the purity of his life and by the fervour with which he sought to improve the morals of both clergy and laity, at that epoch sunk in the foulest corruption, he attracted the attention and gained the respect of all who desired that religion should exhibit some better fruits than mere empty professions and lifeless ceremonies, while he dauntlessly disturbed the repose of the supine, and provoked the hostility of the profligate by the energy with which he strove to awaken them to a sense of their danger, and to convince them of their guilt. In the year 409 or 410, when Alaric was threatening the metropolis, Pelagius accompanied by his disciple, friend, and ardent admirer Coele- tius [Coelctius] passed over along with many other fugitives to Sicily, from thence proceeded to Africa, where he held personal friendly communication with Augustine, and leaving Coelestius at Carthage, sailed for Palestine. The fame of his sanctity had preceded him, for upon his arrival he was received with great warmth by Jerome, and many other distinguished fathers of the church. Although it must have been evident to every close observer that the speculative views of Pelagius differed widely from those advocated with so much applause by the bishop of Hippo, no one had as yet ventured openly to impugn the orthodoxy of the former. But when Orosius, upon his arrival in the East [Orosiost], brought intelligence that the opinions of Coelestius had been formally reproved by Aurelius and the African Church (A. D. 412), whose condemnation extended to the master from whose instructions these opinions were derived, a great commotion arose throughout Syria, in which Jerome, instigated probably by Augustine, assumed an attitude of most active, not to say virulent, hostility towards Pelagius, who was formally impeached first before John of Jerusalem, secondly before the Synod of Diospolis (A. D. 415), summoned specially to judge this case, and fully acquitted by both tribunals. Soon afterwards, however, the Synods of Carthage and of Mileum, while they abstained from denouncing any individual, condemned unequivocally those principles which the followers of Pelagius and Coelestius were supposed to maintain, and at length, after much negotiation, Pope Innocentius was induced to anathematize the two leaders of what was now termed a deadly heresy, by a decree issued on the 27th of January, A. D. 417, about six weeks before his death; and this sentence, although at first reversed, was eventually confirmed by Zosimus [Zosimus]. Of the subsequent career of Pelagius nothing has been recorded. Mercator indeed declares that he was captured before Constantinople; he was found guilty, and sentenced to banishment; but this narrative is confirmed by no collateral evidence. So great however was the alarm excited by the progress of the new sect, that an appeal was made to the secular power, in consequence of which an imperial edict was promulgated at Constantinople in 418, threatening all who professed attachment to such errors with exile and confiscation, and the impression thus made was strengthened by the resolutions of a very numerous council, which met at Carthage in the course of the same year.

We need feel no surprise at the profound sensation created by the doctrines usually identified with the name of Pelagius, since unlike many of the frivolous subtleties which from time to time caused agitation and dissension in the Church, they in reality affect the very foundation of all religion, whether natural or revealed. He is represented as denying predestination, original sin, and the necessity of internal Divine Grace, and as asserting the absolute freedom of the will and the perfectibility of human nature by the unaided efforts of man himself; in other words as refusing to acknowledge the transmission of corruption from our first parents, the efficacy of baptism as the seal of regeneration, the operation of the Holy Spirit as indispensable in our progress towards holiness, and the insufficiency of our natural powers to work out salvation. But although the eager and probably ignorant Coelestius may have been hurried headlong forward in the heat of discussion into these or similar extravagant propositions, it is difficult to delude a man like Pelagius, so fully entertained or intended to incite such extreme views. Jerome and Augustine boldly charge him with covertly instilling this poison, but at the same time they both complain of the snake-like luridity with which he uniformly evaded the grasp of his opponents when they sought to fix him down to any substantial proposition, and of the haze of subtle dialectics with which he enveloped every point in debate, obscuring and confounding the vision of his judges. There can be no doubt, however, that although his speculations were of a most abstruse and refined character, their tendency was eminently practical; that he desired to banish all mysticism, to render religious truth an active power in the amelioration of the heart, and sought upon all occasions to demonstrate the inefficacy of mere nominal faith unaccompanied by works, to warn his hearers of the hazard they incurred by waiting passively for some manifestation of Divine favour, without making one effort to obtain it, and above all, to convince them that their justification depended in some degree upon them.

In forming an estimate of the real character of Pelagius, it must be remembered that his most bitter enemies freely admit the spotless purity of his life, and that he labours under this signal disadvantage, that his chief works are known to us only from the quotations of his adversaries. But even from those which are extant we may without want of charity infer that the charge of duplicity, or at least reserve, was not altogether unfounded. He does not appear to have possessed that straightforward courage which prompts a truly great mind boldly to proclaim what it deems a vital truth in defiance of obloquy and persecution. We are constantly struck with an indistinctness and ambiguity of phrase, which, after making very full allowance for the abstruse nature of the themes, cannot be altogether accidental, while his complex definitions and divisions, his six kinds of grace to take a single example, tend rather to perplex than to simplify his positions and his arguments. Hence he has endeavoured to convey the essence of his system, while he abstained from spreading alarm by the open enunciation of what might appear at once strange and perilous, hoping in this manner to avoid those angry controversies from which a refined and contemplative mind would shrink with disgust. In this project he might have succeeded had not his plans been frustrated by the impetuous sincerity of the more practical Cælestius, whose undisguised avowals first kindled against himself that flame of persecution which eventually involved his teacher also.

A very few only of the numerous and voluminous treatises of Pelagius have descended to us, and for a long period only one of these was supposed to be the work of his most bitter enemy.

1. Expositionum in Epistolas Pauli Libri XIV., written at Rome, and therefore not later than A.D. 310. These commentaries, which consist of short simple expository notes on all the Epistles of Paul, with the exception of that to the Hebrews, were at one period attributed to Gelasius, who was Bishop of Rome towards the end of the fifth century; they afterwards found their way into the MSS. of Jerome; and the admirers of that divine, considering it their duty to expunge every passage which seemed tinged with heresy, they have been transmitted to modern times in a state very different from that in which they issued from the hands of their composer, although his doubts with regard to original sin may still be very clearly traced, especially in the notes on the Epistle to the Romans. No doubt can exist with regard to their authenticity, which is established beyond dispute by the quotations of Augustine, Marius Mercator, and others. They will be found in the Benedictine edition of Jerome, and in that by Vallarsi. See Garnier’s edition of Mercator, Append. ad Diss. vi. p. 367.

II. Epistola ad Demetriudem, written in the East about 412, and addressed to a Roman lady of distinction, who had been induced by Augustine to abandon the pleasures of the world for a life of devout austerity. This piece, which is of considerable importance, inasmuch as it contains clear indications of the sentiments of Pelagius with regard to the excellence of human nature, was, as well as the last-mentioned, assigned to Jerome, but the real author was ascertained from the quotations by Augustine in his De Gratia Christi (capp. 22, 37, 41), and Pagi et religiosa Epistola ad Juliana, the mother of Demetrias. It will be found in the best editions of Jerome, and was published separately by Semler, 3vo. Hal. Magd. 1775.

III. Libellus Fidei ad Innocentianam Papam; a formal confession of faith, forwarded to Rome in 417, which, along with the preceding, was included among the tracts of Jerome under the title Hieronymi Explanatio Symboli ad Damasum; and here likewise the mistake was corrected by the quotations in the De Gratia Christi. It is to be found in all the best editions of Jerome. See also Garnier’s edition of Mercator, P. I. Diss. v. p. 307.

Another letter inscribed Epistola ad Celestium Matronam de Ratione pie vivendi, among the correspondence of Jerome, was supposed by Erasmus to belong to Paulinus of Nola, by Vallarsi to Sulpicius Severus, while Semler argues from the general tone and spirit with which it is imbued, as well as from the style, that it ought to be made over to Flavia Fevisso, mother of Julian, in the edition of Jerome by Vallarsi.

The following works are known to us only from fragmentary citations:—

1. Eulogiam Liber, designated by Gennadius as Eulogiarum pro actuali Conversatione ex Divinis Scripturis Liber; by Honorius as Pro actuali Vita Liber; by Orosius as Testimoniorum Liber. A collection of remarkable texts from Scripture in reference to practical morality, arranged and illustrated after the manner of the Testimonii of Cyprian [Cypriani, p. 914]. (Hieronym. Dialog. advers. Pelag. lib. i.; Augustin. c. duos Pelagijonorum epp. iv. 8; De Gestis Pelagii, c. 1, 6. Comp. Garnier, ad M. Mercat. Append. ad Diss. vi.)

2. De Nature Liber, to which Augustine replied in his De Natura et Gratia. The fragments have been collected by Garnier, l. c.

4. Epistola ad Augustinum; written after the Synod held in Palestine. (Augustin. de Gest. Pelag. c. 26; Garnier, ed. Mercat. l. c.)

PELASGUS.

1. According to the Arcadian tradition, he was either an Autchthon (Paus. ii. 14, § 3, vili. 1 § 2 ; Hea. op. Apollod. ii. 1 § 1), or a son of Zeus by Niobe ; and the Oceanide Meliboea, the nymph Cyllene, or Deianeira, became by him the mother of Lycom. (Apollod. l. e. iii. 8, § 1; Hygin. Fab. 229; Dionys. Hal. i. 11, 13.) According to others, again, Pelasgus was a son of Arestor, and grandson of Iasus, and immigrated into Arcadia, where he founded the town of Parrhasia. (Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 1642; Steph. Byz. s. e. Palmaria.)

2. In Argos, Pelasgus was believed to have been a son of Triopos and Sois, and a brother of Iasus, Agenor, and Xanthus, or a son of Phoroneus, and to have founded the city of Argos in Peloponnesus, to have taught the people agriculture, and to have received Demeter, on her wanderings, at Argos, where his tomb was shown in later times. (Paus. i. 14, § 2, ii. 22, § 2; Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 920; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 335; comp. Pelagisa.)

3. In Thessaly, Pelasgus was described as the father of Chlorus, and as the father of Haemon, or as the father of Haemon, and as the grandfather of Thessalus (Steph. Byz. s. v. Aitouva; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iii. 1089; Dionys. Hal. i. 17), or again as a son of Poseidon and Larissa, and as the founder of the Thessalian Argos. (Dionys. l. c., comp. Clinton, Fast. Hell. vol. i. p. 9, &c.)

PELEIDES, PELIDES (Πελείδης, Πελείδος), a patronymic from Pelus, by which his son Achilles is frequently designated. (Hom. II. i. 146, 188, 197, 277 ; Ov. Met. xii. 665.) [L. S.]

PELETHRONIUS, the reputed inventor of the bridle and saddle for horses. (Plin. Hist. Nat. vii. 56; Hygin. Fab. 274.) [L. S.]

PELEUS (Πελεύς), a son of Aeacus and Enides, was king of the Myrmidons at Pthia in Thessaly. (Hom. II. xxiv. 535.) He was a brother of Telamon, and step-brother of Phocus, the son of Aeacus, by the Nereid Pamathe. (Comp. Hom. II. xvi. 15, xxi. 189; Ov. Met. vii. 477, xiii. 365; Apollon. Rhod. ii. 869, iv. 853; Orph. Argos. 130.) According to some, Telamon was not a brother, but only a friend of Pelus. (Comp. Apollod. iii. 12, § 6.) Pelus and Telamon resolved to get rid of their stepbrother Phocus, because he excelled them in their military games, and Telamon killed him with a disk which he threw at him. The two brothers concealed their crime by removing the body of Phocus, but were nevertheless found out, and expelled by Aeacus from Aegina. (Apollod. iii. 12, § 6; comp. Horat. ad Pison. 96.) According to some, Pelus murdered Phocus (Diod. iv. 72; comp. Paus. ii. 29, § 7, x. 30, § 2), while others combine the two statements by saying that Pelus threw down Phocus with a disk, while Telamon despatched him with his sword. (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 175.) After being exiled from Aegina, Pelus went to Pthia in Thessaly, where he was purified from the murder by Eurytion, the son of Actor, married his daughter Antigone, and received with her a third of Eurytion's kingdom. (Hom. II. xvi. 175.) Apollod. iii. 12, § 6.) Actors relate that he went to Ceyx at Trachis (Ov. Met. xii. 296, &c.) and as he had come to Thessaly without certain Others, he prayed to Zeus for an army, and the god, to please Pelus, metamorphosed the ants (μυκτεραί) into men, who were accordingly called Myrmidons. (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 175.) By Antigone, Pelus is said to have become the father of Polydorn and Achilles. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 321.) Pelus accompanied Eurytion to the Calydonian hunt, and involuntarily killed him with his spear, in consequence of which he fled from Pthia to Iolcus, where he was again purified by Acastus. (Apollod. iii. 12, § 2; comp. Ov. Fast. ii. 39, &c.) According to others (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 175, 901), Pelus slew Actor, the son of Acastus. At the funeral games of Pelus, Pelus contended with Atalante, but was conquer (Apollod. iii. 9, § 2), whereas, according to Hyginus (Fab. 273) he gained the prize in wrestling. During his stay at Iolcus, Astydamia, the wife of Acastus, fell in love with him, and made proposals to him, which he rejected. In order to take vengeance on him, she sent a message to his wife at Pthia, that he was on the point of marrying Sterope, the daughter of Acastus. On receiving this information, the wife of Pelus hung herself. Astydamia further charged Peleus before her husband with having made improper proposers to her, and Acastus, unwilling to stain his hand with the blood of the man whom he had hospitably received, and whom he had purified from his guilt, took him to mount Pelion, where they hunted wild beasts; and when Peleus, overcome with fatigue, had fallen asleep, Acastus left him. So he had conceived his sword, that he might be destroyed by the wild beasts. When Peleus awoke and sought his sword, he was at tacked by Centaurs, but was saved by Cheiron, who also restored to him his sword. (Apollod. iii. 13. § 3.) To this account there are some modifications, for instead of Astydamain, Pindar (Nem. iv. 92, v. 46; comp. Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 224, ad Aristoph. Nub. 1059; Horat. Carm. iii. 7. 18) mentions Hippolyte, the daughter of Cethren, and others relate that after Acastus had concealed the sword of Peleus, Cheiron or Hermes brought him another one, which had been made by Hephæastus. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 204; Aristoph. Nub. 1055.)

While on mount Pelion, Peleus married the Nereid Thetis, by whom he became the father of Achilles, though some regarded this Thetis as different from the marine divinity, and called her a daughter of Cheiron. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 558; comp. Tassius.) The gods took part in the marriage solemnity, and Cheiron presented Peleus with a lance (Hom. il. xvi. 143, xxiv. 61, &c., which, however, according to Pindar, Nem. iii. 56), Peleus made for himself), Poseidon with the immortal horses, Baliss and Xanthus, and the other gods with arms. (Apollod. iii. 13. § 5; Hom. il. xvi. 361, xvii. 443, xviii. 84.) According to some, his immortal wife soon left him, though Homer knows nothing of it (Il. xviii. 86, 332, 441), for once, as he observed her at night while she held the infant Achilles over a fire or in a cauldron of boiling water, in order to destroy in him those parts which he had inherited from his father, and which were mortal, Peleus was terror-struck, and screamed so loud that she was prevented from completing her work. She therefore quitted his house, and returned to her sisters, the Nereides; but Peleus, or, according to others, Thetis herself (Orph. Argon. 385), took the boy Achilles up. (Apollod. iii. 13. § 6.) Homer mentions only Achilles as the son of Peleus and Thetis, but later writers state that she had already destroyed by fire six children, of whom she was the mother by Peleus, and that as she attempted the same with Achilles, her seventh child, she was prevented by Peleus. (Apollon. Rhod. iv. 316; Lycoph. 178; Ptolem. Hephæst. 6.) After this Peleus, who is also mentioned among the Argonauts, in conjunction with Jason and the Dioscuri, besieged Acastus at Iolcus, slew Astydameia, and over the scattred limbs of her body led his warriors into the city. (Apollod. iii. 13. § 7; comp. i. 9. § 16; Apollon. Rhod. i. 91; Orph. Argon. 130; Hygin. Fab. 14.) Some state that from mount Pelion Peleus, without an army, immediately returned to Iolcus, slew Acastus and his wife (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 224; Pind. Nem. iii. 39), and annexed Iolcus to the boy

monia. (Theoc. Pind. Nem. iv. 91.) Respecting the feud between Peleus and Acastus, the legends present great differences. Thus we are told, for example, that Acastus, or his sons, Artclaudor and Architeles, expelled Peleus from his kingdom of Phthia (Eurip. Troad. 1127, with the Schol.), or that the flocks which had been given by Peleus to Acastus, as an indemnification for the murder of his son Acter, were destroyed by a wolf, which was forthwith changed by Thetis into a stone (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 175, 391), or that Peleus, being abandoned during the chase by Acastus, was kindly received by Cheiron, and having acquired the possession of flocks, he took them to Irus, as an atonement for his son Eurytion, whom he had killed. But Irus refusing to accept them, Peleus allowed them to wander about without superintending shepherds, until they were attacked by a wolf. (Anton. Lib. 38.) This wolf was sent by Psmathes, to avenge the murder of Phoebus, but she herself afterwards, on the request of Thetis, changed him into stone. (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 175; Ov. Met. ix. 351, &c., 400.) Phoenix, who had been blinded by his own father Amaryntor, and who afterwards became the companion of Achilles, had his sight restored to him by Cheiron, at the request of Peleus, who also made him king of the Dolopes. (Lycoph. 421; Hom. il. ii. 436, 480.) Peleus also received in his dominion Epeicus, son of Agacies, and Patroclus who had fled from his home, and supposed to be killed by the hand of Peleus. (Pind. Lyc. 30, 79.) Peleus and his sons were scattered from Thessaly to the borders of Pelopia, a daughter of Polyneikes, a daughter of Peleus. (Hom. Il. xvi. 571, xxiii. 89; Apollod. iii. 13. § 8.) Peleus, who had once joined Hercules in his expedition against Troy (Pind. Od. viii. 60), was too old to accompany his son Achilles against that city: he remained at home and survived the death of his son. (Hom. Il. xviii. 434, Od. xi. 495.)

PELIADES (Πελιάδες), the daughters of Peleus. (Eurip. Med. 9; Hygin. Fab. 24; comp. Pelias.)

PELIAS (Πέλιας). 1. A son of Poseidon or Crethus, Hygin. Fab. 12; Schol. ad Theodorit. iii. 45) and Tyro. The latter, a daughter of Salmo- neus, was in love, in her youth, with the river-god Eipeicus, and Poseidon assuming the appearance of Eipeicus, visited her, and became by her the father of Pelias and Neleus. Afterwards she was married to Crethus, her father's brother; she became by him the mother of Aeson, Phères, and Amy- thon. (Hom. Od. xi. 294, &c.; Apollod. i. 9. § 8; Hygin. Fab. 15.) Pelias was exposed by their mother, and one of them was struck by a mare which passed by, so that his face became black, and a shepherd who found the child called him Pelias (from πέλας, Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1662); and the other child which was suckled by a she-dog, was called Neleus, and both were brought up by the shepherd. When they had grown up to manhood, they discovered who their mother was, and Pelias killed Sidero, the wife of Salomeus and step-mother of Tyro, at the altar of Hera, because she had ill used his step-daughter Tyro. After the death of Crethus, Pelias did not allow his step-brother Aeson to undertake the government of the kingdom, and after expelling even his own brother Neleus he ruled at Iolcus (Schol. ad Eurip. Acest. 255; comp. Paus. iv. 2. § 9), whereas according to others, he did not reign at Iolcus till after Aeson's death, and even then only as the guardian of Jason, the son of Aeson. (Schol. ad Hom. Od. xii. 70.) It is probably in allusion to his conduct towards his own brothers that Hesiod (Theog. 996) calls him ἱφθαρτος. He married, according to some (Hygin. Fab. 14), Anaxibia, the daughter of Bias, and according to chers, Philomache, the daughter of Amphion, by whom he became the father of Acus tus, Peisidias, Pelopia, Hippothoe and Alcestis. (Apollod. i. 9. §8, &c.) Besides these daughters of Pelias (Pe- liades), several others are mentioned, such as Medusa (Hygin. Fab. 24), Amphimone, Evadne (Diod. iv. 53), Asteropea and Antinoe. (Paus. viii. 11. § 2.) The Peliades were represented on the chest of Cypselus, where however the name of Alcestis alone was written. (Paus. v. 17. § 4; comp. Hom. II. ii. 715; Ov. Trist. v. 55.) After the murder of their father, they are said to have fled from Iolcus to Mantinea in Arcadia, where their tombs also were shown. (Paus. viii. 11. § 2.) Jason, after his return from Colchis, gave Alcestis in marriage to Admetus, Amphimone to Andraemon, and Evadne to Canes (Diod. iv. 53), though according to the common story, Pelias himself gave Alcestis to Admetus. [Alcestis.] After Pelias had taken possession of the kingdom of Iolcus, he sent Jason, the son of his step-brother Aeson, to Colchis to fetch the golden fleece, and as he did not anticipate his return, he despatched Aeson and his son Promachus. After the return of Jason, Pelias was cut to pieces and boiled by his own daughters, who had been told by Medea that in this manner they might restore their father to vigour and youth. His son, Acatus, held solemn funeral games in his honour at Iolcus, and expelled Jason and Medea from the country. (Apollod. i. 9. § 37, &c.; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 175; Ov. Met. vii. 297, &c.; comp. Jason, Medea, Argonautae.) Pelias is further mentioned as one of the first who celebrated the Olympic games. (Paus. v. 6. § 1.) 2. A son of Aeginaes and a descendant of Lacedaemonius, is mentioned by Pausanias (vii. 16. § 4). [L. S.] PELIGNUS, JU'LIIUS, procurator of Cappa docia in the reign of Claudius, A. D. 52. (Tac. Ann. xii. 49.) PELLEN (Πέλλην), a son of Phorbas and grandson of Triopas, of Argos, was believed by the Argives to have founded the town of Pellene in Achaia, (Paus. vii. 26. § 5.) [L. S.] PELLO'NIA, a Roman divinity, who was believed to assist mortals in warding off their enemies. (August. De Civ. Dei, iv. 21; Arnob. Ado. Gent. iv. 4.) [L. S.] PEL'OEPIA. (Πελοπιέα.) 1. A daughter of Pelias. (Apollod. i. 9. § 10; Apollon. Rhod. i. 326.) 2. A daughter of Amphin and Niobe. (Apollod. iii. 5. § 6; Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 159.) 3. A daughter of Thyestes. (Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 14; Hygin. Fab. 88; Aelian, V. H. xii. 49.) 4. The mother of Cyrus and Ares. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 7; comp. Cy'ncus.) [L. S.] PELOP'IDAS (Πέλοπιδας), the Theban general and statesman, son of Hippocles, was descended from a noble family and inherited a large estate, of which, according to Plutarch, he made a liberal use, applying his money to the relief of such as were at once indigent and deserving. He lived always in the closest friendship with Epaminondas, to whose simple frugality, as he could not persuade him to share his riches, he is said to have assimilated his own mode of life. The disinterested ardour which marked his friendship was conspicuous also in his zealous attention to public affairs. This he even carried so far as to neglect and impair his property, remarking in answer to the remon strance of some of his friends, that money was certainly useful to such as were lame and blind. Hence, of course, he could not fail to be a marked man in any political commotion, and, accordingly, on the seizure of the Cadmeia by Phoebidas, in B.C. 382, he was obliged to flee from Thebes, and took refuge, with his fellow-exiles, at Athens. Here he was the chief instigator and counsellor of the enterprise by which democracy was restored to Thebes, and which Plutarch tells us the Greeks called "sister to that of Thrasybulus." In the execu tion of it also he bore a prominent part: it was by his hand that Leontiades fell; and, being made Boeotarch, induced Sphodrias, the Spartan harmost at Theospin, to invade Attica, and thus succeeded in embroiling Athens with Lacedaemon [Gorgidas]; and in the campaigns against the Lacedaemonians in that and the two following years he was actively occupied, gradually teaching his countrymen to cope fearlessly with the forces of Sparta, which had ever been deemed so formidable. The successes occasionally gained by the Thebans during this period (slight in themselves, but not unimportant in the spirit which they engendered) Pelopidas shared with others; but the glory of the battle of Tegeya, in B.C. 375, was all his own. The town of Orchomenus in Boeotia, hostile to Thebes, had admitted a Spartan garrison of two mens, and during the absence of this force on an expedition into Locris, Pelopidas formed the design of surprising the place, taking with him for the purpose only the Sacred Band and a small body of cavalry. When he arrived, however, he found that the absent garrison had been replaced by fresh troops from Sparta. and he saw, therefore, the necessity of retreating. On his march back, he fell in, near Tegeya, with the two mens which formed the garrison at Orchomenus, returning from Locri under the polemarch Gorgoleon and Theopompos. In spite of the inferiority of his numbers, Pelopidas exhibited great coolness and presence of mind; and when one, running up to him, exclaimed, "We have fallen into the midst of the enemy," his answer was, "Why so, more than they into the midst of us?" In the battle which ensued, the two Spartan commanders fell at the first charge, and the Thebans gained a complete victory. Plutarch might well call this the prologue of Leuctra, proving as it did that Sparta was not invincible, even in a pitched battle, and with the advantage of numbers on her side. At Leuctra (B.C. 371) Pelopidas joined Epaminondas in urging the expediency of immediate action; he raised the courage of his countrymen by the dream with which he professed to have been favoured, and by the propitiatory sacrifice which he offered in obedi ence to it [Ske'daurus], and the success of the day was due in a great measure to him and to the Sacred Band, which he commanded. In B.C. 369, he was one of the generals of the Theban force which invaded the Peloponnesus, and he united with Epaminondas in persuading their colleagues not to return home till they had carried their arms into the territory of Sparta itself, though they would thus be exceeding their legal term of office.
PELOPIDAS.

For this, Epaminondas and Pelopidas were impeached afterwards by their enemies at Thebes, but were honourably acquitted. [Epaminondas; Menecleidas.] Early in B.C. 368, the Thessalians who were suffering under the oppression of Alexander of Pherae, applied for aid to Thebes. The appeal was responded to, and Pelopidas, being entrusted with the command of the expedition, occupied Larissa, and received the submission of the tyrant, who had come thither for the purpose, but who soon after sought safety in flight, alarmed at the indignation shown by Pelopidas at the tales he heard of his cruelty and profligacy. From Thessaly Pelopidas advanced into Macedonia, to arbitrate between Alexander II. and Poteloey of Alorus. Having accommodated their differences, he took away with him, as hostages for the continuance of tranquillity, thirty boys of the noblest families, among whom, according to Plutarch and Diodorus, was the famous Philip, the father of Alexander the Great. [Philopappus II.] When he had collected the same forces, he went again into Thessaly, in consequence of fresh complaints against Alexander of Pherae; but he went simply as an ambassador, not expecting any opposition, and unprovided with a military force. Meanwhile Alexander, the Macedonian king, had been murdered by Poteloey of Alorus; and Pelopidas, being applied to by the loyalists to aid them against the usurper, hired some mercenaries and marched into Macedonia. If we may believe Plutarch, Poteloey seduced his soldiers from him by bribes, and yet, alarmed by his name and reputation, met him submissively, and promised to be a faithful ally of Thebes, and to keep the throne for Perdiccas and Philip, the brothers of the late king, placing in his hands at the same time his son Philoxenus and fifty of his friends, as hostages for the fulfilment of his engagement. After this, Pelopidas, offended at the desertion of his mercenaries, marched with a body of Thessalians, whom he had collected against Pharsalus, where he heard that most of the property of the delinquents was placed, as well as their wives and children. While he was before the town, Alexander of Pherae presented himself, and Pelopidas, thinking that he had come to give an account of his conduct, went to meet him, accompanied by a few friends and unarmed. The tyrant seized him, and confined him closely at Pherae, where he remained till his liberation, in B.C. 367, by a Theban force under Epaminondas. During his imprisonment he is said to have treated Alexander with defiance, and to have exasperated his wife Thebe against him. In the same year in which he was released he was sent as ambassador to Suss, to counteract the Lacedaemonian and Athenian negotiations at the Persian court. His fame had preceded him, and he was received with marked distinction by the king, and obtained, as far as Persia could grant it, all that he asked for, viz. that Messenia should be independent, that the Athenians should lay up their ships, and that the Thebans should be regarded as hereditary friends of the king. For himself, Pelopidas refused all the presents which Artaxerxes offered him, and, according to Plutarch (Artax. 22), avoided during his mission all that to a Greek mind would appear to be unmanly marks of homage.

In B.C. 364, the Thessalian towns, those especially of Magnesia and Phthiotis, again applied to Thbes for protection against Alexander, and Pelopidas was appointed to aid them. He formed, however, were dismayed by an eclipse of the sun (June 13), and, therefore, leaving them behind, he took with him into Thessaly only 300 horse, having set out amidst the warnings of the soothsayers. On his arrival at Pharsalus he collected a force which he deemed sufficient, and marched against Alexander, treating lightly the great disparity of numbers, and remarking that it was better as it was, since there would be more for him to conquer. According to Diodorus, he found the tyrant occupying a commanding position on the heights of Cynosephalae. Here a battle ensued, in which Pelopidas drove the enemy from their ground, but he himself was slain as, burning with resentment, he pressed rashly forward to attack Alexander in person. The Thebans and Thessalians made great lamentations for his death, and the latter, having earnestly requested leave to bury him, celebrated his funeral with extraordinary splendour. They honoured his memory also with statues and golden crowns, and gave more substantial proofs of their gratitude by presents of large estates to his children.

Pelopidas has been censured, obviously with justice, for the rashness, unbecoming a general, which he exhibited in his last battle; and we may well believe that, on more occasions than this, his fiery temperament betrayed him into acts characteristic rather of the gallant soldier than of the prudent commander. His success at the court of Artaxerxes would lead us to ascribe to him considerable skill in diplomacy; but some deduction must be made from this in consideration of the very favourable circumstances under which his mission was undertaken, and the prestige which accompanied him in consequence of the high position of his country at that period, and the recent humiliation of Sparta. Certainly, however, this very power of Thebes, unprecedented as it was, was owing mainly to himself and to Epaminondas. These are minor points. Viewing him as a man, and taking him all in all, Pelopidas was truly one of nature's noblemen; and, if he was inferior to Epaminondas in powers of mind and in commanding strength of character, he was raised above ordinary men by his disinterested patriotism, his uncalculating generosity, and, not least, by his cordial, affectionate, unenvying admiration of his greater friend. (Plut. Pelopidas, Reg. et Imp. Apolph. p. 61, ed. Tauchn.; Diod. xvi. 62, &c., 67, 71, 75, 80, 81; Wess. ad loc.; Xem. Hell. vii. 1 §§ 33, &c.; Ael. V. PELOPS. [Πηλόπ.] I. A grandson of Zeus, and of Tantalus and Dione, the daughter of Atlas. (Hygin. Fob. 83; Eurip. Orest. init.) As he was treading a pleasant ground, he was called by Pindar Κρόνος (Ol. ii. 41), though it may also contain an allusion to Pluto, the mother of Tantalus, who was a daughter of Cronus. (Pluto.) Some writers call the mother of Pelops Euryanassa or Clytia. (Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 5, 11; Tzetz. ad Ige. 52; comp. Apostol. Centur, xviii. 7.) He was married to Hippodameia, by whom he became the father of Atreus (Leteus, Paus. vi. 22. § 5), Thyestes, Dias, Cynoauris, Corinthius, Hippalmus (Hippealimus or Hipal-cimus), Hipppasus, Cleon, Argeus, Alchithus, Aelius, Pittheus, Troezen, Nicippo and Lysides. (Apoll. ii. 4. § 5; Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 5.) By Axioshe or the nymph Danae he is said to have been the father of Chrysippus (Schol. ad Eurip. l. c. Plut. Parallel. min. 33). The father of Pindar (i. 89) he had only six sons by Hippodameia, whereas the Schol. (ad Ol. i. 144) mentions Pleisthenes and Chrysippus as sons of Pelops by Hippodameia. Further, while the common accounts mention only the two daughters above named, Plutarch (Thes. 3) speaks of many daughters of Pelops.

Pelops was king of Pisia in Elia, and from him the great southern peninsula of Greece was believed to have derived its name Peleponnesus; the nine small islands, moreover, which were situated off the Troezenian coast, opposite Methana, are said to have been called after him the Peloponiscn islands. (Paus. ii. 54. § 4.) According to a tradition which became very general in later times, Pelops was a Phrygian, who was expelled from Sipylius by Ilos (Paus. ii. 22. § 4, v. 13. § 4), whereupon the exile then came with his great wealth to one Pindar (i. 5); Thue. i. 48; Athen. i. 1292; Pind. Ol. i. 36, ix. 15) ; others describe him as a Paphlagonian, and call him an Eneteian, from the Paphlagonian town of Enete, and the Paphlagonians themselves ἐνετείς (Apollon. Rhod. ii. 358, with the Schol., and 759; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. i. 37; Dial. iv. 74), while others again represent him as a native of Greece, who came from Oeionos in Achaea. (Schol. ad Pind. l. c.) Some, further, call him an Arcadian, and state that by a stratagem he slew the Arcadian king Symphalus, and scattered about the limbs of his body which he had cut to pieces. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 6) There can be little doubt that in the earliest and most genuine traditions, Pelops was described as a native of Greece and not as a foreign immigrant; and in them he is called the tamer of horses and the favourite of Poseidon. (Hom. Il. i. 104; Paus. v. 1. § 5, 8. § 1; Pind. Ol. i. 38.)

The legends about Pelops consist mainly of the story of his being cut to pieces and boiled, and of the tale concerning his contest with Oenomaus and Hippodameia, to which may be added the legends about his relation to his sons and about his remains.

1. Pelops cut to pieces and boiled. (Ὑποτρίπτου Πελοπός.) Tantalus, the favourite of the gods, it is said, once invited them to a repast, and on that occasion he slaughtered his own son, and having boiled him set the flesh before them that they might eat it. But the immortal gods, knowing what it was, did not touch it; Demeter alone being absorbed by her grief about her lost daughter (others mentioned Thetis, Schol. ad Pind. Ol. i. 37), consumed the shoulder of Pelops. Hereupon the gods ordered Hermes to put the limbs of Pelops into a cauldron, and thereby restore to him his life and former appearance. When the process was over, Clothe took him out of the cauldron, and as the shoulder consumed by Demeter was wanting, Demeter supplied its place by a piece of ivory owned by his descendants (the Pelipidae), as a mark of their origin, were believed to have one shoulder as white as ivory. (Pind. Ol. i. 37, &c. with the Schol.; Tzet. ad Lyc. 152; Hygin. Fab. 83; Virg. Georg. iii. 7; Ov. Met. vi. 404.) This story is not related by all authors in the same manner, for according to some, Rhea restored Pelops, and Pan, the companion of Rhea, danced on the occasion. (Schol. ad Aristid. p. 216, ed. Frommel; Lucian, De Sallal. 54; Paus. v. 13. § 4.) Pindar, again, denies the story of the ἐνετείς, and states that Poseidon, being in love with the beautiful boy Pelops, carried him off, whereupon Pelops, like Ganymedes, for a time stayed with the gods. (Ol. i. 46, &c.; comp. Schol. ad Ol. i. 69; Eurip. Iph. Taur. 387; Philost. Imag. i. 17; Lucian, Charid. 7; Tibull. i. 4. 57.)

2. Contest with Oenomaus and Hippodameia. As an oracle had declared to Oenomaus that he should be killed by his son-in-law, he refused giving his fair daughter Hippodameia in marriage to any one. (Some said that he himself was in love with his daughter, and for this reason refused to give her to any one; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 156; Lucian, Charid. 19; Hygin. Fab. 253.) Many suitors however, appearing, Oenomaus declared that he would give her to him, who should conquer him in the chariot-race, but that he should kill those that should be conquered by him. [ΟΕΝΟΜΑΥΣ.] Among other suitors Pelops also presented himself, but when he found that in his conquered predecessors stuck up as well the death of Oenomaus he was filled with fear, and endeavoured to gain the favour of Myrtilus, the charioteer of Oenomaus, promising him half the kingdom if he would assist him in gaining Hippodameia. Myrtilus agreed, and did not properly fasten the wheels to the chariots of Oenomaus, so that he might be upset during the race. The plan succeeded, and Oenomaus dying pronounced a curse upon Myrtilus. When Pelops returned home with Hippodameia and Myrtilus, he resolved to throw the latter into the sea. As Myrtilus sank, he cursed Pelops and his whole race. (Hygin. Fab. 84; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. i. 114; Dial. iv. 73; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 183.) This story too is related with various modifications. According to Pindar, Pelops did not gain the victory by any stratagem, but called for assistance upon Poseidon, who gave him a chariot and horses by which he overcame Oenomaus. (Ol. i. 109, &c.) On the chest of Cypselus where the race was represented, Pelops was shown in the chariot (Paus. v. 17. § 16, 17; Apollon. Rhod. i. 752, &c.; Hippodameia and Myrtilus.) In order to atone for the murder of Myrtilus, Pelops founded the first temple of Hermes in Peloponnesus (Paus. v. 15. § 5), and he also erected a monument to the unsuccessful suitors of Hippodameia, at which an annual sacrifice was offered to them (vi. 21. § 7). When Pelops had gained possession of Hippodameia, he went with her to Pisia in Elia, and soon also made himself master of Olympia, where he restored the Olympian games with greater splendour than they had ever had before. (Pind. Ol. ix. 16; Paus. v. 1. § 8, 8. § 1.) He received his sceptre from Hermes and bequeathed it to Atreus. (Hom. Il. ii. 104.)

3. The sons of Pelops. Chrysippus who was the favourite of his father, roused the envy of his brothers, who in concert with Hippodameia, prevailed upon the two eldest among them, Atreus and Thyestes, to kill Chrysippus. They accomplished their crime, and threw the body of their murdered brother into a well. According to some Atreus alone was the murderer (Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 800), or Pelops himself killed him (Schol. ad Theseid. i. 9), or Chrysippus made away with himself (Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 1760), or Hippodameia slew him, because her own sons refused to do it. (Pind. Parall. Min. 33.) According to the common tradition, however, Pelops, who suspected his sons of the murder, expelled them from the country, and they dispersed all over Peloponnesus. (Schol. ad Eurip. Or. 5 ; Paus. v. 8. § 1.) Hippodameia, dreading the anger of her husband, fled to Midea in Argolis, from whence her remains were afterwards conveyed by Pelops, at the command of an oracle, to Olympia. (Paus. vi. 20. § 4.) Some state that Hippodameia made away with herself. (Hygin. Fab. 85, 243.) She had a sanctuary at Olympia in the grove Altis, to which women alone had access, and in the race course at Olympia there was a bronze statue of her. (Paus. vi. 20. § 10.)

4. The remains of Pelops. While the Greeks were engaged in the siege of Troy, they were informed by an oracle, that the city could not be taken, unless one of the bones of Pelops were brought from Elis to Troy. The shoulder bone accordingly was fetched from Eletrina or Pisa, but was lost together with the ship in which it was carried, off the coast of Euboea. Many years afterwards it was dragged up from the bottom of the sea by a fisherman, Demarmenus of Eretria, who concealed it in the sand, and then consulted the Delphic oracle about it. At Delphi he met ambassadors of the Eleians, who had come to consult the oracle respecting a plague, which was raging in their country. The Pythia requested Demarmenus to give the shoulder bone of Pelops to the Eleians. This was done accordingly, and the Eleians appointed Demarmenus to guard the venerable relic. (Paus. v. 13. § 3 ; Tzetz., ad Lyc. p. 52, 54.) According to some the Palladium was made of the bones of Pelops. (Clem. Alex. ad Gent. p. 30, d ; comp. Plin. H. N. xxviii. 4.) Pelops was honoured at Olympia above all other heroes. (Paus. v. 13. § 1.) His tomb with an iron sarcophagus existed on the banks of the Alpheus, not far from the temple of Artemis near Pisa; and every year the ephori there scourged themselves, shedding their blood as a funeral sacrifice to the hero. (Schol. ad Pind. Ol. i. 146.) The spot on which his sanctuary (Πελόπιανα) stood in the grove Altis, was said to have been dedicated by Hercules, who also offered to him the first sacrifices. (Paus. l. c. ; v. 26, in fin. ; Apollod. ii. 7. § 2.)

The magistrates of the Eleians likewise offered to him there an annual sacrifice, consisting of a black ram, with special ceremonies. (Paus. v. 13. § 2.) His chariot was shown in the temple of Demeter at Phlius, and his sword in the treasury of the Sic’yonians at Olympia. (Paus. ii. 14. § 3, vi. 19. § 3.)

2. Of Opus, one of the suitors of Hippodameia who was unsuccessful, and was killed. (Schol. ad Pind. Ol. i. 127.)

3. A son of Agamemnon by Cassandra. (Paus. ii. 16. § 5.)

PELOPS (Πελόπ), a physician of Smyrna, in Lydia, in the second century after Christ, celebrated for his anatomical knowledge. He was a pupil of Numisius (Galien, Comment. in Hippocr. “De Nat. Hom.” ii. 6. xv. p. 136), and one of Galen’s earliest tutors, who went to Smyrna, and resided in his house for some time, on purpose to attend his lectures and those of the Platonic philosopher Albinus, about A. p. 150. (De Anat. Admin. i. 1, vol. ii. p. 217; De Atra Fili, c. 3, vol. v. p. 112; De Locis Affect. iii. 11, vol. viii. p. 194, De Libris Proprios, c. 2, and De Ord. Libror. suor, vol. xix. pp. 16, 17, 57.) He wrote a work entitled Πελόπιανα Εἰρύμενα, Introductions Hippocraticae, consisting of at least three books (Galien, De Muscul. Dissect. init. vol. xviii. pt. ii. p. 920), in the second of which he maintained that the brain was the origin not only of the nerves, but also of the veins and arteries, though in another of his works he considered the veins to arise from the liver, like most of the ancient anatomists (Galien, De Hippocr. et Plat. Deocr. vi. 3, 5, vol. v. pp. 527, 544). He is several times mentioned in other parts of Galen’s writings, and is said by the author of the spurious commentary on the Aphorisms of Hippocrates, that goes under the name of Oribasius (p. 8. ed. Basil. 1533), to have translated the Aphorisms into Latin, word for word. He is quoted also by Paulus Aegineta (iii. 20, p. 430), with reference to the treatment of tetanus.

2. The medical writer quoted by Pliny (H. N. xxxiii. 16). must be a different person, who lived about a century earlier than Galen’s tutor, though Fabricius, by an oversight, speaks of him as the same person (Bibl. Gr. vol. xiii. p. 360, ed. vet.); and this is probably the physician quoted by Asclepiades Pharmacian (ap. Galen, De Antal. ii. 11, vol. xiv. p. 172). [W. A. G.]

PELOR (Πελώρ), one of the Spartan or men that grew from the dragons’ teeth which Cadmus sowed at Thebes. (Apollod. iii. 4. § 1 ; Paus. ix. 5. § 1 ; Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 670 ; comp. CADMUS.) [L. S.]

PENATES, the household gods of the Romans, both in regard to a private family and to the state, as the great family of citizens: hence we shall have to distinguish between private and public Penates. The name is unquestionably connected with penuis, they being the gods who were worshipped, and whose images were kept in the central part of the house, or the penetralia, and who thus protected the whole household. (Isidor. Orig. xi. 11 ; Fest. s. vv. Penetralia, Penus.) The Greeks, when speaking of the Roman Penates, called them Σελατρώπι, τεντόνεια, κτησιον, μέχοιον, ἕρικον. (Dionys. l. 67.) The Lares therefore were included among the Penates; both names; in fact, are often used synonymously (Schol. ad Horat. Epod. i. 43 ; Plaut. Mena. v. 1. 5 ; Aufl. ii. 8. 16 ; Plin. H. N. xxviii. 20), and the figures of two youths whom Dionysius (l. 68) saw in the temple of the Penates, were no doubt the same as the Lares praestites, that is, the twin founders of the city of Rome. The Lares, however, though they may be regarded as identical with the Penates, were yet not only the Penates, for each family had usually no more than one Lar, whereas the Penates are always spoken of in the plural. (Plaut. Mena. v. 1. 5.) Now considering that Jupiter and Juno were regarded as the protectors and the promoters of happiness, peace, and concord in the family, and that Jupiter is not only called a deus penetralis (Fest. s. v. Hercenus), but that sacrifices were offered to him on the hearth along with the Lares, there can be little doubt but that Jupiter and Juno too were worshipped as Penates. Vesta also is reckoned among the Penates (Serv. ad Aen. ii. 297; Macrob. Sat. iii. 4; Ov. Met. xv. 864), for each hearth, being the symbol of domestic union, had its Vesta. All other Penates, both public and private, seem to have consisted of certain sacred relics connected with indefinite divinities, and hence the expression of Varro, that the number and names of the Penates were indefinite (ap. Arnob. iii. 40; Macrobr. l.c.; Isid. Orig. viii. 11). This statement of a great antiquarian might have deterred any one from entering upon any further investigation; but some have nevertheless ventured upon the wild speculation, and conjectured that the Penates were Neptune and Apollo, because these divinities had surrounded Troy with walls. According to this view the Penates were the sacred relics that were believed to have been brought from Troy to Italy (Arnob. iii. 40; Macrobr. l.c.) According to an Etruscan opinion the Penates were four in number, or divided into four classes, viz. Jupiter and his suite, Neptune and his train, and the gods of the upper and lower worlds; but this opinion is certainly based upon a view of the Penates which is different from that entertained by the Romans. Others again believed that the Penates were those divinities who were the representatives of the vital principle in man and nature, that is, Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva, to whom Tarquinius built a common temple on the Capitol; and as Tarquinius was believed to have been initiated in the Samothracian mysteries, the Penates were identified with the great gods of Samothrace. This was accounted for by the supposition that the Trojan Penates who had been brought to Italy, had been introduced at Troy from Samothrace. (Dionys. l. 68; Serv. ad Aen. ii. 325, iii. 148; Macrobr. l.c.) But all these opinions and conjectures are of little value. The public Penates of the city of Rome had a chapel somewhere about the centre of the city, in a place called sub Velia. They were represented as two youths with lances in their hands, and similar images of them existed in many other sanctuaries. (Dionys. l. 68; Liv. xiv. 16.) Laviniun, the central point of Latium, too, had the Penates, who had been brought by Aeacus from Troy (Varr. De L. L. v. 144; Dionys. l. 67), and every Roman consul, dictator, and praetor, immediately after entering upon his office, was bound to offer up a sacrifice to the Penates and Vesta at Lamvaun. (Macrobr. Sat. iii. 43.) As the public Latres were worshipped in the central part of the city or country, and at the public hearth, so the private Penates had their place at the hearth of every house; but not only the hearth was sacred to them, but the table also. On the hearth a perpetual fire was kept up in their honour, and the table always contained the salt-cellar and the firstlings of fruit for these divinities. (Plut. Sertor. vii. 4; Arnob. ii. 67; Liv. xxvi. 36; Val. Max. iv. 4. § 3; Cic. De Fin. ii. 7.) Every meal that was taken in the house thus resembled a sacrifice offered to the Penates, beginning with a purification and ending with a libation which was poured either on the table or upon the hearth. After every absence from the hearth, the Penates were saluted like the living inhabitants of the house; and whoever went abroad prayed to the Penates and Latres for a happy return, and when he came back to his house, he hung up his armour, staff, and the like by the side of their images (Terent. Phorm. ii. 1. 81; Plaut. Sich. iv. 1. 29; Ov. Trist. i. 3. 41, iv. 8. 21), and on the whole, there was no event occurring in a family, whether sad or joyful, in which people did not pray to the Latres and Penates. (Comp. Hartung, Die Relig. der Röm. vol. i. p. 71, &c.; Klausen, Aeneas und die Penaten, p. 620, &c.) [L. S.]

PENEUS (Πηνέως), also called Peneus, a Thessalian river god, and a son of Oceanus and Tethys. (Hes. Theog. 343; Hom. II. ii. 757; Od. Met. i. 568, &c.) By the Naiad Cressa he became the father of Hypseis, Stilbe, and Daphne. (Diod. i. 69; Ov. Am. iii. 6. 31; Hygin. Fab. 203; Serv. ad Aen. i. 93; Od. Met. iv. 452; Pind. Pyth. ix. 26, where the Scholiast, instead of Cressa, mentions Phillyna, the daughter of Asopus.) Cyrene also is called by some his wife, and by others his daughter, and hence Peneus is called the genitor of Aristaeus. (Hygin. Fab. 161; Virg. Georg. iv. 355.) [L. S.]

PENELEOS (Πηνέλος), son of Hippalmenus and Asterope, and one of the Argonauts. He was the father of Opheltes, and is also mentioned among the suitors of Helen. (Apollod. i. 9 § 16, iii. 10 § 8, where he is erroneously called a son of Leitus; Diod. iv. 67; Paus. iv. 5 § 8; Hygin. Fab. 97; Plut. Quaest. Gr. 37.) He was one of the leaders of the Boeotians in the war against Troy, where he slew Hioneus and Lycon, and was wounded by Polydamas. (Hom. ii. 495, xiv. 483, iii. 341, xvii. 597, &c.; comp. Virg. Aen. ii. 425.) He is said to have been slain by Enysylos, the son of Telephus. (Paus. iv. 5 § 8; Diet. Cret. iv. 17.) [L. S.]

PENELOPE (Πηνέλοπη, Πηνέλη, Πηνέλωνα), a daughter of Icarius and Periboea of Sparta (Hom. Od. i. 329; Apollod. iii. 10 § 6; comp. Icarius.) According to Diodorus, Penelope was originally called Ameirace, Aracna, or Araena, and Nauplius or her own parents are said to have cast her into the sea (Tzetz. ad Luc. 792), where she was fed by sea-birds (πηνέλωνες) from which she derived her name. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1422.) She was married to Odysseus, king of Ithaca, by whom she had an only child, Telemachus, who was yet an infant at the time when her husband went with the Greeks to Troy. (Od. xi. 447, xxi. 153.) During the long absence of Odysseus, she was belengued by numerous importunes, and so severely was she deceived by declaring that she must finish a large shrub which she was making for Laërtes, her aged father-in-law, before she should make up her mind. During the day time she accordingly worked at the shrub, and in the night she undid the work of the day. (Od. xix. 149, &c., comp. ii. 121; Proppert. ii. 9. 5.) By this means she succeeded in putting off the suitors. But at length her stratagem was betrayed by her servants; and when, in consequence, the faithful Penelope, who was pining and longing for her husband’s return, was pressed more and more by the importunate suitors, Odysseus at length arrived in Ithaca, and as she recognised him by several signs, she heartily welcomed him, and the days of her grief and sorrow were at an end. (Od. xvii. 103, xiii. 203, xiv. 192; Eurip. Orest. 588, &c.; Od. Heroid. i. 83; Trist. v. 14; Propert. iii. 12, 23, &c.; comp. Icarius and Odysseus.) While the Homeric tradition describes Penelope as a most chaste and faithful wife, later writers charge her with the very opposite vices, and relate that by Hermes or by all the suitors together she became the mother of Pan. (Lycoeph. 772; Schol. ad Herod. ii. 145; Cic. De Nat. Deor. iii. 22; comp. Pan.) Odysseus on his return for this reason repudiated her, whereupon she went to a circular revolution (Sculig, Poet. ii. 30). Poets of a higher standard had occasionally had recourse to a similar artifice, but merely for the sake of making a passing impression, as when we read in Ovid (Amor. i. 9), \textit{Militat omnis amans et habet suam castram Cupido,}

Attice, crede mihi, \textit{milut omnis amans.}

(Compare Fast. iv. 365; Martinl. ix. 98.) But we have no example among the purer writers of a serious composition in which such a conceit is prolonged through a series of couplets.

We know nothing with regard to the personal history of the author of these pieces nor of the period when he may have flourished, although from the tone in which they are conceived we may safely assign him to the later empire, and one expression (i. 33) might lead us to believe that he was a Christian. He is generally supposed to be the person to whom Laelantius dedicates the Epitome of his Divine Institutions, and whom he styles "brother," but beyond the identity of name we are not aware that any evidence can be adduced in support of this position.

Certain short poems included in the \textit{Cataloga Petroniana} are in some MSS. given to Pentadius, particularly two elegiac couplets on the faithlessness of woman (Burnmann, Anthol. Lat. iii. 88, or No. 245, ed. Meyer), and fourteen hendecasyllabics, \textit{De Vita Beata,} which certainly bear the impress of a better age than the verses discussed above (Burnmann, Anthol. Lat. iii. 93, or No. 250, ed. Meyer, Wernsdorf, Poet. Lat. Min. vol. iii. p. 405). There is also an \textit{Epitaphium Achilli} (Burn. Anthol. i. 98, Meyer, append. 1614), which has a strong resemblance to the \textit{Tumulus Hectoris} generally given to an Eusebius or an Eusthenius, but by Scaliger and Wernsdorf to Pentadius. Wernsdorf, in one portion of his work, endeavoured to prove that the \textit{Epitome Illadis Homeri,} which bears the name of Pindarus, ought in reality to be assigned to Pentadius, but this idea he afterwards abandoned. (Wernsdorf, Poet. Lat. Min. vol. iii. p. 252, in the 546; Burnmann, Anthol. Lat. iii. 105, Meyer, vol. i. pp. xxvii. and Ep. No. 241—252, and append. Ep. No. 1614; see also Burnmann, i. 98, 102, 139, 140, 141, 142, 148, 163, ii. 203, iii. 88, 93, 105, v. 69.)

PENTHESILEIA (Πενθεσίλεια), a daughter of Ares and Otrera, and queen of the Amazons. (Hygin. Fab. 112; Serv. ad Aen. i. 491; comp. Hygin. Fab. 225; Justin. ii. 4; Lycoph. 997.) In the Trojan war she assisted the Trojans, and offered gallant resistance to the Greeks. (Dict. Cret. iii. 15; \textit{Ov. Heroid.} xxxi. 118.) After the fall of Hector she fought a battle against the Greeks, but was defeated: she herself fell by the hand of Achilles, who mourned over the dying queen on account of her beauty, youth, and valour. (Dict. Cret. iv. 2; Schol. ad Hom. II. ii. 219; Paus. v. 11. § 2, x. 31; Quint. Smyrn. i. 40, &c.) She was frequently represented by ancient artists, and among others by Polygnotus, in the Lesche at Delphi. (Paus. x. 31.) When Achilles slew Penthesileia he is said to have also killed Thersites because he treated her body with contempt, and reproached Achilles for his love towards her. (Schol. ad Hom. i. a., ad Soph. Philoct. 445.) Diomedes, a relative of Thersites, is said then to have thrown the body of Penthesileia into the river Scamander, whereas, according to others, Achilles himself buried on the banks of the Xanthus. (Tzetz. ad Lyc. l.c.; Dict. Cret. iv. 3.; Tryphiod. 37.) Some, farther, state that she was not killed by Achilles, but by his son Pyrrhus (Dor. Phryg. 36), or that she first slew Achilles, and Zeus on the request of Thetis having recalled Achilles to life, she was then killed by him. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1696.)

PENTHEUS (Πένθεος), a son of Echion and Agave, the daughter of Cadmus. (Eurip. Phoenix. iv. 942; Paus. ix. 5. § 2.) He was the successor of Cadmus as king of Thebes, and being opposed to the introduction of the worship of Dionysus in his kingdom, he was torn to pieces by his own mother and two other Mainades, Ino and Antone, who in their Bacchic frenzy believed him to be a wild beast. (Or. Met. iii. 513, &c.; Eurip. Bacch. 1213; Philost. Imag. i. 1; Apollod. iii. 5. § 2; Hygin. Fab. 167; Serv. v. ad Gen. iv. 469; Nonnus, Dionys. xiv. 46; Opplian, Cyan. iv. 289.)

The place where Pentheus suffered death, is said to have been Mount Cithaeron, but according to some it was Mount Parrusus. Pentheus is said to have got upon a tree, for the purpose of witnessing in secret the revelry of the Bacchic women, but on being discovered by them, he was torn to pieces. (Eurip. Bacch. 816, 954, 1061, &c.; Theocr. xxxvi. 10.) According to a Corinthian tradition, the women were afterwards commanded by an oracle to find out that tree, and to worship it like the god Dionysus himself; and out of the tree two carved images of the god were made accordingly. (Paus. ii. 2. § 6.)

PENTHILUS (Πένθιλος), a son of Orestes and Erione, is said to have led a colony of Aeolians to Thrace. He was the father of Echelatus and Damasias. (Paus. ii. 10. § 5, iii. 2. § 1, v. 4. § 2, vii. 6. § 2; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 1374; Strab. xiii. P. 502; Aristot. Polit. v. 8. 13.) There was also a son of Perymenes of this name. (Paus. ii. 13. § 7.)

PEPA'GOMENUS, DEMETRIUS (Δημητρος Πεταγωμένος), a Greek medical writer, who is supposed to have lived towards the end of the thirteenth century after Christ, and to have dedicated one of his works to the emperor Michael Palaeologus, A. D. 1260—1282. He is the author of a treatise, Περὶ Παθήταις, De Podagra, which has been attributed by some persons to Michael Psellos. (Psellos, Πεταγωμένος, p. 52, ed. Fabri. Bibl. Græc. v. p. 62, ed. vet.) It consists of forty-five sort thick chapters, besides the preface and conclusion, and, though principally compiled from former writers, is curious and interesting. A good analysis of its contents is given by Mr. Adams, in his commentary on Paulus Aegineta (iii. 78). It was first published without the author's name, in a Latin translation by Marcus Massura, Rom. 1517, 8vo.; and afterwards in Greek and Latin, Paris, 1558, 8vo. The last and best edition is by J. S. Bernard, Greek and Latin, Lugd. Bat. 1743, 8vo., sometimes found with a new title page, Arnhem. 1753. The Latin translation by Masur is inserted in H. Stephani Medicis Artis Principes,

PERDICCAS. 185

Paris, 1567, fol.; and the Greek and Latin text in the tenth volume of Chartier's Hippocrates and Galen.

Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 531, ed. vet.) conjectures that Demetrius Pergomenus may be the author of the little treatise, Περὶ τῆς ἐν Νεφροῖς Παιδών Διάγνωσις καὶ Θεραπείας, De Renis Affectu Dignatione et Caritatione, which is wrongly attributed to Galen (Galen, p. 215. § 97), but there seems to be no sufficient ground for this opinion. Demetrius Pergomenus is perhaps the author of two other short Greek works, the one entitled Ἱερακοποσφόν, ἢ περὶ τῶν τῆς Ἱεράκον Ανατορίφης τι καὶ Ἐπιμελείαις, Hieracophinium, sive de Accipitris Educatione et Caritatione, the other Κουσφόν, ἢ περὶ Κουσίων Ἐπιμελείαις, Cymnosophium, sive de Canam Caritatione; which are to be found in the collection of "Rei Accipitrinae Scriptores," published by Nic. Rigilius, Greek and Latin, Paris, 1612, 4to, and elsewhere. The treatise De Canam Caritatione is sometimes attributed to Phaemon. (Choulant, Handb. der Bibliokunde für die Aeltere Medizin; Haller, Bibl. Medic. Pract. vol. i.; Fabri. Bibl. Graec.) [W. A. G.]

PEPA'GOMENUS, NICOLAUS (Νικόλαος Πεταγωμένος), wrote a eulogy on the martyr Isidorus, of which a part is given by Allatins, ad Eustathium Antiochen. p. 69. It is said that other writings of his are to be found in the public libraries of Paris. As he was a correspondent of Nicephorus Gregorius, he must have lived about A. D. 1340. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 649. vol. x. p. 265, vol. xi. p. 293.)

PEPROM'ENEN (Πεπρομένην), namely μύρος, that is, the share destined by fate, occurs also as a proper name in the same sense as Moira or Fate. (Paus. viii. 21. § 2; Hom. ii. iii. 309.)

PERA, the name of a family of the Junia gens. 1. D. JUNIUS D. F. D. N. PERA, was consul b.c. 266, with N. Fabius Pictor, and triumphed twice in this year, the first time over the Sassinates, and the second time over the Sallentini and Mes-sapi. He was censor in b.c. 253, with L. Postumius Megellus. (Fasti Capit.)

2. M. JUNIUS D. F. D. N. PERA, son of the preceding, was consul b.c. 230 with M. Aemilius Barbula, censor b.c. 225 with C. Claudia Centho, and dictator b.c. 216 after the fatal battle of Cannae. In order to raise soldiers he armed not only slaves, but even criminals. (Fasti Capit.; Liv. xxx. 49. 12.)

PERÆTIIUS (Πέρατιος), a son of Lycon, from whom the town of Peræthius in Arcadia was believed to have derived its name. (Paus. viii. 3. § 1. 27. § 3.)

PERCE'NIUS, a common soldier, and previously employed in the theatres to hiss or applaud, as the case might be, was the ringleader in the formidable mutiny of the Pannonian legions, which broke out at the beginning of the reign of Tiberius, A. D. 14. He was killed by order of Drusus shortly after his arrival in the camp. (Tac. Ann. i. 16. 17. 28. 29.)

PERDICCAS (Πέρδικκας). 1. Son of Orontes, a Macedonian of the province of Orestis, was one of the most distinguished of the generals of Alexander the Great. We are told that he was descended from a royal house (Curt. x. 7, § 8) probably that of the independent princes of Orestis, and it appears that in consequence of his noble birth he early held a distinguished place at the court of Philip of Macedon. We find him mentioned as one of the select officers who, under the title of σωμάτωραρικας, were immediately about the king's person at the time of his death; and he was one of the first to avenge that crime upon the assassin Pausanias. (Diod. xvi. 94.) It is probable that he continued to hold the same honourable post under the youthful Alexander, though he is not distinctly mentioned as doing so until a later period (see Arr. Anab. iv. 21, § 7, v. 13, § 1, vi. 11, § 3, 28, § 6); but besides this he had the separate command of one of the divisions of the phalanx, at the head of which we find him accompanying the young king in the campaign against the Illyrians, and again at the siege of Thebes. On this last occasion he greatly distinguished himself, but was severely wounded, and narrowly escaped with his life. (Arr. th. i. 6, 8; Diod. xvii. 12.) During the earlier campaigns in Asia we likewise find him commanding one of the divisions of the phalanx, which was composed of his own countrymen the Orestians, together with the neighbouring tribe of the Lyncestians. This post he held in all the three great battles of the Granicus, Issus, and Arbela; in the last of which he was again severely wounded: and his name is also mentioned with distinction at the sieges of Halicarnassus and of Tyre. (Arr. Anab. i. 14, 20, 21, ii. 8, iii. 11; Curt. iii. 9, § 7, iv. 3, § 1, 16, § 32; Diod. xvii. 57, 61.) In the subsequent operations in Persia, Sogdiana, and India, his name occurs still more frequently; and he appears to have borne a continually increasing share in the confidence and favour of Alexander. At this time he was transferred from the infantry to the cavalry, or divisions of the heavy cavalry (ερατο setCurrent); but in addition to this we find him repeatedly charged with separate commands of importance, sometimes in conjunction with Ptolemy, Craterus, or Hephaestion, sometimes as sole general. He appears to have especially distinguished himself in the battle against Porus, and shortly after we find him commanding the whole left wing of the army in the action with the Cnidianae. Again, in the attack of the chief city of the Malli it was Perdiccas who was appointed to conduct the assault on one side of the fortress, while Alexander himself led that on the other. (Arr. Anab. iii. 15, iv. 16, 21, 22, 28, 30, v. 12, 13, 22, vi. 6, 9, 15, Ind. 16; Curt. vii. 6, § 19, viii. 10, § 2, 14, §§ 5, 13, ix. 1, § 19.) Nor was he forgotten in the distribution of honours at Susa, where he received a crown of gold for his services in common with the other Somatophylakes, and the daughter of Atropos, his stepson of Media, in marriage. (Arr. vii. 4, § 7, 5, § 9.) In virtue of his office as Somatophylax, he was one of those in constant attendance upon the king's person when not employed on other military services (see Curt. vi. 8, § 17, viii. i. §§ 45, 48), and thus was naturally one of the officers who were gathered around the bed of the dying Alexander, who is said in his last moments to have taken the royal signet ring from his finger and given it to Perdiccas. (Diod. xvii. 117, xviii. 2; Curt. x. 5, § 4; Justin. xii. 15; it is remarkable that Arrian does not even allude to this circumstance.) In the deliberations which followed the death of the king (A.D. 323), Perdiccas assumed a leading part. In the general council of the officers he was the first to propose that the crown should be reserved for the child of which Roxana was then pregnant, supposing it to prove a male; and it was immediately suggested by AristONUS that the regency in the mean time should be confined to Perdiccas. This proposal—with the modification put forward by Pithon, that Leontinus should be associated with him in the supreme authority—obtained the concurrence of almost all the chief officers, supported by the whole body of the Macedonian cavalry. But the infantry, at the head of whom Meleager had placed himself [MELEAGER], refused to acquiesce in this decision, and clamorously demanded that Arrihaeus, the bastard brother of Alexander, should be at once proclaimed king. Matters soon came to an open rupture between the two parties, and the destinies of the leading men in the army, withdrew from Babylon, and encamped without the city. Perdiccas at first remained behind, but an attempt made upon his life by his rival, which was frustrated only by his own intrepidity, soon compelled him to follow the example of the seceders. The cavalry now threatened to cut off the supplies, and reduce Babylon to a state of famine; but after repeated embassies a compromise was at length effected, by which it was agreed that Arrihaeus should be declared king, reserving however to the son of Roxana a share of the sovereignty, as soon as he should be born, while Perdiccas, under the honorary title of chiliarch of the ἐρατοsetCurrent), should hold the chief command under the new monarch, Meleager taking rank immediately under him. (Curt. x. 6—8; Justin. xiii. 2—4; Arrian. op. Phot. p. 69, a; Dextipp. ibid. p. 64, b; Diod. xviii. 2.) But this arrangement, though sanctioned by a solemn treaty, was not destined to last for long duration. Perdiccas took advantage of his new position to establish his influence over the feeble mind of the nominal king Arrihaeus, while he lulled his rival Meleager into security by the profoundest dissimulation, until his schemes were ripe for execution, and he was able to crush at one blow Meleager himself with all his leading partisans. [MELEAGER]. By this decisive stroke he freed himself from one of his most formidable adversaries, but at the same time he necessarily aroused the fears of all others who felt themselves to be either his rivals or his enemies. For a time, however, he thought himself secure in the possession of the supreme power; the king was a mere puppet in his hands, and the birth of Alexander, the expected son of Roxana, appeared greatly to strengthen his authority, while the partition of the several territories or governments of Asia and Europe among the generals of Alexander, removed to a distance and separated from one another all his more formidable competitors. An alarming revolt of the Greek soldiers who had been settled in the provinces of Upper Asia, was successfully put down through the agency of Pithon, and the whole of those who had submitted were barbarously massacred by the express orders of the regent. (Diod. xviii. 7.) Perdiccas now deemed himself at leisure (B.C. 322) to undertake the reduction of Cappadocia, which had been neglected by Alexander, and continued in virtual independence under its satrap, Ariarathes. The campaign was quelled by a general dissatisfaction, which was defeated in two successive battles, taken prisoner, and put to death by order of the regent, who handed over the government of Cappadocia to his friend and partisan Eumenes. From thence he marched into Pisidia, where he reduced the important cities of Laranda and Iaura. Meanwhile the jealousies and apprehensions of his principal adversaries had been long secretly at work, to combine them into a league against his power. Ptolemy appears to have been from the first regarded by the regent with especial suspicion and distrust, and Perdiccas was only waiting for a plausible pretext to dispose of him of his important government of Egypt. But the regent knew that Antipater also was scarcely less hostile to him, and he had already entered into secret engagements with Ptolemy, from which he now sought to detach him by requesting his daughter Nicaea in marriage. Antipater could not refuse so splendid an offer, and immediately sent Nicaea to Perdiccas in Asia. But just about the same time the regent received overtures from Olympia, who offered him the hand of her daughter Cleopatra in return for his support against Antipater. He did not, however, deem the moment yet come for an open rupture with the latter, and consequently married Nicaea, but with the secret purpose of divorcing her and espousing Cleopatra in her stead at a subsequent period. From this time, if not before, it appears certain that he began to look forward to establishing himself eventually on the throne of Macedonia, and regarded the proposed alliance with Cleopatra merely as a stepping-stone to that object. (Arrian, ap. Phot. p. 69. b. 70, a.; Diod. xvi. 14, 16, 22, 23; Justin. xii. 6.)

It was at this juncture that the daring enterprize of Cynane [CYNANE] threatened to disconnect all the plans of Perdiccas; and though he succeeded in detaining them, his cruelty in putting her to death excited such universal dissatisfaction, that he found himself compelled, in order to appease the murmurs of the soldiery, to give her daughter Eurydice in marriage to the king Archdaeus. (Arr. ap. Phot. p. 70, a. b.) Shortly after, his attempt to bring Antigonus to trial for some alleged offences in the government of his satrapy, brought on the crisis which had been so long impending. That general made his escape to Macedonia, where he revealed to Antipater the full extent of the ambitious schemes of Perdiccas, and thus at once induced Antipater and Craterus to unite in a league with Ptolemy, and openly declare war against the regent. Thus assailed on all sides, Perdiccas determined to leave Eumenes in Asia Minor, to make head against their common enemies in that quarter, while he himself directed his efforts in the first instance against Ptolemy. In the spring of b.c. 321 accordingly, he set out on his march against Egypt, at the head of an armable army, and accompanied by the king Archdaeus, with his bride Eurydice, as well as by Roxana and her infant son. He advanced without opposition as far as Pelusium, but found the banks of the Nile strongly fortified and guarded by Ptolemy, and was repulsed in repeated attempts to force the passage of the river; in the last of which, near Memphis, he lost great numbers of men, by the depth and rapidity of the current. This disaster caused the discontent among his troops which had been long gathering in secret, and had been exas erated rather than repressed by the severity with which he had punished the first symptoms of dissatisfaction, to break out into open mutiny; the infanty of the phalanx were the first to declare themselves, but their example was soon followed by the cavalry, and a band of officers headed by Seleucus and Antigenes hastened to the tent of Perdiccas, and despatched him with many wounds. (Diod. xviii. 23, 25, 29, 33—36; Arrian, ap. Phot. p. 70, b. 71, a.; Justin. xiii. 6, 8; Plut. Eum. 5, 8; Corn. Nep. Eum. 3, 5; Strab. xvii. p. 794.)

We know little or nothing of the character of Perdiccas beyond what may be gathered from the part he took in the events above related, but in these he certainly appears in the darkest colours. His only redeeming qualities were his great personal courage (see on this point an anecdote related by Ael. V. H. xii. 39), and his talents as a general. His selfish and grasping ambition was wholly unalloyed by any of the generosity and magnanimous spirit which had adorned the life of Alexander. At once crafty and cruel, he arrayed himself against, by his dark and designing policy, all the other leaders in the Macedonian empire, while he alienated the minds of his soldiers and followers by the arrogance of his demeanour, as well as by unsparing and needless severity, and he ultimately fell a victim not to the arms of his adversaries, but to the general discontent which he had himself excited.

2. One of the generals who held a subordinate command under Eumenes in the war against Antigonus, b.c. 321. He was preparing to desert to the enemy, when Eumenes became apprised of his project, and sent Phoenix against him, who surprised his camp in the night, took him prisoner, and brought him before Eumenes, who caused him to be put to death. (Diod. xviii. 40.) [E. H. B.]

PERDICCAS I. (PERDICCAS), was, according to Herodotus, the son of a Macedonian monarch, though Justin, Diodorus, and the other chronographers, Dexippus and Eusebius, represent Caranus as the first king of Macedonia, and make Perdiccas only the fourth. [CARANUS.] Thucydides, however, seems to follow the same version of the history with Herodotus, since he reckons only eight kings before Archelaus. (Thuc. ii. 100. See also Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. p. 221; Müller's Dorians, App. i. § 15.) According to Herodotus, Perdiccas and his two brothers, Gannus and Aëropus, were Argives of the race of Temenus, who fled from their native country to Illyria, and from thence into the upper part of Macedonia, where they at first served the king of the country as herdsmen, but were afterwards dismissed from his service, and settled near Mount Bermius, from whence, he adds, they subdued the rest of Macedonia (Herod. vii. 137, 138). It is clear, however, that the dominions of Perdiccas and his immediate successors, comprised but a very small part of the country subsequently known under that name. (See Thuc. ii. 99.) According to Eusebius (ed. Arm. p. 152, 153), Perdiccas reigned forty-eight years, but this period is, doubtless, a purely fictitious one. He was succeeded by his son Argeus. (Herod. viii. 136.) From a fragment of Diodorus (Exc. Val. p. 4), it would appear that Perdiccas was regarded as the founder of Aegae.
PERDICCAS.

or Edessa, the capital of the early Macedonian monarchs.

PERDICCAS II. (Περδίκκας), king of Macedonia, was the son and successor of Alexander I. It is impossible to fix the date of his accession with any degree of precision, on account of the great discrepancy in the statements of ancient authors concerning the length of his reign, to which Deyippus and Eusebius allot only twenty-two or twenty-three years, while Theopompos extended it to thirty-five, and the Parian Chronicle, apparently following Nicomedes of Acanthus, to as much as forty-one years. (See Athen. v. p. 217; Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. p. 222; Dexipp. ap. Syncell. p. 262, d.; Marm. Par.) It is certain, however, that he had been on the throne of Macedonia for some time when his name first appears in history, shortly before the outbreak of the Peloponnesian war. During the early years of his reign he had entered into friendly relations with the Athenians, who, as it appears, had even bestowed on him the rights of a citizen as a reward for the services of his father Alexander during the Persian war. (Thuc. i. 57; Demosth. de Syntax. p. 175, c. Aristeo. p. 687, who erroneously calls Perdiccas king at that time of the Persians, on account of the gratuitous assistance furnished by the Athenians to the pretensions of his brother Philip, as well as to Derdas, a Macedonian chieftain, at this time in hostility to Perdiccas, completely estranged the mind of the latter, and led to an open rupture between him and Athens. In B. C. 432, the Athenians sent a fleet and army to Macedonia to support Philip and Derdas against Perdiccas, while the latter openly espoused the cause of Potidæae, which had shaken off the Athenian yoke, at the same time that he sent ambassadors to Lacedaemon and Corinth, to induce those powerful states to declare war against Athens. His negotiations, for a time, produced no effect. But the Athenian generals also accomplished but little: they took Thera, but laid siege, without effect, to Pydna, and concluded a hasty treaty with Perdiccas, in order to be more at liberty to pursue operations against Potidæae. This peace, however, was broken almost immediately afterwards, and Perdiccas sent a body of horse to the assistance of the Potidæaeans, but these troops fell in with a diversion near Corinth, produced by their allies. (Thuc. i. 57—59, 61—63; Dion. xii. 34.) Perdiccas, however, continued on hostile terms with Athens, until the following year (B. C. 431), when Nymphodorus brought about a peace between them by which the Macedonian king obtained the restoration of Thera. He now supported the Athenian general Phornion against the Chalcidians, but his disposition seems to have been still unfriendly, and we find him soon after sending secret assistance to the expedition of the Ambrazists and their allies against Acanthia. (Id. ii. 29, 80.)

He was soon threatened by a more formidable danger. In B. C. 429, Stilas, king of the powerful Thracian tribe of the Odrysians, invaded Macedonia with an army of 150,000 men, with the declared object of establishing Amyntas, the son of Philip, upon the throne of that country. Perdiccas was wholly unable to oppose this mighty host, and contented himself with observing the movements of his, and cutting off their supplies. The very magnitude of the barbarian army proved the cause of its failure. Si-to, indeed, ravaged the open country without opposition, and took some small towns, but was disappointed of the promised co-operation of the Athenian fleet, and after a short stay in Chalcidice, was compelled, by want of provisions, to return home. Scourias, the nephew of the Thracian king, who had been secretly gained over by Perdiccas, was mainly instrumental in bringing about this resolution, in reward for which service Perdiccas gave him his sister Stratonice in marriage. (Thuc. ii. 95—101; Dion. xii. 50, 51.)

From this time we hear no more of the proceedings of Perdiccas for some years, but he appears to have continued always on hostile terms with Athens, and it was in great part at his instigation that Brasidas in B. C. 424 set out on his celebrated expedition to Macedonia and Thrace. (Thuc. iv. 79.) Immediately on the arrival of the Spartan general, Perdiccas made use of his new auxiliary to prosecute a private quarrel of his own with Arrihæus, prince of Lyncestis. But Brasidas, though he at first joined his forces with those of the Macedonian king, interposed rather as a mediator than an auxiliary, and soon concluded a treaty with Arrihæus, by which proceeding he so much offended Perdiccas, that the latter withdrew a part of the supplies which he had engaged to furnish to the Lacedaemonian army, and took little part in the operations of Brasidas in Chaldidice and Thrace. But the following spring (B. C. 423) the conclusion of a truce for a year between the Athenians and Lacedaemonians having suspended the operations of Brasidas, Perdiccas induced him once more to join in a campaign against Arrihæus. The king had also reckoned on the co-operation of a body of Illyrians, but these expected allies suddenly joined the enemy, and the Macedonian troops, alarmed at the defection, were seized with a panic, and compelled Perdiccas to make a hasty retreat, leaving his Spartan auxiliaries at the mercy of the enemy. Brasidas, indeed, saved his army by a masterly retreat, but the minds of the Spartans were irritated against the Macedonian king, and it was not long before matters came to an open rupture. Before the close of the year Perdiccas abandoned the Spartan alliance, and concluded peace with Athens. (Thuc. iv. 82, 83, 103, 107, 129, 132.)

But he was little disposed to enter heartily into the cause of his new allies, whom he supported so feebly as to lead to the failure of their arms in Chaldidice, and in B. C. 418 he secretly joined the new league concluded between Sparta and Argos. This led to a renewal of hostilities between him and the Athenians, but apparently without any important result. At a subsequent period we find him again in alliance with Athens, without any account of the circumstances that led to this change, but it is evident that he joined one or other of the belligerent parties according to the dictates of his own interest at the moment. (Thuc. v. 80, 83, vi. 7, vii. 9.) The exact date of the death of Perdiccas cannot be determined, but it is clear from Thucydides that it could not have occurred before the end of B. C. 414, or the beginning of 413. The Parian Chronicle, by a strange error, assigns it to the archonship of Aystrophilus, B. C. 420. (Thuc. vii. 9; Marm. Par.; Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. pp. 74, 223.)

PERDICCAS III. (Περδίκκας), king of Macedonia, was the second son of Amyntas II., by his wife Eurydice. He was still very young when the assassination of his brother Alexander 11., by Ptolemy of Alorus, caused the crown of Macedonia to devolve by hereditary right upon him. Ptolemy, however, assumed the government as regent during the minority of Perdiccas, with the concurrence of Eurydice. But the appearance of a new competitor for the throne, Ptolemy, soon compelled both Eurydice and her two sons, Perdiccas and Philip, to have recourse to the assistance of the Athenian general Iphicrates, who drove out the usurper, and re-established Perdiccas upon the throne. Ptolemy seems to have been reinstated in his office of regent or guardian of the young king, under which name he virtually enjoyed the sovereign power, until at length Perdiccas caused him to be put to death, and took the government into his own hands, n. c. 364. (Justin, vii. 4, 5; Aesch. de Fals. Leg. §§ 28—31, ed. Bekk.; Diod. xv. 77, xvi. 2; Syme. p. 263; Flathe, Gesch. Macedon. vol. i. p. 39—40; Thirlwall's Greece, vol. v. p. 162—164.) Of the subsequent reign of Perdiccas we have very little information. We learn only that he was at one time engaged in hostilities with Athens on account of Amphipolis (Aesch. l. c. §§ 32—33), and that he was distinguished for his patronage of men of letters. Among these we are told that Euphranor, a disciple of Plato, rose to so high a place in his favour, as completely to govern the young king, and exclude from his society all but philosophers and geometers. (Carystius, op. Athen. xi. pp. 506, e. 506, d.) Perdiccas fell in battle against the Illyrians after a reign of five years, n. C. 359. (Diod. xvi. 2. The statement of Justin, vii. 5, that he was killed by Ptolemy of Alorus is clearly erroneous. See, however, Curt. vi. 11. § 26.) He left an infant son, Amyntas, who was, however, excluded from the throne by his uncle Philip. [AMYNTAS, No. 3.] [E.H.B.]

COIN OF PERDICCAS III.

PERDICCAS (ΠΕΡΔΙΚΑΣ), was protomartyr of Ephesus. A poem written by him was inserted in a compilation of Allatius entitled Ζωμυρά, published at Amsterdam, in 1635, vol. i. pp. 65—78. The subject is the miraculous events connected with our Lord's history, principally those of which Jerusalem was the theatre. But besides Jerusalem, he visits Bethany, Bethpage, and Bethlehem. In this poem—which consists of 260 verses of that kind termed politici—he writes as if from personal inspection, but, if this was really the case, he is wanting in clearness and distinctness of delineation. While some of the details are curious, his geography is singularly inaccurate. Thus, he places Galilee on the northern skirts of the Mount of Olives. If we may trust a conjecture mentioned by Fabricius, he attended a synod held at Constantinople, a. d. 1347, at which were present two of the same name, Thedorus and Georgius Perdiccas. (Allatius, l. c.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 663, vol. viii. p. 99.) [W. M. G.]

PERDIX (ΠΕΡΔΙΧ), the sister of Daedalus, and mother of Talos, or according to others, the sister's son of Daedalus, figures in the mythological period of Greek art, as the inventor of various implements, chiefly for working in wood. Perdix is sometimes confounded with Talos or Calos, and it is best to regard the various legends respecting Perdix, Talos, and Calos, as referring to one and the same person, namely, according to the mythographers, a nephew of Daedalus. The inventions ascribed to him are: the saw, the idea of which is said to have been suggested to him by the back-bone of a fish, or the teeth of a serpent; the chisel; the compasses; the potter's wheel; and the heads of Minerva, Athena, and Apollo. He was also credited with the invention of the art of metal working, of the potter's wheel, of the bellows, of the bow and arrow, and of the various arts connected with the theatre. (Justin, x. 9; Paus. vii. 7.; Wesselius's note; Apollod. i. 26. 2; Diod. ii. 29; Wesseling's note; Serv. ad Virg. Aen. vi. 14; Georg. 143; Suid. s. v. ΠΕΡΔΙΧΑΣ λεπόν; DAEDALUS.) [P. S.]

PEREGRI/NUS PROTEUS, a cynic philosopher, born at Parium, on the Hellespont, flourished in the reign of the Antonines. After a youth spent in debauchery and crimes, among which he is even charged with parricide, he visited Palestine, where he turned Christian, and by dint of hypocrisy attained to some authority in the Church. Here, in order to gratify his morbid appetite for notoriety, he contrived to get thrown into prison; but the Roman governor, perceiving his aim, disdained to be annoyed by him, and released him. He afterwards resided in Coele-Syria, where, resuming the cynic garb, and returned to his native town, where, to obfuscate the memory of his crimes, he divided his inheritance among the populace. He again set out on his travels, relying on the Christians for support; but being discovered profaning the ceremony of the Lord's Supper, he was excommunicated. He then went to Egypt, where he made himself notorious by the open perpetration of the most disgusting obscenity. Thence he proceeded to Rome and endeavoured to attract attention by his ribaldry and abuse, for which he was expelled by the praefectus urbis. His next visit was to Elis, where he tried to incite the people against the Romans. Having exhausted all the methods of making himself conspicuous, he at length resolved on publicly burning himself at the Olympic games; and carried his resolution into effect in the 296th Olympiad, a. d. 165. The Romans raised a statue to his memory, which was reputed to be erasable. (Anaxagoras, quoted by Valla. Ad Aen. Marc. 2; Lucian, who knew Pergrinus in his youth, and who was present at his strange self-immolation, has perhaps overcharged the narrative of his life. Wieland was so strongly of this opinion that, being unable to refute Lucian from ancient authors, he wrote his romance of Perngrinus Proteus, as a sort of vindication of the philosopher. A. Gellius gives a much more favourable account of him. (Lucian, de Morte Peregrini; Amm. Marc. xxix. 1; Philostrat. Vit. Sophist. ii. 1; A. Gell. xii. 11.) [T. D.]

PEREGRINI/NUS, L. ARME/NIUS, consul A. D. 244 with A. Fulvius Aemilius, the year in which Philipus ascended the throne. [PERENNIS, after the death of Paterinus [PA*ERENNIS] in A. D. 183, became sole praefect of the praetorians, and Commodus being completely sunk in debauchery and sloth, virtually ruled the empire. Having, however, rendered himself obnoxious to the soldiery, he was delivered up to them, and put to death, together with his wife and children, in A.D. 186 or 187. The narrative of Dion Cassius, who states that his death was demanded by a deputation of fifteen hundred darters, despatched for this special purpose from the turbulent army in Britain, and that these men, after having marched unmolested through France and Italy, on their approach to Rome, overawed the prince, although his own guards were far more numerous, is so improbable that we can scarcely give it credit. Moreover, Dion represents the character of Perennis in a very different light from that in which it is exhibited by other historians. Although he admits that Perennis procured the death of his colleague Paternus, in order that he might rule with undivided sway, he would yet depict him as a man of pure and upright life, seeking nought but the prosperity and safety of his country, which were utterly neglected by Comnonus, while Herodian and Lapidius charge him with having encouraged the emperor in all his excesses, and urged him on in his career of profligacy. (Dion Cass. lixxii. 9, 10; Herodian. i. 6, 9; Lapid. Commod. 5, 6.)

PEREUS (Περεύς), a son of Elatus and Laodice, and brother of Stymphalus, was the father of Neaera. (Apollod. iii. 9. § 1; Paus. viii. 4. § 3; comp. Elatus and Neaera.)

PERIGAMOS (Πηγαμος), an engraver on precious stones, whose name occurs on a stone in the collection of Prince Pomintowski, engraved with the portrait of Nicomedes IV. king of Bithynia; whence it may be inferred that the artist lived about the time of Augustus. There is another gem ascribed to him by Bracci and Stosch, but in this case the true reading of the name is doubtful. (Visconti, Oper. Var. vol. ii. p. 569; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 147; 2nd ed.; comp. Pycn. 17).

PERGAMUS (Πηγαμος), a son of Pyrrhus and Andromache. In a contest for the kingdom of Teuthrania, he slew his kinsman, and then named the town after himself Pergamus, and in it he erected a sanctuary of his mother. (Paus. i. 11. § 1. κκ.)

PERIANDER (Περιανδρος). 1. A son of Cypselus, whom he succeeded as tyrant of Corinth, probably about B.C. 625. By his bitterest opponents his rule was admitted to have been mild and beneficent at first; and, though it is equally certain that it afterwards became oppressive, we must remember that his history has come down to us through the hands of the oligarchical party, which succeeded to power on the overthrow of the Cypselidae, and that suspicion therefore attaches to much of what is recorded of him. In the speech which Herodotus (v. 92) puts into the mouth of Sosicles, the Corinthian delegate at Sparta, and which is couched in the language of a strong partisan, the change in question is absurdly ascribed to the advice of Thrasybulus, tyrant of Miletus, whom Periander had consulted on the best mode of maintaining his power, and who is said to have taken the messenger through a corn-field, cutting off, as he went, the tallest ears, and then to have dismissed him without committing himself to a verbal answer. According to the story, however, the action was rightly interpreted by Periander, who proceeded to rid himself of the most powerful nobles in the state. If we may believe another statement, which we find in Diogenes Laërtius (i. 96; comp. Parthen. Am. Afr. 17), the horrible consciousness of incest with his mother (which some versions of the story represented as involuntary on his part) altered his kindly nature to misanthropic cruelty. Aristotle, without mentioning any change in the character and conduct of Periander, merely speaks of him as having been the first in Greece who reduced to a system the common and coarser arts of tyrant-craft; and, accordingly, in two passages of the Politics (iii. 13, v. 10, ed. Bekk.), he alludes to the above-mentioned suggestion of cutting off the nobles, as having been made by Periander to Thrasybulus. If we may depend at all on the statements in Diogenes Laërtius, we may believe that, while Periander would gladly have trusted for his security rather to the affection than to the fears of his subjects, he was driven to tyrannical expedients by what he considered a constraining political necessity; and it is far from improbable that, while the arts which win the favour of the people were less carefully cultivated by him than by his father Cypselus, who had risen to power by popular aid, so the commons, on their side, not having now so lively a sense of the evils of oligarchy, would begin to look with dislike on the rule of an individual. But, whatever might have been their dispositions towards him, he contrived with great ability to keep rebellion in check, protecting his person by a body-guard of mercenaries, and directing, apparently, his whole policy, domestic as well as foreign, to the maintenance of his power. The citizens of noblest rank or feeling were kept down or put out of the way, and common tables, clubs, and public education were suppressed,—actions prompted, not, as Müller supposes (Dor. i. § 4), by the wish of utterly eradicating the peculiarities of the Doric race, but rather by that of crushing high spirit and mutual confidence among his subjects. To the same end we may refer also his expulsion of many of the people from the city, as we are told by Diogenes Laërtius, on the authority of Ephorus and Aristotle, by the latter of whom such a measure is indeed mentioned in the Politics (v. 10. ed. Bekk.), but not expressly as one of the devices of Periander. Again, while he made it part of his system to prevent the accumulation of wealth to any dangerous extent by individuals, he placed checks at the same time on habits of wasteful extravagance, and instituted a court for the punishment of those who squandered their patrimony, probably because he knew that such persons are often the readiest for innovation (Arist. Pol. v. 6). The story of his stripping the Corinthian women of their ornaments is variously given in Herodotus and in Diogenes Laërtius from Ephorus; and it seems doubtful whether we should regard it as one of his measures for diminishing the resources of powerful families, or as a perverted account of a sumptuary law. It may also have been as part of his policy for repressing the excess of luxury and extravagance that he commanded the procurers of Corinth to be thrown into the sea. Being possessed, as Aristotle tells us, of considerable military skill, he made his government respected abroad, and so provided more effectually for its security at home. Yet very little is recorded of his expeditions. Besides his conquest of Epidaurus, mentioned below, we know that he kept Coreya in PERIANDER, and we are told, on the authority of Timaeus, that he took part with Pitaeus and the Mytileneans in their war against Athens (n. c. 600) for the possession of Sigeium and the surrounding coast. If, however, he was at first a party to the contest, he seems to have acted subsequently as a mediator. (Strab. xiii. p. 600; Herod. v. 94, 95; comp. Müll. ad Aesch. Eum. § 42; Clint. F. H. sub anno 606.) Another mode by which he strengthened himself was his alliance with tyrants in other cities of Greece (Miletus, e.g. and Epidaurus), and even with barbarian kings, as with Alyattes of Lydia. On the west of Greece, as Müller remarks (Dor. i. 8, § 3), the policy of the Cypselidae was to keep the occupation of the coast of the Ionian sea as far as Illyria, and to establish a connection with the barbarous nations of the interior. In accordance with this policy, Periander kept up a considerable navy, and is said to have formed the design of cutting through the Isthmus of Corinth and thus opening a larger communication between the eastern and western seas; and we find, too, that Apollonia on the Macedonian coast was founded by the Corinthians in his reign. (Strab. vii. p. 316; Thuc. i. 26; Plin. H. N. iii. 23.) Such a policy, combined with the natural advantages of its situation, stimulated greatly the commerce of Corinth, and we hear accordingly that the harbour and market-dues were so considerable, that Periander required no other source of revenue. The construction of splendid works dedicated to the gods (κυφήλας δωματία, Arist. Pol. v. 1]), would be recommended to him as much by his own taste and love of art as by the wish to drain the stores of the wealthy. Generally, indeed, we find him, like so many of the other tyrants, a liberal and discriminating patron of literature and philosophy; and Arion and Anacharsis were in favour at his court. Diogenes Laërtius tells us that he wrote a didactic poem (ὑμνημία), which ran to the length of 2000 verses, and consisted in all probability of moral and political precepts; and he was very commonly reckoned among the Seven Sages, though by some he was excluded from their number, and Myson of Chenea in Laconia was substituted in his room. The letters, which we find in Diogenes Laërtius, from Periander to his brother sages, inviting them to Corinth, and from Thrasylulus to Periander, explaining the act of cutting off the tops of the corn, are obvious and clumsy farragoes. (Herod. i. 20, 24, 24; Ael. V. H. ii. 41; Gell. xvi. 19; Plut. Sol. 4, Cown. VII. Sup.; Diod. Fragm. b. ix; Plut. Protag. p. 343; Clem. Alex. Strom. p. 351; Herod. Pont. 5.) The private life of Periander is marked by great misfortune, if not by the dreadful criminality which his enemies ascribed to him. He married Melissa, daughter of Procles, tyrant of Epidaurus, having fallen in love with her, according to one account, from seeing her in a light dress, after the Peloponnesian fashion, giving out wine to her father's labouren. (Pyth. ap. Ath. xiii. p. 589, f.) She bore him two sons, Cypselus and Lycothron, and was passionately beloved by him; but he is said to have killed her by a blow during her pregnancy, having been roused to a fit of anger by the calumnies of some courtiers, whom, on the detection of their falsehood, he afterwards caused to be burnt alive. His wife's death embittered the remainder of his days, partly through the remorse which he felt for the deed, and which he seems to have tried to quiet by superstitious rites, partly through the alienation of his younger son Lycothron, inexorably exasperated by his mother's fate. The young man's anger had been chiefly excited by Procles, and Periander in revenge assaulted Epi- daurus, and, having reduced it, took his father-in-law prisoner. His vengeance was roused also against the Corcyreans by their murder of Lyco- thron, and he sent 300 Corcyrean boys to Alyattes, king of Lydia, to be made eunuchs of; but they were rescued on their way by the Samians, and Periander is said to have died of despondency, at the age of 80, and after a reign of 40 years, according to Herodotus. His sons Laërtius and Cypselus were succeeded by a relative, Psammecthus, son of Gordias, names which have been thought to intimate the maintenance by the Cypselidae of hospitable relations with the princes of Egypt and Phrygia. For Gordias, however, some would substitute Gorgus (the son or brother of Cypselus), whom Plutarch calls Gorgias; but this conjecture we need not hesitate to reject. Aristotle, if we follow the received text, assigns to the tyranny of Periander a duration of 44 years; but the amount of the whole period of the dynasty, as given by him, does not accord with his statement of the length of the several reigns (Pol. v. 12, ed. Bekk. v. 9, ed. Göttling). To make Aristotle, therefore, agree with himself and with Diogenes Laërtius, Syrburg and Clinton would, in different ways, alter the rendering, while Göttling supposes Psammecthus, on the ground of his name, to have been not of the blood of the Cypselidae, but a barbarian, to whom Periander entrusted the command of his mercenaries, and who seized the government and held it for three years; and these years he considers Aristotle to have omitted in stating the entire period of the dynasty. But this is a most far-fetched and improbable conjecture. In Diogenes Laërtius there is a very childish story, not worth repeating here, which relates that Periander met his end by violence and voluntarily. (Herod. iii. 48—53, v. 92; Suid.s.m. Pl pav^bros; Clint. F. H. sub anno 625, 583; Plut. de Herod. Mal. 22.)

2. A tyrant of Ambracia, was contemporary with his more famous namesake of Corinth, to whom he was also related, being the son of Gorgus, who was son or brother to Cypselus. The establishment of a branch of the family in Ambracia will be seen to have been quite in accordance with the ambitious policy of the Cypselidae in the west of Greece, as mentioned above. Periander was deposed by the people, probably after the death of the Corinthian tyrant (a. c. 585). The immediate occasion of the insurrection, according to Aristotle, was a gross insult offered by him to one of his favourites. (Arist. Pol. v. 4, 10, ed. Bekk.; Ael. V. H. xii. 35; Perizon. ad loc.; Diog. Laërt. i. 98; Menn. ad loc.; Clinton, F. H. sub anno 612; Müller, Dor. i. 6, 8, 8, 8, § 3, 3, 9, § 6.)

PERIANDER (Πειανδρός), a Greek physician in the fourth century B.C. He enjoyed some reputation in his profession, but was also fond of writing poor verses, which made Archidamus, the son of Aegeslao, ask him how he could possibly wish to be called a bad poet rather than an accomplished physician. (Plut. Apolokthyn. Laco. vol. ii. 135; ed Tuchau). [V. A. G.]

PERIBOEA (Πειρίβοηα). 1. The wife of Icarus, and mother of Penelope. [ICARIUS.]
PERICLES.

A daughter of Eurymedon, and by Poseidon the mother of Nansithous. (Hom. Od. vii. 56, &c.)

3. A daughter of Aecassmenus, and the mother of Pelagon by the river god Axios. (Hom. II. xxi. 142.)

4. A daughter of Alcathous, and the wife of Telamon, by whom she became the mother of Ajax and Teucer. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 7; Paus. i. 42. § 17. § 3.) Some writers call her Erbacon. (Pind. Isthm. vi. 63; Soph. Aj. 506.)

5. A daughter of Hippomenes, and the wife of Oeneus, by whom she became the mother of Tydeus. (Apollod. i. 8. § 4; comp. Oen. xiv.)

6. The wife of king Polybus of Corinth. (Apollod. iii. 5. § 7; comp. Oedipus.)

PERICLEITUS (Περικλείτου), a Lesbian lyric musician of the school of Terpander, flourished shortly before Hippomaces, that is, a little earlier than n. c. 550. At the Lacedaemonian festival of the Carneia, there were musical contests with the cithara, in which the Lesbian musicians of Terpander’s school had obtained the prize from the time of Terpander himself to that of Pericleitus, with whom the glory of the school ceased. (Plut. de Mus. p. 1153, d.)

PERICLES (Περικλῆς). 1. The greatest of Athenian statesmen, was the son of Xanthippus, under whose command the victory of Mycale was gained, and of Agariste, the great grand-daughter of Cleisthenes, tyrant of Sicyon, and niece of Cleisithenes, the founder of the later Athenian constitution, (Herod. vi. 131; comp. Cleisthenes.) Both Herodotus (l. c.) and Plutarch have thought the story, that before his birth his mother dreamed that she gave birth to a lion, of sufficient interest to deserve recording. Pericles belonged to the deme Cholargos in the tribe Acamantis. The date of his birth is not known. The early period of his life was spent in retirement, in the prosecution of a course of study in which his noble genius found the most appropriate means for its cultivation and expansion; till, on emerging from his obscurity, his unequalled capabilities rapidly raised him to that exalted position which thence forwards he maintained throughout the whole of his long and brilliant career till his death. His rank and fortune enabled him to avail himself of the instructions of all those who were most eminent in their several sciences and professions. Music, which formed so essential an element in the education of a Greek, he studied under Pythocheides (Aristot. ap. Plut. Per. 3; Plut. Aelcb. p. 118, c.)

The musical instructions of Damon were, it is said, but a pretext; his real lessons having for their subject political science. Pericles was the first statesman who recognised the importance of philosophical studies as a training for his future career; he devoted his attention to the subtleties of the Eleatic school, under the guidance of Zeno of Elea. But the philosopher who exercised the most important and lasting influence on his mind, and to a very large extent formed his habits and character, was Anaxagoras. [ANAXAGORAS.] With this great and original thinker, the propounder of the sublimest doctrine which Greek philosophy had yet developed, that the arrangements of the universe are the dispositions of an ordering intelligence, Pericles lived on terms of the most intimate friendship, till the philosopher was compelled to retire from Athens. From him Pericles was believed to have derived not only the cast of his mind, but the character of his eloquence, which, in the elevation of its sentiments, and the purity and loveliness of its style, was the fitting expression of the force and dignity of his character and the grandeur of his conceptions. Of the oratory of Pericles no specimens remain to us, but it appears to have been characterised by singular force and energy. He was described as thundering and lightning when he spoke, and as carrying the weapons of Zeus upon his tongue (Plut. Moral. p. 118, d.; Ibld. xii. 40; Aristoph. Acharn. 303; Cic. de Orat. ii. 84; Quin. x. 1. § 62.) The epithet Olympus which was given to him was generally understood as referring to his eloquence. By the unanimous testimony of ancient authors his oratory was of the highest kind. (Plut. Phaedr. p. 269, e.) His orations were the result of elaborate preparation; he used himself to say that he never ascended the bema without praying that no inappropriate word might drop from his lips. (Quintil. xii. 9. § 13.) According to Suidas (s. v. Περικλῆς), Pericles was the first who committed a speech to writing before delivery. The influence of Anaxagoras was also traced in the deportment of Pericles, the lofty bearing and calm and easy dignity of which were sustained by an almost unrivalled power of self-command. The most annoying provocation never made him forsake his dignified composure. His voice was sweet, and his utterance rapid and distinct; in which respect, as well as in his personal appearance, he resembled Peisistratus. His figure was graceful and majestic, though a slight deformity in the disproportionate length of his head furnished the comic poets of the day with an unfailing theme for their pleasantry, and procured him the nicknames of σχυμονόφας and κεφαληγερέτης.

In his youth he stood in some fear of the people, and, aware of the resemblance which was discovered in him to Peisistratus, he was careful of exciting jealousy and alarm; but as a soldier he conducted himself with great intrepidity. However, when Aristides was dead, Themistocles ostracised, and Cimon much engaged in military expeditions at a distance from Greece, he began to take a more active part in the political movements of the time. In putting himself at the head of the more democratical party in the state, there can be no question that he was actuated by a sincere predilection. The whole course of his political career proves such to have been the case. There is not the slightest foundation for the contrary supposition, except that his personal character seemed to have greater affinities with the aristocratical portion of the community. If he ever entertained the slightest hesitation, his hereditary prepossessions as the grand-nephew of Cleisthenes would have been quite sufficient to decide his choice. That that choice was determined by selfish motives, or political rivalry, are suppositions which, as they have nothing to rest upon, and are contradicted by the whole tenor of his public life, are worth absolutely nothing.

As his political career is stated to have lasted above forty years (Plut. Cic. L. c.), it must have been somewhat before n. c. 469 when he first came forward. He then devoted himself with the greatest assiduity to public affairs; was never to be seen in the streets except on his way to the place of assembly or the senate; and withdrew entirely from the convivial meetings of his acquaintance, once only breaking through this rule to honour the marriage of his nephew Eurypylus, and admitting to his society and confidence only a few intimate friends. He took care, however, not to make himself too cheap, reserving himself for great occasions, and putting forward his ideas and opinions through his partisans. Among the foremost and most able of these was Euphiletus. [EUPHILETUS.] The fortune of Pericles, which, that his integrity might be kept free even from suspicion, was husbanded with the strictest economy under the careful administration of his steward Euangetus, insomuch as even to excite the discontent of the women of his household, was not sufficient to enable Pericles out of his private resources to vie with the profuse liberality of Cimon. Accordingly, to ingratiating himself with the people, he followed the suggestion of his friend Demodikes, to make the public treasury available for similar objects, and proposed a series of measures having for their object to provide the poorer citizens not only with amusement, but with the means of subsistence. To enable them to enjoy the theatrical amusements, he got a law passed that they should receive from the public treasury the price of their admittance, amounting to two oboluses apiece. The measure was unwise as a precedent, and being at a later period carried to a much greater extent in connection with various other festivals led to the establishment of the Thoric fund. (Dict. of Antiquities, art. Theorica.) Another measure, in itself unobjectionable and equitable, was one which ordained that the citizens who served in the courts of the Heliaen should be paid for their attendance (μίσθος δικαςταῖοι—τὸ θησαυρίων). It was of course not in the power of Pericles to foresee the mischievous increase of litigation which characterised Athens at a later time, or to anticipate the prophecies of later demagogues by whom the pay was tripled, and the principle of payment extended to attendance at the public assembly; a measure which has been erroneously attributed to Pericles himself. (Büchle, Publie Econ. of Athens, ii. §14.) According to Ulpius (ad Demosth. προφητήριον, p. 50, a) the practice of paying the citizens who served as soldiers was first introduced by Pericles. To affirm that in proposing these measures Pericles did violence to his better judgment in order to secure popularity, would be to do him a great injustice. The whole course of his administration, at a time when he had no rival to dispute his pre-eminence, shows that these measures were the results of a settled principle of policy, that the people had a right to all the advantages and enjoyments that could be procured for them by the proper expenditure of the treasures of which they were masters. That in proposing them he was not insensible to the popularity which would accrue to his proposer, many of his partisans, may be admitted without fixing any very deep stigma upon his character. The lessons of other periods of history will show that the practice of wholesale largess, of which Cimon was beginning to set the example, is attended with influences even more corrupting and dangerous. If Pericles thought so, his measures, though perverted to mischief through consequences beyond his foresight or control, must be admitted to have been wise and statesmanlike, and not the less so because they were dexterously timed for the advancement of his personal influence.

The first occasion on which we find the two rival parties assuming anything like a hostile attitude towards each other, was when Cimon, on his return from Thasos, was brought to trial [CIMON, Vol. i. p. 750]. Pericles was one of those appointed to conduct the impeachment. But whether the prosecution was not according to law, or his wishes, or he had yielded to the intercession of Elpinice, he only rose once, for form's sake, and put forth none of his eloquence. The result, according to Plutarch, was, that Cimon was acquitted. It was shortly after this, that Pericles, secure in the popularity which he had acquired, assailed the aristocracy in its strong-hold, the Areopagus. Here, again, the prominent part in the proceedings was taken by Euphiletus, who in the assembly moved the speech in which the Areopagites were deprived of those functions which rendered it formidable as an antagonist to the democratic party. The opposition which Cimon and his party might have offered was crippled by the events connected with the siege of Ithome; and in the measure was passed. That Pericles was influenced by jealousy because, owing to his not having been archon, he had no seat in the council, or that Euphiletus seconded his views out of revenge for an offence that had been given him in the council, are notions which, though indeed they have no claims to attention, have been satisfactorily refuted (comp. Müller, Eumenides, 2d Dissert. i. A.) Respecting the nature of the change effected in the jurisdiction of the Areopagus, the reader is referred to the Dictionary of Antiquities, art. Areopagus. This success was soon followed by the ostracism of Cimon, who was charged with Laconism. In B.C. 457 the unfortunate battle of Tanagra took place. The request made by Cimon to be allowed to take part in the engagement was rejected through the influence of the friends of Pericles, and Cimon was sentenced to death for his friends to fight round, Pericles, as if in emulation of them, performed prodigies of valour. We do not learn distinctly what part he took in the movements which ensued. The expedition to Egypt he disapproved of; and through his whole career he showed himself averse to those ambitious schemes of foreign conquest which the Athenians fond of cherishing; and at a later period effectually withstood the dreams of conquest in Sicily, Etruria, and Carthage, which, in consequence of the progress of Greek settlements in the West, some of the more enterprising Athenians had begun to cherish. In B.C. 454, after the failure of the expedition to Thessaly, Pericles led an armament which embarked at Pegas, and invaded the territory of Sicyon, routing those of the Sicilians who opposed him. Then, taking with him some Achaean troops, he proceeded to Acrania, and besieged Oeniadae, though without success (Thucyd. i. 111). It was probably after these events (Thirlwall, Hist. of Greece, vol. iii. p. 34), that the recall of Cimon took place. If there was some want of generosity in his ostracism, Pericles at least atoned for it by himself proposing the decree for his recall. The story of the private compact entered into between Pericles and Cimon through the intervention of Elpinice, that Cimon should have the command abroad, while Pericles... took the lead at home, is one which might safely have been questioned had it even rested on better authority than that of the gossip-mongers through whom Plutarch became acquainted with it. It was not improbably about this time that Pericles took some steps towards the realisation of a noble idea which he had formed of uniting all the Greek states into a defensive confederation. He got a decree passed for inviting all the Hellenic states in Europe and Asia to send deputies to a congress, to be held at Athens, to deliberate in the first place about rebuilding the temples burnt by the Persians, and providing the sacrifices vowed in the time of danger; but also, and this was the most important part of the scheme, about the means of securing freedom and safety of navigation in every direction, and of establishing a general peace between the different Hellenic states. To bear these proposals to the different states, twenty men were selected of above fifty years of age, who were sent in detachments of five in different directions. But through the jealousy and counter machinations of Sparta, the project came to nothing.

In b.c. 448 the Phocians deprived the Delphians of the oversight of the temple and the guardianship of the treasures in it. In this they seem at least to have relied on the assistance of the Athenians, if the proceeding had not been suspected and by them. A Lacedaemonian force proceeded to Phocis, and restored the temple to the Delphians, who granted to Sparta the right of precedence in consulting the oracle. But as soon as the Lacedaemonians had retired, Pericles appeared before the city with an Athenian army, replaced the Phocians in possession of the temple, and had the honour which had been granted to the Lacedaemonians transferred to the Athenians (Thucyd. i. 112). Next year (b.c. 447), when preparations were being made by Tlmidias, to aid the democratical party in the towns of Boeotia in repelling the efforts and machinations of the oligarchical exiles, Pericles opposed the measure as rash and unseasonable. His advice was disregarded at the time; but when, a few days after, the news arrived of the disaster at Coroneia, he gained great credit for his wise caution and foresight. The ill success which had attended the Athenians on this occasion seems to have alarmed the Plataeans against their own safety, and Pericles, after five years' truce had expired (b.c. 445), a general and concerted attack was made on them. Euboea revolted; and before Pericles, who had crossed over with an army to reduce it, could effect anything decisive, news arrived of a revolution in Megara and of the massacre of the greater part of the Athenian garrison, the rest of whom had fled to Nisaen; and intelligence was also brought of the approach of a Lacedaemonian army under the command of Pleistoanax, acting under the guidance of Cleandrides. Pericles, abandoning Euboea for the present, at once marched back to Athens. The Peloponnesians had already begun to ravage the country; Pericles, with his usual prudence, declined the risk of a battle; he found a bribe—a simpler and safer way of getting rid of the enemy [Cleandridas, Pleistoanax]. When this more important enemy had been disposed of, Pericles returned to Euboea with an armament of 50 galleys and 5000 heavy-armed soldiers, by which all resistance was overpowered. The land-owners of Chalcis (or at least some of them,—see Thirlwall, vol. iii. p. 57) were stripped of their estates. One of the Histionians, who had given deeper provocation by murdering the whole crew of an Athenian galley which fell into their hands, a severer vengeance was inflicted. They were expelled from their territory, on which was settled a colony of 2000 Athenians, in a new town, Oreus, which took the place of Histiaea. These events were followed by the thirty years' truce, the Athenians consenting to evacuate Troezen, Pergae, Nisaen, and Achaeae. The influence of the moderate counsels of Pericles may probably be traced in their consenting to submit to such terms. The conjecture hazarded by Bishop Thirlwall (vol. iii. p. 44), that the treaty was the work of the party opposed to Pericles, seems improbable. It may at least be assumed that the terms were not opposed by Pericles. The moment when his deeply-rooted and increasing influence had just been strengthened by the brilliant success which had crowned his exertions from a most perilous position, would hardly have been chosen by his political opponents as one at which to set their policy in opposition to his.

After the death of Cimon the aristocratical party was headed by Thucydides, the son of Meleas. He formed it into a more regular organization, producing a more marked separation between it and the democratical party. Though a better political tactician than Cimon, Thucydides was no match for Pericles, either as a politician or as an orator, which, indeed, he acknowledged, when once, being asked by Archidamus whether he or Pericles was the better wrestler, he replied that when he threw Pericles the latter always managed to persuade the spectators that he had never been down. The contest between the two parties was brought to an issue in b.c. 444. Thucydides and his party opposed the lavish expenditure of the public treasure on the magnificent and expensive buildings with which Pericles was adorning the city, and on the festivals and other amusements which he instituted for the amusement of the citizens. In reply to the clamour which was raised against him in the assembly, Pericles offered to discharge the expense of the works, on condition that the edifices should be inscribed with his name, not with that of the people of Athens. The assembly with acclamation empowered him to spend as much as he pleased. The contest was soon after decided by ostracism, and Pericles was left without a rival; nor did any one throughout the remainder of his political course 632, with the Scholiast; Thucyd. ii. 21). It was probably this incident which gave rise to the story which Plutarch found in several writers, that Pericles, for the purpose of postponing the Peloponnesian war, which he perceived to be inevitable, sent ten talents yearly to Sparta, with which he bribed the most influential persons, and so kept the Spartans quiet; a statement which, though probably incorrect, is worth noting, as indicating a belief that the war was at any rate not hurried on by Pericles out of private motives.
appear to contest his supremacy. Nothing could be more dignified or noble than the attitude which under these circumstances he assumed towards the people. The boundless influence which he possessed was never perverted by him to sinister or unworthy purposes. So far from being a mere selfish demagogue, he neither indulged nor courted the multitude. As long as he was at the head of state in peace he administered its affairs with moderation, and kept a safe guard over it, and it became in his time very great. Being powerful on the ground both of his reputation and of his judgment, and having clearly shown himself thoroughly incorruptible, he restrained the multitude with freedom, and was not so much led by it as himself led it, because he did not seek to acquire power by unworthy means, bringing forward propositions which would gratify the people, but on the ground of his high character being able to speak in opposition even to its angry feelings. And so, whenever he saw them insolently confident beyond what the occasion justified, by his speeches he reduced them to a more warly temper, and when on the other hand they were unreasonably alarmed, he restored them again to confidence. And there was in name a democracy, but in reality a government in the hands of the first man" (Thucyd. ii. 65). After this ostracism of Thucydides the organized opposition of the aristocratic party was broken up, though, as we shall see, the malevolence of the enemies of Pericles exposed him subsequently to some troublesome contests.

A few years after the commencement of the 30 years' truce a war broke out between Samos and Miletus about the towns of Priene and Anaen. The Milesians, being vanquished, applied for help to Athens, and were backed by the democratical party in Samos itself. So favourable an opportunity for carrying out the policy which Athens pursued towards her allies was quite sufficient to render the intervention of Aspasia unnecessary for the purpose of inducing Pericles to support the cause of the Milesians. The Samians were commanded to desist from hostilities, and submit their dispute to the decision of an Athenian tribunal. This they showed themselves slow to do, and Pericles was said to have in his hands a galleyer (Thucyd. ii. 65). He established a democratical constitution in Samos, and took 100 hostages from the oligarchical party, which he lodged in Lemnos. He also levied a contribution of 80 talents. The bribe of a talent from each of the hostages, with a large sum besides from the oligarchical party and from Pisistratus, the satrap of Sardes, is said to have been offered to Pericles to induce him to relinquish his intention, and of course refused. He then returned, leaving a small garrison of Athenians in Samos. When he had left, a body of Samians, who had left the island as he approached, having concerted measures with Pisistratus, recovered the hostages, overpowered the Athenian garrison and their political opponents, and renounced the Athenian alliance. A Phoenician fleet was promised to assist them; the enemies of Athens in Greece were urged, though without success, to take up the cause of the Samians; and Byzantium was induced to join in the revolt. Pericles, with nine colleagues and a fleet of 60 vessels, returned to put down the revolt. Detachments were sent to get reinforcements from the other allies, and to look out for the Phoenician fleet. With the remaining ships, amounting to 44 in number, Pericles attacked a Samian fleet of 70, as it was returning from Miletus, and gained the victory. Having received reinforcements, he landed a body of troops, drove the Samians within the walls, and proceeded to invest the town. A victory, though probably a slight one, was gained by the Samians under the command of Melissus [Melissus], and Pericles, with 60 ships, sailed to meet the Phoenician fleet. In his absence, the force which he had left behind was defeated, and the Samians exerted themselves actively in introducing supplies into the town. On the return of Pericles they were again closely besieged. An additional squadron of 40 ships was sent from Athens under the command of Hagnon, Phormion, and Thucydides. The Samians, being again decisively defeated in a sea-fight, were closely blockaded. Though Pericles is said to have made use of some new kinds of battering engines, the Samians held out resolutely, and murrums were heard among the Athenian soldiers, whose dissolute habits (comp. Athen. xiii. p. 572, c.) soon rendered them weary of the tedious process of blockade. There is a story that, in order to pacify them, Pericles divided his army into eight parts, and directed them to cast lots, the division which drew a white bean being allowed to rest and enjoy themselves, while the others carried on the military operations. At the end of nine months the Samians capitulated, on condition that they should give up their ships, dismantle their fortifications, and pay the cost of the siege by instalments. Their submission was speedily followed by that of the Byzantines. On his return to Athens, Pericles celebrated with great magnificence the obsequies of those who had fallen in the war. He was chosen to deliver the customary oration. At its close the women who were present showered upon him their chaplets and garlands. Blpinice alone is said to have contrasted his hard-won triumph with the brilliant victories of her brother Cimon. Pericles had indeed good reason to be proud of his success; for Thucydides (viii. 76) does not scruple to say that the Samians were within a very little of wresting from the Athenians their maritime supremacy. But the comparison with Cimon's victories is more likely to have come from some sycophantic partisan, than from Pericles himself. (Plut. l.c.; Thucyd. i. 115—117; Diox. xii. 27, 28; Suidas, s. v. Σαμισλος ὁ Σῆμως; Aelian, V.H. ii. 9; Aristoph. Acharn. 650.)

Between the Samian war, which terminated in B.C. 440, and the Peleponnesian war, which began in B.C. 431, the Athenians were not engaged in any considerable military operations. On one occasion, though the date is uncertain, Pericles conducted a great armament to the Euxine, apparently with very little object beyond that of displaying the power and maritime supremacy of the Athenians, overawing the barbarians, and strengthening the Athenian influence in the cities in that quarter. Sinope was at the time under the power of the tyrant Timesilus. Application was made to Pericles for assistance to expel the tyrant. A body of troops, which was left under the command of Lamachus, succeeded in effecting this object, and a body of 600 Athenians was afterwards sent to take possession of the confiscated property of the tyrant and his partisans.

While the Samian war was a consequence of the policy which Athens exercised towards her allies, the issue of it tended greatly to confirm that direct authority which she exercised over them. This policy did not originate with Pericles, but it was quite in accordance with his views, and was carried out by him in the most complete manner. By the commutation of military service for tribute, many of the allied states had been stripped of their means of defence in the time of Cimon. It appears, however, to have been on the proposition of Pericles that the treasure of the confederacy was removed from Delos to Athens (about B.C. 461; see Böckh, Public Econ. of Ath. bk. iii. c. 15), and openly appropriated to objects which had no immediate connection with the purpose for which the confederacy was first formed, and the contributions levied. In justification of this procedure, Pericles urged that so long as the Athenians fulfilled their part of the compact, by securing the safety of their allies against the attacks of the Persian power, they were not obliged to render any account of the mode in which the money was expended; and if they accomplished the object for which the alliance was formed with so much vigour and skill as to have a surplus treasure remaining out of the funds contributed by the allies, they had a right to expend that surplus in any way they pleased. Under the administration of Pericles the contributions were raised from 460 to 600 talents. The greater part of this increase may have arisen from the commutation of service for money. There is nothing to show that any of the states were more heavily burdened than before (see Böckh, Public Econ. bk. iii. c. 15, p. 400, 2nd ed.). The direct sovereignty which the Athenians claimed over their allies was also exercised in most instances in establishing or supporting democratical government, and in compelling all those who were reduced to the condition of subject allies to refer, at all events, the more important of their judicial causes to the Athenian courts for trial (Böckh, iii. c. 16). Pericles was not insensible to the real nature of the supremacy which Athens thus exercised. He admitted that it was of the nature of a tyranny (Thucyd. ii. 63). In defence of the assumption of it he would doubtless have urged, as the Athenian ambassadors did at Sparta, that the Athenians deserved their high position on account of their noble sacrifices in the cause of Greece, since any liberty which the Greek states enjoyed was the result of that self-devotion; that the supremacy was offered to them, not seized by force; and that it was the jealousy and hostility of Sparta which rendered it necessary for the Athenians in self-defence to convert their hegemony into a dominion, which every motive of national honour and interest urged them to maintain; that the Athenians had been more moderate in the exercise of this dominion than could have been expected, or than any other state would have been under similar circumstances; and that the right of the Athenians had been tacitly acquiesced in by the Lacedaemonians themselves until actual causes of quarrel had arisen between them. (Thucyd. i. 73, &c., especially 75, 76.) In point of fact, we find the Corinthians at an earlier period, in the congress held to deliberate respecting the application of the Samians, openly laying down the maxim that each state had a right to punish its own allies. (Thucyd. i. 40.) If Pericles did not rise above the maxims of his times and country, his political morality was certainly not below that of the age; nor would it be easy even in more modern times to point out a nation or statesman whose procedure in similar circumstances would have been widely different.

The empire which arose out of this consolidation of the Athenian confederacy, was still further strengthened by planting colonies, which commonly stood to the parent state in that peculiar relation which was understood by the term δορυξίων. (Dict. of Ant. art. Colonia.) Colonies of this kind were planted at Oreus in Euboea, at Chaleis, in Naxos, Andros, among the Thracians, and in the Thracian Chersonesus. The settlement at Sinope has been already spoken of. The important colony of Thurii was founded in B.C. 444. Amphipolis was founded by Hagnon in B.C. 437. These colonies also served the very important purpose of drawing off from Athens a large part of the more troublesome and needy citizens, whom it might have been found difficult to keep employed at a time when no military operations of any great magnitude were being carried on. Pericles, however, was anxious rather for a well consolidated empire than for an extensive dominion, and therefore refused to sanction those plans of extensive conquest which many of his contemporaries had begun to cherish. Such attempts, surrounded as Athens was by jealous rivals and active enemies, he knew would be too vast to be attended with success.

Pericles thoroughly understood that the supremacy which it was his object to secure for Athens rested on her maritime superiority. The Athenian navy was one of the objects of his especial care. A fleet of 60 galleys was sent out every year and kept at sea for eight months, mainly, of course, for the purpose of training the crews, though the subsistence thus provided for the citizens who served in the fleet was doubtless an item in his calculations. To render the communication between Athens and Peiraeus still more secure, Pericles built a third wall between the two first built, parallel to the Peiraeic wall.

The internal administration of Pericles is characterized chiefly by the mode in which the public treasures were expended. The funds derived from the tribute of the allies and other sources were devoted to a large extent to the erection of those magnificent temples and public buildings which rendered Athens the wonder and admiration of Greece. A detailed description of the splendid structures which crowned the Acropolis, belongs rather to an account of Athens. The Propylaæa, and the Parthenon, with its sculptured pediments and statue of Athene, exhibited a perfection of art never before seen, and never since surpassed. Besides these, the Odeum, a theatre designed for the entertainment of the people which Pericles appended to the festivities of the Panathenæa, was constructed under his direction; and the temples at Eleusis and other places in Attica, which had been destroyed by the Persians, were rebuilt. The rapidity with which these works were finished excited astonished admiration. The Propylaæa, the most expensive of them, was finished in five years. Under the stimulus afforded by these works architecture and sculpture reached their highest perfection, and some of the greatest artists of antiquity were employed in erecting or adorning the buildings. The chief direction and oversight of the
PERICLES.

Public edifices was entrusted to Phidias, under whose superintendence were employed his two pupils Alcamenes and Agoracritus, Ictinus and Callicrates the architects of the Parthenon. Mnesicles the architect of the Propylæa, Coroebos the architect who began the temple at Eleusis, Callimachus, Metagenes, Xenocles and others. These works calling into activity, as they did in various ways, almost every branch of industry and commerce at Athens, diffused universal prosperity while they proceeded. Such a variety of instruments and materials were now needed, that there could hardly be an artisan in the city who would not find scope for his industry and skill; and as every art required the services of a number of subordinate labourers, every class of the labouring citizens found employment and support. This, however, though a most important object, amounting which Pericles had distinctly in view, was not the only one which he set before himself in this expenditure. Independently of the gratification of his personal taste, which in this respect accorded with that of the people, his internal and external policy formed parts of one whole. While he raised Athens to that supremacy which in his judgment she deserved to possess, on account both of the natural capabilities of the people and the glorious sacrifices which they had made for the safety and freedom not of themselves only but of Greece, the magnificent aspect which the city assumed under his directions was designed to keep alive among the people a present consciousness of their greatness and power. (Comp. Demosth. Aristocr. p. 689, Mid. p. 565.) This feature of his policy is distinctly expressed in the speech delivered by him over the slain in the first winter of the Peloponnesian war, which equally valuable as an embodiment of his views, whether the sentiments contained in it be, as is most probable, such as he actually delivered, or such as his contemporary Thucydides knew him to entertain (Thucyd. ii. 35—46). He calls upon the survivors to resolve that the spirit they cherish towards their enemies shall be no less daring than that of those who had fallen; considering not alone the immediate benefit resulting from repelling their enemies, but rather the power of the city, contemplating it in reality, daily, and becoming lovers (ἐπαράστατοι) of it; and whenever it seems to them to be great, considering that men acquired this magnificence by daring, and judging what was necessary, and maintaining a sense of honour in action (c. 43). The design of his policy was that Athens should be thoroughly prepared for war, while it contained within itself every thing that could render the citizens satisfied with peace; to make them conscious of their greatness, to prepare them for the contest with the power of the republic and the elastic vigour, which was a surer safeguard than all the jealous measures resorted to by the Spartans (c. 36—39). Nothing could well be further from the truth than the estimate Plato formed of the policy of Pericles, if he makes Socrates express his own views, in saying that Pericles made the Athenians idle, and cowardly, and talkative, and money-loving, by first accustoming them to receive pay (Gorg. p. 515, e.). The great object of Pericles was to get the Athenians to set before themselves a great ideal of what Athens and an Athenian ought to be. His commendations of the national characteristics partook quite as much of the nature of exhortation as of that of praise. This object, of leading the Athenians to value highly their station and privileges as Athenians, citizens, may doubtless be traced in the law which he got passed at an early period, that the privileges of citizenship should be confined to those whose parents were both Athenians; a law which was called into exercise in B. C. 444, on the occasion of a present of corn being sent by Psammetichus from Egypt, to be distributed among the Athenian citizens. At the scrutiny which was set on foot only about 14,000 were found to be genuine Athenians, nearly 5000 being discovered to be aliens. That he had not miscalculated the effect likely to be produced on the minds of his fellow-citizens, is shown by the interest and pride which they took in the progress and beauty of the public works. When it was a matter of discussion in the assembly whether marble or ivory should be used in the construction of the great statue of Athene, the latter was selected, apparently for scarcely any other reason than that it was the more costly. We have already seen that the bare idea of having their name disconnected with the works that adorned their city, was sufficient to induce them to sanction Pericles in his lavish application of the public treasures. Pitty, that an expenditure so wise in its ends, and so magnificent in its kind, should have been founded on an act of appropriation, which a strict impartiality cannot justify, though a fair consideration of all the circumstances of the age and people will find much to palliate it. The honesty of the objections raised against it by the enemies of Pericles on the score of its injustice is very questionable. The issue of the opposition of Thucydides and his party has already been noticed. It was not the mere device of a demagogue anxious to secure popularity, but a part of a grand policy, which led Pericles to provide amusement for the people in the shape of religious festivals and musical and dramatic entertainments. These were at the same time intended to prepare the citizens by cheerful relaxation and intellectual stimulus for enduring the exertions necessary for the greatness and well-being of the state, and to lead them, as they became conscious of the enjoyment as well as dignity of their condition, as Athenian citizens, to be ready to put forth their most strenuous exertions in defending a position which secured to them so many advantages. (Thucyd. ii. 38, 40.) The impulse that would be given to trade and commerce by the increase of requirements on the part of the Athenians was also an element in his calculations (Thucyd. ii. 38). The drama especially characterised the age of Pericles (Aeschylus, Sophocles; Dict. of Antiquity, Thucyd. Tragedia). From the comic poets Pericles had to sustain numerous attacks. Their ridicule of his personal peculiarity could excite nothing more than a passing laugh. More serious attempts were made by them to render his position suspicious in the eyes of the people. They exaggerated his power, spoke of his party as Peisistratids, and called upon him to swear that he was not about to assume the tyranny. Cratinus threw out insinuations as to the tardiness with which the building of the third long wall to Peiraeus proceeded. His connection with Aspasia was made the ground of frequent satires (Schol. ad Plat. p. 391, ed. Bekker; Plut. Per. 24). His high character and strict probity, however, rendered all of appropriating part of the gold destined to adorn the statue of the goddess on the Acropolis; and Menon, a workman who had been employed by Pheidias, was suborned to support the charge [Menon]. By the direction of Pericles, however, the golden ornaments had been so fixed as to admit of being taken off. Pericles challenged the accusers to weigh them. They shrank from the test, but the probity of Pheidias was established. This charge having been fruitless, a second attack was made on him for having in the sculpture on the shield of the goddess, representing the battle with the Amazons, introduced portraits of himself and Pericles. To support this charge, again Menon was brought forward, and Pheidias was cast into prison as having shown dishonour to the national religion. According to Plutarch he died there, either by poison or by a natural death. To this charge were connected the attacks on Pericles on a still more sensitive side. The connection between Pericles and Aspasia, and the great ascendency which she had over him, has already been spoken of in the article Aspasia. (Respecting the benefit which the oratory of Pericles was supposed to have derived from her instructions, see Plat. Menecr. p. 235, c. 236, a.) The comic poet Hermippus instituted a prosecution against her, on the ground of impiety, and of pandering to the vices of Pericles by corrupting the Athenian women; a charge beyond all doubt as slanderous as that made against Pheidias of doing the same under pretence of admitting Athenian ladies to view the progress of his works (Thirlwall, iii. pp. 87, 89). Apparently, while this trial was pending, Diopithes got a decree passed that those who denied the existence of the gods, or introduced new opinions about celestial phenomena, should be informed against and impeached according to the measures termed against Pheidias (Dict. of Ant. art. Eunastia). This decree was aimed at Anaxagoras, and through him at Pericles. Another decree was proposed by Dracontides, that Pericles should give in an account of his expenditure of the public money before the Prytanes, who were to conduct the trial with peculiar solemnity. On the amendment of Agon it was decreed that the trial should take place before 1500 dicae. Aspasia was acquitted, though Pericles was obliged to descend to entreaties and tears to save her. The fate of Anaxagoras is uncertain [Anaxagoras]. Of the proceedings against Pericles himself we hear nothing further. (Plut. I. c. Athen. xiii. p. 589, where several of the gossiping stories about Pericles will be found; Diod. xii. 39; Diog. Laërt. ii. 12.) It was the opinion entertained by many ancient writers that the dread of the impending prosecution was at least one of the motives which induced Pericles to hurry on the outbreak of the war with Sparta. That this unworthy charge was a false one is abundantly evident from the impartial and emphatic statements of Thucy- dides. The honesty of Pericles was unimpeachable, and the outbreak of hostilities inevitable.

When the Corecyraeans applied to Athens for assistance against Corinth, one of their main arguments was that hostilities between the rival confederacies could not be postponed much longer. Pericles doubtless foresaw this when by his advice a defensive alliance was contracted with the Corecyraeans and the ten galley ships sent to assist them, under Lacedaemonians, under the command of Cimon, which were only to be brought into action in case a descent upon the territories of the Corecyraeans were threatened. Plutarch represents Pericles as sending so small a force through jealousy of the family of Cimon. Pericles might safely have defied the rivalry of a much more formidable person than Lacedaemonius. A larger squadron of 20 ships was sent out not long after, in case the force first sent should prove too small. (Thucyd. i. 31—54.) The measures taken by the Athenians with respect to Potidaea doubtless had the sanction of Pericles, if they were not suggested by him. (Thucyd. i. 56, &c.) After war had been declared by the congress of the Peloponnesian alliance, as the members of it were not in a condition to commence hostilities immediately, various embassies were sent to Athens, manifestly rather with the intention of multiplying causes of hostility, than with a sincere intention to make a war with the Athenians the object of war. The first demand made was, that the Athenians should banish all that remained of the accrued family of the Alcmeneids. This was clearly aimed at Pericles, who by his mother's side was connected with that house. The design of the Lacedaemonians was to render Pericles an object of odium when the difficulties of the war came to be felt by the Athenians, by making it appear that he was the obstacle in the way of peace. (Thucyd. i. 127.) The demand was disregarded, and the Lacedaemonians in their turn directed to free themselves from the pollution contracted by the death of Pausanias. Subsequent demands were made that the Athenians should raise the siege of Potidaea, restore Aegina to independence, and especially repeal the decree against the Megarians, by which the latter were excluded, on pain of death, from the agora of Athens, and from all ports in the Athenian dominions. One of the second-rate objects of the time was this decree; as having been proposed by Pericles from private motives, some Megarians having carried off two girls belonging to the train of Aspasia. (Aristoph. Acharn. 500.) There was quite sufficient ground for the decree in the long-standing enmity between the Athenians and Megarians, which, just before the decree was passed on the motion of Charinus, had been inflamed by the murder of an Athenian herald, who had been sent to obtain satisfaction from the Megarians for their having encroached upon the consecrated land that lay between the territories of the two states. This demand of the Lacedaemonians was succeeded by one that the Athenians should leave all Greek states independent, that is, that Athens should relinquish her empire, intimations being given that peace might be expected if these conditions were complied with. An assembly was held to deliberate on the answer to be given to the Lacedaemonians. The true motives which actuated Pericles in resisting these demands are given by Thucydides in the speech which he puts into his mouth on the occasion (i. 140—144). Pericles judged rightly in telling the Athenians that the demands made of them, especially that about Me-garn, which was most insisted on, were mere pretexts by which the Lacedaemonians were trying the spirit and resolution of the Athenians; and that in that point of view, involving the whole principle of submission to Sparta, it became of the utmost importance not to yield. He pointed out the advantages which Athens, as the head of a compact dominion, possessed over a disjointed league like that of the Peloponnesians, which, moreover, had not at its immediate command the resources necessary for carrying on the war, and would find the greatest difficulty in raising them; showed how impossible it was that the Peloponnesians should be able to cope with the Athenians by sea, and how utterly fruitless their attack would be if Athens remained mistress of the sea. The course which he recommended therefore was, that the Athenians should not attempt to defend their territory when invaded, but retire within the city, and devote all their attention to securing the strength and efficiency of their navy, with which they could make severe retaliations on the territories of their enemies; since a victory by land would be of no service, and defeat would immediately be followed by the revolt of their subject allies. He warned them, however, that they must be content with defending what they already possessed, and must not attempt to extend their dominion. War, he bade them observe, could not be avoided; and they would the less feel the ill effects of it, if they met their antagonists with alacrity. At his suggestion the Athenians gave for answer to the Lacedaemonian ambassadors, that they would rescind the decree against Megara if the Lacedaemonians would cease to make war on the independent cities; that they would leave their allies independent if they were so at the conclusion of the treaty, and if Sparta would grant real independence to her allies; and that they were still willing to submit their differences to arbitration.

In one sense, indeed, Pericles may be looked upon as the author of the Peloponnesian war, inasmuch as it was mainly his enlightened policy which had raised Athens to that degree of power which produced in the Lacedaemonians the jealousy and alarm which Thucydides (i. 23) distinctly affirms to have been the real cause of the Peloponnesian war. How accurately Pericles had calculated the resources of Athens, and how wisely he had discerned her true policy in the war, was rendered manifest by the spirited struggle which she maintained even when the Peloponnesians were supplied with Persian gold, and by the irreparable disasters into which she was plunged by her departure from the policy enjoined by Pericles.

In the spring of B.C. 451 Plataea was seized. Both sides prepared with vigour for hostilities; and a Peloponnesian army having assembled at the isthmus, another embassy was sent to the Athenians by Archidamus to see if they were disposed to yield. In accordance with a decree which Pericles had had passed, that no herald or embassy should be received after the Lacedaemonians had taken the field, the ambassador, Melissippus, was not suffered to enter the city. Pericles, suspecting that Archidamus in his invasion might leave his property untouched, either out of private friendship, or by the direction of the Peloponnesians, in order to excite odium against him, declared in an assembly of the people that if his lands were left unraaged, he would give them up to be the property of the state (Thucyd. ii. 13). He took the opportunity at the same time of giving the Athenians an account of the resources they had at their command. Acting upon his advice they conveyed their moveable property into the city, transporting their cattle and beasts of burden to Euboea. When the Peloponnesian army advanced desolating Attica, the Athenians were clamorous to be led out against the enemy, and were angry with Pericles because he steadily adhered to the policy he had recommended. He would hold no assembly or meeting of any kind. He, however, kept close guard on the walls, and sent out cavalry to protect the lands near the city. While the Peloponnesian army was in Attica, a fleet of 100 ships was sent round Peloponnesus. (Thucyd. ii. 18, &c.) The foresight of Pericles may probably be traced in the setting apart 1000 talents, and 100 of the best sailing galleys of the year, to be employed only in case of an attack being made on Athens by sea. Any one proposing to appropriate them to any other purpose was to suffer death. Another fleet of thirty ships was sent along the coasts of Locri and Euboea; and in this same summer the population of Aegina was expelled, and Athenian colonists sent to take possession of the island. An alliance was also entered into with Sitalces, king of Thrace. In the autumn Pericles in person led an army into Megaris, and ravaged most of the country. The decree against Megara before spoken of enacted that the Athenian generals on entering office should swear to invade Megaris twice a year (Plut. l.c.; Thucyd. iv. 60). In the winter (B.C. 451—450), on the occasion of paying funeral honours at the battle of Plataea, the Peloponnesians were involved in a severe distress. Pericles was chosen to deliver the oration. (Thucyd. ii. 35—46.) In the summer of the next year, when the Peloponnesians invaded Attica, Pericles pursued the same policy as before. In this summer the plague made its appearance in Athens (Thucyd. ii. 48, &c.). An armament of 100 ships (Thucyd. ii. 56) was conducted by Pericles in person to the coast of Peloponnesus. An eclipse of the sun which happened just before the fleet set sail afforded Pericles an opportunity of applying the astronomical knowledge which he had derived from Anaxagoras in quieting the alarm which it occasioned. (Plut. Per. 35.)

The Athenians, being exposed to the devastation of the war and the plague at the same time, not unnaturally began to turn their thoughts to peace, and looked upon Pericles as the author of all their distresses, inasmuch as he had persuaded them to go to war. Pericles was unable to prevent the sending of an embassy to Sparta, with proposals for peace. It was however fruitless. Pericles then called an assembly, and endeavoured to bring the people to a better mind; set forth the grounds they had for hoping for success; pointed out the unreasonableness of being cast down and diverted from a course of action deliberately taken up by an unforeseen accident like that of the plague, and especially the injustice of holding him in any way responsible for the hardships they were suffering on account of it. It was impossible now to retreat; their empire must be defended at any sacrifice, for it was perilous to abandon it (Thucyd. ii. 60—64). Though Pericles had at least to some extent excited the public ferment, it did not remove from their minds the irritation they felt. Cicero appears among his foremost enemies. According to Plutarch a decree was passed that Pericles should be deprived of his command and pay a fine, the amount of which was variously stated. Thucydides merely says that he was fined. The ill feeling of the people having found this vent, Pericles soon resumed his accustomed sway, and was again elected one of the generals for the ensuing year.

The military operations of B.C. 429 were doubtless conducted under the general superintendence of Pericles, though he does not appear to have conducted any in person. The plague carried off most of his near connections. His son Xanthippus, a potential and unfruitful youth, was put to death by his brother, with whom he had fallen in affection. Of his two intimate friends died of it. Still Pericles maintained unmoved his calm bearing and philosophic composure, and did not even attend the funeral rites of those who were carried off. At last his only surviving legitimate son, Paralus, a youth of greater promise than his brother, fell a victim. The firmness of Pericles then at last gave way; as he placed the funeral garland on the head of the lifeless youth he burst into tears and sobbed aloud. He had one son remaining, his child by Aspasia. Either by a repeal of the law respecting legitimacy which he himself had before got passed, or by a special vote, he was allowed to enrol this son in his own tribe and give him his own name. In the autumn of B.C. 429 Pericles himself died of a lingering sickness, which, if a variety of the plague, was not attended by its usual violent symptoms, but was of such a nature that he wasted away by slow degrees. Theophrastus preserved a story, that he allowed the women who attended him to hang an amulet round his neck, which he showed to a friend to indicate the extremity to which sickness had reduced him, when he could submit to such a piece of superstition. When at the point of death, as his friends were gathered round his bed, recalling his virtues and successes and enumerating his triumphs (in the course of his military career, in which he was equally remarkable for his prudence* and his courage, he had erected as many as nine trophies), overhearing their remarks, he said that they had forgotten his greatest praise: that no Athenian through his means had been made to put on mourning. He survived the commencement of the war two years and six months (Thuc. ii. 65). His death was an irreparable loss to Athens. The policy he had laid down for the guidance of his fellow-citizens was soon departed from; and those who came after him being far inferior to him in personal abilities and merit and more on a level with each other, in their eagerness to assume the reins of the state, betook themselves to unworthy modes of securing popular favour, and, so far from checking the wrong inclinations of the people, fostered and encouraged them, while the operations of the forces abroad and the counsels of the people at home were weakened by division and strife (Thuc. ii. 65).

The name of the wife of Pericles is not mentioned. She had been the wife of Hippocrates, by whom she was the mother of Callias. [Callias, Vol. I. p. 567.] She bore two sons to Pericles, Xanthippus and Paralus. She lived unhappily with Pericles, and a divorce took place by mutual consent, when Pericles connected himself with Aspasia by a tie as close as the law allowed. His union with her continued in uninterrupted harmony till his death. It is possible enough that Aspasia occasioned the alienation of Pericles from his wife; but at the same time it appears that she had been divorced by her former husband likewise. By Aspasia Pericles had one son, who bore his name. Of his strict profligacy he left the decisive proof in the fact that at his death he was found not to have added a single drachma to his hereditary property. Cicero (Brut. vii. § 27, de Orat. ii. 22 § 93) speaks of written orations by Pericles as extant. It is not unlikely that he was deceived by some spurious productions bearing his name. (Quint. I. O. iii. 1.) He mentions the tomb of Pericles at Athens (de Pten. v. 2). It was on the way to the Academy (Paus. i. 29 § 3). There was also a statue of him at Athens (Paus. i. 28 § 2). (Plut. Pericles; Thirwall, Hist. of Greece, vol. iii. cc. 17—20.)

2. Son of the preceding, by Aspasia [Pericles, No. 1]. He was one of the generals at the battle of Arginusae, and was put to death in consequence of the unsuccessful issue of that battle. (Xen. Helos. i. 5 § 16.)

[Comp. CPP M.]

PERICLES (ΠΕΡΙΚΛΕΟΣ). 1. One of the Argonauts, a son of Nelens and Chloris, and a brother of Nestor. (Hom. Od. xxi. 285; Apollo. i. 9 § 15; Orph. Argen. 155.) Poseidon gave him the power of changing himself into different forms, and conferred upon him great strength, but he was nevertheless slain by Heracles at the taking of Pylos. (Apollod. i. 9 § 9, ii. 7 § 8; Apollon. Rhod. i. 156 with the Schol.; Ov. Met. xiii. 556, c.; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1695.) According to Hyginus (Fab. 10) Pericles was escaped from Argos in the shape of an eagle.

2. A son of Poseidon and Chloris, the daughter of Teiresias, of Thebes. In the war of the Seven against Thebes he was believed to have killed Parthenopeus (Apollod. iii. 6 § 8; Paus. viii. 18, in fin.; Eurip. Phoen. 1157), and when he pursued Amphitaurus, the latter by the command of Zeus was swallowed up by the earth. (Pind. Nem. ix. 57, &c. with the Schol.)
Perclymenus (ΠΕΡΙΚΛΥΜΕΝΟΣ), a statuary of unknown age and country, is enumerated by Pliny among those who made athletas et armatus et venatores sacrificantes (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19 § 34). One of his works, a female statue, is mentioned by Tation (adv. Gracce. 55. p. 110, ed. Warb.)

PERICLES (ΠΕΡΙΚΛΕΟΣ), a sculptor, who belonged to the best period and to one of the best schools of Greek art, but of whom scarcely anything is known. He is only mentioned in a single passage of Pausanias (v. 17 § 4), from which we learn that he was the disciple of Polycleitus of Argos, and the teacher of Antiphanes, who was the teacher of Cleon of Sicyon. Since Polycleitus flourished about B.C. 440, and Antiphanes about B.C. 400, the date of Pericyclus may be fixed at about B.C. 420. In some editions of Pausanias his name occurs in another passage (ii. 22 § 8), but the true reading is Polycleiton, not Pericyclus or Periklytus. [Comp. NAUCYDES.] [P. S.]

PERICTHEIS and PERICTYON (ΠΕΡΙΚΤΟΙ, ΠΕΡΙΚΤΟΝ), the former being the more common form), is said to have been the mother of Plato, who was born B. C. 429. Diogenes Laërtius (vii. 1) and Suidas (c. c. Πατρός) call her also Potone, which was the name of Plato's sister. (Suid. s. v. Περίλαυς.) Through Pericle, Plato was descended from Solon, (see pedigree of Glaucon,) though Olymposorus in his life of Plato traces his descent from Solon through his father, and from Cœrus through his mother, reversing the statements of Diogenes Laërtius (l. c.) and Apuleius (of Doym. Plat.), it is a shrewd conjecture of Bentley's (Diss. on Phalaris, vol. i. p. 421, ed. 1836), that, as it was thought "a point of decorum to make even the female kind of philosophers copy after the men," certain passages bearing the name of Pericleone, and quoted by Stobaeus (Florileg. i. 62, 63, Ixxx. 50, lxxxv. 19), are spurious, and, for the reason above given, received the name of Plato's mother. This is strengthened by the fact, stated by Bentley, that fambelclus mentions no such name in his copious list of Pythagorean women. Besides, the first two extracts are in the Doric, and the last two (not one, as Bentley, through oversight, says) are in the Ionic dialect; "And why should she wear loveliness in two dialects?" We have no other trace of this last Pericleone, if indeed there was such a woman, save in the extracts given by Stobaeus; and the two last fragments are undeniably spurious, whatever be determined regarding those in the Doric dialect. [W. M. G.]

PERIÆRES (Περίαιρης). 1. A son of Acos and Enarete, king of Messene, was the father of Aphaerus and Leucippus by Gorgophone. (Apollod. i. 7. § 3; Paus. iv. 2. § 2, 3. § 3, &c.) In some traditions Perieres was called a son of Cynortas, and besides the sons above mentioned he is said to have been, by Gorgophone, the father of Tyndareos and Ictius. (Tzetz. ad Ic. 511; Apollod. i. 9. § 5, ii. 10. § 3.) Oeulus also is called a son of Perieres. (Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 447.) After the death of Perieres, Gorgophone is said to have married Oealus, and to have been the first widow in Greece that married a second husband. (Paus. ii. 21. § 8, comp. iii. i. § 4.)

2. The charioteer of king Menoeceus in Thbes. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 11.)

3. The father of Borus, who was the husband of Polydora. (Hom. II. xvi. 177.) [L. S.]

PERIÆNES (Περιανές), commander of the fleet of Potomel IV. (Philopator) in the war against Antiochus III., king of Syria, B.C. 218. He engaged Diogenes, the admiral of Antiochus, without any decisive result, but the defeat of the land forces of Potomel under Nicolas compelled Perigenes to retreat. (Polby. v. 68, 69.) [E. H. B.]

PERIÁUS (Περίας), a son of Icarus and Periboea, and a brother of Penelope. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 6; Paus. viii. 34. § 2.) There are three other mythical personages of the same name. (Paus. ii. 29. § 6, vi. 4. § 1; Quint. Smyrni. viii. 294.) [L. S.]

PERIÁUS (Περίας). 1. A citizen of Megara, who espoused the party of Philip of Macedon, and according to Demostrhenes, betrayed his country to that monarch, but was afterwards treated by him with neglect and contempt. (Dem. de Cor. pp. 242, 324, de F. L. p. 435.)

2. A Macedonian officer, who was one of the three deputies sent by Meleager and Arrhidæus to treat with the party of Perdiccas and Leonnatus, during the dissensions at Babylon immediately after the death of Alexander (Curt. x. 8, § 15). He afterwards attached himself to Antigonus, by whom he was appointed, in B. C. 315, to command an army in the southern provinces of Asia Minor; but was defeated and taken prisoner by Polyceus, the general of Seleucus. (Diod. xiii. 64.)

3. A son of Antipater, and younger brother of Cassander, king of Macedonia, under whom he held various subordinate employments. (Plut. de Fraz. Amor. 15, p. 486, a.) [E. H. B.]

PERILLUS (Περίλλος), the form Pehlaos in Lucian, Phil. 1, and the Scholiast to Pindar, Pyth. i. 185, probably arises from a confusion of A with Α, a statuary, was the maker of the bronze bull of the tyrant Phalaris, respecting which see further under Phalaris. Of the modern disquisitions on this instrument of torture, the most important are those of Goller (De Situ et Orig. Syrac. pp. 273, &c.) and Boëtiger (Kunstmythologie, vol. i. p. 380). Müller places the artist at OL 55, c. 560. Like the makers of other instruments of death, Perillus is said to have become one of the victims of his own hand. [P. S.]

PERIMÉDE (Περιμήδης). 1. A daughter of Aeonus and Enarete, and the mother of Hippodamas and Orestes. (Apollod. i. 7. § 1; comp. Achelous.)

2. A daughter of Oeneus, by whom Phoenix became the father of Europa and Astypalæa. (Paus. vii. 4. § 2.)

3. A daughter of Eurystheus. (Apollod. ii. 8. § 1.)

4. A sister of Amphitrion, and wife of Licymnius. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 6.) [L. S.]

PERIMÉDES (Περιμήδης). 1. One of the companions of Odysseus during his wanderings. (Hom. Od. xi. 23; Paus. x. 29. § 1.)

2. One of the centaurs. (Hes. Sout. Hero. 187; Athen. iv. p. 148.)

3. A son of Eurystheus and Antimache. (Apollod. ii. 8. § 1.) [L. S.]

PERIMELE (Περιμήλη), the name of three mythological personages, the first a daughter of Hippodamas (Ov. Met. viii. 550, &c.; comp. Achelous); the second a daughter of Admetus (Anton. Lib. 23); and the third a daughter of Anythoan. (Diod. iv. 69; comp. Ixion.) [L. S.]

PERIPHÄNAS (Περιφήνας). 1. One of the sons of Aegyptus. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 6.)

2. A son of Oeneus. (Anton. Lib. 2; comp. Ormenus.)

3. A son of Lapithes in Thessaly. (Diod. iv. 69, v. 61; comp. Lapithenes.)

4. One of the Lapithes. (Ov. Met. xii. 449.)

5. An Attic autochthon, previous to the time of Cecrops, was a priest of Apollo, and on account of his virtues he was made king; but as he was honoured to the same extent as Zeus, the latter wished to destroy him. At the request of Apollo, however, Zeus metamorphosed him into an eagle, and his wife likewise into a bird. (Anton. Lib. 6; Ov. Met. viii. 400.)

6. A son of the Aetolian Ocheus, fell by the hand of Ares in the Trojan war. (Hom. Il. v. 842.)

7. A son of Epytus, and a herald of Aeneas. (Hom. Il. xvii. 323.)

PERIPI ETES (Περιπῆτες). 1. A son of Hephaestus and Anticlea, was surnamed Cory-notes, that is, Club-bearer, and was a robber at Epidauros, who slew the travellers he met with an iron club. Theseus at last slew him and took his club for his own use. (Apollod. ii. 16. § 1; Plut. These. 8; Paus ii. 1. § 4; Ov. Met. vii. 437.)

2. A son of Copeus of Myceneae, was slain at Troy by Hector. (Hom. ll. xvi. 638.)

3. A Trojan, who was slain by Teucer. (Hom. ll. xiv. 515.)

PERPO (Pepo). 1. The mother of the river-god Asopus by Poseidon. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 6.)

2. A daughter of Neleus and Chloris, was married to Bias, and celebrated for her beauty. (Hom. Od. xi. 286; Apollod. i. 9. § 9; Paus. x. 31. § 2.)

PEROLL. [Calavius.]

PERPERNA, or PERPENNA, the name of a Roman gens. We may infer from the termination of the word, that the Perpernae were of Etruscan origin, like the Carciinae and Spurrinae. The Perpernae are first mentioned in the latter half of the second century B.C., and the first member of the gens, who obtained the consulship, was M. Perperna, who is in considerable doubt as to the orthography of the name, since both Perperna and Perpena occur in the best manuscripts; but as we find Perpena in the Fasti Capitolini, this appears to be the preferable form. (Comp. Gnaevus and Garatone. ad Cic. pro Rosc. Com. 1; Duker, ad Flor. ii. 20; Drakenborch, ad Liv. xil. 27.) There are no coins now extant to determine the question of the orthography, although in the time of Fronto there were coins bearing this name. (Fronto, p. 249, ed. Rom.)

1. M. Perperna, was sent as an ambassador in B.C. 168 with L. Petillius to the Illyrian king Gentius, who threw them into prison, where they remained till the conquest of Gentius shortly after by the praetor Anicius. Perperna was thereupon sent to Rome by Anicius to convey the news of the victory. (Liv. xil. 27. 32; Appian, Mac. xvi. 1.)

2. M. Perperna, consul in B.C. 130, is said to have been a consul before he was a citizen; for Valerius Maximus relates (iii. 3. § 5), that the father of this Perperna was condemned under the Papia lex after the death of his son, because he had falsely usurped the rights of a Roman citizen.*

M. Perperna was praetor in B.C. 135, in which year he had the conduct of the war against the slaves in Sicily, and in consequence of the advantages which he obtained over them received the honour of an ovation on his return to Rome. (Flor. iii. 19; Fasti Capit.) He was consul in B.C. 130 with C. Claudius Pulcher Lentulus, and was sent into Asia against Aristonicus, who had defeated one of the consuls of the previous year, P. Licinius Crassus. Perperna, however, soon brought the war to a close. He defeated Aristonicus in the first engagement, and followed up his victory by laying siege to Stratonicea, whither Aristonicus had fled. The town was compelled by famine to surrender, and the king accordingly fell into the consul's hands. Perperna did not however live to enjoy the triumph, which he would undoubtedly have obtained, but died in the neighbourhood of Pergamum on his return to Rome in B.C. 129. (Livy. Epit. 59; Justin. xxxvi. 4; Vell. Pat. ii. 4; Flor. ii. 20; Oros. v. 10.) [Aristonicus, No. 2.]

It was the above-mentioned Perperna that granted the right of asylum to the temple of Diana in the town of Hieroacarea in Lydia. (Tac. Ann. iii. 62.)

3. M. Perperna, son of No. 2, consul B.C. 92 with C. Claudius Pulcher, and censor B.C. 86 with L. Marcius Philippus. Perperna is mentioned by the ancient writers as an extraordinary instance of longevity. He attained the great age of ninety-eight years, and died in B.C. 49, the year in which the civil war broke out between Caesar and Pompey. He outlived all the senators who belonged to that body in his consularship, and at the time of his death there were only seven persons surviving, whom he had enrolled in the senate during his censorship. (Plin. H. N. vii. 43; Val. Max. viii. 13. § 4; Dion Cass. xli. 14; the last writer gives the details a little differently.) Perperna took no prominent part in the agitated times in which he lived. In the Social or Marius war, B.C. 90, he was with the legates, who served under the consul P. Rutilius Lupanus, Appian, B.C. 90.

It was probably the same M. Perperna who was judge in the case of C. Aculeo (Cic. de Oraat. ii. 65), and also in that of Q. Roscius, for whom Cicero pleaded (pro Rosc. Com. i. 8). In B.C. 54, M. Perperna is mentioned as one of the consulars who bore testimony on behalf of M. Scaurus at the trial of the latter. (Ascon. in Scour. p. 28, ed. Orelli.) The censorship of Perperna is mentioned by Cicero (Verr. i. 55), and Cornelius Nepos speaks of him (Cat. i. 1) as censorius.

4. M. Perperna Vento, son of No. 3, joined the Marian party in the civil war, and was raised to the praetorship (Perperna praetorius, Vell. Pat. ii. 30), though in what year is uncertain. After Sulla had completely conquered the Marian party in Italy in B.C. 82, Perperna fled to Sicily with some troops; but upon the arrival of Pompey shortly afterwards, who had been sent thither by Sulla, Perperna evacuated the island. On the death of Pompey in B.C. 78, Perperna, who had been consul B.C. 130, appealed to the Senate in B.C. 77, and was appointed M. Aemilius Lepidus in his attempt to overthrow the new aristocratical constitution, and retired with him to Sardinia on the failure of this attempt. Lepidus died in Sardinia in the following year, B.C. 77, and Perperna with the remains of his army crossed over to Spain, where the amiable disposition and brilliant genius of Sertorius had gained the love of the inhabitants of the country, and had for some time defied all the efforts of Q. Metellus Pius, who had been sent against him with a large army by the ruling party at Rome. Perperna, however, was not disposed to place himself under the command of Sertorius. He had brought with him considerable forces and large treasures; he was proud of his noble family, being both the son and grandson of a consul; and although his abilities were mean, he thought that the chief command ought to devolve upon him, and therefore resolved to carry on the war on his own account against Metellus. But his troops, who well knew on which commander they could place most reliance, compelled him to join Sertorius, as soon as they heard that Pompey was crossing the Alps in order to prosecute the war in conjunction with Metellus. For the next five years Perperna served under Sertorius, and was more than once defeated. [For details, see Sertorius.] But although Plut. Cic. Liv. Sail. Veil. hence jealousy war latter, Anxious enpanied to inviting Epit. 23 to with 115 south his states presented that statue Bion Verr. 162, Antigonus i), Athenaeus B. 27. Persaeus, writings in Laeitius, which are acknowledged to Plutarch, has been and for himself, was appointed to a chief command in Corinth, and hence he is classed by Aelian (V. H. 117), among those philosophers who have taken an active part in public affairs. According to Athenaeus (iv. p. 162, c), who has no high opinion of his morality, his dissipation led to the loss of Corinth, which was taken by Aratus the Sicilian, n. c. 243. Pausanias (ii. 8, vii. 8) states that he was then slain. Plutarch doubtfully represents him as escaping to Cenchreae. But this may have been put to his mouth when alive, what Athenaeus says of him when dead, that he who had been taught by Zeno to consider philosophers as the only men fit to be generals, had been forced to alter his opinion, being corrected by a Sician ambassador, to whom he had been said that he was jealous of the king of Persia.

We find a list of his writings in Laeitius, in which we are started to find Έσορρυτω. Athenaeus (iv. 140, p. 6, e) agrees with Laeitius, in attributing to him a work, entitled Φιλοσοφικόν Διάλογον (iv. p. 162, e). But that the favourite pupil of Zeno, and the trusted friend of Antigonus for many years, could have written such a work as he describes, seems incredible. He very probably did write a book bearing the title Τυμωνίματα Φιλοσοφία (as stated by Laeitius), on the model of the Συμπόσιον of Plato; hence the Πέρι Γάμου and Πέρι Ερωτός, mentioned by Laeitius as separate treatises of Persaeus. But, being the friend of Antigonus, he was deemed to be an enemy to Greek freedom; hence the inveterate enmity of Memedus (Diog. Laer. ii. 143), and hence spurious productions of a contemptible character were probably assigned to him. Lippus, however (Manuscr. d. Stote. Philos. xii. 1), seems to be of an opinion quite the reverse. Suidas and Eudocia (p. 362) state that he wrote a history, which may refer to his political writings. He also wrote, according to Laeitius, against the laws of Plato. Of his philosophical opinions, we know hardly anything. It is reasonable to conjecture that he adhered closely to the tenets of Zeno. Accordingly, we find him, on one occasion, convicting Ariston of inconsistency in not adhering in practice to his dogma, that the wise man was opinionless (Διάδος-τος). We find him, however, if we can trust Laeitius, agreeing with Ariston in his doctrine of indisference (Διαδοσία), and himself convicted of inconsistency by Antigonus—an incident which has been ingeniously expanded by Themistius. (Orat. x. 528.) Cicero (de Nat. D. i. 15, where the old reading was Persus) censures an opinion of his that divinity was ascribed not only to men who had improved the arts of life, but even to those material substances which are of use to mankind. Meinrius (de Cpairo, i. p. 167) thinks that this is taken from a work of his entitled Ἡθικά Σχόλων mentioned by Laeitius. Minucius Felix (Octav. p. 22, ed. Lugd. Bat. 1653), alludes also to this opinion, but he seems to have derived his knowledge from Cicero, as the illustrations are Roman, and not Greek, as we might have expected. Dio Chrysostom (Orat. iiii.) states that following the example of Zeno, Persaeus, while commenting on Homer, did not discuss his general merits, but attempted to prove that he had written κατά Σέξιαν, and not κατά Δαλβείαν. (Cicero, diog. Laer. vii. with Lipsius, Meinrius, ii. cc., and Fabric. Bibl. Gracc. vol. iii. p. 570.) [W. M. G.] PERSEPHONE.

PERSEPHONE (Περσεφόνη), a daughter of Oceanus, and wife of Helios, by whom she became the mother of Aeetes and Circe. (Hom. Od. x. 139; Hes. Thog. 356, 956.) She is further called the mother of Pasiphaë (Apollod. i. 9§ 1, 3. 1. i. 2; Hygin. Praef.); Perse (Apollod. i. 9, in § 9.), and Aleea (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 174). Homer and Apollonius Rhodius (v. 591) call her Perse, while others (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 708, v. 591) or Persan. (Virg. Gmii. 68.)

PERSEIDES or PERSEUS (Περσείδης, Περσείδας, Περσεύς, or Περσείς), a patronymic of Perses, used to designate his descendants. (Hom. Il. xii. 123; Thucyd. i. 9.) But it is also used to designate the descendants of Perse, viz. Aeetes and Hecate. (Val. Flacc. v. 582, vi. 495.)

PERSEPHONE (Περσεφόνη), in Latin Proserpina, the daughter of Zeus and Demeter. (Hom. Il. xiv. 326, Od. xi. 216; Hes. Thog. 912, &c.; Apollod. i. 5. § 1.) Her name is commonly derived from περσινός, "to bring" or "cause death," and the form Persephone occurs first in Hesiod (Thog. 913; comp. Hom. Hymn. in Cer. 56), the Homeric form being Persephone. But besides these forms of the name, we also find Persephassa, Pherephassa, Persephatta, Pherrephassa, and Pherephsea, for which various spellings are given. The name Proserpina, which is probably only a corruption of the Greek, was erroneously derived from the Romans from proserpere, "to shoot forth." (Cic. de Nat. Deor. ii. 26.) Being the infernal goddess of death, she is also called a daughter of Zeus and Styx (Apollod. i. 3. § 1); in Arcadia she was worshipped under the name of Despoea, and was called a daughter of Poseidon, Hippius, and Demeter, and said to have been brought up by the Titan Anytus. (Paus. viii. 37, §§ 3, 6, 25, § 5.) Homer describes her as the wife of Hades, and the formidable, venerable, and majestic queen of the shades, who shields her power, and carries into effect the curses of men upon the souls of the dead, along with her husband. (Hom. Od. x. 494, xi. 226, 385, 634, Il. ix. 457, 569; comp. Apollod. i. 9. § 15.) Hence she is called by later writers Juno Inferna, Aeterna, and Syagia (Virg. Aen. vi. 138; Orv. Met. xiv. 114), and the Erinnyes are said to have been daughters of Persephone by Pluto (Orph. Hymn. 29. 6, 70. 3.) Groves spoke of her, and she was called by Homer to be in the western extremity of the earth, on the frontiers of the lower world, which is itself called the house of Persephone. (Od. x. 491, 500.)

The story of her being carried off by Pluto, against her will, is not mentioned by Homer, who simply describes her as his wife and queen; and her abduction is first mentioned by Hesiod (Thog. 914). Zeus, it is said, advised Pluto, who was in love with the beautiful Persephone, to carry her off, as her mother, Demeter, was not likely to allow her daughter to go down to Hades. (Comp. Hygin. Fab. 146.) Pluto accordingly carried her off while she was gathering flowers with Artemis and Athena. (Comp. Didot. v. 3.) Demeter, when she found her daughter had disappeared, searched for her all over the earth with torches, until at length she discovered the place of her abode. Her anger at the abduction obliged Zeus to request Pluto to send Persephone for Cer, i.e. the maiden or daughter) back Pluto indeed complied with the request, but first gave her a kernel of a pomegranate to eat, whereby she becom doomed to the lower world, and an agreement was made that Persephone should spend one third (later writers say one half) of every year in Hades with Pluto, and the remaining two thirds with the gods above. (Apollod. i. 5. § 1, &c.; Orv. Met. v. 585; comp. Demeter.) The place where Persephone was said to have been carried off, is different in the various local traditions. The Scienians, among whom her worship was probably introduced by the Corinthian and Megaric colonists, believed that Pluto found her in the meadows near Enna, and that the well Cyane arose on the spot where he descended with her into the lower world. (Diod. v. 3, &c.; comp. Lydus, De Mens. p. 286; Orv. Fast. iv. 422.) The Cretans thought that their own island had been the scene of the rape (Schol. ad Hes. Thog. 913), and the Eleusi- sinians mentioned the Nyssaean plain in Boeotia, and said that Persephone had descended with Pluto into the lower world at the entrance of the western Ocean. Later accounts place the rape in Attica, near Athens (Schol. ad Soph. Oed. Col. 1590) or at Erinus near Eleusis (Paus. i. 36. § 5), or in the neighbourhood of Lerna (ii. 36. § 7; respecting other localities see Conon, Narr. 15; Orph. Argon. 1192; Spanheim, ad Callim. Hymn. in Cer. 9.)

The story according to which Persephone spent one third of the year in the lower world, and another with the gods above, made her, even with the ancients, the symbol of vegetation which shoots forth in spring, and the power of which withdraws into the earth at other seasons of the year. (Schol. ad Theocrit. iii. 48.) Hence Plutochar identifies her with spring, and Cecro (De Nat. Deor. ii. 26) calls her the seed of the fruits of the field. (Comp. Lydus, De Mens. pp. 90, 284; Porphyry, De Ant. Nymp. p. 118, ed. Barnes.) In the mysteries of Eleusis, the return of Cora from the lower world was regarded as the symbol of immortality, and hence she was frequently represented on sarcopha- gi. In the mystical theories of the Orphics, and what are called the Platonicists, Cora is described as the all-pervading goddess of nature, who both produces and destroys everything (Orph. Hymn. 29. 16), and she is therefore mentioned along, or identified with, other mystic divinities, such as Isis, Rhea, Ge, Hestia, Pandemos, Artemis, Eleuteta. (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 703, 1176; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iii. 79; Schol. ad Theocrit. ii. 12; Serv. ad Aen. iv. 609.) This mystic Persephone is further said to have become Zeus the mother of Dionysus, Iacchus, Zagreus or Sabazius. (He- sch. s. v. Xarpef; Schol. ad Euphr. Or. 952; Aristoph. Ran. 326; Did. iv. 4; Arrian, Expol. Al. i. 16; Lydus De Mens. p. 198; Cic. de Nat. Deor. ii. 23.) The surnames which are given to her by the poets, refer to her character as queen of the lower world and of the dead, or to her sym- bolic meaning which we have pointed out above. She was commonly worshipped along with Demeter, and with the same mysteries, as for example, with Demeter Cabeiria in Boeotia. (Paus. ix. 25. § 5.) Her worship further is mentioned at Thebes, which Zeus is said to have given to her as an acknowledgment for a favour she had bestowed on him (Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 607); in like manner a festival among whom her worship was probably 216. (Pind. Nem. i. 17; Did. v. 2; Schol. ad Theocrit. xi. 14), and two festivals were celebrated in her honour in the island, the one at the time of sowing, and the other at the time of harvest. (Diod. v. 4; Athen. iv. p. 647.) The Eleanusian mysteries belonged to Demeter and Cora in common, and to her alone were dedicated the mysteries celebrated at Athens in the month of Anthesterion. (Comp. Paus. i. 31. § 1, &c.) Temples of Persephone are mentioned at Corinth, Megara, Sparta, and at Locri in the south of Italy. (Paus. iii. 13. § 2; Liv. xxix. 6, 10; Appian, iii. 12.) In works of art Persephone is seen very frequently: she bears the grave and severe character of an infernal Juno, or she appears as a mystical divinity with a sceptre and a little box, but she was mostly represented in the act of being carried off by Pluto. (Paus. viii. 37. § 2; comp. Iirt. Mythol. Bilderb. i. p. 72, &c.; Welcker, Zeitschrift für die alte Kunst, p. 20, &c.)

Another mythical personage of the name of Persephone is called a daughter of Minyas, and the mother of Chloris by Amphion. (Schol. ad Hom. Od. xi. 291.)

PERSEUS (Herc.). 1. A son of the Titan Crius and Eurybia, and husband of Asteria, by whom he became the father of Hecate. (Hes. Theog. 377, 409, &c.; Apollod. i. 2. §§ 2, 4.)

2. A son of Perseus and Andromeda, is described as the founder of the Persian nation. (Herod. vii. 61; Apollod. ii. 4. § 5.)

3. A son of Helen and Perseus, and brother of Aetes and Circe. (Apollod. i. 9. § 28; Hygin. Fab. 244.) The Scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius (iii. 200) calls him as well as Perseus No. 1, Perseus, and king of Tauris. (Comp. Tzetza ad Lyc. 1175.)

PERSEUS (Herc.), an epigrammatic poet, who was included in the Garland of Meleager, but of whose time we have no further indication, is called a Theban in the title of one of his epigrams, but a Macedonian in that of another. There are nine epigrams by him in the Greek Anthology. (Bruckn. Anatol. vol. ii. p. 4; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. ii. p. 3, vol. xill. p. 932.)

PERSEUS (Herc.). 1. The famous Argive hero, was a son of Zeus and Danae, and a grandson of Acrisius (Hom. ii. xiv. 310; Hes. Scut. Herc. 229). Acrisius, who had no male issue, consulted the Pythian oracle, and received the answer, that if Danae should give birth to a son, he would kill his father. Acrisius, accordingly, shut up his daughter in a subterraneous apartment, made of brass or stone (Soph. Ant. 947; Lylyph. 533; Horat. Carm. iii. 16). But Zeus having metamorphosed himself into a shower of gold, came down upon her through the roof of the apartment, and became by her the father of Perseus. From this circumstance Perseus is sometimes called χρυσάραυρος or aurigena (Lylyph. 833; Ov. Met. v. 250). When Acrisius discovered that Danae had given birth to a son, he threw both mother and son into a chest, and put them out to sea; but Zeus caused the chest to land on the island of Seriphos, one of the Cyclades, where Dictys, a fisherman, found them, and carried them to his brother, king Polydectes. According to a later or Italian tradition, the chest was carried to the coast of Italy, where king Pilumnus married Danae, and founded Ardea (Virg. Aen. vii. 410; Serv. ad Aen. vii. 372); or Danae is said to have come to Italy with two sons, Argus and Argeus, whom she had by Phineus, and took up her abode on the spot where Rome was afterwards built (Serv. ad Aen. vii. 345). But, according to the common story, Polydectes, king of Seriphos, made Danae his slave, and courted her favour, but in vain; and in order to obtain the undisputed possession of her, he sent off Perseus, who had in the meantime grown up to manhood, to the Gorgons, to fetch the head of Medusa, which he said he would give to Hippodameia as a wedding present (Tzetza. ad Lyc. 539). Another account again states that Polydectes married Danae, and caused Perseus to be brought up in the temple of Athena. When Acrisius learnt this, he went to Polydectes, who, however, interfered on behalf of the boy, and the latter promised not to kill his grandfather. Acrisius, however, was detained in Seriphos by storms, and during that time Polydectes died. During the funeral games the wind carried a disk thrown by Perseus against the head of Acrisius, and killed him, whereupon Perseus proceeded to Argos and took possession of the kingdom of his grandfather (Hygin. Fab. 63). But to return to the common tradition. Athena, with whom Medusa had ventured to contend for the prize of beauty, first showed to Perseus the head of Gorgo in images, near the town of Dictieron in Samos, and advised him to be unconcerned about the two immortal Gorgons, Steno and Euryale. Perseus then went first to the Graeae, the sisters of the Gorgons, took from them their eyes, and the three of them, and burnt and restored them to the Graeae until they showed him the way to the nymphs; or he cast the tooth and the eye into lake Triton, so that the Graeae were no longer able to guard the Gorgons (Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 12). The nymphs provided Perseus with winged sandals, a bag, and the helmet of Hades, which rendered him invisible, Hermes with a sickle, and Athena with a mirror (Hes. Scut. Herc. 220, 222; Eurip. Elect. 460; Anthol. Palat. ii. 557; comp. Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 12; Theon, ad Astral. p. 29). Being thus armed, he went to the Gorgons, who dwelt near Tartessus on the coast of the Ocean, whose heads were covered, like those of serpents, with scales, and who had large tusk-like horns, brazen hands, and golden wings. He found them asleep, and cut off the head of Medusa, looking at her figure through the mirror, for a look at the monster herself would have changed him into stone. Perseus put her head into the bag in which he carried on his back, and as he went away, he was pursued by the winged Gorgons (Hes. Scut. Herc. 230; Paus. v. 18. § 1). On his return he visited Aethiopia, where he saved and married Andromeda, by whom he became the father of Perseus, whom he left with Cepheus. During this journey Perseus is also said to have come to the Hyperboreans, by whom he was hospitably received (Pind. Pyth. x. 50), and to Atlas, whom, by the head of Gorgo, he changed into the mountain of the same name (Ov. Met. iv. 653; Serv. ad Aen. iv. 246). Phineus, the brother of Cepheus, was likewise changed into stone, and when Perseus returned to Seriphos he found his mother with Dictys in the temple, whither she had fled to the embraces of Polydectes. Perseus found the latter at a repast, and metamorphosed him and all his guests, and, some say, the whole island, into stone (Pind. Pyth. xii. 21; Strab. x. p. 487), and presented the kingdom to Dictys. Perseus then gave the winged sandals and the helmet to Hermes, who restored them to the nymphs and to Iades, and Athena received the head of Gorgo, which was put on the shield or breast-plate of the PERSEUS.

Perseus, on his return to Argos, found Proetus who had expelled his brother Acrisius, in possession of the kingdom (Ov. Met. vi. 236, &c.); Perseus slew Proetus, and was afterwards killed by Megapenthes, the son of Proetus, who avenged the death of his father. (Hygin. Fab. 244.) Some again relate that Proetus was expelled, and went to Thebes. (Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 1109.) But the common tradition goes on thus: when Teuta- midas, king of Larissa, celebrated games in honour of his guest Acrisius, Perseus, who took part in them, accidentally hit the foot of Acrisius, and thus killed him. Acrisius was buried outside the city of Larissa, and Perseus, leaving the kingdom of Argos to Megapenthes, the son of Proetus, received from him in exchange the government of Tyrins. According to others, Perseus, being slain in Argos, and successfully opposed the introduction of the Bacchic orgies. (Paus. ii. 20. § 3, 22. § 1; comp. Nonn. Dion. xxxi. 25.) Perseus is said to have founded the towns of Midea and Mycenae. (Paus. ii. 15. § 4.) By Andromeda he became the father of Alcaeus, Sthenelus, Heleus, Mestor, Electryon, Gorgophone, and Autochthe. (Apollod. ii. 4. §§ 1—5; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 494, 838; Ov. Met. iv. 606, &c.; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1091.) Perseus was worshipped as a hero in several places, e.g. between Argos and Mycenae, in Seriphus, and at Athens, where he had an altar in common with Dictys and Clymene. (Paus. ii. 18. § 1.) Herodotus (ii. 91) relates that a temple and a statue of Perseus existed at Chemnis in Egypt, and that the country was blessed whenever he appeared.

2. A son of Nestor and Anaxibia. (Hom. Od. iii. 414; Apollod. i. 8. § 9.)

3. A ruler of Dardanus, who, with his wife Phaea, visited Laodice in forming a reconciliation with Acrisius. (Parthen. Erol. 19; comp. Acamas and Laodice.)

PERSEUS or PERSES* (Perseus), the last king of Macedonia, was the eldest son of Philip V. According to some of the Roman writers he was the offspring of a concubine, and consequently not of legitimate birth. (Liv. xxxix. 53, xl. 9, &c.) Plutarch, on the contrary (Aemil. 8), represents him as a supposititious child, and not the son of Philip at all: but it is probable that both these tales were mere inventions of his enemies: at least it is clear that he was from the first regarded both by his father and the whole Macedonian nation as the undoubted heir to the throne. He was early trained to arms, and was still a mere boy when he was appointed by his father to command the army destined to guard the passes of Pelagonia against the Illyrians, n. c. 260 (Liv. xxxi. 20). In n. c. 189 we again find him leading an army into Epeirus, where he besieged Amphibolia, but was compelled by the Aetolians to retire. (Id. xxxviii. 5, 7.) The favour shown by the Romans to his younger brother Demetrius had the effect of exciting the jealousy of Perseus, who suspected that the Roman senate intended to set up Demetrius as a competitor for the throne on the death of Philip: and the popularity of the prince among the Macedonians themselves was ill calculated to allay these apprehensions. Perseus in consequence set to work to effect the ruin of his brother, and at length by a long train of machinations and intrigues [DEMETRIUS] succeeded in convincing Philip that Demetrius entertained a treasonable correspondence with the Romans, and thus prevailed on him to order the execution of the unhappy prince. (Liv. xxxix. 53, xl. 5—15, 20—24; Polyb. xxiv. 3, 7, 8; Diod. xxix. Eexc. Vales. p. 576; Justin. xxxii. 2; Zonar. ix. 22; Plut. Aemil. 8.) It is said that Philip subsequently detected the treachery of Perseus, and had even determined to exclude him from the throne, but his own death, which was brought on by the grief and remorse caused by this discovery, prevented the execution of his designs, n. c. 179. Perseus instantly assumed the sovereign power, and his first act was to put to death Antigonus, to whom he had assigned the hostile intentions of his own father. (Liv. xl. 54—56, 57; Justin. xxxii. 3; Zonar. ix. 22.)

The latter years of the reign of Philip had been spent in preparations for a renewal of the war with Rome, which he foresaw to be inevitable: and when Perseus ascended the throne, he found himself amply provided both with men and money for the impending contest. But, whether from a sincere desire of peace, or from irresolution of character, he sought to avert an open rupture as long as possible; and one of the first acts of his reign was to send an embassy to Rome to obtain the recognition of his own title to the throne, and a renewal of the treaty concluded with his father. This embassy was the more necessary as he had already by his hostilities with a Thracian chief, named Abrupolis, who was nominally in alliance with Rome, afforded a pretext to the jealousy of that power; but for the moment this cause of offence was overlooked, Perseus was acknowledged as king, and the treaty renewed on the same terms as before. (Liv. xliii. 9, p. 757; Polyb. xxxii. 14; Liv. xl. 23; Polyb. xxiv. Eexc. Vat. p. 413; Liv. xlii. 24, xliii. 13, 40, 41.) It is probable that neither party was sincere in the conclusion of this peace; at least neither could entertain any hope of its duration; yet a period of seven years elapsed before the mutual enmity of the two powers broke out into actual hostilities. Meanwhile Perseus was not idle: and his first measures were of a liberal and judicious character. He secured the attachment of his own subjects by rescinding the unpopular acts of his father's reign, by recalling all exiles and publishing a general act of amnesty. (Polyb. xxv. 6.) At the same time he sought to conciliate the favour of the Greeks, many of whom were inclined to his cause in preference to that of Rome; and entered into extensive relations with the Thracian, Illyrian, and Celtic tribes, by which his kingdom was surrounded. Nor did he neglect to cultivate the friendship of the Asiatic princes, who on their part (with the exception of Eumenes) seem to have eagerly sought his alliance.Seleucus IV Philopator gave him his daughter Laodice in marriage, while Prusias king of Bithynia gladly accepted the hand of his sister. (Liv. xliii. 12; Po-

lyb. xxvi. 7; Inscur. Del. op. Mar. Oeon.; Appian. Mac. ix. 1.) But every attempt to strengthen himself by foreign alliances was resisted by the Romans as an infringement of the treaty with them. The Dardanians complained to the senate at Rome of the aggressions of the Ostrogoths, and accused Perseus, apparently not without reason, of supporting the invaders. News was also brought to Rome that Macedonian envys had been secretly received at Carthage; and the king soon after gave fresh cause of offence by an expedition against the Dolopians, in which, after reducing that tribe, he repaired at the head of an army, though in the most peaceful manner, to Delphi, under pretence of a vow, but in reality to make a show of his power and force in the eyes of the Greeks. Numerous embassies were sent by the Romans to complain of these proceedings, as well as to spy into the real state of affairs in Macedonia, while Perseus in return was not sparing of apologies and excuses. At length, in b.c. 172, Eumenes, king of Pergamus, repaired in person to Rome and laid before the senate an elaborate statement of the power, the resources, and the hostile designs of the Macedonian king. On his return through Greece he was attacked near Delphi by a band of assassins, who are said to have been employed by Perseus, a suspicion to which the latter certainly afforded some countenance, by taking the leader of them—a Cretan named Evanider—into his immediate service. Another plot which the Romans pretended to have discovered at the same time, for poisoning some of their chief officers [RAMMIUS], was probably a mere fiction to inflame the minds of the populace against Perseus. War was now determined by the senate, but it was not declared till the following spring (b.c. 171), and even then the Romans were not fully prepared to commence hostilities. Perseus, on the other hand, found himself at the head of a splendid army, fully equipped and ready for immediate action; but instead of making use of this advantage, he still clung to the delusive hopes of peace, and was persuaded by Q. Marcus Philippus, with whom he held a personal conference in Thessaly, to send ambassadors once more to Rome. These soon returned, as was to be expected, without having even obtained an answer; but in the mean while the Romans had completed their levies, transported their army into Epeirus, and the consul P. Licinius Crassus was ready to take the field. (Lit. xlii. 19, 22—24, xliii. 2, 5, 11, 12, 14—19, 25, 29—31, 36—43, 48; Polyb. xxvii. 9, xxviii. 7, Exc. Vat. p. 413; Diod. xxx. Exc. Leg. pp. 623, 624; Appian. Mac. Exc. ix. 1—5.)

Perseus was now at length convinced that he had no hope of any longer delaying the contest; and at a council of war held at Pella, it was determined to have immediate recourse to arms. Though supported by no allies, except Cota king of the Odyrians, he found himself at the head of an army of 39,000 foot and 4,000 horse, with which he invaded Thessaly, and after taking some small towns, encamped near Sycurium in the valley of the Peneus. The consul Licinius soon arrived in the same neighbourhood, and an action ensued between the cavalry of the two armies, in which the Macedonians were victorious; and if Perseus had chosen to follow up his advantage with vigour, might probably have led to the total defeat of the Romans. But the king wavered, drew off his forces, and even sent to the consul to renew his offers of peace, which were haughtily rejected by Licinius. The rest of the campaign passed over without any decisive result. The Romans in their turn obtained a slight advantage, and Perseus at the close of the summer withdrew into Macedonia, whither Licinius made no attempt to follow him. (Liv. xlii. 50—67; Polyb. xxviii. 8; Appian. Mac. Exc. 10; Plut. Aemil. 9; Zonar. ix. 22; Eutrop. iv. 6; Oros. iv. 20.)

The second year of the war (b.c. 170) passed over without any striking action, but was on the whole favourable to Perseus. The Macedonian fleet defeated that of the Romans at Oreus; and the consul, A. Hostilius Mancinus, after an unsuccessful attempt to penetrate into Macedonia, through the passes of Elymots, remained inactive in Thessaly. Meanwhile, the Epeirots declared in favour of Perseus, by which his frontier became secured on that side; and so little cause did there appear to dread the advance of the Romans, that the king found leisure for an expedition against the Dardanians, of which he obtained a large booty. (Plut. Aemil. 9; Liv. xlii. 16.) During the heat of the following winter he crossed the mountains into Illyria with an army, but not so much with a view to conquest, as in order to gain over Gentius, king of the Illyrians, to his alliance. That monarch was favourably disposed towards the Macedonian cause, but was unable to act without money, and this Perseus was unwilling to give. A second expedition into Acarnania was also productive of little result. (Liv. xlii. 18—23.)

The arrival of the new consul Q. Marcus Philip- pus, in the spring of 169, for a moment gave fresh vigour to the Roman arms. By a bold but hazardous march he crossed the mountain ridge of Olympus, and thus descended into Macedonia near Hermicium. Had Perseus attacked him before he reached the plains he might probably have destroyed the whole Roman army; but instead of this he was seized with a panic terror, abandoned the strong position of Diun, and hastily retreated to Phila. Marcus at first followed him, but was soon compelled by want of provisions to fall back to Phila, and Perseus again occupied the line of the Enipeus. (Liv. xlv. 1—10; Polyb. xxix. 6; Dio. xxx. Exc. Vat. pp. 578, 579; Exc. Vat. pp. 74, 75; Zonar. ix. 22.)

The length to which the war had been unexpectedly protracted, and the ill success of the Roman arms, had by this time excited a general feeling in favour of the Macedonian monarch; Prusias, king of Bithynia, and the Rhodians, both interposed their good offices at Rome to obtain for him a peace upon moderate terms; and even his bitter enemy Eumenes began to waver, and entered into secret negotiations with the same view. [EUMENES.] These were, however, rendered abortive by the refusal of Perseus to advance the sum of money demanded by the king of Pergamus as the price of his interposition; and the same unseasonable niggarliness deprived the king of the services of 20,000 Gaulish mercenaries, who had actually advanced into Macedonia to his support, but retired on failing to obtain their stipulated pay. Many of the Greek states, also, which had been from the commencement of the war favourably disposed towards Perseus, might undoubtedly have been induced at this juncture openly to expose his cause, had he been more liberal of his treasures: but his blunt aversion led him to sacrifice all these advantages. Even when he was compelled to advance 300 talents to Gentius, in order to secure his cooperation, he contrived basely to defraud his ally of the greater part of the money. (Gentius). (Liv. xlv. 14, 23—27 ; Plut. Aemil. 12, 13; Polyb. xxviii. 8, 9, xix. 2, 3, Exc. Vet. p. 427—431; Diod. xxx. Exc. Vales. p. 580, Exc. Vet. p. 73, 74; Dion Cass. Fr. 73; Appian. Mac. Exc. 16.)

While Perseus was thus compelled by his own ill-timed aversion to carry on the contest against Rome single-handed, the arrival of the new consul, L. Aemilius Paulus, who took the command of the Roman army early in the summer, speedily changed the face of affairs. Finding the position of Perseus on the bank of the Euphrates so powerful as to be unassailable in front, he dexterously turned to flank by sending Scipio Nasica with 8000 men across the mountain pass of Pythium, and thus compelled the Macedonian king to fall back upon Pydna. Here the latter was at length induced to await the approach of the enemy, and it was in the plain near that town that the battle was fought which decided the fate of the Macedonian monarchy (June 22, B.C. 168). For a time the serried ranks of the phalanx seemed likely to carry every thing before them, but its order was soon broken by the inequalities of the ground; and the Romans rushing in, made a fearful carnage of the Macedonian infantry, of whom not less than 20,000 were slain, while the cavalry fied from the field almost without striking a blow. Perseus himself was among the foremost of the fugitives: he first directed his flight to Pella, but finding himself abandoned by his friends, he hastened from thence to Amphipolis, accompanied only by three foreign officers and 500 Cretan mercenaries. With these few followers, and the treasures which had been collected at Amphipolis, he threw himself for safety into the sacred island of Samothrace. (Liv. xlv. 32—46; Plut. Aemil. 13—23; Polyb. xxix. 6; Zonar. ix. 23; Entrop. iv. 7; Oros. iv. 20; Vell. Pat. i. 9.)

Here he was quickly blockaded by the praetor Cn. Octavius with the Roman fleet, and though the latter did not venture to violate the sanctuary in which the king had taken refuge, Perseus found himself abandoned, in succession, by his few remaining followers; and after an ineffectual attempt to escape by sea to Thrace, was at length compelled to surrender himself and his children into the hands of the Roman praetor. When brought before Aemilius, he is said to have degraded himself by the most abject submission: he was treated with kindness and courtesy by the Roman general, who allowed him every degree of liberty compatible with his position. The following year he was carried to Italy, where he was compelled to adorn the splendid triumph of his conqueror (Nov. 30, B.C. 167), and afterwards cast into a dungeon, from whence, however, the intersection of Aemilius procured his release, and he was permitted to end his days in an honourable captivity at Alba. He survived his removal thither during a period which is variously stated at from two to five years (Diod. Exc. Phot. p. 516; Vell. Pat. i. 11; Porphyry. ap. Euseb. Arm. p. 159); and died, according to some accounts, by voluntary starvation, while others—fortunately with less probability—represent him as falling a victim to the cruelty of his guards, who deprived him of sleep. (Liv. xlv. 4—9, 28, 35, 42; Plut. Aemil. 26, 27, 34, 37; Diod. xxx. Exc. Vet. p. 78; Exc. Vales. p. 581, Exc. Phot. p. 516; Dion Cass. Fr. 74, 75; Zonar. ix. 23, 24; Entrop. iv. 7, 8; Oros. l.c.; Val. Max. v. 1. § 1; Justin. xxxii. 2.)

The character of Perseus has been represented in the most unfavourable light by the Roman historians, who have sought, by blackening his name, to palliate the gross injustice by which the republic forced him into the war that ended in his ruin. But with every allowance for this partiality, it is impossible not to regard him as at once odious and despicable. Polybius, indeed, tells us (xxvi. 5), that at the beginning of his reign he conciliated the minds of his subjects by the mildness of his rule, and that the temperance of his private life presented a strong contrast to that of his father. But it is clear, from the words of the historian, that these fair appearances did not last long. Avarice appears to have been his ruling passion; and to this, as we have seen, he sacrificed eventually his kingdom and his life. But there are many other yet darker stains upon his character: his perfidy to his friends, and the mean jealousy with which he sought to avenge upon others the consequences of his own misconduct, are enough to condemn his name to infamy. The weakness of his character is glaringly conspicuous throughout the whole history of his life: and his conduct of the war displays the same vacillating uncertainty of purpose which he had evinced during the transactions that had preceded it. Even if the cowardice of which he is accused at Pydna be exaggerated by his enemies (see Plut. Aemil. 19), the panic terror with which he had abandoned his strong position in the preceding campaign, and the abject meanness of his conduct before Paulus, are sufficient evidences of his pusillanimity.

A history of the reign and life of Perseus was written by a Greek author of the name of Posidonus, who is repeatedly cited by Plutarch (Aemil. 19, 21), as a contemporary and eye-witness of the events which he related. Among modern writers Flathe (Geschichte Macedonien, vol. ii. p. 533—566) has entered into a laborious vindication of the Macedonian king.

COIN OF PERSEUS.

Perseus had been twice married; the name of his first wife, whom he is said to have killed with his own hand in a fit of passion (Liv. xlii. 5) is not recorded; his second, Laodice, has been already mentioned. He left two children; a son, Alexander, and a daughter, both apparently by his second marriage, as they were mere children when carried to Rome. Besides these, he had adopted his younger brother Philip, who appears... to have been regarded by him as the heir to his throne, and became the partner of his captivity. (Liv. xlii. 52, xlv. 6, 39; Plut. Aemil. 33, 37; Zonar. ix. 24.)

PERSEUS, a painter, the disciple of Apelles, who addressed to him a work upon painting. At least so we understand the somewhat ambiguous passage of Pliny (H. N. xxxv. 10. s. 36. § 23), "Apelles discipulus Perseus, ad quem de hac arte scriptum," which is generally understood to mean the converse, namely, that Perseus wrote upon painting to Apelles. The former interpretation is, we think, more strictly grammatical; also, it was more natural and usual for a great master to write a work for the instruction of a favourite pupil, than for a pupil to inscribe a work to his master; and, above all, the name of Perseus does not occur as a writer on painting, either in Pliny's lists of his authorities, or elsewhere, whereas it is well-known that Apelles wrote upon his art. Perseus must have flourished about Ol. 118, b. c. 303.

PERSCUS, PAULUS FA'BIIUS, consul A. d. 34 with L. Vitellius. (Dion Cass. lviii. 24; Tac. Ann. vi. 29; Frontin. Aquaed. 102.) This Fabius Perssicus was notorious for his licentiousness. (Senece de Be nef. iv. 31.)

PERSIUS. 1. C. PERSIUS, an officer in the Roman army in the second Punic war, distinguished himself in a sally from the citadel of Tarrentum, b. c. 210. (Livy. xxvi. 39.)

2. C. Persius, a contemporary of the Graecchi, had the reputation of being one of the most learned men of his time; and Lucullus therefore said that he did not wish Persius to read his works. The speech, which the consul C. Fannius Strabo delivered against Graccus in b. c. 122, and which was much admired by Cicero, was said by some to have been written by Persius. (Cic. de Fin. i. 3, de Orat. ii. 6, Brut. 26.)

3. Persius, of Chzomenae, whose lawsuit with Rupilius Rex is described by Horace in one of his Satires (i. 7).

PERSIUS, is the third in order of the four great Roman satirists, being younger than Lucilius and Juvenal, and older than Persius the poet. The Eusebian chronicle supplies the date of his birth and of his death, but, with this exception, the whole of the knowledge we possess regarding his origin and personal history is derived exclusively from an ancient biography which in the greater number of the codices now extant is prefixed to his works. By several modern scholars it has been ascribed, without a shadow of evidence or probability, to Suetonius, merely, it would seem, because he is the reputed author of the lives of Terence, Horace, Lucan, and Juvenal; in MSS. of a recent date it frequently bears the name of Annaeus Cornutus, but in the oldest and most valuable it is uniformly entitled Vita Aurelii Persii Flacci de Commentario Probi Valerii sublata. Who this Probus may have been, whether M. Valerius Probus of Berytus, who flourished under Nero, or some other individual among the various Latin grammarians who bore that appellation [PROBUS], it is impossible to determine; but the information contained in the memoir is of such a minute and precise description, that we can scarcely doubt that the materials were derived from some pure source, and collected at a period not very remote from that to which they refer. The words de Commentario

PERSIUS. 299

Probi Valerii sublata indicate, apparently, that it must be regarded as an extract from some longer piece, but what that piece may have been, and how or by whom the extract was made, are questions which do not now admit of solution. A slight degree of confusion is perceptible in the arrangement of some of the details, which must, doubtless, be ascribed to the carelessness or interpolations of transcribers, and the concluding portion especially, from the words "sed vox a schola" to the end, is evidently out of its proper place, or, rather, ought to be regarded as an addition by a later hand. Following, therefore, this sketch as our guide, we learn that

AULUS PERSIUS FLACCUS, a Roman knight connected by blood and marriage with persons of the highest rank, was born at Volaterrae in Etruria on the 4th of December, during the consulship of L. Vitellius and Fabius Persicus, A. D. 34 (comp. Hieron. Chron. Euseb. an. 2050). His father Flaccus died six years afterwards; his mother, Fulvia Sisenna married as her second husband a certain Fusius belonging to the equestrian order, and within a few years again became a widow. Young Persius received the first rudiments of education in his native town, remaining there until the age of twelve, and then removed to Rome, where he studied grammar under the celebrated Remmius Palamon, rhetoric under Verginius Flavins. When approaching the verge of manhood he became the pupil of Cornutus the Stoic, who opened up to him the first principles of mental science, and speedily impressed upon his plastic mind a stamp which gave a character to his whole subsequent career. To this master, who proved in very truth the guide, philosopher, and friend of his future life, he attached himself so closely that he never quitted his side, and the warmest reciprocal attachment was cherished to the last by the instructor and his disciple. While yet a youth he was on familiar terms with Lucan, with Caesius Bassus the lyric poet, and with several other persons of literary eminence; in process of time he became acquainted with Seneca also, but never entertained a very warm admiration for his talents. By the high-placed, or, rather, virtuous Patrician Thraseas (Tac. Ann. xvi. 21, 34), the husband of his kinswoman the younger Arrina, Persius was tenderly beloved, and seems to have been well worthy of such affection, for he is described as a youth of pleasing aspect, of most gentle manners, of maiden modesty, pure and upright, exemplary in his conduct as a son, a brother, and a nephew. He died of a disease of the stomach, at an estate near the eighth milestone on the Appian way, on the 24th of November in the consulship of P. Marius and L. Asinius Gallus, A. D. 62, before he had completed his twenty-eighth year.

The extant works of Persius, who, we are told, wrote seldom and slowly, consist of six short satires, extending in all to 650 hexameter lines, and were left in an unfinished state. They were slightly corrected after his death by Cornutus, while Caesius Bassus was permitted, at his own earnest request, to be the editor. In boyhood he composed a comedy, a book of δουλουρία (the subject is a matter of conjecture), and a few verses upon Arrina, the mother-in-law of Thraseas, that Arrina whose death has been rendered so celebrated by the narratives of Pliny and Dion Cassius (Plin. Ep. i. 16; Dion Cass. ix. 16; comp. Martial, l.
14). The whole of these juvenile effusions were by the advice of Cornutus destroyed.

Few productions have ever enjoyed more widely diffused and more enduring popularity than the Satires. When read over to Lucan he could scarcely refrain from shouting with delight; when first given to the world they were devoured with eager admiration (editum librum continuo mirati homines et diripere); and a long unbroken chain of testimonies, direct or implied, to their merits, might be linked together, reaching from the period of their publication through the darkest portion of the middle ages down to the revival of literature, including the names of Quintilian, Martial, the emperors Septimius and Alexander Severus, Ausonius, Prudentius, Sedulius, Sidonius, Liudprandus, Adam of Bremen, Bernard of Cluny, Peter of Blois, and John of Salisbury, to say nothing of the scholiasts and grammarians by whom they are perpetually cited. Nor ought we to omit the great fathers of the church, Lactantius, Augustin, and Jerome, of whom the two former frequently quote whole lines from Persius, while the latter seems to have been so thoroughly imbued with his phraseology that we encounter all the most striking expressions of the heathen moralist reproduced in the epistles, controversial tracts and commentaries of the Christian ecclesiastics. How far his reputation has been fairly earned, everybody of admit of question. It would seem that Persius, strangely enough, owes not a little of his fame and popularity to a cause which naturally might and, perhaps, ought to have produced an effect directly the reverse, we mean the multitude of strange terms, many of them derived, as in the case of Petronius, from the familiar language of ordinary life, proverbial phrases, far-fetched harsh metaphors, and abrupt transitions which every where embarrass our progress. The difficulty experienced in removing these impediments, and the close attention required to follow the train of thought and the numerous rapid changes of person, necessarily impress deeply both the words and the ideas upon every one who has carefully studied his pages, and hence no author clings more closely to our memory, or rises more frequently to our lips in a quotation. His delineations of men and manners are immeasurably inferior to those of Juvenal, yet his cold formalism and rough ungainly style form a mark in competition with the lively practical good sense and easy grace of the one, or with the fiery indignation and sonorous rhetoric of the other. His pictures, although skilfully drawn, grouped with dexterity and often finished with patient minuteness, are deficient in reality; they are not sketched from human beings actually living and moving in the business of the world, but are highly coloured fancy pieces imagined by the student in his seclusion, created for the purpose of illustrating some abstract general principle or subtle philosophic paradox. In fact, the five last satires may be regarded as so many scholastic exercises, each being devoted to the exposition of a doctrine pronounced by the stoics, stated and developed according to their discipline. We must not, at the same time, withhold from him the praise of great ingenuity in moulding to his purpose the most refractory materials, of calling up a crowd of images by a few skilful touches, and concentrating a multitude of thoughts within the compass of a few poignant words. He is, unquestionably, the most dramatic of the ancient satirists, his dialogues are in the highest degree spirited and effective, conveying a very distinct notion of the element which formed the staple of the original Saturn, and which was revived in the Mimes of the Augustan age. The first Satire—which is devoted to strictures on the false taste which prevailed in reference to poetry, and to an exposure of the follies and falsehoods of fast and display—intermixed with numerous paradoxes on the most popular pieces of the day—is superior both in plan and execution to the rest; but we may remark, in passing, that there are no good grounds for the belief, which has prevailed from a very early epoch, that both here and elsewhere Nero is the mark against whom the most piercing sarcasms are aimed; a belief which has beyond measure perplexed and tortured commentators, and has given rise to inconceivable absurdity in the interpretation of obscure allusions. Those passages in the fifth, where Persius describes the process by which his own moral and intellectual faculties were first excised and gradually expanded, are remarkable for their grace and beauty.

Several MSS. of Persius contain a collection of scholia ascribed to Cornutus, which by many of the earlier critics were received without hesitation as authentic. But these annotations, as they now exist, are so full of mistakes, and such valuable ignorance on common topics, that, although it is not impossible that they may contain observations which actually proceeded from the stoic, they must have assumed their present form in the hands of some obscure and illiterate grammarian. The ancient glosses published originally by Pithou (8vo. Heidelb. 1590) are merely extracts containing what is most valuable in the scholia of the Pseudo-Cornutus.

The Edito Princeps of Persius is a 4to. volume without date, but known to have been printed at Rome by Ulrich Hahn, about 1470; and in addition to this, bibliographers have described upwards of twenty impressions, all published before the year 1500. The notes of Fontius appeared first in the Venice edition, fol. 1480; the commentary of Britannicus in that of Drescu, fol. 1491; and the commentary of the Pseudo-Cornutus in that of Venice, fol. 1490. A multitude of them illustrated by very voluminous annotations, issued from almost every classical press in Europe during the course of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and of these by far the most valuable is that of Isaac Casaubon (8vo. Paris, 1605), which has been very often reprinted, the commentary being not only superior to all which preceded it, but having served as the groundwork of all subsequent elucidations of the satirist.

Of the editions belonging to a more recent period, we may notice specially those of Koenig, 8vo. Gotting. 1803; of Passow, 8vo. Lips. 1809, accompanied by a translation and valuable remarks on the first satire; of Achaintre, 8vo. Paris, 1812; of Orelli, in his Elogia Poet. Lat. 8vo. Turic. 1822, and much improved in 1833; of Plum, 8vo. Havn. 1827, with a most voluminous commentary; of Otto Jahn, 8vo. Lips. 1843, with elaborate prolegomena and judicious notes; and of Heinrich, 8vo. Lips. 1844, with excellent notes in German. The student who possesses the editions of Jahn, Heinrich, and the reprint of Casaubon, published with some additional matter by Dacier, 8vo. Lips. 1839, will be able without further aid to master the difficulties he may encounter.

The translations into different languages are, as might have been expected, very numerous. There are at least fourteen into English, upwards of twenty into French, a still greater number into German, and also several into Italian and various other European languages. Of those into English, that of Barten Holiday is the most quaint, that of Gifford is the most accurate, and affords the best representation of the manner of the original; that of Dryden is incomparably the most spirited and poetical, but is often difused, and often far from being correct; those of Brewer and Howes are very praiseworthy performances. Of the German versions, those of Passow (8vo. Lips. 1809) and Donner (8vo. Stuttgart, 1829) enjoy considerable reputation. [W. R.]

PERSEO (Paprea), one of the Graeae. (Hygin. Fab. Praef. p. 9; Burmann. ad Ov. Met. iv. 773; comp. Graeae.) [L. S.]

PERTINAX. HELENIUS, was born, according to Dion Cassius, at Alba Pompeia, a Roman colony in Liguria on the west bank of the Tanaro, according to Capitinius at a place called Villa Martia among the Apennines, on the first of August, a. d. 126. His father Helvius Successus was a libertinus of humble fortune, who followed the trade of a wood merchant and charcoal burner, and brought up his son to the same calling. The youth, however, appears to have soon abandoned this career; and the various steps by which he gradually ascended to the highest offices of state, until at last he mounted the throne itself, "deserve well," says Gill. As a reward for his achievements he was "expressive of the form of government and manners of the age." 1. Having received a good elementary education he became a teacher of grammar, but finding this occupation little profitable, 2. he sought and obtained the post of a centurion through the interest of his father's patron, Lollius Avitus. 3. He was next a praefectus cohortis, served in this capacity in Syria, gained great renown in the Parthian war, and was then transferred to Britain. 4. He commanded an ala of cavalry in Moesia. 5. He was at the head of the commissariat on the line of the Aemilian Way. 6. He was admiral of the German fleet. 7. He was collector of the imperial revenues in Dacia, but was dismissed from this employment in consequence of incurring the suspicions of M. Aurelius, who had listened to the misrepresentations of his enemies. 8. Having found a protector in Claudius Pompeianus, the husband of Lucilla, he became commander of a vexillum attached to a legion. 9. Having discharged this duty with credit he was admitted into the senate. 10. M. Aurelius now discovered the falseness of the charges which had been preferred against him, and in order to make amends for the injury inflicted, raised him to the rank of praetor, and gave him the command of the first legion, at the head of which he drove out of Raetia and Noricum the barbarians who were threatening to overrun Italy. This inroad, which is called by Dion (lxxi. 3) the invasion of the Kelts from beyond the Rhine, took place some time after A. D. 172. The imperial legates were Pompeianus and 172. Pertinax. As a reward for his courage he was declared consul elect, and is marked in the Fasti as having held that office, although absent from Rome, along with M. Didius Julianus in A. D. 179. The accuracy of this date has, however, been called in question. (See notes on Dion Cass. lxxi. 19.) 12. Being now held in high esteem by the emperor, who on many occasions commended him publicly in the presence of the soldiers and in the senate, after the revolt of Cassius had been suppressed, he proceeded from Syria to guard the frontiers of the Danube, and was appointed to the command of both the Moesians and of Dacia in succession. 13. He was made governor of Syria where he remained, performing the functions of his office with great uprightness until the death of Aurelius. 14. He took his seat in the senate for the first time soon after the accession of Commodus, being one of the guardians or counsellors to whose care the new prince had been consigned by his father, and is one of those enumerated by Dion (lxxii. 4; comp. Herod. ii. 1, 16) as having escaped the destruction entailed by this dangerous distinction; but in consequence of exciting the jealousy of Perennius (Pere-nennis) was ordered to retire to his native province. 15. After the death of Perennius, Commodus earnestly requested him by letter to assume the command in Britain, where he suppressed a mutiny among the legionaries at the peril of his life. 16. Recalled from Britain at his own desire in consequence of the bad feeling entertained towards him by the soldiers, by whom he had been wounded and left for dead in the tumult; he was appointed chief of the commissariat at Rome. 17. He was proconsul of Africa. 18. Lastly, he was praefectus urbi and was consul for the second time in A. D. 192, on the last day of which Commodus was slain; Pertinax, according to Capitinius and Julianus, was upon this point contradicted by Herodian, being privy to the plot. As soon as the tyrant was dead, before the news had been spread abroad, Laetus the prefect of the praetorium, and Eucleius the imperial chamberlain, hastened to offer the throne to Pertinax, and having with difficulty (Aurel. Vict. Epit. xviii. 1) succeeded in vanquishing his scruples, immediately hurried him in secret to the camp. An announcement was made to the soldiers that Commodus had died of apoplexy, upon which Pertinax delivered an oration, declaring that the supreme power had been forced upon his acceptance, and concluded by promising a liberal donative. Upon this he was slowly and reluctantly hailed as emperor by a few, the rest maintaining a sullen silence. While it was yet night he appeared before the senate, who greeted him with hearty good will; the following morning, being the 1st of January, A. D. 193, he was received with equal cordiality by the magistrates and the populace, took up his abode in the Palatium, and was invested with all the honours and titles appertaining to his station, in addition to which, in order to conciliate the citizens, he assumed the ancient constitutional designation of princeps senatus. From the very commencement of his reign he manifested a determination to introduce extensive reforms, not only in the expenditure and internal arrangements of the palace, but in all departments of the government, more especially in all matters connected with the army, and to restore, if possible, that strictness of discipline which the glory and dominion of Rome had been won. But with rash enthusiasm he resolved to do that at once which could only be accomplished effectually by slow degrees, and raised Pertinax made his apologetic harangue, that Laetus took advantage of this commotion to put to death a great multitude of the soldiers as if by the orders of Pertinax; that this circumstance filled the praetorians with rage and terror, and led to the catastrophe.

PETILLIA.

PE'TEOS, a son of Orneus, and father of Menestheus, was expelled from Athens by Aeges, and is said to have gone to Pheos, where he founded the town of Stiris. (Hom. H. i. 552; iv. 372; Apollod. iii. 29; Paus. iii. 8, 13, 35, 36; Plut. Theb. 32.)

PETICUS, C. SULPICIUS, a distinguished patrician in the times immediately following the enactment of the Licinian laws. He was censor B.C. 366, the year in which a plebeian consul was first elected; and two years afterwards, B.C. 364, he was consul with C. Licinius Calvus Stolo, the proposer of the celebrated Licinian laws. In this year a fearful pestilence visited the city, which occasioned the establishment of ludi scenici for the first time. In B.C. 362 he served as legate in the army of the plebeian consul, L. Gennius, and after the fall of the latter in battle, he repulsed the Hernici in an attack which they made upon the Roman camp. In the following year, B.C. 361, Peticus was consul a second time with his former colleague Licinius: both consuls marched against the Hernici and took the city of Perentinum, and Peticus obtained the honour of a triumph on his return from Rome. In B.C. 358, Peticus was appointed dictator in consequence of the Gauls having penetrated through the Praenestine territory as far as Pedum. The dictator established himself in a fortified camp, but in consequence of the murmurs of the soldiers, who were impatient at this inactivity, he at length led them to battle against the Gauls, whom he eventually conquered, but not without difficulty. He obtained a triumph in consequence of this victory, and dedicated in the Capitol a considerable quantity of gold, which was part of the spoils. In B.C. 355 he was one of the interreges for holding the elections, and in the same year was elected consul a third time with a patrician colleague, M. Valerius Poplicola, in violation of the Licinian law. In B.C. 353 he was consul a fourth time with the same colleague as in his last consulship. In B.C. 351 he interred, and in the same year obtained the consulship for the fifth time with T. Quinctius PenumCapsio-

PETULLIA or PETULIA GENS, plebeian. This name is frequently confounded with that of Poetelius, as for instance by Glandorp in his Onomasticon. The Petillii are first mentioned at the beginning of the second century B.C., and the first member of the gens, who obtained the consulship, was Q. Petillius Spurinus, B.C. 176. Under the republic the only cognomens of the Petillii are those of CAPITOLINUS and SPURINUS; a few persons, who are mentioned without a surname, are given below. On coins Capsiolinus is the only cognomen that occurs. The following coin of the Petillia gens must have been struck by a Petillius Capito-linus, as the reverse is nearly the same as the obverse of the coin figured in Vol. I. p. 605, and seems to have reference to the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus.

COIN OF PETILLIA GEN.

PETILLIUS. 1. 2. Q. PETILLI, two tribunes of the plebs, b.c. 185, are said to have been instigated by Cato the Censor, to accuse Scipio Africanus the elder, of having been bribed by Antiochus to allow that monarch to come off too leniently; but according to other authorities it was M. Naevius and not the Petillii who brought the charge. On the death of Africanus in this year, the Petillii brought forward a bill for making an inquiry respecting the persons who had received money from Antiochus without paying it into the treasury. (Liv. xxxviii. 50, 54; comp. Gell. iv. 18; Aur. Vict. de Vir. Ill. 49.) [NAEVII. No. 4.]

3. L. PETILLIUS, a scriba, in whose land at the foot of the Janiculum, the books of Numa were said to have been found in b.c. 181. The books were subsequently taken to the city-praetor Petillius Spurinus. (Liv. xi. 29.) [NUMa. p. 1283, a.]

4. M. PETILLIUS, was sent as ambassador in b.c. 168 with M. Perpenna to the Illyrian king Gentius, and was with his colleague thrown into prison by that king, but was liberated shortly afterwards on the conquest of Gentius by the praetor Anicius. (Liv. xlvii. 27, 32; Appian, Mac. xvi. 1.)

5. M. PETILLIUS, a Roman eques, who carried on business at Syracuse, while Verres was governor of Sicily. (Cic. Verr. ii. 29.)

6. Q. PETILLIUS, a jujex at the trial of Milo. (Cic. pro Mil. 16.)

PETILLIUS CEREA-LIS. [CEREA-LIS.

PETILLIUS RUFUS. [RUFUS.]

PETINES (Πητίνης), one of the generals who commanded the Persian army at the passage of the Granicus, b.c. 334. He was killed in the battle. (Arr. Anat. i. 12, 16.) [E. H. B.]

PETOSIRIS (Πετόςιρις), an Egyptian priest and astrologer, who is generally named along with Nechoseus, an Egyptian king. The two are said to be the founders of astrology, and of the art of casting nativities. Suidas (s. v.) states that Petosiris wrote on the right mode of worshipping the gods, astronomical maxima in των ἀρχαν βελτίων (which are often referred to in connection with astrology), and a work on the Egyptian mysteries. But we may infer from a statement made by Vetius Valens, of which the substance is given by Marsham (Cason Chronicus, p. 479, ed. Lips. 1676), that Suidas assigns to Petosiris, what others attribute partly to him, and partly to Nechoseus. For his Ὄργαι ὁν ἀστρονομοὺς, or, Ψῆφος σκηναρι, containing astrological principles for predicting the event of diseases, and for his other writings, Fabricius (Bibl. Græc. vol. iv. p. 169) may be consulted. And to the list given by him may be added a translation into Latin by Bede, of the astrological letter of Petosiris to Nechoseus, entitled, De Divinatione Moris et Vltuæ (Cred. Opera, vol. ii. pp. 233, 234, ed. Col. Agripp. 1612.) His name, as connected with astrology, was in high repute early in Greece, and in Rome, in her degenerate days. This we learn from the praises bestowed on him by Manethon (v. 10), who, indeed, in the prologue to the first and fifth books of his Apotelesmatica, professes only to expand in Greek verse the prose rules of Petosiris; from Julius Firmicus (Mathes. iv. in praefat. &c.), who calls Petosiris and Nechoseus, divini illi viri atque omni admiratione digni; and, from the references of Pliny. (H. N. i. c. vii. 49.) But the best proof is the fact, that, like our own Lilly, Petosiris became the common name for an astrologer, as we find in Aristophanes, quoted by Athenaeus (iii. p. 114, c.), in the 45th epigram of Lucilius (Jacobs, Anthol. Graec. vol. iii. p. 38), whence we learn the quantity, and in Juvenal, vi. 580. Marsham has a full dissertation on Nechoseus and Petosiris, in the work above quoted (pp. 474—481). [W. M. G.]

PETRAEA (Πηραιά), is the name of one of the Oeanides, and also occurs as a surname of Scylla, who dwelt in or on a rock. (Hes. Theog. 357 ; Hom. Od. xii. 231.) [L. S.]

PETRAEUS (Πετραεύς). 1. One of the centaurs who figures at the wedding of Peirithous. (Hes. Scut. Herc. 183; Ox. Met. xii. 530.)

2. A surname of Poseidon among the Thessalians, because he was believed to have separated the rocks, between which the river Penius flows into the sea. (Pind. Pith. iv. 246, with the Schol. Petraeus, is a surname of Petreius, king of Macedonia, who was sent by that monarch to Sparta in b.c. 220, to receive the submission of the Lacedaemonians, and confirm them in their allegiance to Macedonia. We subsequently find him commanding a military force in Thessaly, where he successfully opposed the invasion of that country by the Aetolian general Dorimuthus, b.c. 218. (Polyb. iv. 24, v. 17.) [E. H. B.]

PETREIUS. 1. CN. PETREIUS, of Atina, was a centurion primi pili in the army of Q. Ca-tulus, b.c. 102, in the Cimbrian war, and received a crown on account of his preserving a legion. (Plin. H. N. xxii. 6.)

2. M. PETREIUS, is first mentioned in b.c. 62, when he served as legatus to the proconsul C. Antonius, in his campaign against Catiline. Both Cicero and Sallust speak of Petreius as a man of great military experience, and one who possessed considerable influence with the troops. He had previously served in the army more than thirty years, either as tribune, praefectus, legatus, or praetor; but we know nothing of his former history, nor in what year he was praetor. In consequence of the illness of Antonius, according to one statement, or his dislike to fight against his former friend, as others relate, the supreme command of the army devolved upon Petreius on the day of the battle, in which Catiline perished. (Sall. Cat. 59, 60 ; Dion Cass. xxxvii. 39, 49 ; Cic. pro Sest. 5.)

The name of Petreius next occurs in b.c. 59, in which year he offered to go to prison with Cato, when Caesar, the consul, threatened the latter with this punishment. (Dion Cass. xxxviii. 3.) In b.c. 53 Petreius was sent into Spain along with L. Afranius

as legatus of Pompey, to whom the provinces of the two Spain's had been granted. On the breaking out of the civil war in B. C. 49, Afranius and Petreus were in Nearer Spain at the head of so powerful an army, that Caesar, after obtaining possession of Italy, hastened to Spain to reduce those provinces. Afranius and Petreus, on the approach of Caesar, united their forces, and took up a strong position near the town of Ilerda (Lerida in Catalonia), on the right bank of the Sicoris (Segre). At first they were very successful, and Caesar was placed in great difficulties; but these he quickly surmounted, and soon reduced the enemy to such straits, that Afranius and Petreus were obliged to surrender. They were dismissed unharmed by Caesar, part of their troops disbanded, and the remainder incorporated in the conqueror's army. Petreus joined Pompey in Greece, and after the loss of the battle of Pharsalia in B. C. 48, he first fled to Patrae in Achaia, and subsequently passed over to Africa. He took an active part in the campaign in Africa in B. C. 46. At the battle of Ruspina, fought at the beginning of January in this year, he was severely wounded; and he was also present at the battle of Thapsus in the month of April, by which Caesar completely destroyed all the hopes of the Pompeian party in Africa. After the loss of the battle Petreus fled with Juba to Zama, and as the inhabitants of that town would not admit them within its walls, they retired to a country house of Juba's, where despairing of safety they fell by each other's hands. The exact manner of their death is somewhat differently related by different writers. According to some accounts Juba despatched Petreus first and then killed himself, while the contrary is stated by others. (Cic. ad Att. viii. 2; Caes. B. C. i. 38, 63—96; Hirt. B. Afr. 16, 19, 91, 94; Dion Cass. xii. 20, xiii. 13, xiii. 2, 8; Appian, B. C. iii. 42, 43, 95, 100; Lucan, iv. 4, &c.; Vell. Pat. ii. 46, 50; Suet. Caes. 84, 75; Liv. Epit. 110, 114.)

3. M. PETREIUS, a centurion in Caesar's army in the Gallic war, who died fighting bravely at Gergovia, B. C. 52. (Caes. B. G. vii. 50.)

PETRICHUS (Πετρίχος), the author of a Greek poem on venomous serpents, Οφάμαξ, who lived in or before the first century after Christ. His poem, which is no longer extant, is quoted by Pliny (H. N. xx. 36, xxii. 40) and the scholiast on Nicander's Θερίας (pp. 47, 50, ed. Ald.).

PETO, T. FLA'VIUS, the ancestor of the emperor Vespasian, was a native of the municipality of Reute, and served as a centurion in Pompey's army at the battle of Pharsalia, B. C. 48. (Suet. Vesp. 1.)

[VESPA'SIANUS]

PETRICO'RDIUS or PETRICO'RDUS (PAULINUS). Among the various Paulini who flourished in the Western Empire in the fifth century, was Paulinus, called in the MSS. Petricordius, which modern critics correct to Petrocorius, and suppose to be given him from the place of his birth, inferred to be Petrocorii, the modern Periguex. Some moderns have erroneously given him the patronym Benedictus; an error which has arisen from their having regarded as a name the epithet "benedictus," "blessed," given to him by some who have confounded him with his more celebrated namesake, Paulinus of Nola. [PAULINUS, p. 144]. Sidonius Apollinaris (Epistol. viii. 11) mentions a Paulinus, an eminent rhetorician of Periguius, whom Sirmond supposed to be the subject of the present article, but whom the authors of the Histoire Littéraire de la France consider, but with little reason, to be his father. Our Paulinus was intimate with Perpetuus, who was bishop of Tours from A. D. 461 to 491, and whom he calls his patron. It was at the desire of Perpetuus that he put into verse the life of St. Martin of Tours; and in an epistle addressed to that prelate, he humbly tells him, with an amusing reference to the history of Balaam, that, in giving him confidence to speak, he had repeated the miracle of opening the mouth of the ass. He afterwards supplied, at the desire of the bishop, some verses to be inscribed on the walls of the new church which Perpetuus finished about A. D. 473 (or according to Oudin, A. D. 492), and to which the body of St. Martin was transferred. He sent with them some verses De Visitatton Ne'petuali sui, on occasion of the cure, supposed to be miraculous, of a man whom the young lady to whom he was married or betrothed, had experienced through the efficacy of a document, apparently the account of the miracles of St. Martin, written by the hand of the bishop. We gather that this poem was written when the author was old, from the circumstance of his having a grandson of marriageable age. Of the death of Paulinus we have no account.

The works of Paulinus Petrocorius are:—1. De Vita S. Martini, a poem in hexameter verse, divided into six books. It has little poetical or other merit. The first three books are little else than a versified abridgement of the De Beati Martini Vita Liber of Sulpicius Severus; and the fourth and fifth comprehend the incidents mentioned in the Dialogi II. et III. de Virtutibus Beati Martini of the same author. The sixth book comprises a description of the miracles which had been wrought at the tomb of St. Martin, under the eyes of Perpetuus, who had been an account of them to Paulinus. 2. De Visitatton Ne'petuali sui, a description of the miraculous cure of his grandson already mentioned; also written in hexameter verse. 3. De Orantibus (an inappropriate title, which should rather be Orantibus simply, or Ad Orantes), apparently a portion of the hexameter verses designed to be inscribed on the walls of the new church built by Perpetuus. 4. Perpetui Episcopo Epistol. This letter was sent to Perpetuus, with the verses De Visitatton and De Orantibus. The works of Paulinus Petrocorius were first printed by Franciscus Juretus, Paris, 1583. Some writers have spoken, but without foundation, of an earlier edition printed at Dijon: Juretus ascribed the works to Paulinus of Nola, an error which is as ancient as the time of Gregory of Tours and Fortunatus of Poictiers, by whom it was shared. After the first publication of the works by Juretus they were reprinted in several collections of the Christian poets, and in some editions (e. g. Paris, 1575, 1589, and Cologne, 1618) of the Bibliotheca Patrum, generally, however, under the name of Paulinus of Nola. In the Lyon edition of the Bibliotheca Patrum, fol. 1677, vol. vi. p. 297, &c., they are ascribed to their right author. They were again published by Christianus Daunius, 8vo. Leipzig, 1686, with ample notes of Juretus, Barthius, Gronovius, and Daunius. To the works of our Paulinus were subjoined in this edition, the Enchasticion of Paulinus the Penitent, or Paulinus of Pella [PAULINUS], and the poem on Jonah and the Ninevites, ascribed to Ter-
PETRONIUS. 215

PETRONIUS. 4. Petronius, a tribune of the soldiers, served in the army of Crassus, in his expedition against the Parthians, b. c. 55, and was with Crassus when the latter was killed. (Plut. Crass. 30, 31.)

5. Petronius, had taken part in the conspiracy against Caesar’s life, and was subsequently put to death by Antony in Asia. (Appian, B. C. v. 4.)

6. C. Petronius, succeeded Aelius Gallus in the government of Egypt, carried on war in b. c. 22 against the Aethiopians, who had invaded Egypt under their queen Candace. Petronius not only drove back the Aethiopians, but took many of their principal towns. The details of the war are given under Candace (Dion Cass. iv. 5; Strab. xvii. p. 820). Petronius was a friend of Herod, and sent corn to Judea when the latter country was visited by a famine. (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 9. § 2.)

7. P. Petronius, is twice mentioned by Tacitus as a distinguished person in the reign of Tiberius (Tac. Ann. iii. 49, vi. 45). He may have been the same as the following Petronius, or perhaps his father.

8. P. Petronius, was sent by Caligula to Syria, as the successor of Vitellius, with orders to erect the statue of that emperor in the temple at Jerusalem (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 9. § 2, B. J. ii. 10). This Petronius is also mentioned as having been the legate of Claudius. (Senec. de morte Claudii.)

9. C. Petronius, who put an end to his own life in the reign of Nero, is supposed by many to have been the author of the Satyricon, and is spoken of below.

11. Petronius Priscus. [Priscus.]

12. Petronius Secundus. [Secundus.]

13. Petronius Maximus, the emperor. [Maximus.]

C. Petronius, is described by Tacitus (Ann. xvi. 18, 19) as the most accomplished volupratory at the court of Nero. His days were passed in slumber, his nights in visiting and revelry. But he was no vulgar spendthrift, no dull besotted debauchee. An air of refinement pervaded all his extravagancies; with him luxury was a serious study, and he became a proficient in the science. The careless, graceful ease, assuming almost the guise of simplicity, which distinguished all his words and actions, was the delight of the fashionable world; he gained, by polished and ingenious folly, an amount of fame which others often fail to achieve by a long career of laborious virtue. At one time he proved himself capable of better things. Having been appointed governor (praefectus) of Bithynia, and subsequently elevated to the consularship, his official duties were discharged with energy and discretion. Relapsing, however, into his ancient habits, he was admitted among the few chosen companions of the prince, and was regarded as director-in-chief of the imperial pleasures, the judge whose decision upon the merits of any proposed scheme of enjoyment was held as final (Neroni assuntus est elegantiarum arbiter, dum nihil amovem et molle affinitia putat, nisi quod ei Petronius approbatissel). The influence thus acquired excited the jealous suspicions of Tigellinus: Petronius was accused of having been privy to the treason of Scaevus: a slave was suborned to lodge an information, and the whole of his household was arrested. Believing that destruction was inevitable, and impatient of delay or suspense, he resolved to die as he had lived, and to excite admiration by the frivolous eccentricity of his end. Having caused his veins to be opened, he from time to time arrested the flow of blood by the application of bandages. During the intervals he conversed with his friends, not upon the solemn themes which the occasion might have suggested, but upon the news and light gossip of the day; he bestowed rewards upon some of his slaves, and ordered others to be scourged; he lay down to sleep, and even showed himself in the public streets of Cumae, where these events took place; so that at last, when he sunk from exhaustion, his death (A.D. 66), although compulsory, appeared to be the result of natural and gradual decay. He is said to have despatched in his last moments a sealed document to the prince, taunting him with his brutal excesses (\textit{factita Principi} \textit{percipiat atque obsignata misit Neroni}), and to have broken in pieces a murrhine vessel of vast price, in order that it might not fall into the hands of the enemy. The last anecdote has been recorded by Pliny (\textit{H. N.} xxvii. 2), who, as well as Plutarch (\textit{De Adulat. et Amicit. Discord.} p. 60), give to the person in question the name of Titus Petronius. We find it generally assumed that he belonged to the equestrian order, but the words of Tacitus (\textit{Ann.} xvi. 17) would lead to an opposite inference, "Paucis quoque intra dies eodem agmine Annaeaeus Mella, Cerealis Anicius, Rufus Crispinus ac C. Petronius cecidero. Mella et Crispinus Equites Romani dignitatem senatiori." Now, since Petronius, in virtue of having been consul, must have enjoyed the \textit{dignitas senatoria}, the above sentence seems to imply that Mella and Crispinus alone of the individuals mentioned were \textit{Equites Romani}.

A very singular production consisting of a prose narrative interspersed with numerous pieces of poetry, and thus resembling in form the Varronian Satire, has come down to us in a fully matured state. In the oldest MSS. and the earliest editions it bears the title \textit{Petronii Arborti Satyricon}, and, as it now exists, is composed of a series of fragments, the continuity of the piece being frequently interrupted by blanks, and the whole forming but a very small portion of the original, which, when entire, contained at least sixteen books, and probably many more. It is a sort of comic romance, in which the adventures of a certain Encolpius and his companions in the south of Italy, chiefly in Naples or its environs, are made a vehicle for exposing the false taste which prevailed upon all matters connected with literature and the fine arts, and for holding up to ridicule and detestation the folly, luxury, impurity, and dishonesty of all classes of the community in the age and country in which the scene is laid. A great variety of characters connected for the most part with the lower ranks of life are brought upon the stage, and support their parts with the greatest liveliness and dramatic propriety, while every page overflows with ironical wit and broad humour. Unfortunately the vices of the personages introduced are depicted with such minute fidelity that we are perpetually disgusted by the coarseness and obscenity of the descriptions. Indeed, if we can believe that such a book was ever widely circulated and generally admired, that fact alone would afford the most convincing proof of the pollution of the epoch to which it belongs. Without feeling any inclination to pass too severe a sentence on the collector of so much garbage, the most expansive charity will not permit us to join with Burnmann in regarding him as a very holy man (\textit{virum sanctissimum}), a model of all the austere virtues of the olden time, who filled with pious horror on beholding the monstrous corruption of his contemporaries, was irresistibly impelled to arrest, if possible, the rapid progress of their degradation by holding up the crimes which they practised to view in all the loathsome nature of their native deformity.

The longest and most important section is generally known as the \textit{Supper of Trimalchio}, presenting us with a detailed and very amusing account of a fantastic banquet, such as the most luxurious and extravagant gourmads of the empire were wont to exhibit on their tables. Next in interest is the well-known tale of the Ephesian Matron, which here appears for the first time among the popular fictions of the Western world, although current from a very early period in the remote regions of the East. In the middle ages it was circulated in the "Seven Wise Masters," the oldest collection of Oriental stories, and has been introduced by Jeremy Taylor into his "Holy Dying," in the chapter "On the Contingencies of Death, &c." The longest of the effusions in verse is a descriptive poem on the Civil Wars, extending to 295 hexameter lines, affording a good example of that declamatory tone of which the Pharsalia is the type. We have also sixty-five iambique triters, depicting the capture of Troy (\textit{Troias Halosis}), and besides these several shorter morsels are interspersed replete with grace and beauty.

A great number of conflicting opinions have been formed by scholars with regard to the author of the \textit{Satyricon}. Many have confidently maintained that he must be identified with the Caius (or Titus) Petronius, of whose career we have given a sketch above, and this view of the question, after having from a very early period been revived and supported with great earnestness and learning by Studer in the \textit{Rheinisches Museum}, and by Ignarr he is supposed to be the Petronius Turpilianus who was consul A.D. 61. [\textit{Turpilianus.}] Hadrianus Valesius places him under the Antonines; his brother Henricus Valesius and Sambucus under Gallienus. Niebuhr, led away by ingenious but most fanciful inferences derived from a metrical epitaph, discovered in the vicinity of Naples, imagines that he lived under Alexander Severus; Statilinus would bring him down as low as the age of Constantine the Great; but Burnmann holds that he flourished under Tiberius, Caius, and Claudius, and thinks it probable that he may have seen the last days of Augustus. The greater number of these hypotheses are mere flimsy conjectures, unsupported by any thing that deserves to be called evidence, and altogether unworthy of serious examination or discussion; but the first, although too often ignorantly assumed as a self-evident and unquestionable fact, is deserving of some attention, both because it has been more widely adopted than any of the others, and because it appeals with confidence to an array of proofs both external and internal, which may be reduced to the following propositions:—

1. We can trace the origin of the name \textit{Arbiter} to the expression "elegantiae arbiter," in Tacitus.
2. When the historian states that Petronius in his dying moments despised a writing to Nero expressing the indignity of the emperor's life, he evidently refers to the work of which we now possess the fragments. 3. Nero and his minions are held up to scorn under the guise of Trimalchio and his retainers. 4. The language bears the stamp of the best age of Latinity, and cannot have proceeded from any writer of the second or third century. Upon these we may observe:—

1. Tacitus certainly does not use Arbiter as a proper name, but merely as the term best suited to express the meaning he wished to convey, while Pliny and Plutarch who speak of the same Petronius, give no hint that he was distinguished by any such designation. On the other hand, it may be urged that although the name of Petronius is by no means uncommon in the annals of the empire, the cognomen of Arbiter is never found attached to it in inscriptions or in documents of any description, which renders it probable that the word may be regarded as a title or epithet introduced by some grammarian or copyist for the purpose of marking out the individual described by Tacitus, and separating the author of the Satyricon from all other Petronii. 2. Tacitus, to whom alone we are indebted for precise information regarding the Petronii put to death by Nero, says not one word of his having possessed any talent for literature; and with respect to the sentence quoted above, upon which so much stress has been laid, no one who reads it with care, and without being wedded to a preconceived opinion, can for a moment believe that the words denote any thing except a short epistle filled with direct reproaches, composed almost in the agonies of death to satisfy a craving for revenge. Indeed it is difficult to understand how expressions so little ambiguous could have been interpreted by any scholar to signify an elaborate and a voluminous work of fiction. 3. The idea that Nero is shadowed forth under the form of Trimalchio is absolutely preposterous. Trimalchio is in reality the representative of a class of persons who existed in considerable numbers after the downfall of the republic. He is depicted as a freeman of overgrown wealth, far advanced in years, inflamed with vulgar purse-pride and ostentation, coarse in manners and conversation, uneducated and ignorant, but eager to display an imperfect smattering of ill digested learning, and thus constantly rendering himself ridiculous by innumerable blunders, ruled by a clever bustling wife, who had acquired complete dominion over him by studying his weaknesses, greedy of flattery, inclined to be overbearing and tyrannical, but not devoid of a sort of rough good-nature—a series of characteristics in which it is certainly impossible to discern one trace of Nero. The notion of Burnmann that Claudius was the prototype of Trimalchio, although not so glaringly absurd, is equally untenable. 4. The assertion regarding the language is frequently met by a flat contradiction, and Reinecus has gone so far as to stigmatise it as a farrago of Greecisms, Gallicisms, Hebraicisms, and barbarous idioms, such as we might expect to find in the worst writers of the worst period. This critic, however, and those who have embraced his sentiments appear to have contemplated the subject from the fancy of the one, and in addition to the corruptions in the text which are so numerous and hopeless as to render whole sentences unintelligible, there are doubtless a multitude of strange words and of phrases not elsewhere to be found; but this is a circumstance we need not critics, to remember the various topics which fall under discussion, and the singular personages grouped together on the scene. The most remarkable and startling peculiarities may be considered as the phraseology appropriate to the characters by whom they are uttered, the language of ordinary conversation, the familiar slang in every-day use among the hybrid population of Campania, closely resembling, in all probability, the dialect of the Atellan farces. On the other hand, wherever the author may be supposed to be speaking in his own person, we are deeply impressed by the extreme felicity of the style, which, far from bearing marks of decrepitude or decay, is redolent of spirit, elasticity, and vigorous freshness.

Our author is twice quoted by Terentianus Maurus, once under the name of Arbiter, and once as Petronius; and if it were certain, as some have insisted, that Terentianus was contemporary with Domitian, one portion of the problem before us might be regarded as solved, but, unfortunately, the age of the grammarian is as much a matter of controversy as that of the novelist. Again, a very close resemblance has been detected between certain expressions in Martial and Statius, and three passages in the Satyricon. Two of these, it is true, are not found in the extant copies, but are adduced incidentally by St. Jerome and Fulgentius; but even if we admit that there is no mistake or confusion in regard to these citations, we can form no conclusion from such a fact, for it is impossible to demonstrate whether Petronius copied from Martial and Statius, or Martial and Statius from Petronius, whether they may not have borrowed from common sources without reference to each other. (Petron. Satyr. 119; Mart. xiii. 62; Hieron. Ep. cxxx. c. 19; Mart. ii. 12; Fulgent. Myst. v.; Stat. Theb. iii. 661.) In like manner the testimonies of Macrobius (Somn. Sep. i. 2), Servius (Ad Virg. Aen. xi.), Lydus (De Magist. i. 41), Priscian, Diomedes, Victorinus, Isidorus, and Sidonius Apollinaris (Carm. xxiii. 155), lead to no result. The latter, indeed, when enumerating some of the brightest lights of Roman literature, places "Arbiter" immediately before Ovid, the Senecans, and Martial; but it is evident that he does not adopt any sort of chronological order, for Tacitus in his list takes precedence of the above, and at the commencement of his catalogue Cicero, Livy, Virgil, Terence, Plautus, and Varro follow in succession. Upon this passage, which is very obscurely worded, rests the assertion, admitted without comment by many of the historians of Latin literature, that Petronius was a native of Marseilles.

If we sit with impartiality the whole of the evidence produced, and analyse with care the pleadings of the contending parties, we shall feel disposed to decide that, while upon the one hand there are no proofs nor even probabilities which can justify us in pronouncing that the author of the Satyricon is the same person with the Petronius of Tacitus, so on the other hand there is good reason to believe that the miscellany in question belongs to the first century, and that at all events, it is not later than the reign of Hadrian, although we cannot pretend to fix a narrower limit, nor to hazard a conjecture as to the individual by whom it was composed. In addition to the considerations already indicated, which support this view of the question, it will be observed that the lamentations over the decline of correct taste in eloquence, poetry, and the fine arts, and the invectives against the destructive influence exercised upon the minds of the young by the system of education then in fashion, and especially by the teachers of declamation, could proceed only from one who had witnessed the introduction, or at least the full development of that system, and would have been completely out of place at an epoch when the vices here exposed had become sanctioned by universal practice, and had long ceased to excite animadversion or suspicion. Many attempts have been made to reconcile the strangely mutilated condition in which the piece has been transmitted to modern times. It has been suggested by some that the blanks were caused by the scruples of pious transcribers, who omitted those parts which were most licentious; while others have not hesitated to declare their conviction that the worst passages were studiously selected. Without meaning to advocate this last hypothesis—and we can scarcely conceive that Burmann was in earnest when he propounded it—it is clear that the first explanation is altogether unsatisfactory, for it appears to be impossible that what was passed over could have been more offensive than much of what was retained. According to another theory, what we now possess must be regarded as striking and favourite extracts, copied out into the common-place book of some scholar in the middle ages; a supposition applicable to the Supper of Trimalchio and the longer portions of the work, but which fails for the numerous short and abrved fragments breaking off in the middle of a sentence. The most simple solution of the difficulty seems to be the true one. The existing MSS, proceeded, in all likelihood, from two or three archetypes which may have been so much damaged by neglect, that large portions were rendered illegible, while whole leaves and sections may have been torn out or otherwise destroyed.

The Edito Principe of the fragments of Petronius was printed at Venice, by Bernardinus de Vitalibus, 4to. 1499; and the second at Leipzig, by Jacobus Thanner, in 1500; but these editions, and those which followed for upwards of a hundred and fifty years, exhibited much less than we now possess. For, about the middle of the seventeenth century, an individual who assumed the designation of Martinus Statilius, although his real name was Petrus Petitus, found a MS. at Traun in Dalmatia, containing, nearly entire, the Supper of Trimalchio, which was wanting in all former copies. This was published separately at Padua, in a very incorrect state (8vo. 1664), without the knowledge of the discoverer, again by Petitus himself (8vo. Paris, 1664), and immediately gave rise to a fierce controversy, in which the most learned men of that day took a share, one party receiving it without suspicion as a genuine relic of antiquity, while their opponents with great vehemence contended that it was spurious. The strife was not quelled until the year 1669, when the MS. was despatched from the library of the proprietor, Niculius Cipplius, at Traun, to Rome, where, having been narrowly scrutinised by the most competent judges, it was finally pronounced to be at least three hundred years old, and, since no forgery of such a nature could have been executed at that epoch, the sceptics were compelled reluctantly to admit that their doubts were ill founded. The title of the Codex, commonly known as the Codex Tragamienst, was Petronii Arbati Satyrj Fragmenta ex libro quinto decimo et sexto decimo, and then follow the words “Num aliore genere furi- arum,” &c. Stimulated, it would appear, by the interest excited during the progress of this discussion, and by the favour with which the new acquisition was now universally regarded, a certain Francis Nodot published at Rotterdam (12mo. 1683) what professed to be the Satyricon of Petronius complete, taken, it was said, from a MS. found at Belgrade when that city was captured in 1688. Nodot declared he had been presented to him by a Frenchman high in the imperial service. The fate of this volume was soon decided. The imposture was so palpable that few could be found to advocate the pretensions put forth on its behalf, and it was soon given up by all. It is sometimes, however, printed along with the genuine text, but in a different type, so as to prevent the possibility of mistake. Besides this, a pretended fragment, said to have been obtained from the monastery of St. Gall, was printed in 1800, with notes and a French translation by Lallemand, but it seems to have deceived nobody.

The best edition which has yet appeared, which is so comprehensive as entirely to supersede all its predecessors, is that of Petrus Burmannus, 4to. Traj. ad Rhen. 1709; and again much enlarged and improved, 2 vol. 4to. Amst. 1743. It embraces a vast mass of annotations, prolegomena and disquisitions from the hands of different critics. Those who may prefer an impression of more moderate size, will find the edition of Antonius, 8vo. Lips. 1781, correct and serviceable.

We find in the Latin Anthology, and subjoined to all the larger editions of the Satyricon, a number of short poems bearing the name of Petronius. These have been collected from a great variety of different sources, and are the work of many different hands, it being very doubtful whether any of them ought to be ascribed to Petronius Arbiter.

PETRONIUS (Πέτρωνος), a writer on pharmacy, who lived probably in the beginning of the first century after Christ, as he is mentioned by Dioscorides (De Mater. Med. praef. vol. i. p. 2), who classifies him among the later authors (comp. St. Epiphan. Adv. Haeres. i. 1. §3, p. ed. Colon. 1602). Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. vol. xii. p. 361, ed. vet.) supposes his name to have been Petronius Niger.
PETRUS.

[Nicer], but this is uncertain, and in the latest edition of Diocletianides (i.e.), where the words καὶ ῾Νεκροὺς καὶ Πετρόνιον Νεῖρα τὸ καὶ διορίστασις occurs, αὐτὸς is placed between Πετρόνιος and Νεῖρα. In Pliny (H. N. xx. 32), he is called Petronius Dicolatus, but probably the text is not quite sound [Diocletianus]. He is mentioned by Galen (De Compos. Medic. sec. Gen. ii. 5, vol. viii. p. 562), where the words Πετρόνιος Μουαρσ occur, which has made some persons consider Petronius Musus to be one and the same individual, and others conjecture that instead of Πετρόνιος, we should read Ἀρτρόνιος; however, it is only necessary to insert a καὶ or a comma between the words. One of his medicines is quoted by Galen (ibid. v. 11. p. 631). (See Fabric. Bibl. Gr. l. c.)

The name of M. Petronius Heraus, a physician, occurs in an ancient Latin inscription preserved by Gruter. [W. A. G.]

L. PETROSI/DIUS, a standard-bearer (μαχι/λισ), died fighting bravely, when Titurius Sabinus and Aurunculeus Cotta were destroyed with their troops, by Ambrizius, b. c. 54. (Cass. B. G. v. 37.)

PETRUS, Latin emperor of Constantineople, belonged to that branch of the Courtenay family which was descended from the kings of France. He was chosen to succeed the emperor Henry in 1217, being then in France, where he held the dignity of count of Auverre. While traversing Epirus with an army on his way to Constantinople, he was made a prisoner by Theodore, despot of Epirus, and died in captivity in 1219, having never sat on the throne. We consequently dismiss him, and only mention that his successor was his second son, Robert. [W. F.]

PETRUS (Hērōs), literary and ecclesiastical. 1. Of Alexandria (i). Petrus or Peter, the first of that name in the list of the bishops of Alexandria, succeeded Theonas in that see sometime between Easter and the latter part of November. A. D. 300, according to Tillemont's calculation; and exercised his episcopal functions more than eleven (Eusebius says for twelve) years. Of the time and place of his birth we have no account. Cave considers that he was probably born at Alexandria, and that he was there "trained alike to virtue and to sacred literature by his predecessor Theonas;" but we do not know that these statements are more than inferences from his being chosen to succeed Theonas. He had not occupied the see quite three years when the persecution commenced by the emperor Diocletian [Diocletianus] and continued by his successors, broke out a. D. 304. During its long continuance Peter was obliged to flee from one hiding-place to another. The monk Gregory, Bishop of Basilea, in his Commentary on Acts, 15. 23, and St. Photius, in his Codex Synag. et in Schol. Histor. Pseudo, apud Valesius, Not. ad Euseb. H. E. vii. 32) attests this; and Peter himself, if confidence may be placed in a discourse said to have been delivered by him in prison, and given in certain Acta Petri Alexandrini (apud Valesius, ibid.) states that he found shelter at different times in Mesopotamia, in Phoenicia, in Palestine, and in various islands; but if these Acta are the same that were published by Combeis in his Selecti Martyrum Triumphi, 3vo. Paris, 1660, their authority is materially lessened by the interpolations of Symeon Metaphrastes. Cave conjectures that he was imprisoned during the reign of Diocletian or Maximian Galerius [Maximianus II.], and if there is truth in the account given by Euphranius (Hieron. ixviii. 1—5) of the origin of the schism in the Egyptian churches, occasioned by Meletius of Lycopolis [Meletius, literary and ecclesiastical, No. 3], the conjecture is probably correct; and if so, Peter must have obtained his release, as this imprisonment must have been antecedent to the deposition of Meletius by Peter, and the commencement of the Meletian schism. In the ninth year of the persecution Peter was, suddenly and contrary to all expectation, again arrested and was beheaded, by order of Maximin Daza [Maximinus II.], without any distinct charge being brought against him. Eusebius speaks with the highest admiration of his piety and his attainments in sacred literature, and he is revered as a saint and martyr both in the Eastern and Western Churches. His martyrdom is placed by an ancient Oriental chronicle of the bishops of Alexandria, translated by Abraham Echellensis (Paris, 1651), on the 29th of the month Athar or Athyr, which corresponds sometimes to the 25th, and sometimes to the 26th November. His memory is now cele-

PETER wrote several works, of which there are very scanty remains. 1. Πετρος μεταθαλασσια. Ληστος, Sermo de Puellentia. 2. Ληστος τη Παλαξα, Sermo in Sacram Pascha. These discourses are not extant in their original form, but fifteen canons relating to the lapsed, or those who in time of persecution had fallen away, fourteen of them from the Sermo de Puellentia, the fifteenth from the Sermo in Sacram Pascha, are contained in all the Canonum Collections. They were published in a Latin version in the Micrologusbiblicon, Basel, 1550; in the Orthodoxographa of Heroldus, Basel, 1555, and of Grynaeus, Basel, 1569; in the first and second editions of De la Bigne's Bibliotheca Patrará, Paris, 1575 and 1589, and in the Cologne edition, 1618. They are given also in the Concilia. In the edition of Labbe (vol. i. col. 955) and in that of Hardouin (vol. i. col. 225) they are given in Greek with a Latin version, but without notes; but in the Συνόδουκα, εἰς Pandectae Canonum of Bishop Beveridge (vol. ii. p. 8, fol. Oxon. 1672) they are accompanied by the notes of Joannes Zonaras and Theodorus Dalsamon. They are entitled Τιμίου Μεταθαλασσια των Εκκλησιων. Τοια παντες αυτοι πεφιλεμεν εν τη πετρος μεταθαλασσια. De Petri Archipelapios Alexandrii et Martyris Canonos qui feruntur in Sermone ejus de Puellentia. It is only in some MSS. and editions that the separate source of the fifteenth canon is pointed out. A passage from the Sermo in Sacram Pascha, or from some other work of Peter's on the same subject, is given in the Distritta de Paschate prefixed to the Chronicon Alexandrinum u. Paschale, and published separately in the Uranologion of Petavius, fol. Paris, 1630, p. 396, &c. As the Distritta is mutilated, and the extract from Peter forms its present commencement, it was hastily inferred by some critics that the Diatriba itself was the work of Peter, the title of the citation being considered as applying to the whole treatise; but Cave and others have observed that the Diatriba was written not before the latter part of the sixth century. A Vatican MS. from which the text of the Bonn edition of the Chronicon is taken, describes the work of Peter. It is published in the Acta Concilii Chalcedon.,

2. Of Alexandria (2), was presbyter of the Church at Alexandria during the life-time of Athanasius, whom he accompanied for many years in his wanderings and shared his dangers. Athanasius before his death had nominated Peter as his successor, and after his decease his appointment was carried into effect with the great applause of the orthodox part of the Alexandrian populace and with the approval of the neighbouring bishops, A. D. 373. But the Arians, then in the ascendant under the emperor Valens, though they had, from reverence or fear, conceded the quiet possession of the see to the age and authority of Athanasius [Athena- sius], were by no means disposed to acquiesce in the appointment of an orthodox successor; and Peter, after his consecration, according to Socrates and Sozomen, imprisoned by the officers of the emperor. Tillemont and Galland, however, doubt if he was imprisoned. At any rate he soon made his escape, and, getting on board ship, fled to Rome, where he was kindly received by the pope Damasus I., leaving his Arian competitor Lucius [Lucius, No. 2] in possession of the churches of Alexandria. On the departure of Valens from Antioch (A. D. 378) to his fatal war with the Goths, Peter, who had returned from Rome with letters from Damasus, confirming his title to the see, recovered possession of the churches by favour of the populace, who expelled Lucius, and compelled him to flee to Constantinople. Peter, however, survived his restoration only for a short time, dying A. D. 381, and being succeeded in his bishopric by his own brother Timotheus or Timothy. Valesius (Not. ad Sozomen. H. E. vii. 9) describes Peter as the abbot of Maximus the Cynic [Maximus Alexandrinus] in his usurpation of the see of Constantinople, but Theodoret (H. E. v. 6) describes the transaction to Timotheus. (Socrates, H. E. iv. 29—22, 37; Sozomen, H. E. vi. 19, 39; Theodoret, H. E. iv. 29—22.)

Peter was held in the highest esteem by his contemporaries. Gregory Nazianzen unites him in the same eulogy with St. Athanasius; and the emperor Theodosius the Great, in one of his laws, refers to the faith preached by him as the standard of orthodoxy. (Tillemont, Mémo. vol. vi. p. 580, &c.) Two productions of Peter have been preserved in part: —

1. 'EpiStolh s. Grámmata, Epistola, a letter sent by him, after his escape from Alexandria, to all the churches, giving an account of the persecutions and other atrocities perpetrated by Lucius and the Arian party. Theodoret has given a large extract, probably the chief part of this, in the original Greek (H. E. iv. 22).

2. Epistola ad Episcopos et Presbyteros alique Diaconos pro eorinde Fide in exilio constitutos, s. ad Episcopos, Presbyteros, alique Diaconos qui sub Valente Imperatore Dioccesarum fauros caules missi. Facundus has preserved two passages of this in a Latin version in his Pro De- fensione Trium Capitolorum, lib. iv. c. 2, lib. xi. c. 2. These fragments of the works of Peter are given from Theodoret and Facundus, in the seventh volume of the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland. (Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 371, vol. i. p. 254; Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. ix. p. 318; Galland Bibliotheca Patrum, proleg. ad vol. vii. c. 6.)

3. Of ALEXANDRIA (3). [No. 25.]

4. Of ANTOCH (4). [No. 17.]

Contemporary with Michael Cerularius, patriarch of Constantinople [Michaeli, No. 6], and Leo of Achrida [Leo, No. 2], and united with them in hostility to the Latin Church, was Petrus or Peter, the third patriarch of Antioch of that name in the current tables of the occupants of that see, which commence with the Apostle Peter. Peter obtained the patriarchate in the year 1053, and in the same year he sent synodical letters to the patriarchs of Alexandria, Jerusalem, and Constantinople, and to the pope, Leo IX., signifying his accession. Cave states that he sent to the pope "a profession of his faith," but it is probable that he has applied this term to the synodical letter, of which a Latin version appears among the letters of Leo IX.; but Le Quien, who had in his possession the Greek text of these synodical letters, complains of the great discrepancy between the Greek text and the Latin version. Two letters of Peter appear in Greek with a Latin version, in the Monumenta Ecclesiae Graecae, of Cotelerius, vol. ii. pp. 112, 145. The first is entitled Epistola ad Dominicum Gradenseni, and is an answer to Dominicus Gradensis s. Venetus, patriarch of Venice or Aquileia, whose letter, in the collection of Cotelerius, precedes that of Peter; the second is addressed to Michael Cerularius, Epistola ad Michaelem Cerularium, and is preceded by a letter of Michael to Peter, to which it is the answer. A considerable part of this letter had previously been published by Leo Allatius, in his De Consenso Ecclesiariarum Orient. et Occident. lib. iii. c. 12. § 4. According to Cave, Peter bitterly inveighed against the lives and doctrines of the Latin clergy, and especially against the addition of the word "homo" to the creed; while, according to Le Quien, he preserved a more impartial tone, and showed everywhere what "a disposition adverse to schism." There is extant in MS. at Vienna, another letter of Peter, Petri Epistola ad Joannem Transem in Apulia Episcopam, relating to the matters in dispute between the Eastern and Western Churches. (Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 1040, vol. ii. p. 192; Oudin, Comment. de Scrip- torib. et Scriptis Eccles. vol. ii. col. 605; Lambeck, Comment. de Biblioth. Caesareae, lib. v. cod. ccxlvii. Nos. 19, 20, 22, col. 261—265, ed. Kollar; Le Quien, Orient. Christiani, vol. ii. col. 754.)

6. APOTELOS, the APOSTLE. Various apocy- phal writings were, in the earlier periods of the Church, circulated under the name of the Apostle Peter. 1. Kedr Petru Epistola Episcopi Alexandrii Petri s. Evangelium secundum Petrum. This is mentioned by Origen (Comm. in Matheum, tom. xi.), by Eusebius (H. E. iii. 3, 25, vi. 12), by Jerome (De Viris Illustr., c. 1), by Theodoret (Heret. Fabul. Compend. ii. 2), who confounds it with the Evangelium Nazaræorum, or Gospel used by the Nazarenes; and, according to two MSS., but not according to the printed editions, by Pope Gelasius (Decretum de Libris Apocryphis). This Evangelium Petri must not be confounded with the Evangelium Infantinœ, which an Oriental tradition ascribes to Peter; and still less with the canonical Gospel of Mark, which has sometimes been named after Peter, because supposed to have been written under his direction. The apocryphal Gospel of Peter is not extant. Serapion of An- toich, a Christian writer near the close of the second century, wrote a refutation of the fables con- tained in it, by which some Christians at Rhossus in Syria had been led into heresy. Eusebius (H. E. vi. 12) quotes a passage of this work of Serapion. (Fabric. Cod. Apocryph. p. 137.) 2. Πετρον. Acta s. Acta Petri. This work is mentioned by Eusebius (H. E. iii. 3), by Jerome (i.e.), by Isidore of Pelusium (Epistol. ii. 99), and ap- parently by Philastrius (De Haeres. lxxxvii.), who speaks of an apochryphal work of Peter as received by the Manichæans. It is not unlikely that these Acta Petri were substantially identical with or incorporated in the Recognitions Clementinae [Cle- mens Romanus]; for Photius (Biblioth. cod. 112, 113) states that many copies of the Recognitions were preceded by an introductory letter to James, the Lord's brother (Ενεργον προ των αδελφων Ιακωβουν, Epistola ad Pratum Domini Jacobum), of which there were two copies, one as from the Apostle Peter, stating that he had among his writings his Παράξυς, Acta, and sent them to James, who had requested to have them; the other, as from Clement, stating that he had written the Acta at the command of Peter. Photius conjectured, with apparent reason, that there were two editions or copies of the Acta Petri, of which the one written as by himself had been lost, while the other, which was either the same with the Recognitions, or was incorporated in them, had been generally diffused. There is some room, however, to doubt the identity of the lost edition with the work mentioned by Eusebius and the other ancient writers. (Comp. Grabe, Spicilegium, vol. i. p. 78.) 3. Επιστολα ad Pratum Domini Jacobum, just mentioned. Turrianus, in his Apologia pro Epis- tola Pontificum, published (lib. iv. c. 1, and lib. v. c. 23) a letter of Peter to James, which Cotelerius, in his Patria Apologet. presented to the Clementinae s. Homilie Clementinae, a work which Cave appears justly to characterize as only another edition or form of the Recognitions. We consider the Ενεργον προ των αδελφων, Epistola ad Jacobum, published by Turrianus and Cotelerius, to be the one mentioned by Photius; though Fabricius, who has reprinted it in his Codex Apocryphus N. T. vol. ii. p. 997, &c. regards it as a different one. 4. Πετρον. Επιστολα Πετρον. Petri Apocalypse s. Revelatio. This work is mentioned by Eusebius (H. E. iii. 3), Jerome (i.e.), Sozomen (H. E. vii. 19), and in some copies of the Stichometria subjoined to the Chronographia of Nicephorus of Constantinople. It was cited by the heretic Theodorus, as appears from a passage in the "Trentwurcs, Hypotyposeos" of Alexander, noticed by Eusebius (H. E. vi. 14). Sozomen (i.e.) states that the work was, in his time, read once a year in some of the churches in Palestine. A passage in Latin, cited by Jacobus de Vitriaco in the thirteenth cen- tury, as from the Apocalypsis Petri (apud Grabe, Spicilegium, vol. i. p. 76), must be from a much later work than that noticed by Clement, Eusebius, and Jerome, for it bears internal evidence of having Leen written after the rise of Mohammedanism. 5. Petrus kephyrus, Petri Praedicato, mentioned by Clement of Alexandria (Stromata, lib. i. v.), Eusebius (H. E. iii. 3), and Jerome (l.c.). A few fragments of this work have been collected by Grabe (Spicileg. vol. i. p. 62, &c.), from Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Lactantius, Gregory Nazianzen, and others. Dodwell supposed that the Epistola ad Jacobum (No. 3) was the introduction to the Prædication, but his opinion is rejected by Grabe (ibid. p. 59). The work entitled Διασκεδασις Πέτρου, Doctrina Petri, quoted by Origen (Prooem. ad Libros, περὶ ἀρχῶν, vers. Rufini) and Damascenus (Parallel. i. 16), is probably only another name for the Prædication (Grabe, ibid. pp. 56, 57). The Κατηγορία Πέτρου, Catechesis Petri, formerly in the Coddin library at Paris, is also apparently the same work. 6. Petri Judicium s. Duas Vies. This work is mentioned by Rufinus (EpijN. Symboii) and Jerome (l.c.). Grabe suspects that no such work ever existed; but that the supposition of its existence arose from Rufinus mistaking κρας, the abbreviation of κατηγορία, for κράς, and that Jerome was misled by the error of Rufinus. The work itself is generally ascribed to Eusebius. A work entitled Ἡ ζεία λειτουργία τοῦ ἀγάπηλον Πέτρου, Missa Apostolorum s. Divinum Sacrificium S. Apostoli Petri, was published in Greek, with a Latin version by Fed. Morel. Paris, 1595, and has been reprinted (sometimes in Latin only) in various editions of the Bibliotheca Patrum. The Πέτρων περιοδοι, or Circuitus s. Peregrinationes s. Itinerarium Petri, mentioned repeatedly by the ancients, appear to be only so many titles for the Recognitions of Clement. The Πέτρων καὶ Αποστολῶν καὶ Ἀποστολῶν διδακτορῶν Petri et Eusebii Disputationes (Euseb. H.E. iii. 38; Hieron. De Firis Illust. c. 15), was not ascribed to Peter as its author, but to Clement of Rome. Eusebius speaks of it as a spurious work, recently produced, and not noticed by more ancient writers. Valesius (not. ad Euseb. I.c.) thinks it was a second, and now lost part of the Recognitions. The Προερχέται Petri et Pauli and the Πετρονίαν Excerpta Petri et Pauli SS. Apostolorum Constitutiones, now or formerly extant in the Medeicin library at Florence, and the Bodleian at Oxford, appear to be portions of the well-known Constitutiones Apolliniceris (Grabe, Spicileg. vol. i. pp. 85, 86). The Planctus Petri Apostoli Victorii (Fabric. Cod. Apocryph. N. T. vol. iii. p. 721) is one of a parcel of forged documents, partly written on parchment, partly inscribed on leaden plates, professing to be Latin translations from the Arabic, which were dug up in a mountain near Granada, near the close of the sixteenth century. The Epistola ad Pseudam Regem Francorum et Carolum ac Carolinum Filios ejus, written by Pope Stephen III. in the name of the Apostle Peter, soliciting aid against the Lombards, is regarded by Fabricius rather as a piece of rhetorical affectation than a fraud. The Epistola is given by Baronius, in his Annales Ecclesiastici, ad ann. 755, xvii. &c. (Grabe, Spicileg. SS. Patrum, vol. i. pp. 55-60 in Grabe, Hist. Patr. Eusebii, vol. i. p. 6; Fabric. Codex Apocryphus N. T. passim.) 7. Of Argos. There were two bishops of Argos of the name of Peter, authors of works extant in MS. or print. One of these wrote an Elogium Cosmacae et Damianae SS. Anargyrorum in Asia s. Oratio in sanctos et gloriosos Anargyros et Theamaturgos Cosmam et Damianun, which has never been printed (Fabric. Bibli. Græc. vol. x. p. 214, vol. x. p. 339; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii. Dissert. i. p. 153). The other, who is termed Petrus Siculus or Peter the Sicilian and acquired his bishoprie after A.D. 790, wrote a life of St. Athanasius, bishop of Methone in the Peloponnesus; and is probably the same person as the Petrus Siculus who was sent by the emperor Basil the Macedonian [BASILII I. MACEDO] to Fabricon in the district or on the frontier of Melitene near the Euphrates, to negotiate an exchange of prisoners, apparently with the chiefs of the Paulicians; a purpose which, after a residence of nine months, he effected. He wrote an account of the Paulicians, or as he designated them, Manichaean. Both these works have been published in a Latin version: 1. The life of St. Athanasius is given in the Latin version of the Jesuit Franciscus Blandiutius in the Acta Sanctorum of the Bollandists, Januar. vol. ii. p. 1125, &c. It is entitled Petri Siculi Historia de vana et stolidà Maniachæorum Haeresi lanquam Archiepiscopo Bulgurarum nuncupatìta. It is in the sixteenth volume of the Lyon edition of the Bibliotheca, fol. 1677. It is to be observed that Le Quien considers the Elogium SS. Cosmacae et Damiani to be by Petrus Siculus, and not by another Peter. (Miraevus, Actuatorum de Scriptor. Eccles. c. 256; Vossius, De Historicis Graecis, lib. iv. c. 19; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 370, vol. ii. p. 55; Acta Sanctorum, l. c.; Fabric. Biblioth. Græc. vol. x. p. 201; Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, vol. ii. col. 184.) 8. CHARTOPIHALAS. [No. 13.] 9. CHRYSOLOGUS or GHOSOLANUS, was archbishop of Milan, A.D. 1110, having previously held some less important see. He was sent by Pope Paschal II. on a mission to the emperor Alexius I. Comnenus, and engaged eagerly in the controversy on the procession of the Holy Spirit. His only title to be noticed in this work, within the limits of which he does not properly fall, is derived from his having composed Προς τοῦ Βασιλεία κύριον Ἀλέξου τοῦ Κοιμητίου λόγος, κ. τ. λ. Ad Imperatorum Dominum Alexium Cœnennam Oratio, &c., designed to prove the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Son as well as from the Father, published in the Graecia orthodoxa of Allatius, vol. i. p. 379, &c. 4to, Rome, 1632, and given in a Latin version by Baronius, Annal. Eccles. ad ann. 1116. viii. &c. (Fabric. Biblioth. Græc. vol. xi. p. 335; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 1110, vol. ii. p. 191.) 10. CHRYSOLOGUS. This ecclesiast. (a saint in the Romish Calendar) is thought to have been born at Forum Cornelii (now Imola) in the northern part of Italy, and was educated by Cornelius, a bishop, and perhaps (though Tillemont doubts it) of that city. He received ordination as presbyter, or, as some think, as deacon only, from the same prelate; and became archbishop of Ravenna, as Tillemont thinks, before A.D. 431, but according to Cave in A.D. 433, and died in or before A.D. 451, in which year Pope Leo the Great wrote a letter to a Leo bishop of Ravenna, who must have been a successor of Peter Chrysologus. The statement in the life prefixed to the first edition of his Homilias, that he lived till near the close of the century, must be inaccurate. Peter acquired his surname from his eloquence. His published writings consist of, 1. Homilias s. Sermones in Latin. They were first published in 12mo.
Paris, 1544, with this title Dives Petri Chrysologi archiepiscopi Ravennatis, viri erudissimi atque sanctissimi, insigne et pervertutustam opus Homiliarum nunc primum in lucem editum; and have been frequently reprinted. They appear in the seventh volume of the Lyon edition of the Bibliotheca Patrum, fol. 1677. Among these Homilias, which amount in number to a hundred and seventy-six, some are improperly attributed to Peter. Five of these Sermones were printed in the Spicilegium D'Archéry (vol. vii. p. 120, &c.) under the name of Peter Damiani, an Italian ecclesiastic of much later date, to whom in D'Archéry's MS. they were ascribed; but the error was discovered, and they were assigned by D'Archéry in his Index Generalis, to Chrysologus, their true author. 2. "Epistolæ Petræ à fideis à Petro in Compendium, Epistolæ Petri Ravennatis Episcopi ad Euthemem Abbatem. This letter, which is a reply to one addressed by the heresiarh Eutyches to Peter, complaining of the condemnation passed on him by Flavianus of Constantinople [Eutyches: Flaviusianus, Ecclesiast. No. 5], was published by Gerard Vossius in the original Greek with a Latin version, at the end of the works of Gregory Thaumaturgus, 4to. Mayence, 1604. It is reprinted in the Concilia (vol. iv. col. 36, ed.
Labbe; vol. ii. col. 21, ed. Hardouin). (Tillemont, ad ann. 433, vol. i. p. 422; Oudin, De Scriptor.
art et Scriptis Eccles. vol. i. col. 1250.) 11. CNAHPER. [No. 17.]
12. Of Constantino. [No. 15.]
13. DAMASCEUS. Among the works of Joannes Damascenus [Damascenus, Ioannes]
(vol. i. p. 632, ed. Le Quien) are an Epistola ad Zachariam, and a short piece entitled Caput de immaculato Corpore, &c. The Epistola is cited by Michael Glicas at the end of the twelfth century, in certain letters extant in MS., as having been written by Joannes Damascenus; and both pieces were published under the name of that author by Petrus Puntius, 8vo. Antwerp, 1601; and by Fronto Ducaeus, Paris, 1603 and 1619. These directors were supported by the authority of MSS.
in ascribing them to Joannes; but internal evidence showed that such ascription was erroneous;
and the authority of a more perfect MS. enabled Le Quien to restore them to their true author.
As published by him (ubi supra) they bear respectively these titles, 1. "Epistolæ in ægmatā Petræ in Macroprophiæ ad Zaccarias Epistola Domini, Epistolæ sanctissimi Petri Mansur ad Zachariam episcopum Daororum. 2. "Caput de immaculato Corpore, episcopum Daororum. This is by no means clear who this Peter was.
His surname Mansur makes it probable that he was of the same family as Joannes Damascenus, by whom that surname was borne.
Le Quien thinks that the writer of the letter was not Peter, metropolitan of Damascus, an intimate friend of Joannes Damascenus, who, for writing against the doctrines of the Mohammedans and the Manichaens (i. e. the Paulicians), had his tongue cut out, and was banished by order of the Caliph Walid into Arabia Felix, where he suffered martyrdom. (Theophanes, Chronographia, s. A. m.
Venice, vol. i. p. 641, ed. Bonn.) Theophanes mentions (ibid.) another Peter, as having suffered martyrdom from the Saracens at Maima, the port of Gaza in Palestine, about the same time, and adds that Joannes Damascenus had written in honour of this Peter. Le Quien, though he refers to this passage in Theophanes, gives no intimation that he regarded the martyr of Maima as the author of the pieces in question: but he has observed that a quotation from the Liturgy of St. James, or of Jerusalem, in the Epistola, shows that the writer was an ecclesiastic of Palestine. There was a later Peter of Damascus, a Greek monk, who flourished in the middle of the twelfth century, and wrote several works on the discipline of a monastic life, which are found in MS. in various libraries: but it is hardly likely that he wrote the Epistola and the Caput, for Michael Glicas would hardly have ascribed pieces of so recent an origin to Joannes Damascenus, a writer of four hundred years previous to his own time. If either of the above-mentioned persons was the writer, we think the balance of probability is in favour of the martyr of Maima. (Le Quien, Opera Damasceni, i. c.
Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii. Dissert. i. p. 15.)
14. DIACONUS. In the controversy excited near the beginning of the sixth century by the monks, whom ecclesiastical writers call "Scythea,
" who came from the diocese of Tomi, on the south bank of the Danube [MAkEXTIUs, IOANNES], Peter, a deacon, took a prominent part. He had accompanied the delegates sent to Rome by the monks, and while at Rome united with his colleagues in addressing to Fulgentius, and the other African bishops who were then in exile in Sardinia, a work entitled De Incarnatione et Gratia Domi noster Jesu Christi Liber. To this Fulgentius and his companions replied in another treatise on the same subject. The work of Peter, which is in Latin, was published in the Monumenta SS. Patrum Orthodoxoarchaeologia of Gryneus, Basel, 1569, and has been reprinted in various editions of the Bibliothea Patrum, and in the ninth volume of the Lyon edition, fol. a. d. 1677, and in the eleven (Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 520, vol. i. p. 503; Ittigius, De Bibliothecis Patrum, pp. 21, 40, 436, xi. c. 4.)
15. DIACONUS. In the Isu Graeco-Romanum of Laenclavius, lib. vi. pp. 395—397, are given
"Ephrasteis Æpopo. kai ἔχειν όν ρηταμαστάς χαρτισθένας κήρυς Πέτρος, καὶ διάκονος τῆς τού Θεοῦ μεγάλης

vearevendissimæ Chartularias, Dominus Petrus, identique Diaconus Majoris Ecclesiae (sc. of St. Sopia at Constantinople) a. m. 6600 = a. d. 1092.
We learn from this title that the author lived about the close of the eleventh century in the reign of Alexis I. Comnenus, and that he held the offices described, which is all that is known of him.
There are, or were, extant in MS. in the King's Library at Paris, Petrus Diaconus et Philosophos de Cyclo et Indictione, and Petrus Diconio et Philo-sophi Tractatus de Sole, Luna, et Sidereus (Codd.
Cuxxix. No. 7. and mmnulxxv.), but whether this

16. Of Edessa. Peter, a Syrian by birth, and a presbyter of the church at Edessa, and an eminient preacher, wrote Theodosius adversus Consarum, treatises on various subjects, and composed Psalms in metre like those of Ephrem the Syrian.
 Trithemius ascribes to him Commentarii in Psalms: and says that he wrote in Syriac. All his works have perished. (Gennadius, De Viris Illustr. c. 74; Trithem. De Scriptorib. Eccles. c. 167.)

17. Fullo, or sometimes retaining the Greek word GNAHEUS or CNPAHEUS (Πηρός ο Γρα-φης or Κραφης), the Fuller, patriarch of Antioch in the middle of the fifth century. He was a priest or monk of the neighbourhood of Constantinople: but whether he originally followed the business of a Fuller before embracing a religious life, or whether he carried it on while a monk is uncertain. Acacius of Constantinople (apud Liberal. Breviar. c. 18), states that he was begu-menos, or abbot of a monastery at Constantinople;
and that on account of his offences, or actual actions against him, "crimina," (their nature is not stated) he fled to Antioch. The Laudatio
S. Barnabae, c. iii. § 32, of Alexander the Cyprian 447), and the Synodicon Vetus, first published by Jo. Pappus, and reprinted in the Biblioth. Graeca, of Fabricius (vol. xii. p. 396) describe him as a monk of the monastery of the Acacematæ at Constantinople, who accompanied Zeno, son-in-law to the emperor Leo I., when sent to Antioch. On the other hand, Theodorus Lector (H. E. i. 20), whom Theophanes and Cedrenus follow, says he was a presbyter of the Church of St. Bassa the Martyr at Chaldedon. Tillenot endeavours to arrange and harmonize these various statements as follows: that Peter was originally a monk in the monastery of the Acacematæ, which he places in the neighbourhood of Constantinople, but on the Asiatic side of the Bosporus; that having been expelled and obliged to flee on account both of immorality and heresy, he resorted to Constantinopib, where he led the life of a parasite and a gourmand, and gained an introduction to Zeno (Tillenot is thus far supported by the monk Alexander); and that he was then, by Zeno's interest, made presbyter of the Church of St. Bassa. The third step in this arrangement is, however, by no means satisfactory.
Almost all our authorities agree that he accompanied Zeno to Antioch; and if, as is not improbable, the charge or the consciousness of some offence rendered his absence from Constantinople convenient, if not necessary, Acacius would not be far out in describing his journey as a flight. Peter appears to have held the monophysite doctrine, the controversy respecting which then agitated the whole Eastern Church; and on his arrival at Antioch, the patriarchate of which city was then held by Martyrius, a supporter of the Council of Chalcedon, he determined on the audacious enterprise of occupying that high office.
Persuading Zeno to favour his attempt, he engaged on his side a number of those inclined to the Monophysite doctrine, (Theodorus Lector and others call them Apollinarists [APOLLINARIS,
No. 2.], but it is likely that the Monophysites generally are meant,) and excited much dissension and tumult, among other causes of which was his adding to the sacred hymn called the Trisagion, the words "who was crucified for us," which constituted one of the party tests of the Monophysites, and his anathematizing all those who refused to subscribe the Trisagion, and against Zeno himself with being a Nesterian. Martyrius, unable to stop the disorder by his own authority, went to Constantinople, where, through the influence of the patriarch Gennadius [Gennadius, No. 1.], he was honourably treated by the emperor Leo I., and returned to Antioch, trusting that the imperial favour would enable him to quell all disturbance. Disappointed in this hope by the obstinacy of his opposents, and disgusted with his failure, he abdicated
the patriarchate, which was immediately occupied by Peter. Leo, however, was not to be thus braved; and, at the instigation of Gennadius, he immediately expelled the intruder, in whose place Julian was with general approval elected. Peter was sentenced to banishment to the Oasis of Upper Egypt, but he contrived to escape from exile, and returning to Constantinople, obtained refuge in the monastery of the Acacematæ, where he remained untill the revolt of Basiliscus against "who was cru-cross himself by oath to abstain from exciting further troubles. His usurpation of the See of Antioch may be placed in A. D. 469.

When Basiliscus (A. D. 475) had expelled Zeno from Constantinople, it appears to have been his first policy to court the Monophysite party, whom Leo and Zeno had repressed; and, at the persuasion of Timotheus Aelurus, Monophysite patriarch of Alexandria, whom he had recalled from exile, he issued an encyclical letter to the various prelates of the church, anathematizing the decrees of the Synod of Chalcedon. To this letter Peter gave his formal assent: and obtained a decree restoring him to the patriarchate of Antioch, to which city he was immediately sent. (A. D. 476.)
The Monophysites regained their ascendancy. Julian was expelled, and soon after died of grief:
and Peter resuming the patriarchal authority, excited, by again resuming the charge "who was crucified for us," and by repeating his anathemas, fresh rumours, which led to plundering and murder.
But the recovery of the imperial power by Zeno checked his career: a synod was assembled at Antioch
(A. D. 477), in which he was deposed, chiefly by the agency of one of his own partizans, John Codonatus [JOANNES, No. 10], whom he had appointed bishop of Apameia. He was banished to Pityus, from whence he contrived to escape, or was allowed to go to Euchaïa in Pontus, where he found refuge in the church of St. Theodore. Tillenot thinks he even returned to Antioch, but this is quite unlikely. John Codonatus meanwhile succeeded to the vacant patriarchate; but he being deposed after three months, Stephen, a supporter of the Council of Chalcedon, succeeded, and he dying soon after, another Stephen was appointed in his room.
But the Monophysites of Antioch, though deprived of their leader, were both active and powerful: they accused the first (the Synodicon Vetus of Pappus says the second) of the two Stephens of Nestorianism, and apparently succeeded in deposing him: for Theophanes says, that a council of the Eastern bishops, assembled at Laodicea by the emperor's command, "restored him" (ἀποκαταστήσαντες) to 20. MANSUR. [No. 13.]

21. MEOOLANENIS, of Milan. [No. 9.]
22. MONGUS or MOGUUS (ΜΠΡΟΣ ὁ ΜΟΥΚΟΣ), Monophysite patriarch of Alexandria in the fifth century. Liberaturum (Breviarium, c. 16) gives him also the surname of BLAESUS, the STAMMERER. He was ordained deacon by Dioscorus, successor of Cyril, who held the patriarchate for seven years (A.D. 444—451). Peter was the ready participator in the violences of Dioscorus, and earnestly embraced his cause, when he was deposed by the Council of Chalcedon, withdrawing from the communion of the successor of Dioscorus, Proterius, who supported the cause of the council, and uniting in the opposition raised by Timothy Aelurus and others. (Liberat. ibid. c. 15.) He was consequently sentenced by Proterius, apparently to deposition and excommunication. (Liberat. ibid.) Whether he was banished, as well as Timothy Aelurus, is not clear, but he seems to have accompanied Timothy to Alexandria, and to have been his chief supporter when, after the death of the emperor Marcian, he returned, and either murdered Proterius or excited the tumults that led to his death A.D. 457. Timothy Aelurus was immediately raised to the patriarchate by his partizans, but was shortly after banished by the emperor Leo I., the Thracian, who had succeeded Marcian: Peter also was obliged to flee. Another Timothy, surnamed Salosicius, a supporter of the Council of Chalcedon, was appointed to succeed Proterius in the patriarchate. When, in the following reign of Zeno, or rather during the short usurpation of Basiliscus, Timotheus Aelurus was recalled from exile (A.D. 475), and was sent from Constantinople to Alexandria to re-occupy that see, he was joined by Peter (Liberatus, ibid. c. 16), and his party, and with their support drove out his competitor Salosicius, who took refuge in a monastery at Canopus. On the downfall of Basiliscus and the restoration of Zeno, Timothy Aelurus was allowed, through the emperor's compassion for his great age, to retain his see; but when on his death (A.D. 477) the Monophysite bishops of Egypt, without waiting for the emperor's directions, elected Peter (who had previously obtained the rank of archdeacon) as his successor, the emperor's indignation was so far roused, that he determined to put the new prelate to death. His anger, however, somewhat abated, and Peter was allowed to live, but was deprived of the patriarchate, to which Timothy Salosicius was restored. On the death of Salosicius, which occurred soon after, John of Tabenna, surnamed Talaia, or Taladus [JOANNES, No. 115], was appointed to succeed him. Peter was very shortly deposed by order of Zeno, on some account not clearly ascertained, and Peter Mongus was unexpectedly recalled from Euchaita in Paphus, whither he had been banished, and was (A.D. 482) restored to his see. His restoration appears to have been part of the policy of Zeno, to unite if possible all parties, a policy which Peter, whose age and misfortunes appear to have abated the fierceness of his party spirit, was ready to adopt. He consequently subscribed the Henoticion of the emperor, and readmitted the Proterian party to communion on their doing the same. John of Tabenna had meanwhile fled to Rome, where the pope Simplicius, who, with the Western Church, stoutly supported the Council of Chalcedon, embraced his cause, and wrote to the emperor in his behalf. Felix II. or III., who succeeded Simplicius (A.D. 483) was equally zealous on the same side. Peter had some difficulty in maintaining his position. In order to recover the favour of his Monophysite friends, whom his subservience to Zeno's policy had alienated, he anathematized the Council of Chalcedon; and then, to avert the displeasure of Acacius of Constantinople and of the Court, to whose temporizing course this decisive step was adverse, he denied that he had done so. Evagrius (H. E. iii. 17) has preserved the letter he wrote to Acacius on this occasion, which is the only writing of Peter now extant. By this tergiversation he preserved his see, and was enabled to brave the repeated anathemas of the Western Church. When, however, to recover the attachment of the Monophysites, he again anathematized the Council of Chalcedon; and Euphemius, the newly elected patriarch of Constantinople, forsaking the policy of his predecessors, took part with the Western Church against him, his difficulties became more serious. What result this combination against him might have produced, cannot now be known; death removed him from the scene of strife a.d. 490, shortly before the death of Zeno. He was succeeded in the see of Alexandria by another Monophysite, Athanasius II. (Evagrius, H. E. iii. 11—23; Brevisculus Historiae Eutychianistarum s. Gesta de Nomine Acacii, apud Concilia, vol. iv. col. 1079, ed. Labbe ; Liberianus, Breviarium, c. 15—18; Theophanes, Chronographia, pp. 107—115, ed. Paris, pp. 86—92, ed. 23. Of Nicomedea. Of the prelates, who with certain deacons and monks had to clear themselves in the third Constantinopolitan or sixth oecumenical council (a.d. 680), from the suspicion of holding the Monothelite heresy, the leader was Peter, metropolitan of Nicomedea. Peter and his companions appeared before the council, and delivered to them, upon oath, solemn written confessions of their belief in the orthodox doctrine of two wills in Christ; the confessions were of considerable length, and all exactly alike, and are given in the original Greek with a considerable hiatus, but completely in a Latin version in the Acta Concilii Octobritani III., Acta x.; or according to one of the Latin versions of the Acta given by Hardouin, in Acta ix. (Concilia, vol. vi. col. 784, 842, ed. Labbe, vol. iii. col. 1202, 1248, 1537, 1561, ed. Hardouin; Cave, Hist. Lit. ad ann. 600, vol. i. p. 589.)

24. Orator. [No. 25.]

25. Patricius et Magister, a Byzantine historian of the sixth century. He was born at Thessalonica (Procop. De Bell. Gotthic. i. 3), in the province of Macedonia, then included in the prae- terior province of Illyricum, on which account he is said to have been "an Illyrian." (Procop. I. c.) Peter settled at Constantinople, where he acquired distinction as a rhetor or advocate, a profession for which his cultivated mind, agreeable address, and natural powers of persuasion, were admirably adapted. These qualifications pointed him out to the discernment of the emperor Justinian I. as suited for diplomatic life, and he was sent by him (a.d. 534) as ambassador to Amalasuntha, regent, and Theodatus, one of the chieftains of the Ostrogoths in Italy. On his way, at Aulon, near the entrance of the Adriatic, on the coast of Epirus, or perhaps before his arrival there, Peter heard of the death of Atha- lacus, the young Ostrogothic king, of the marriage of Amalasuntha and Theodatus and their exaltation to the throne of Italy, and of their subsequent dissensions and the imprisonment of Amalasuntha. He con- sequently despatched intelligence of these important events to the emperor, while he himself waited at Aulon for further instructions. Justinian, without delay, undertook to vindicate the cause of the imprisoned queen, and directed Peter to declare his purpose openly to Theodatus. Peter immediately proceeded (a.d. 535), to Italy; but his arrival was speedily followed by the murder of Amalasuntha, an event extremely opportune for the ambitious views of Justinian, who, through Peter, immediately declared war against the Ostrogoths, on account of the queen's death. Such is the account given in the Annals of Peter by Procopius (ibid. c. 4); but he else- where (Hist. Arcana, c. 16) explains that he was instigating Theodatus to commit the murder, being secretly commissioned to do so by the jealousy of Theodorum, Justinian's wife, who held out to him, as an inducement to comply with her desire, the hope of great advancement. The baseness of Theodatus was alarmed by the declaration of war, and by the successes of Belisarius, who rapidly conquered Sicily; and he negotiated with Peter, who had not yet quitted Ravenna, a peace by which he ceded Sicily to Justinian, engaged to pay a yearly tribute in money, and to furnish him yearly with a body of Ostrogothic soldiers; he consented also to restrict the exercise of his own power within very narrow limits, and to exercise it under the supremacy of Justinian. He at the same time commissioned Peter, in case the emperor should reject these terms, to promise an unconditional abdication; binding him, however, by oath not to reveal this second offer, unless the em- peror should have previously rejected the first. Peter returned to Byzantium: the first offer was rejected, and the second then divulged and accepted; and Peter with another ambassador, Atha- nasius, was sent back to Italy to complete the arrangement. But Theodatus meanwhile, encour- aged by some disasters which the Byzantine forces had sustained in Dalmatia, had changed his mind: he not only refused to fulfil his promise of sub- mission, but violated the law of nations by impris- oning the ambassadors. (Ibid. De Bell. Gotthic., i. 6—8.) Peter and his colleague remained in captivity until Belisarius, by detaining some Ostro- gothic ambassadors, compelled Vitiges, who had suc- ceeded Theodatus, to release them about the end of a.d. 543, (Ibid. ii. 22.) On his return, Peter re- ceived, as Procopius (Hist. Arcan., c. 16) intimates, by Theodora's interest, and as a reward for his partici- pation in procuring Amalasuntha's death, the high appointment of magister officiorum, but incurred, according to the same authority, general odium by the part he had acted. He exercised his au- thority with the most unbridled rapacity; for al- though he was, according to Procopius, naturally of a mild temper, and by no means insolent, he was at the same time the most dishonest of all mankind, κλειστοπατος ηι δημοσιων ανδάτων. (Ibid. c. 24.)

Several years afterwards (about a.d. 550), Pe- ter, who retained his post of magister officiorum, and had in addition acquired the dignity of patri- cian (a dignity which Niebuhr not inaptly com- pares to that of privy councillor in England), was sent by Justinian to negotiate a peace with Chos- roes I. king of Persia; but Chosroes, who did not desire peace, dismissed him, with a promise of sending an ambassador of his own to Constanti- nople to effect the proposed arrangement. Shortly afterwards (a.d. 551 or 552) Peter was engaged in some negotiations with Pope Vigilius, then at Chalcedon: at this time he possessed, in addition to his other honours, the dignity of ex-consil or consol codicilarius, and the office of referendarius. (Vigil. Papa, Epistola ad Universam Eccles. apud Concilia, vol. iii. col. 3. ed. Hardouin.) In A.D. 502 Peter was again sent to arrange the terms of a peace with Chosroes; and meeting Zichus, the Persian commissioner at or near Das in Mesopotamia, and afterwards proceeding to the court of Persia to negotiate with Chosroes himself, succeeded in concluding a treaty. Menander, who has narrated the affair at length (Excerpta de Legationibus, pp. 133—147, ed. Paris, pp. 89—99, ed. Venice, pp. 346—373, ed. Bonn), has given at some length several of the speeches of Peter during the negotiation. Peter died shortly after. (Menander, id.) Some suppose he is the Petrus Rheter mentioned in an Epigramma (No. xvii.) of Leontius in the Anthologia (vol. iii. p. 107, ed. Brunck, vol. iv. p. 77, ed. Jacob), as killed by the falling of a theatre. He left a son named Theodore, who, successively held the offices of magister officiorum and "comes ingatitionum," and was sent by the emperor Justin II. (A. D. 576) on an embassy to Chosroes. (Menander apud Excerpta, p. 130, ed. Paris, p. 80, ed. Venice, p. 319, ed. Bonn, cum nota Valensi.) Peter was held in high esteem in his own day. Niebuhr has collected various testimonies of his reputation from Byzantine authors.

Suidas, who has two articles on Peter (Πέτρος ἀπὸ Πήρου and Πέτρος simply) ascribes to him two works. 1. Ιστορία, Histoires, and 2. Πελ Πολυτεχνος κατασκευας, De Statu (or De Constitutione) Reipublicae. Of the Historiae considerable portions are preserved in the Excerpta de Legationibus, made by order of the emperor Constantine Porphyrogenitus. [Constantinus VII.; Paisscus.] The earliest extract relates to the time of the emperor Tiberus I., the latest to the transactions of the Caesar Julian, afterwards emperor, in Gaul in the reign of Constantius II. From the date of these extracts and a short fragment, subjoined to the Excerpta in the Bonn edition, Niebuhr infers that the Historiae began with Augustus, or rather with the second triumvirate, and continued to a period a little later than the time of Constantine the Great, where the Historia of Eunapius [Eunapius] became more full. Niebuhr conjectures that Peter epitomized the Historia of Dion Cassius as far as that work extended. The De Statu Reipublicae is conjectured by Angelo Mai to be the anonymous work composed in the form of a dialogue between the patriotic Menas and the referendarius Thomas Πελ Πολυτεχνος, De Re publica, briefly analysed by Photius (Biblioth. Cod. 37), and of which Mai considered large fragments, deciphered in a palimpsest, and published by himself under the title Πελ Πολυτεχνος Περιτοινος, De Scientia Politeia, in his Scriptorum Veterum Novae Collectio, vol. ii. pp. 590, &c. to be a part. But if the work mentioned by Suidas be, as is most likely, that in which Peter defined the duties of a magister officiorum, as noticed by Joannes Lydus (De Magistratibus, ii. 25., 29), and from which considerable portions (lib. i. c. 84, 85, certainly, and c. 86—95, probably) of the work of Constantine Porphyrogenitus De Caeremoniis Aulae Byzantinae are taken, it must have been a different kind of work from that described by Photius. It is not ascertained in which of his works Peter published the account of his negotiations with Chosroes, whether in one of those mentioned by Suidas, or in some other work not mentioned. Menander, who cites the work (apud Excerpta, p. 429, ed Bonn), describes it as η τοι αυτον Πέτρου συναγωγή, Epitome Petri Collectio, a title somewhat indefinite, but which seems to indicate a different work from either of those mentioned by Suidas. The accounts could not have been given in the Historiae, unless this came down to a much later period than Niebuhr supposes; but it may have formed part of the De Reipublicae Statu, if we suppose a part of that work to have been devoted to defining and illustrating the duty of ambassadors. All the remains of Peter are given in the Bonn edition of the Excerpta de Legationibus, and the valuable preface disseration by Niebuhr, De Historiae quorum Reipublricae hoc Volumine continetur, has been our chief guide in this article. (Compare Reiske's Praefatio, c. ii. to the work of Constantine Porphyrogenitus De Caeremoniis, the dissertation by Mai, De Fragmentis Politicae Petri Magistri, in the volume already cited of his Scriptorum Veterum Novae Collectio, pp. 571, &c.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 135, vol. vii. p. 538, vol. viii. p. 39; and Vossius, De Historiae Graecae, lib. ii. c. 22.)

26. Patricius, a Greek saint, who lived early in the ninth century, and of whom a life, taken from the Menoae of the Greeks, is given in the original Greek, with a Latin version, and a Commentarius Praeaeus by Joannes Pinius in the Acta Sanctorum, Julii (vol. i. pp. 289, 290). This Petrus had fought in the battle (A. D. 811) against the Bulgarians, in which the emperor Nicephorus I. was defeated and slain.

27. Patricius, a Greek different from the foregoing, and belonging to a somewhat later period. He presented to the emperor Leo VI. Sapientis [Leo VI.], who, began to reign A. D. 866, a copy of Theodoret's Curatio Grecorum Adfexionem, to which he prefixed an Epigramma, which is printed at length by Lambeus in his Commentarius in Biblioth. Caesareanae, vol. a. lib. iv. col. 393, &c., ed. Kollar. (Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. xi. p. 338.)

28. Of Ravenna. [No. 10.]

29. Rheter. [No. 25.]

30. Of Sebastus, an ecclesiastic of the fourth century. He was the youngest of the ten children of Basil and Eunomia, wealthy and excellent persons of Caesarea in Cappadocia, who had the happiness of numbering among their children those eminent fathers of the church, Basil the Great [Basilii, No. 2], and Gregory of Nyssa [Gregorius Nyssenus, St.]. Peter was born, according to Tillemont's calculation, before A. D. 349, and almost immediately before his father's death. His early education was conducted by his sister St. Macrina, who, in the emphatic phrase of Gregory of Nyssa, "was everything to him, father, teacher, attendant (πανδιδακτη), and mother." The quickness of the boy enabled him readily to acquire anything to which his attention was directed; but his education appears to have been conducted on a very narrow system; profane learning was disregarded; and the praise given him by his brother Gregory that he attained, even in boyhood, to the heights of philosophy, must be taken with the limitation which such a restrictive system would necessarily imply. If, however, his literary culture was thus narrowed, his morals were preserved pure; and if he fell short of his more eminent brothers in variety of attainments, he equalled them in holiness of life. The place of his education appears to have been a monastery at Amnis or Amessa on the river Iris, in Pontus, established by his mother and sister; and with them, or in the monastery which his brother Basil had established on the other side of the river, much of his life was passed. In a season of scarcity (A.D. 367, 368?) such was his benevolent exertion to provide for the destitute, that they flocked to him from all parts, and gave to the thinly-peopled neighbourhood in which he resided the appearance of a populous town. He had the satisfaction of being present with his sister at his mother's death-bed, and received her dying benediction. Her death appears to have occurred about the time of Basil's elevation to the bishopric of the Cappadocian Caesarea, about A.D. 370: soon after which, apparently, Peter received from Basil ordination to the office of presbyter, probably of the church of Cæsarea; for Basil appears to have employed his brother Peter as a confidential agent in some affair. (Basil. Maritinitus Episcopis Epistola Ixxxvi. edit. vett., exil. edit. Benedictin.) Peter, however, retained a house, which Basil describes as near Neo-caesarea (Basil. Meleto Epistola ccxxvi. edit. vett., ccxvi. edit. Benedictin), but which was probably at or near Amessa, where he had been brought up, and where his sister Macrina still resided. It was probably after the death both of Basil and Macrina, about the year 380, that Tillemont judges, that Peter was raised to the bishopric of Sebaste, (now Siwâs) in the Lesser Armenia. A passage of Theodoret (H. E. iv. 30) has been thought to imply that he was raised to the episcopate during the reign of Valens, which terminated in A.D. 378; but the passage only implies that he took an active part in the struggle carried on during that reign by the bishops of the orthodox party against Arius, which he might very well do, though not himself a bishop. His elevation preceded the second great council, that of Constantinople, A.D. 380-381, in which he took part. (Theodoret, H. E. v. 8.) In what year he died is not known: but it was probably after A.D. 391; and certainly before the death of his brother, Gregory of Nyssa (who survived till A.D. 394, or later), for Gregory was present at Sebaste at the first celebration of his brother's memory, i.e. the anniversary of his death, which occurred in hot weather, and therefore could not have been in January or March, where the martyrlogies place it. (Greg. Nyssen, Epist. ad Flavian. Opera, vol. ii. p. 645, &c. ed. Paris, 1638.)

The only extant writing of Peter is a letter prefixed to the Contra Eunomium Libri of Gregory of Nyssa, and published with the works of that father. It is entitled Τοῦ ἐν Ἑλεώσει ἑρμοῦ Πετροῦ Ἐπισκόπου Σωτηρίου ἔπιστολα πρὸς τὸν ἀγάμον Γρηγόριον Νησαὶ τῶν αὐτοῦ ἔκδοτῶν, Sancti Patris nostri Petri Epsicopi Socratini ad S. Gregorium Nyssenum fratrem suam Epistolā. Peter does not appear to have been ambitious of authorship, and probably felt the disqualification arising from his restricted education. Some of the works of his brother Gregory were, however, written at his desire, such as the above-mentioned treatises against Eunomius and the Expositio Apologetica in Hæcæmeron. The De Hominis Opificio is also addressed to him by Gregory, who, both in this treatise and in the Expositio in Hæcæmeron, speaks of him in the highest terms. A work extant in Arabic, bearing the title of Demonstratio, cited by Abrahām Echeillens (Emynth. Vindic. Pars ii. p. 486, and Not. ad Catalog. Hebeliæus, p. 51), is ascribed to the three brothers, Basil, Gregory, and Peter; but its genuineness is, to say the least, very doubtful. (Greg. Nyssen. De Vita S. Marcinæ; Basil. ii. cc.; Theodoret, ii. cc.; Tillemont, Mémoires, vol. ix. p. 572, &c.; Le Quien, Orients Christianus, vol. i. col. 424; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 370, vol. i. p. 246.)

31. SICULUS. [No. 7.]

PEUCETIAS. (Πεουκήτας.) 1. Son of Macartatus, a Macedonian officer in the service of Alexander, who was appointed by the king to command the troops left in Egypt, n. c. 331. (Arr. Abab. iii. 5; § 6; Curt. iv. 8; § 4.)

2. Son of Alexander, a native of the town of Mieza, in Macedonia, was a distinguished officer in the service of Alexander the Great. His name is first mentioned when he appears as a high officer in command over a trireme on the Hydaspes. (Arr. Ind. 18.)

Previous to this we do not find him holding any command of importance; but it is evident that he must have distinguished himself for his personal valour and prowess, as he was the person selected by Alexander to carry before him in battle the sacred shield, which he had taken down from the temple of Athena at Ilium. In this capacity he was in close attendance upon the king's person in the assault on the capital city of the Malli; and all authors agreed in attributing the chief share in saving the life of Alexander upon that occasion to Peucetias, while they differed as to almost all the other circumstances and persons concerned (Arr. Abab. vi. 9, 10, 11; Plut. Alex. 63; Diod. xvii. 99; Curt. ix. 5; § 14). For his services on this occasion he was rewarded by the king with almost every distinction which it was in his power to confer. On the arrival of Alexander at Persepolis, he bestowed upon Peucetias the important station of Persis, but, previous to this, he had already raised him to the rank of somatophylax, an honour rendered the more conspicuous in this instance by the number of those select officers being augmented on purpose to make room for his admission. At Susa, also, Peucetias was the first of those rewarded with crowns of gold for their past exploits (Arr. ib. vi. 28, 30, viii. 5). After this he proceeded to take possession of his government, where he conciliated the favour of the Persians subject to his rule, as well as that of Alexander himself, by adopting the Persian dress and customs, in exchange for those of Macedonia. (Id. vi. 30, viii. 6; Diod. xix. 14.)

In the spring of n. c. 323, Peucetias joined the king at Babylon, with an army of 20,000 Persian troops; and is mentioned as one of those in attendance upon him during his last illness. It does not appear that he took any leading part in the discussions that ensued upon the death of Alexander, but in the division of the provinces that followed, he obtained the renewal of his government of Persis, which he also retained in the second partition at Tripolédeus, n. c. 321 (Arr. Abab. vii. 23, 24, 26, ap. Phot. p. 69, b. 71, b.; Diod. xvii. 110, xviii. 3, 39; Dexipp. ap. Phot. p. 64, b.; Justin. xiii. 4). All his attention seems to have been directed to the strengthening himself in this position, and extending his power and influence as far as possible; in which he so far succeeded, that when he was at length compelled to take an active part in the war between Antigonus and Eumenes (B.C. 317), he obtained by common consent the chief command of all the forces furnished by the satrapies east of the Tigris; and was with difficulty induced to waive his pretensions to the supreme direction of the war. Eumenes, however, by his dexterous management, soothed the irritation of Peucetas, and retained him firmly in his alliance throughout the two campaigns that followed. The satrap was contented to gratify his pride by feasting the whole of the armies assembled in Persia on a scale of royal magnificence, while Eumenes virtually directed all the operations of the war. But the disaster in the final action near Gadamara (B.C. 310) which led to the capture of the baggage, and the surrender of Eumenes by the Argyraspids [EUMENES], appears to have been clearly owing to the misconduct and insubordination of Peucetas, who, according to one account, was himself one of the chief advisers of the disgraceful treaty. His conduct throughout these campaigns shows that he wanted both the ability to command for himself, and the moderation to follow the superior judgment of others. His vain and ambitious character seems to have been appreciated at its just value by Antigonus, who, while he deprived him of his satrapy, and led him away a virtual prisoner, elated him with false hopes and specious promises, which, of course, were never fulfilled. (Diod. xix. 14, 15, 17—24, 37, 38, 43, 48; Plut. Eumenes 14—16; Polyena. iv. 6 § 13, 8 § 3.)

EUMENES (Πευκέτιος), one of the sons of Lycon, is said to have led, in conjunction with his brother Oenetres, an Arcadian colony into Italy, where they landed near the Iapygian promontory. (Dionys. Hal. i. 11; Apollod. iii. 8.[L. S.])

PHACRASES (Φαιράσης). Several persons of this name are enumerated by Fabricius (Bibl. Græc. vol. xi. p. 707). Of these the principal are:

1. JOANNES, logotheta (clerk of accounts) under the Emperor Andronicus senior, was promoted to be magnum logotheta (Cancellarius, according to Du Cange, s. e.), under Michael senior Philaeogus. He was a correspondent of Gregory of Cyprus and Maximus Planudes. His praises are celebrated, and allusions to his progress in court distinction contained, in some Greek verses, published in the old edition of Fabricius (Bibl. Græc. vol. x. p. 542). He lived towards the close of the thirteenth century.

2. GEORGIUS, Protokontron (master of the horse, Marescullus, Ducange) under Joannes Cantacuzenus, a. d. 1344.

3. MATTHAIUS, bishop of Sera, about a.d. 1401. He was a correspondent of Isidorus, metropolitan of Thessalonica. [W. M. G.]

PHAEAX (Φαιάς), the name of the sow of Crommyon, which ravaged the neighbourhood, and was slain by Theseus. (Plut. These. 9; Plut. Lach. p. 196, e.; Menip. Suppil. 316.)

PHAEAX (Φαιάς), a son of Poseidon and Cer- cyra, from whom the Phaeacians derived their name. (Diod. iv. 72; Steph. Byz. s. v. Φαιάς) Conon (Narrat. 3) calls him the father of Alcinous and Locrus. [L. S.]

PHAEAX (Φαιάς), an Athenian orator and statesman. He was of good family, being the son of Etrinius. The date of his birth is not known, but he was a contemporary of Nicias and Alcibiades. Plutarch (Alecib. 13) says, that he and Nicias were the only rivals from whom Alcibiades had any thing to fear when he entered upon public life. Phaeax, like Alcibiades, was at the time just rising to distinction. In B.C. 422 Phaeax with two others was sent as an ambassador to Italy and Sicily, to endeavour to induce the allies of the Athenians in that quarter and the other Siceliots to aid the Leontines against the Syracusans. He succeeded with Camarina and Agrigentum, but his failure at Gela led him to abandon the attempt as hopeless. In his way back he did some service to the Athenian cause among the states of Italy, (Thucyd. v. 4, 5.) According to Theophrastus (ap. Plut.) it was Phaeax, and not Nicias, with whom Alcibiades united for the purpose of ostracising Hyperbolus. Most authorities, however, affirmed that it was Nicias. (Plut. l. c. Nic. 11, Arist. 7.) In the Lives of the Ten Orators (Andoc.) there is mention of a contest between Phaeax and Andocides, and a defence of the latter against the former. It is difficult to say to what period this could have referred. Andocides did not come into notice till after the affair of the mutilation of the Hermee.

Phaeax was of engaging manners, but had no great abilities as a speaker. According to Eupolis (ap. Plut. Alecib. 13) he was a fluent talker, but quite unable to speak. (Comp. A. Galli, N. A. i. 15.) Aristophanes gives a description of his style of speaking (Euplit. 1377, &c.), from which we also gather, that on one occasion, he was brought to trial for some capital offence (ετος ανδοφάσις κουόκεως, Schol.) and acquitted.

There has been a good deal of controversy respecting the speech against Alcibiades, commonly attributed to Andocides, which Taylor maintained to be the production of Phaeax. Plutarch (Alecib. 13), according to the opinion of most editors, speaks of an oration against Alcibiades, reported to be the production of Phaeax. It seems not unlikely that he refers to the very oration which is extant, the passage which he quotes (though not quite accurately) being found in the speech in question, which could not have been written by Andocides, as the author speaks of the rival claim of himself, Nicolaid, and Alcibiades being decided by ostracism. There are, however, strong reasons for believing that it is the production of some rhetorical writing in the name of Phaeax. The style does not at all resemble what the notice in Aristophanes would lead us to expect; and the writer betrays himself by various inaccuracies. If then the speech was written as if by Phaeax, and reliance can be placed on the biographical notices in it (which are in part at least borne out by good authorities), Phaeax was four times put upon his trial for life, and each time was acquitted (§ 8, 36. Comp. Aristoph. l. c.), and was sent as ambassador to Thessaly, Macedonia, Molossia, and Thessopia, besides Sicily and Italy, and had gained various prizes, for example, with the tragic choral of the torch race, &c. (Taylor, Lect. Lyco. c. 6; Valvekener, Advers. ap. Sluieter, Lect. Andoc. p. 17—26; Ruhnken, Hist. Crit. Orat. Gr. Opusc. p. 321, &c.; Becker, Andokides, p. 13, &c., 85—108); and especially Meier, Comment. de Andocidēs quae velox fortis oratione contra Alcibiadem. (C. P. M.) 4 3 PHAEDON.

PHAEDON (φαίδων), a celebrated architect of Agrigentum, who flourished about Ol. 75, B.c. 480, and executed several important works for his native city. Among the most remarkable of these works were the sewers (αἰγυπτια), which were named, after the architect, φαίδων. (Diod. xi. 26.)

PHAIDIMUS (φαίδημος), a Persian lady, daughter of Otanes, was one of the wives of Cambyses and of Smerdis the Magian. Instigated by her father, she discovered one night, while he was asleep, that Smerdis had lost his ears; and thus she confirmed the suspicion of Otanes, that he was not as he pretended to be, Smerdis, the son of Cyrus. (Her. iii. 68, 69.) [ΟΤΑΝΕΣ.]

PHAEDIMUS (φαίδημος), the name of two different personages, the one a son of Amphion and Niobe (Apollod. iii. 5. § 6), and the other a king of the Sidonians, who hospitably received Melanias on his return from Troy. (Hom. Od. xv. 117.)

PHAEDIMUS (φαίδημος), was one of the Thirty Tyrants, according to the common reading of a passage in Demetrius (de Fals. p. 402.). This name was given by Xenophanes (Hell. ii. 3. § 2), is Phaedrias.

PHAEDIMUS (φαίδημος), an epigrammatic poet, four of whose epigrams are contained in the Greek Anthology (Bruck, Anal. vol. i. p. 261; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. i. p. 192.). He lived earlier than Meleager, in whose Garland his verses had a place (v. 52). We learn from Stephanus that he was a native of Bisanthe in Macedonia, or, according to others, of Amastris or Cromna, in Paphalagonia. (Steeph. Byz. s. v. Βαρδάθη.) One of his epigrams is inscribed Βασαρίνος in the Palatine and Planudean Anthologies. He also perhaps wrote an epic poem entitled Ηρατεία, for Athenaeus (xi. p. 498, ε.) quotes an hexameter line from Phaeidimus, ἐν πρώτῳ Παραλήψις. (Schweigh. ad loc.) [P. S.]

PHAEDON (φαίδων), a Greek philosopher of some celebrity. He was a native of Elis, and of high birth, his father was then prisoner in his youth, and passed into the hands of an Athenian slave dealer; and being of considerable personal beauty (Plat. Phaed. c. 38) was compelled to prostitute himself. (Diog. Laér. ii. 105; Suid. s. v. Φαίδων; A. Gellius, N. A. ii. 18.) The occasion on which he was taken prisoner was no doubt the war between Sparta and Elis, in which the Laecacemnians were joined by the Athenians, which was carried on in the years B.C. 401, 400. (Clinton, s.a.) The reading οἴδαω in Suidas is of course an error. The later date assigned for the war by Kruger and others is manifestly erroneous. (See Clinton, Pasti Hellen. vol. ii. p. 220, ed. 3.) So that it would be in the summer of B.C. 400 that Phaedon was brought to Athens. A year would thus remain for his acquaintance with Socrates, to whom he attached himself. According to Diogenes Laertius (i. 44.) he ran away from his master to Socrates, and was ransomed by one of the friends of the latter. Suidas says, that he was accidentally present at a conversation with Socrates, and besought him to effect his liberation. Various accounts mentioned Alkibiades, Criton, or Cebes, as the person who ransomed him. (Diog. Laér. ii. 105; Suid.; A. Gell. l.c.) Alkibiades, however, was not at Athens at the time. Cebes is stated to have been on terms of intimate friendship with Phaedon, and to have instructed him in philosophy. Phaedon was present at the death of Socrates, while he was still quite a youth. From the mention of his long hair (Plat. l.c.) it would seem that he was not eighteen years of age at the time, and at that age it was customary to cease wearing the hair long. (Becker, Charicles, ii. p. 382.) That Phaedon was on terms of friendship with Plato appears likely from the mode in which he is introduced in the dialogue which takes its name from him. Other stories that were current in the schools spoke of their relation as being that of enmity rather than friendship. (Athen. xi. pp. 505, 507, ε.) In the former passage Athenaeus says, that neither Gorgias nor Phaedon would acknowledge the least of what Plato attributed to them in the dialogues that bore their names. Several philosophers were ungenerous enough to reproach Phaedon with his previous condition, as Hieronymus (Diog. Laér. l.c.), and Epicurus (Cic. de Nat. Deor. l. 33, § 93). Besides Plato AESCHINES named one of his dialogues after Phaedon. (Suid. s. v. Αλεξίνης.)

Phaedon appears to have lived in Athens some time after the death of Socrates. He then returned to Elis, where he became the founder of a school of philosophy. Anchiphylus and Moschus are mentioned among his disciples. (Diog. Laér. ii. 126.) He was succeeded by Pleistanus (Diog. Laér. ii. 105), after whom the Eleian school was merged in the Eretrian. [ΜΕΝΕΔΕΜΟΣ.] Of the doctrines of Phaedon nothing is known, except as they made their appearance in the philosophy of Menedemos. Nothing can safely be inferred respecting them from the Phaedon of Plato. None of Phaedon's writings have come down to us. They were in the form of dialogues. There was some doubt in antiquity as to which were genuine, and which were not. Panaetius attempted a critical separation of the two classes (Diog. Laér. ii. 64); and the Ζωντος and the Ημέρως were acknowledged to be genuine. Besides these Diogenes Laertius (ii. 105) mentions as of doubtful authenticity the Νικιάς, Μεδός, Ἀρτεμισιός ἐρετικός, and Χαρίκλης, mention of which mentions the Σίμιος, Αλκαθίδης, and Κροτανός. It was probably from the Zopyrus that the incident alluded to by Cicero (de Fato, 5. Tusc. Disp. iv. 37, § 80), Maximus Tyr. (xxxii. 3), and others, was derived. Seneca (Ep. 94. 41) has a translation of a short passage from one of his pieces. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. ii. p. 717; Schüll, Gesch. der Griech. Lit. vol. i. p. 475; Prollier in Ersch and Gruber's Encycl.) [C. P. M.]

PHAEDRA (φαίδρα), a daughter of Minos by Pasiphaë or Crete, and the wife of Theseus. (Apollod. iii. 1. § 2.) She was the stepmother of Hippolytus, the son of Theseus, by Antiope or Hippolyte, and having fallen in love with him he repulsed her, whereupon she calumniated him before Theseus. After the death of Hippolytus, his innocence became known to his father, and Phaedra made away with herself. (Hom. Od. xi. 323; Eurip. Hippol.; compare THESEUS and HIPPOLYTUS.) [L. S.]

PHAEDRIS (φαίδρις), is mentioned by Xenophanes (Hell. ii. 3. § 2), as one of the Thirty Tyrants. [PHAERIDUS.]

[Ε. Ε.]

PHAEDRUS (φαίδρος). 1. An Athenian, the son of Pythocles, of the deme Myrrhinus (Plat. Phaedr. p. 244). He was a friend of Plato (Diog. Laér. iii. 29), by whom he is introduced in the PHAEDRUS.

Phaedrus and the Convivium. It appears from these that he was a great admirer of Lyais and the other rhetoricians of his age. (Fabric. *Bibl. Graec. * vol. ii. p. 717.)

2. An Epicurean philosopher, a contemporary of Cicero, who became acquainted with him in his youth at Rome (Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 1 § 2). During his residence in Athens (n. c. 80) Cicero renewed his acquaintance with him. Phaedrus was at that time an old man, and was the president of the Epicurean school (Cic. Phil. v. § 15, de Nat. Deor. i. 33, § 93, de Fin. i. 5 § 16). He was also on terms of friendship with Velleius, whom Cicero introduces as the defender of the Epicurean tenets in the De Nat. Deor. i. 24, § 56; comp. Madvig. ad Cic. de Fin. p. 35, and especially with Atticus (Cic. de Fin. i. 5 § 16, v. 1 § 3, &c.). He occupied the position of head of the Epicurean school till n. c. 70 (Phot. Cod. 97, p. 84, ed. Bekker), and was succeeded by Patron (Patron). Cicero especially praises his agreeable manners. He had a son named Lysiadas.

Cicero (ad Att. xiii. 39) mentions, according to the common reading, two treatises by Phaedrus, Φαίδρου περισσοῦ et Ελλάδος. The first title is corrected on MS. authority to Πεπρώεων. Some critics (as Peteraeus) suppose that only one treatise is spoken of, Πεπρώεων καὶ Παλλάδος. Others (among whom is Orelli, Onom. Tull. s. v. Phaedrus) adopt the reading Ελλάδος, or at least suppose that two treatises are spoken of. An interesting fragment of the former work was discovered at Heracleum in 1806, and was first published, though not recognised as the work of Phaedrus, in a work entitled Heracleum选址, or Archaeological and Philological Dissertations; containing a Manuscript found among the ruins of Heracleum, London, 1810. A better edition was published by Petersen (Phaedri Epicurei, vulgo Anonymi Heracleum选址, de Nat. Deor. Fragmenta; Hamb. 1833). Cicero was largely indebted to this work of Phaedrus for the materials of the first book of the De Natura Deorum. Not only is the development of the Epicurean doctrine (c. 16, &c.) taken from it, but the erudite account of the doctrines of earlier philosophers put in the mouth of Velleius, is a mere translation from Phaedrus. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. iii. p. 608; Kriische, Forschungen aus dem Gebiete der alten Phil. vol. i. p. 27, &c.; Preller, in Ersh and Gruber's Eucharistia. [C. P. M.]

PHAEON.

Phaedon. This prologue also adds that the object was to amuse and to instruct. The prologue to the second book intimates a somewhat freer handling of the old fabulist's material. In the prologue to the third book he still refers to Aesop as his model:—

"Librum exarabo tertium Aesopum isto.

There is no prologue to the fourth book; and in the prologue to the fifth book he intimates that he had often used the name of Aesop only to recommend his verses. Accordingly, many of the fables of Phaedrus are not Aesopian, as the matter clearly shows, for they refer to historical events of a much later period (v. i, 8, iii. 10). Many of the fables, however, are transusions of the Aesopian fables, or those which pass as such, into Latin verse. The expression is generally clear and concise, and the language, with some few exceptions, as purely and correct as we should expect from a Roman writer of the Augustan age. But Phaedrus has not eschewed censure, when he has deviated from his Greek model, and much of the censure is just. The best fables are those in which he has kept the closest to his original.

The MSS. of Phaedros are rare, which circumstance, combined with a passage of Seneca (Consol. ad Felig. 27), "that fable-writing had not been attempted by the Romans," and an expression of N. Perotti, has led some critics to doubt their genuineness, and even to ascribe them to Perotti; an opinion, however, which Perotti's own attempts at verse-making completely disprove.

Another collection of thirty-two fables, attributed to Aesop, has been published from a MS. of the same N. Perotti, who was archbishop of Manfredonia in the middle part of the fifteenth century. This collection is entitled Epitome Fabularum, and was first published at Naples, in 1809, by Cassitti. Opinions are much divided as to the genuineness of this collection. The probability is, that the Epitome is founded on genuine Roman fables, which, in the process of transcription during many centuries, have undergone considerable changes.

The first edition of the five books of fables of Phaedrus was by P. Pithon, 1596, 12mo., which was from a MS, that is supposed to belong to the tenth century. The last and only critical edition of the fables is by J. C. Orelli, Zürich, 1831, 8vo., which contains the Artes of Caesar Germanicus. Orelli has not always displayed judgment in his choice of the readings. The last edition of the thirty-two new fables is entitled Phaidri Fabulæ Novæ XXXXXII. e codice Vaticanō redintegratae ab Angelo Maiō. Supplementum Editionis Orellianæ. Accedit Pudī Civili Codd. Basili. et Turī. antiquis... cum Sententia circae XXX. nunc primum edita, Zürich, 1832. [G. L.]

PHAEDON. (Φαίδων). A treatise on the right management of dogs (κυνοφόρου), was published without the name of the author, by Nicolaus Ruggiliaus, Paris, 1619, in a collection bearing the title, De Iro Acciprariar et Venaticar. But it had been published in Greek and Latin, under the name of Phaemon Philosphus, by Andrew Goldschmidt, at Wittenberg, in 1545. It was afterwards re-edited by Rivinus, Leipzig, 1654. (Fabric. Bibli. Grac. vol. i. p. 211.) [W. M. G.] PHAENA'TETE. [Socrates].

PHAENO'NEAS (φανεάς), an Aetolian of high rank, who held the office of prmetor of the Aetolian league in a. c. 198, and was present at the conference between Flamininus and Philip at the Malian gulf, on which occasion he distinguished himself by the vehemence of his opposition to the demands of the Macedonian king. (Polyb. xvii. 1, 3, 4; Liv. xxxii. 32, 33, 34.) Early in the ensuing spring (a. c. 197) he joined Flamininus with the Aetolian contingent, and appears to have rendered important services in the campaign that followed (Liv. xxxiii. 3, 6, 7). But in the conference that was again held between the Roman general and Philip, for the settlement of the terms of peace, after the decisive battle of Cynoscephalae, Phaenæas gave great offence to Flamininus by the pertinacity with which he insisted on the restitution to the Aetolians of certain cities in Thessaly, and the dispute between them on this occasion is regarded by Polybius as the first origin of the war that subsequently broke out between the Romans and Aetolians (Polyb. xviii. 20—22; Liv. xxxiii. 13). In a. c. 193, when Antiochus landed in Greece, Phaenæas was again prætor, and in that capacity was one of those who introduced the king into the assembly of the Aetolians at Lamia. But in the discussions that ensued he took the lead of the more moderate party, and opposed, though unsuccessfully, the warlike counsels of Thoas and his adherents (Liv. xxxiv. 44, 45). Though he was overruled at this period, the unfavourable turn of affairs soon induced the Aetolians to listen to more pacific counsels, and, after the fall of Heraclea, b. c. 191, an embassy was despatched, at the head of which was Phaenæas himself, to bear the submission of the nation to the Roman general M. Aelius Glabrio. But the exiguous demands of the latter and his arrogant demeanour towards the ambassadors themselves, broke off all prospect of reconciliation, and the war was continued, though the Roman arms were for a time diverted against Antiochus. In a. c. 190, Phaenæas was again sent as ambassador to Rome to sue for peace, but both he and his colleagues fell into the hands of the Epeirotes, and were compelled to pay a heavy ransom to redeem themselves from captivity. Meanwhile, the arrival of the consul M. Fulvius put an end to all hopes of peace. But during the siege of Ambraia, b. c. 189, the Aetolians determined to make one more effort, and Phaenæas and Damoteles were sent to the Roman consuls, with powers to conclude peace on almost any terms. This they ultimately obtained, through the intervention of the Athenians and Rhodians, and the favour of C. Valerius Laevinus, upon more moderate conditions than they could have dared to hope for. Phaenæas now hastened to Rome to obtain the ratification of this treaty, which was, after some hesitation, granted by the senate on nearly the same terms as those dictated by Fulvius. (Polyb. xx. 9, 10, xxxii. 3, 9, 12—14, 15; Liv. xxxvi. 28, 29, 35, xxxviii. 8—11.) [E. B. B.]

PHAEN'Nias. [Phænias].

PHAENIPPUS (φαήνιππος), an Athenian, the son of Callippus, and adopted son of Philostratus. A speech against him, composed for a suit in a case of Antidosis (Dict. of Aut. art. Antidosis), is found among those of Demosthenes (p. 1037, &c. ed. Reiske). [C. P. M.]

PHAENN a (φαήνα), one of the Charites. (Pans. iii. 18, § 4, ix. 55. § 1.) [L. S.]

PHAENNUS (φαήνους), an epigrammatic poet, who has a place in the Garland of Meleager (v. 29), and two of whose epigrams are contained in the Greek Anthology. (Bruneck, Anth. vol. i. p. 257; Jacobs, Anth. Græc. vol. i. p. 150.) Nothing more is known of him.

PHAENOPS (φαήνοψ), the son of Aisius of Abydos, and a friend of Hector; he was the father of Xanthes, Phorcyz, and Thoön. (Hom. ii. 195, xviii. 321, 502.) [L. S.]

PHAESTUS (φαήςτος), a son of Rhopalus, and grandson of Heracles, was king of Sicyon, from whence he emigrated to Crete. (Pans. ii. 6. § 3.) He is said to have established at Sicyon the custom of worshipping Heracles as a god, since before he had only been honoured as a hero, (Pans. ii. 10. § 1; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 313.) A second Phaestus was a son of Bornus, of Tarne, in Macedonia, and was slain by Idomeneus at Troy (Hom. ii. 45.) [L. S.]

PHAETHON (φαήθον), that is, "the shining," occurs in Homer (Hom. ii. 137, Od. v. 479) as an epithet or surname of Helios, and is used by later writers as a real proper name for Helios (Apollon. Rhod. iv. 123; V. Aen. i. 105). He was more commonly known as the son of Helios by the Oceanid Clymene, the wife of Merops. The genealogy of Phaethon, however, is not the same in all writers, for some call him a son of Clymenus, the son of Helios, by Merops (Hygin. Fab. 154), or a son of Helios by Prote (Tzetz. Chil. iv. 137), or, lastly, a son of Helios by the nymph Rhode or Rhodos. (Schol. ad Pind. Od. vi. 131.) He received the significant name Phaethon from his father, and was afterwards also presumptuous and ambitious enough to request his father one day to allow him to drive the chariot of the sun across the heavens. Helios was induced by the entreaties of his son and of Clymene to yield, but the youth being too weak to check the horses, came down with his chariot, and so near to the earth, that he almost set it on fire. Zeus, therefore, killed him with a flash of lightning, so that he fell down charred and smoking to the ground. His sisters, who had yoked the horses to the chariot, were metamorphosed into poplars, and their tears into amber. (Eurip. Hippol. 737, &c.; Apollon. Rhod. iv. 598, &c.; Lucian, Dial. Doer. 25; Hygin. Fab. 152, 154; Virg. Eclog. vi. 62, Aen. x. 190; Ov. Met. i. 755, &c.)

2. A son of Cephalus and Eos, was carried off by Aphrodite, who appointed him guardian of her temple. (Hes. Theog. 986.) Apolloourus (iii. 14. § 3) calls him a son of Tithonus, and grandson of Cephalus, and Pausanias (i. 3. § 1) a son of Cephalus and Hemera.

3. The name of one of the horses of Eos. (Hom. Od. xxii. 246.) It is also a surname of Abysurus. (Apollon. Rhod. iii. 245.)

PHAETHON, a slave or freedman of Q. Cicero. (Cic. ad Q. Fr. i. 4, ad Att. iii. 2.)

PHAETHONTIADES or PHAETHONTIDES (φαήθοντιάδες), i.e. the daughters of Phaethon or Helios, and sisters of the unfortunate Phaethon. They are also called Heliades. (Virg. Eclog. vi. 62; Antehl. Pallat. iv. 782.) [L. S.]

PHAETH'USA (φαήθουσα), 1. One of the PHALEAECS.

Heliades or Phaethontiades. (Ov. Met. ii. 346; comp. Heliades.)

2. A daughter of Helios by Nena, guarded the flocks of her father in Thrinacia in conjunction with her sister Lamptea. (Hom. Od. xii. 132; Apollon. Rhod. iv. 971.) [L. S.]

PHAETUS, a writer on cookery of uncertain age. (Athen. xiv. p. 643, e. f.)

PHAGITA, CORNELIUS. [CORNELIUS, No. 2.]

PHALAECS (Φαλαέκς), a tyrant of Ambra- cia, in whose way Artemis once sent a young lion, while he was hunting. When Phalaecus took the young animal into his hand, the old lioness rushed forth and tore him to pieces. The people of Ambacia who thus got rid of their tyrant, propitiated Artemis Hegemone, and erected a statue to Artemis Agrotora. (Anton. Lib. 4.) [L. S.]

PHALAECS (Φαλαέκς), son of Onomarchus, the leader of the Phocians in the Sacred War. He was still very young at the death of his uncle Phyllus (a. c. 351), so that the latter, though he designated him for his successor in the chief command, placed him for a time under the guardianship of his friend Mnasæus. But very shortly afterwards Mnasæus having fallen in battle against the Boeotians, Phalaecus, notwithstanding his youth, assumed the command in person, and carried on hostilities with various success. The war had now resolved itself into a series of petty invasions, or rather predatory incursions by the Phocians and Boeotians into each other's territory, and continued without any striking incident until a. c. 347. But it seems that Phalaecus had failed or neglected to establish his power at home as firmly as his predecessors had done: and a charge was brought against him by the opposite party of having appropriated part of the sacred treasures to his own private purposes, in consequence of which he was deprived of his power. No punishment, however, appears to have been inflicted on him; and the following year (a. c. 346) we find him again appointed general, without any explanation of this revolution: but it seems to have been in some manner connected with the proceedings of Philip of Macedon, who was now preparing to interpose in the war. It is not easy to understand the conduct of Phalaecus in the subsequent transactions; but whether he was deceived by the professions of Philip, or had been secretly gained over by the king, his measures were precisely those best adapted to facilitate the projects of the Macedonian monarch. Instead of strengthening his alliance with the Athenians and Spartans, he treated the former as if they had been his open enemies, and by his behaviour towards Archidamus, led that monarch to withdraw the forces which he had brought to the succour of the Phocians. All this time Phalaecus took no measures to oppose the progress of Philip, until the latter had actually passed the straits of Thermopylae, and all hope of resistance was vain. He then hastened to conclude a treaty with the Macedonian king, by which he provided for his own safety, and was allowed to withdraw into the Peloponnesse with a body of 8000 mercenaries, leaving the unhappy Phocians to their fate. (Diod. xvi. 39—40, 56, 59; Paus. x. 2. § 7; Aesch. de F. Leg. p. 43—47; Dem. de F. Leg. pp. 359, 364; Thirlwall's Greece. vol. v. chap. 44.) Phalaecus now assumed the part of a mere leader of mercenary troops, in which character we find him engaging in various enterprises. At one time he determined to enter the service of the Tarentines, then at war with the Lucanians; but a mutiny among his own troops having compelled him to abandon this project and return to the Peloponnesse, he subsequently passed over to Crete, and assisted the Cossians against their neighbours of Lyttus. He was at first successful, and took the city of Lyttus; but was afterwards expelled from thence by Archidamus king of Sparta: and having next laid siege to Cydonia, lost many of his troops, and was himself killed in the attack. We are told that his besieging engines were set on fire by lightning, and that he, with many of his followers, perished in the conflagration; but this story was probably invented to give a colour to his fate of that divine vengeance which was believed to wait upon the whole of his sacrilegious race. His death appears to have been after that of Archidamus in a. c. 338. (Diod. xvi. 61—63; Paus. x. 2. § 7.) [E. H. B.]

PHALAECS (Φαλαέκς), a lyric and epigrammatic poet, from whom the metre called Φαλαέκτων took its name. (Hephaest. p. 57, Gaisf.) He is occasionally referred to by the grammarians (Terentian. p. 2424; Auson. Epist. 4), but they give us no information respecting his works, except that he composed hymns to Hermes. The line quoted by Hephaestion (L. c.) is evidently the first verse of a hymn. He seems to have been distinguished as an epigrammatist (Ath. x. p. 449, d.), and five of his epigrams are still preserved in the Greek Anthology (Brunck, Anal. vol. i. p. 421), besides the one quoted by Athenaeus (L. c.). The age of Phalaecus is uncertain. The conjecture of Reiske (cp. Pal. x. 96) that this line is founded on an epigram which does not properly belong to this writer. A more probable indication of his date is furnished by another epigram, in which he mentions the actor Lycon, who lived in the time of Alexander the Great (Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. p. 927); but this epigram also is of somewhat doubtful authorship. At all events he was probably one of the principal Alexandrian poets.

The Phalaecian verse is well known from its frequent use by the Roman poets. The Roman grammarians also call it Hendecasyllabus. Its normal form, which admits of many variations, is:

\[\text{It is much older than Phalaecus, whose name is given to it, not because he invented, but because he especially used it. It is a very ancient and important lyric metre. Sappho frequently used it, and it is even called the μέτρον Σαπφικόν γενοῦσα Φαλαέκτων (Atl. Fort. p. 2674, Putsch; Terentian. p. 2440). No example of it is found in the extant fragments of Sappho; but it occurs in those of Anacreon and Simonides, in Cratinus, in Sophocles (Philoct. 136—151), and other ancient Greek poets. [P. S.]

PHALACRUS, one of the Sicilians oppressed by Verres. He was a native of Centuripas, and the commander of a ship. (Cic. Verr. v. 40, 44, 46.)}

PHAELANTHUS (Φαελανθος), a son of Ages- laus, and grandson of Stympalus, and the reputed founder of Phalanthus in Arcadia. (Paus. viii. 35. § 4; cf. Paus. vii. 1. § 11.)

PHAELANTHUS (Φαελανθος), a Phoenician leader, who held for a long time against the D-PHALANTHUS.

rians the town of Ialyssus in Rhodes, being encouraged by an oracle, which had declared that he should not be driven from the land till white crows should appear and fishes be found in bowls. Iphiclus, the Greek leader, having heard this, somewhat clumsily fulfilled the conditions of the prophesy by whitening some crows with chalk and introducing a few small fish into the bowl which held Phalanthus's wine. The latter accordingly was terrified into surrender, and evacuated the island after a fruitless attempt, wherein he was outwitted by Iphiclus, to carry off a quantity of treasure with him. (Verg. ap. Ath. viii. pp. 320, e, f, 361, a, b.)

PHALANTHUS (Φαλανθος), a Lacedaemon-

ian, son of Arcas, was the founder of Tarentum about B.C. 708. The legend, as collected from

Justin, and from Antiochus and Ephorus in Strabo, is as follows. When the Lacedaemonians set forth on their first Messenian war, they bound themselves by an oath not to return home till they had brought the contest to a successful issue. But nine years passed away, and in the tenth their wives sent to complain of their state of widowhood,

and to point out, as its consequence, that their country would have no new generation of citizens defend it. By the advice therefore of Arcas, the young men, who had grown up since the beginning of the war, and had never taken the oath, were sent to become fathers of children by the Spartan virgins; and those who were thus born were called Παρθενικαί (sons of the maidens).

According to Theopompos (ap. Ath. vi. p. 271, c, d; comp. Casaub. ad loc.), the widows of those who had fallen in the Messenian war were given as wives to Helots; and, though this statement more probably refers to the second war, it seems likely that the Partheniae were the offspring of some marriages of disarrangement, which the necessity of the period had induced the Spartans to permit.

The notion of Manso, that the name was given in derision to those who had declined the expedition, shirking from war like maidens, seems less deserving of notice. As they grew up, they were looked down upon by their fellow-citizens, and were excluded from certain privileges. Indignant at this, they formed a conspiracy under Phalan-

thus, one of their number, against the government, and, when they saw that they had nothing to make of it, went off to Phalanthus, where he was allowed to go forth and found a colony under his guidance and with the sanction of the Delphic god.

Pausanias tells us that Phalanthus, when setting out on this expedition, was told by an oracle from

Delphi, that he would find a territory and a city in that place where rain should fall on him under a clear sky (αλήθη). On his arrival in Italy, he conquered the barbarians in battle, but was unable to take any of their cities or their land. Wearing out with his fruitless efforts, and cast down under the belief that the oracle had meant to express an impossibility, he was lying one day with his head on his wife's lap, as she strove to comfort him,

when suddenly, feeling her tears dropping on him,

it flashed upon his mind that, as her name was Aethra (Αἰθρα), the mysterious prediction was at length fulfilled. On the succeeding night he captured Tarentum, one of the largest and most flourishing towns on the coast. The mass of the inhabitants took refuge, according to Justin, in Brundusium, and lither Phalanthus himself fled afterwards, when he was driven out from his own colony by a sedition. He ended his days in exile, but, when he was at the point of death, he desired

the Brundusians to reduce his remains to dust and sprinkle it in the agora of Tarentum; by which means, he told them, Apollo had predicted that they might recover their country. The oracle, however, had named this as the method of securing Tarentum to the Partheniae for ever. (Strab. vi.

PHALARIS (Φαλάρης), ruler of Agrigentum in Sicily, has obtained a proverbial celebrity as a cruel and inhuman tyrant. But far from the notoriety thus given to his name having contributed to our real knowledge of his life and history, it has only served to envelope every thing connected with him in a cloud of fable, through which it is scarcely difficult to catch a glimpse of truth. The period at which he lived has been the subject of much dispute, and his reign has been carried back by some writers as far as the 31st Olympiad (B.C. 565), but there seems little doubt that the statement of

Suidas, who represents him as reigning in the 52d

Olympiad, is correct. In one passage he gives the older date, but in another assigns the commencement of his reign to the third year of the 52d Olympiad (B.C. 570); and this is confirmed by statements which represent him as contemporary with the Tisichorous and Crousos. (Suid. s. v.

Φαλάρης; Euseb. Chron. an. 1363, 1393, 1446;

Synceill. p. 213, d. ed. Paris; Oros. i. 20; Plin.

pp. 25, 26; Bentley, Dissertation on the Epistles of Phalaris; Clinton, F. H. vol. i. p. 236, vol. ii. p. 4.)

There seems no doubt that he was a native of Agrigentum, though the author of the spurious epistles ascribed to him represents him as born in the island of Astypalaea, and first arriving in Sicily

as an exile. Concerning the steps by which he rose to power we are almost wholly in the dark.

Polyaeus indeed tells us that he was a farmer of the public revenue, and that under pretence of constructing a temple on a height which he mandated the city, he contrived to erect a temporary citadel, which he occupied with an armed force, and thus made himself master of the sovereignty.

But this story has much the air of a fable, and it is clearly implied by Aristotle (Pol. v. 10) that he was raised by his fellow-citizens to some high office in the state, of which he afterwards availed himself to assume a despotic authority. Of the events of his reign, which lasted according to Eusebius sixteen years, we can hardly be said to know anything; but a few anecdotes preserved to us by

Polyaeus (v. 1.), the authority of which it is difficult to estimate, represent him as engaged in frequent wars with his neighbours, and extending his power and dominion on all sides, though more frequently by stratagem than open force. It would appear from Aristotle (Rhet. ii. 20), if there be no mistake in the story there told, that he was at one time master of Himera as well as Agrigentum; but there certainly is no authority for the statement of Suidas (s. v. Φαλάρης), that his power extended over the whole of Sicily. The story told by Diordus of the manner of his death has every appearance of a fable, but is probably so far founded in fact that he perished by a sudden outbreak of the popular fury, in which it appears that Telemachus, the ancestor of Theron, must have borne a conspicuous part. (Diod. Exc. Vat. p. 25, 26; Tzetz. Chil. v. 556; Cic. de Off. ii. 7; Schol. ad Pind. Od. iii. 68.) The statement of Iamblichus, who represents him as dethroned by Pythagoras (De Vit. Pyth. 32. § 122. ed. Kiessl.), is wholly unworthy of credit.

No circumstance connected with Phalaris is more celebrated than the brazen bull in which he is said to have burnt alive - the victims of his cruelty, and the appearance inseparably against him of the name of Phalaris - as early as the time of Pindar. (Pind. Pyth. i. 185; Schol. ad loc.; Diod. xiii. 20; Polyb. xii. 25;
Timaeus, fr. 116—118. ed. Didot; Callim. fr. 119, 194; Plut. Parall. p. 315.) That poet also speaks of Phalaris himself in terms which clearly prove that his reputation as a barbarous tyrant was then already fully established, and all subsequent writers, until a very late period, allude to him in terms of similar import. Cicero in particular calls him "cru-delissimus omnium tyrannorum" (in Verr. i. 33), and uses his name as proverbial for a tyrant in the worst sense of the word, as opposed to a mild and enlightened despot like Peisistratus. (Cic. ad
Att. v. 20; see also De Off. ii. 7, iii. 6, De Rep. i. 26, and other passages; Polyb. vii. 7; Lucian, Ver. Hist. 23, Bis. Accus. 8; Plut. de ser. num.
vind. p. 533.)

But in the later ages of Greek literature, there appears to have existed or arisen a totally different tradition concerning Phalaris, which represented him as a man of a naturally mild and humane disposition, and only forced into acts of severity or occasional cruelty, by the pressure of circumstances and the machinations of his enemies. Still more strange is it that he appears at the same time as an admirer of literature and philosophy, and the patron of men of letters. Such is the aspect under which the character of the tyrant of Agrigentum is presented to us in two declamations commonly ascribed to Lucian (though regarded by many writers as not the work of that author), and still more strikingly in the well-known epistles which bear the name of Phalaris himself. Purely fictitious as the latter undoubtedly are, it is difficult to conceive that the sophist who composed them would have given them a colour and character so entirely opposite to all that tradition had recorded of the tyrant, if there had not existed some traces of a wholly different version of his history.

The once celebrated epistles alluded to are now remembered chiefly on account of the literary contrivory to which they gave rise, and the masterly dissertation in which Bentley exposed their spurionness. The proofs of this, derived from the glaring anachronisms in which they abound - such as the mention of the cities of Tauroomenium, Alene, and Phintias, which were not built till long after the death of Phalaris - the allusions to tragedies and comedies as things well known and of ordinary occurrence - the introduction of sentiments and expressions manifestly derived from later writers, such as Herodotus, Democritus, and even Callimachus - and above all, the dialect of the epistles themselves, which is the later Attic, such as was the current language of the learned in the latter ages of the Roman empire - would appear so glaring, that it is difficult to conceive how a body of men of any pretensions to learning could be found to maintain their authenticity. Still more extraordinary is it, that a writer of so much taste and cultivation as Sir William Temple should have spoken in the highest terms of their intrinsic merit, and have pronounced them unquestionably genuine on this evidence alone. (Essay on Ancient and Modern Learning, Works, vol. iii. p. 478.) Probably no reader at the present day will be found to look into them without concurring in the sentence of Bentley, that they are "a fardle of common-places." The epistle in which the tyrant professes to give the Athenians an account of his treatment of Perillus, and the reasons for it (Ep. v. of Lennep and Schaefer, it is Ep. xxii. of the older editions), would seem sufficient in itself to betray the sophist. The period at which this forgery was composed cannot now be determined. Politian ascribed the spurious epistles in question to Lucian, but there is certainly no ground for this supposition, and they are probably the work of a much later period. The first author who refers to them is Istobalus, by whom they are repeatedly quoted, without any apparent suspicion (Florileg. t. 7. §§ 68, 49. §§ 16, 26, 86. § 17); but Philius alludes to them (Ep. 207), in terms that clearly intimate that he regarded them as spurious. At a later period they are mentioned with the greatest admiration by Suidas
(s. v. Φάλαρις), who calls them χαμαίκοι παύ Tzetzes also has extracted largely from them, and calls Phalaris himself εκείνου ὁ παύσανος.
(Chil. i. 669, &c., v. 839—963.) After the revival of learning also, they appear to have enjoyed considerable reputation, though rejected as spurious by Politian, Menage, and other eminent scholar. They were first given to the world in a Latin translation by Francesco Accolti of Arezzo, published at Rome in 1470, of which many successive editions appeared before the end of the fifteenth century. The original Greek text was not published till 1498, when it was printed at Venice, together with the epistles ascribed to Apollonius of Tyana and M. Brutus.
They were afterwards inserted by Aldus in his collection of the Greek writers of epistles (Venet.
1499), and passed through several editions in the 16th and 17th centuries, but none of any note, until that printed at Oxford in 1693, which bore the name of Charles Boyle, and gave occasion to the famous dissertation of Bentley already referred to. For the literary history of this controversy, in which Bentley was opposed not only by Boyle, but by all the learning which Oxford could muster, as well as by the wit and satire of Swift and Atterbury, the reader may consult Monk's Life of Bentley, chaps. 4—6, and Dyce's preface to his edition of Bentley's works (8vo. Lond. 1836). Since this period only two editions of the Epistles of Phalaris have been given to the world: the one commenced by Lenep, and published after his death by Valkenauer (4to. Groningae, 1777), which contains a greatly improved text and valuable notes, together with a Latin translation of Bentley's dissertations. The latter are omitted by Schaefer in his edition (8vo. Lips. 1823), in which he has reproduced the text and notes of Lenep, but with many corrections of the former and some additional notes of his own. This last edition is decidedly the best that has ever appeared. The epistles have also been repeatedly translated into Italian and French, and three separate versions of them have appeared in English, the latest of which is that by Franklin, Lond. 1749. [E. H. PHA'CLCES (Φακλός), a son of Temenus, and father of Rhigmedas, was one of the Herculædae. He took possession of the government of Sicyon, and there founded the temple of Hera Prodomia. (Paus. ii. 6. § 4, 11. § 2, 13. § 1; Strab. viii. p. 389.) He is said to have killed his father and his sister Hymetho. (Paus. ii. 29. § 3.) A Trojan of the same name occurs in Homer. (II. xiv. 513.) [L. S.]

PHA'LEAS, or PH'A'LEES (Φαλέας, Φαλ-λάς), a writer on political economy mentioned by Aristotle. He was a native of Chalcodon. He had turned his attention mainly to the relations of property, his theory being that all the citizens in a state should have an equal amount of property, and be educated in the same manner. (Arist. Pol. ii. 4. §§ 1, 6, 9. § 6.) [C. M.]

PHA'LE'RION, a painter of second-rate merit, who painted a picture of Scylla. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 11. s. 40. § 38.) [P. S.]

PHALERIU'S, DEMETRIUS. [DEME-TRIUS.]

PHA'LE'RUS (Φαλέρος). 1. One of the La- pithae, who was present at the wedding of Peiri- thous. (Hes. Sout. Herc. 180.)

2. A son of Alcon, and grandson of Erechtheus or Eurythestes, was one of the Argonauts, and the founder of Gyron. (Orph. Arg. 144.) He is said to have emigrated with his daughter Chalciop or Chalciop to Chalcis in Euboea, and when his father demanded that he should be sent back, the Chalcidians refused to deliver him up. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 97.) In the port of Phalerum near Athens, which was believed to have derived its name from him, an altar was dedicated to him. (Paus. i. 1. § 4. [L. S.]

PHA'LI'NIUS (Φαληνίος), a Zacynthian, in the service of the satrap Tissaphernes, with whom he was in high favour in consequence of his pretensions to military science. After the battle of Cunaxa, B. C. 401, he accompanied the Persian heralds, whom Artaxerxes and Tissaphernes sent to the Cyrean Greeks to require them to lay down their arms; and he recommended his countrymen to submit to the king, as the only means of safety. Plutarch calls him Phalenus. (Xen. Anab. ii. 1. §§ 7—23 ; Plut. Artax. 13.) [E. E.]

PHAMEAS or PHAMEAS, HILICLO. [HILICLO, No. 11.]

PHA'MEAS, a rich freedman from Sardinia, was the uncle of M. Tigellius Hermogenes, of whom Hume speaks (Sat. i. 2). Phamæus died in B. C. 49; and in B. C. 43 Cicero undertook to plead some cause relating to the property of Phæmas against the young Octavius, the sons of Cæcilius. Cicero did this in order to please the distant Cæsar, who patronised the musician Tigellius; but he did not fulfil his promise, for reasons which he assigned to Tigellius, but which appeared unsatisfactory to the latter. (Cic. ad Att. ix. 9. § 4, 13, § 6, ad Fam. ix. 16, viii. 24, ad Att. xiii. 49 ; Weichert, Politi. Lat. p. 304; Drummans' Rom. vol. vi. p. 318.)

PHANIES (Φάνης). 1. A mystic divinity in the system of the Orphics, is also called Eros, Eri- capæus, Metis, and Protogonus. He is said to have sprung from the mystic mundane egg, and to have been the father of all gods, and the creator of man. (Plat. Crit. p. 96 ; Orph. Arg. 15 ; Lactant. Instit. i. 5.)

2. A Thcan who is said to have introduced the worship of Dionysus Lyaius from Thebes to Sicyon. (Paus. ii. 7. § 6.) [L. S.]

PHANIES (Φάνης), a Greek of Haliacarnassus, of sound judgment and military experience, in the service of Amasis, king of Egypt, fled from the latter and passed over to Cambyses, king of Persia. When Cambyses invaded Egypt, the Greek and Carian mercenaries in the service of the Egyptian monarch, set to death the sons of Phænas in the presence of their father, and drank of their blood. (Herod. iii. 4, 11.)

PHANGO, FUFICUS. [FANGO-]

PHAN'NIA, a freedman of App. Claudius Pulcher (Cic. ad Fam. ii. 13, iii. 1, 6).

PHANIES or PHAE'NIA (Φάνης, Φανίας ; the MSS. vary between the two forms, and both are given by Suidas). 1. Of Ereeses in Lesbos, a distinguished Peripatetic philosopher, the immediate disciple of Aristotle, and the contemporary, fellow-citizen, and friend of Theophrastus, a letter of whose to Phanias is mentioned by Diogenes (v. 37; Schol. in Apollon. i. 972 ; Strab. xiii. p. 618). He is placed by Suidas (s. v.) at Ol. 111, n. c. 336 (comp. Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 145, Syllb.). Phanias does not seem to have founded a distinct school of his own, but he was a most diligent writer upon every department of philosophy, as it was studied by the Peripatetics, especially logic, physics, history, and literature. In fact he was, for the extent of his studies, the most distinguished disciple of Aristotle, after Theophrastus. His writings may be classified in the following manner:

1. On Logic. Of this class of his writings we have but little information, probably because, being only paraphrases and supplements to the works of Aristotle, they were, in after generations, eclipsed by the writings of the master himself. In a passage of Ammonius (ad Categ. p. 13; Schol. Arist. p. 28, a. 40, ed. Brandis) we are told that Eudemios, Phanias, and Theophrastus wrote, in emulation of their master, κατηγορίαι καὶ πρεπεῖς εἰρημενεῖς καὶ Ἀναλυτικῶν. There is also a rather important passage respecting ideas, preserved by Alexander of Aphrodisias, from a work of Phanias, πρὸς Διαβολοῦν (Schol. Arist. p. 566, a. ed. Brandis), which may possibly be the same as the work πρὸς τοὺς σοφιστὰς, from which Athenaeus cites a criticism on certain musicians (xiv. p. 638).

II. On Natural Science. A work on plants, τὰ φυτικά, or τὰ πρέπει φυτών, is repeatedly quoted by Athenaeus, and frequently in connection with the work of Theophrastus on the same subject, to which, therefore, it has been supposed to have formed a supplement. (Ath. ii. p. 54, f. 58 d, i. p. 406, c. & c.) The fragments quoted by PHAENOCLES (Φαίνοκλης), one of the chief of the later Greek elegiac poets. We have no exact information respecting his time, but he seems, from the style of his poetry, to have lived in the same period as Hermesianax, Philetas, and Callimachus, that is, in the time of Philip and Alexander the Great. The elegiac poetry of that period was occupied for the most part in describing the manners and spirit of old Greek life, under the form of narrations, chiefly of an amatory character, the personages of which were taken from the old mythology.

Phanocles is called by Plutarch ἐπηρήτος δρῦπ, a phrase which very well describes the nature of his poetry (Quaed. Convic. iv. 5, 3, 671, b.). He seems only to have written one poem, which was entitled Ἐπηρήτων Ἀραλοῦ (Clem. Alex. Strom. vi. p. 750, Prod. p. 32), or, in Latin, Cupinidines (Lactant. Script. iv. in Ovid. Metam. ii.). The second title, Καλός, describes the nature of its contents; it was entirely upon paederasticia; but the subject was so treated as to exhibit the retribution which fall upon those who addicted themselves to the practice. We still possess a considerable fragment from the opening of the poem (Stobaeus, Flor. l. iv. 14), which describes the love of Orpheus for Calais, and the vengeance taken upon him by the Thracian women. From other references to the poem we learn that it celebrated the loves of Cyrus for Phaethon (Lactant. i. c.); comp. Ovid, Metam. ii. 367—369, of Dionysus for Adonis (Plut. l. c.), of Tanatus for Ganymede (Euseb. op. Synecd. p. 161, s. a.); Oros. Hist. i. 12), and of Agamemnon for Argynmus (Clem. Alex. Strom. vii. p. 68, 2). Byz. s. e. Ἀρριφόν (Clem. Alex. Diat. p. 12). The latter was probably the name of a poet, and not of the poem, of which the fragment has been restored by Ruhnken, and other critics as one of the most perfect and beautiful specimens of elegiac poetry which have come down to us, and as superior even to Hermesianax in the simple beauty of the language and the smoothness of the verse.

The fragments of Phanocles have been edited by Ruhnken, Epist. Crit. ii. Opusc. vol. ii. p. 615; Bach, Philol. Hermesianacis, atque Phanocis Reliquiae; and Schneidewin, Delectus Posse Graec. p. 158; the large fragment and another distich are contained in the Greek Anthology. (Brunk, Anal. vol. i. p. 414; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. i. p. 204.) The chief fragment has been translated by Jacobs, Vermischte Schriften, vol. ii. p. 121, by Weber, die Elig. Dichter der Hellenen, p. 269, and by Herberg, in the Zeitschrift für Alterthumsweisenschaft, 1847, pp. 29, 29. (Bergk, Zeitschrift f. Alterthumsweisenschaft, 1841, p. 94; Welcker, Synrho. p. 31; Preller, in Ersh and Gruber's Enylopôidie, s. e.)

PHANO'CRITUS (Φανόκριτος), the author of one of those works on the legends and antiquities of Attica, known under the name of Attibides. The age and birthplace of Phanodemos are uncertain. It has been conjectured, from a passage in Proclus (ad Platon. Tim. p. 30, ed. Basili.), that Theopomus wrote against him, but the passage in Proclus does not prove this. Phanodemos must in any case have lived before the time of Augustus, as he is cited both by the grammarians Didymus (Harpocrat. s. v. γαμοκλαία) and Dionysius of Halicarnassus (i. 61). The birthplace of Phanodemos would, according to a passage of Hesychius (s. v. `Αισιοκλάια), be Tarentum, since the latter speaks both of Phanodemos and Rhinthon as `Αριστοκόπους; but it has been well conjectured, that we ought in this passage to read `Αριστοκόπους, thus making Rhinthon alone the Tarentine. It is much more probable that he was a native of the little island of Icous, one of the Cyclades, since we know that he wrote a special work on that island. In any case he identified himself with Attica, and spoke with enthusiasm of its greatness and glory.

Three works of Phanodemos are cited, but of these the first was by far the most important. 1. 'Αρτίς, which has been already spoken of. It must have been a work of considerable extent, as the ninth book is referred to (Harpocrat. s. v. Λευκόφερεως). We annex a few of the passages of the ancient writers, in which it is quoted: a complete list is contained in the works of which we give the titles below (Athen. iii. p. 114, c. i. p. 302, d. x. p. 457, c. xi. p. 465, a.; Plut. Them. 13. Cm. 12, 19). 2. 'Αντίκλαζ (Harpocrat. s. v. ἄντικλας). There seems no good reason for changing the name of Phanodemos into that of Phanodicus in this passage of Harpocration, as Vossius has done, nor to adopt the alteration of Siebelis, by which the work is assigned to Semus. 3. Ικανάξ, an account of the island of Icous (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ικάς). The fragments of Phanodemos have been collected by Siebelis, Phanocodemi, Democrit. &c., Fragmenta, Lips. 1812 (p. v. and pp. 3—14), and by C. and Th. Müller, Fragmenta Historiae Graecorum, Paris, 1841 (pp. 1xxiii. 1xxvi. and pp. 360—370).

PHANODICUS (Φανοδίκος), a Greek writer of uncertain date, wrote a work entitled Διαιλαία (Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. i. 211, 419; Diog. Laërt. i. 91, 82).

An inscription found at Sigeum, and written from Ephesus, is referred to by Böckh to the above-mentioned Phanodics. The inscription, which begins Φανοδίκος ἐλια τοῦ Ἐρυμακτοῦ τοῦ Προκοσπεύου, belonged to the base of a statute erected to the honour of Phanodemos, and is evidently, later than the time of Augustus and Tiberius, though it would at first sight appear from the style of the writing to have been of very ancient date. (Böckh, Corp. Inscrip. vol. i. n. 8.)

PHANO/MACHUS (Φανομάχος), an Athenian, the son of Callinachus. He was one of the generals to whom the inhabitants of Potidaea surrendered, b.c. 429. He was shortly afterwards the colleague of Xenophon the son of Euripides, in an expedition against the Chalcidians. (Thuc. ii. 70, 79; Dio. xii. 47.)

PHANO'STIHES (Φανοστίθης), an Andrian, was entrusted by the Athenians, in b.c. 407, with the command of their ships, and was sent to Andros to succeed Conon on that station. On his way, he fell in with two Thirian galleys, under the command of Dorius, and captured them with their crews. (Xen. Hell. i. 5, §§ 18, 19; Plut. Ion, p. 541; Ael. V. H. xiv. 5; Ath. xi. p. 506, a.; see above, vol. i. pp. 233, b. 1067, a.) [E. J.]

PHANOTEUS (Φανοτέος), a Phocian and friend of Orestes. (Soph. Elect. 45, 660.) [L. S.]

PHANOTHEA (Φανοθέα), was the wife of the Athenian Icarus. [Icarius, No. 1.] She was said to have invented the hexameter. (Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 366.) Phorpyrites designates her as the Delphic priestess of Apollo (τῇ Δήλῳ, Stob. Floril. xxii. 26.) [W. M. G.]

PHANTA'SIA (Φαντασία), one of those numerous personages (in this case evidently mythical), to whom Homer is said to have been indebted for his poems. She was an Egyptian, the daughter of Nicarchus, an inhabitant of Memphis. She wrote an account of the Trojan war, and the wanderings of Odysseus; and her poems were deposited in the temple of Hephaestus at Memphis. Homer procured a copy from one of the sacred scribes, named Phantes. From this tradition, Lipsius, while he discarded the story, infers the early establishment of libraries in Egypt. (Lipsius, Syntagma. Biblioth. c. 1; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. i. p. 206.) [W. M. G.]

PHANTON (Φαντόν), of Phlius, a Pythagorean philosopher, one of the last of that school, a disciple of Philebus and Eurytus, and, probably, in his old age, contemporary with Aristoxenus, the Peratiatic, c. 320. (Iamblich. de VV. Pyth. cc. 35, 36; Diog. Laërt. viii. 46.) [W. M. G.]

PHAON (Φαών), the celebrated favourite of the poetess Sappho. He was a boatman at Mytilene, and already at an advanced age and of ugly appearance; but on one occasion he very willingly, and without accepting payment, carried Aphrodite across the sea, for which the goddess gave him youth and beauty. After this Sappho is said to have fallen in love with him. (Aelian, V. H. xii. 18; Palaeph. 49; Lucian, Dial. Mort. 9; comp. SAPPHO.) [L. S.]

PHAON, a freedman of the emperor Nero, in whose villa in the neighbourhood of the city Nero took refuge, when the people rose against him, and where he met his death a. d. 68. (Suet. Ner. 46, 49; Dion Cass. lxxii. 28; Aur. Vict. Epit. 5.)

PHAON (Φαών), one of the most ancient of the Greek physicians, who must have lived in or before the fifth century b. c., as he was either a contemporary or predecessor of Hippocrates. He was one of the authorities quoted by some of the ancient writers attributed the treatise Περὶ Δαίμων Ῥημάτων, De Soulubi Virtus Ratione, which forms part of the Hippocratic Collection. (Hisipograte, p. 480, a.; Galen, Comment in Hippocr. "De Vict. Ration. in Morb. Aqu.") i. 17, vol. xxv. p. 455.) [W. A. G.]

PHAR/ACIDAS (Φαράκδας), a Lacedaemonian who commanded a fleet of thirty ships sent by the Spartans and their allies to the assistance of the elder Dionysius, when Syracuse was besieged by the Carthaginians under Himilco, b. c. 396. Having fallen in with a squadron of Carthaginian ships, he took nine of them, and carried them safely into the port of Syracuse. His arrival there infused fresh vigour into the besieged, and he appears to have contributed essentially to the successes that followed. At the same time he lent the weight of his name and influence as the representative of Sparta, to support the authority of Dionysius. (Diod. xiv. 65, 70, 72; Polyæn. ii. 11.) [E. H. B.]

PHARANDAT'TES (Φαρανδάτης), a Persian, son of Teaspes, commanded the Marian and Colchians in the expedition of Xerxes against Greece. (Her. vii. 79.) He is mentioned again by Herodotus (ix. 76), as having carried off by violence a woman of Cos, and made her his concubine. She was rescued by the Greeks after the battle of Plataea.

[PHARAXAS].

1. A king of the Scythian tribe of the Chorasmians, who presented himself to Alexander the Great at Zariaea, b. c. 328, with friendly offers, which were favourably received, and an alliance concluded between them. He promised the Macedonian king his assistance in conquering the tribes between the Caspian and the Euxine seas, when Alexander should have leisure for this expedition. (Arr. Anab. iv. 15.)

2. A son of Phrataphernes, the satrap of Parthia and Hyrcania. (Ibid. vi. 27.)

3. King of Iberia, contemporary with the emperor Tiberius. He assisted his brother Mithridates to establish himself on the throne of Armenia, a. d. 35. [Arscidace, Vol. I. p. 302]; and when the Parthian prince Orodes attempted to dispossess him of his newly-acquired kingdom, Pharsamases assembled a large army, with which he totally defeated the Parthians in a pitched battle (Tac. Ann. vi. 32—33). At a later period (A. d. 53) he instigated his son Rhadamistus, whose ambitious and aspiring character began to give him umbrage, to make war upon his uncle Mithridates, and supported him in his enterprise; but when Rhadamistus was in his turn expelled by the Parthians, after a short reign (A. d. 55), and took refuge again in his father’s dominions, the old king, in order to curry favour with the Romans, who had expressed their displeasure at the proceedings of Rhadamistus, put his son to death. (Id. ib. xii. 42—48, xiii. 6, 37.)

[PHARAXAS].

1. A Spartan, father of the Styrphon, who was one of the prisoners taken by Demosthenes and Clean at Sphacteria, in b. c. 425. (Thuc. iv. 38.)

2. One of the council of ten, appointed by the Spartans in b. c. 418, to control Agis. At the battle of Mantinea in that year, he restrained the Lacedaemonians from pressing too much on the defeated enemy, and so running the risk of driving them to despair (Thuc. v. 63, &c.; Diod. xii. 79; Wess. ad loc.). Diodorus speaks of him as having been high in dignity among his countrymen, and Pausanias (vi. 3) tells us that he was one of those to whom the Ephesians erected a statue in the temple of Artemis, after the close of the Peloponnesian war. He seems to have been the same person who was admissible in b. c. 397, and co-operated with Dercylidas in his invasion of Caria, where the private property of Tissaphernes lay. [Dercylidas]. In b. c. 396 he laid siege, with 120 ships, to Caria, where Conon was then stationed; but he was compelled to withdraw by the approach of a large force under Pharmazus and Artaphernes, according to Diodorus, in whom however the latter name appears to be a mistake for Tissaphernes (Xen. Hell. iii. 2, §§ 12 &c.; Diod. xiv. 79; Paus. vi. 7; Thirlwall’s Greece, vol. iv. p. 411). We learn from Theopompus (Ap. Athen. xii. p. 536, b. c.) that Pharmazus was much addicted to luxury, and was more like a Greek of Sicily in this respect than a Spartan.

3. A Spartan, one of the ambassadors who were sent to negotiate an alliance with Athens against Thebes, in b. c. 369. (Xen. Hell. vi. 5, § 33.)

[PHARIS].

1. A son of Hermes and the Cretan Phoebus, by whom he became the father of Telamon. He is the reputed founder of the town of Pharos in Messenia. (Paus. iv. 30, § 2, vii. 22, § 3, where he is called Phares.)

[PHARMAECEIA].

The nymph of a well with poisonous powers, near the river Iliussa, in Attica; she is described as a playmate of Orichthys (Plut. Phaed. p. 529, c.; Timaeus, Lex. Plut. s. v.).

[PHARMAKIDES].

i.e. sorceresses or witches, is the name by which the Thebans designated the divinities who delayed the birth of Hermes. (Paus. ix. 11, § 2.)

[PHARNABAZUS].

1. Father of Pharmaces (Thuc. ii. 67).

2. Son of Pharmaces, succeeded his father as satrap of the Persian provinces near the Hellespont, and it would seem from a passage in Thucydides (vii. 58) that his brothers were associated with him in the government (comp. Arnold and Goller ad Thuc. l. c.; Krueger, ad Thuc. viii. c). Early in b. c. 412, being anxious to support the Greek cities of his satrapy in their intended revolt from Athens, in order that he might satisfy the demand of his master, Dareius I., for the tribute arising from them, he sent to Sparta two Greek exiles who had taken refuge at his court (Calligetus of Megara and Timngoras of Cyzicus), proposing an alliance, and urging that a Lacedaemonian fleet should be despatched to the Hellespont. The government, however, acting chiefly under the influence of Alcibiades, decided in favour of a counter application to the same effect from Tissaphernes, the satrap of Lydia; but, in the congress which the Spartans shortly after held at Corinth, it was resolved to send aid to the Hellespont after Chios and Lesbos should be won from Athens, and, in the same year, a squadron of twenty-seven ships, which had been prepared for this service, was despatched with orders to proceed under Clearchus to co-operate with Pharmazus, if it should seem fit to the Spartan commissioners who were sent out at the same time to inquire into the conduct of Astyochus (Thuc. viii. 6, 8, 39). Nothing, however, appears to have been attempted by the Lacedaemonians in this quarter till the spring of 411, when Dercylidas marched thither, and, being joined by Pharmazus, gained possession of Abydus, and, for a time, of Lampsaus. In the following summer, as Pharmazus promised to maintain any force which might come to his aid, and the supplies from Tissaphernes were more grudgingly and scantily furnished, the Spartans sent forty ships under Clearchus to the Hellespont, of which ten only arrived there; but, the same motives still continuing to operate with them, and the duplicity of Tissaphernes becoming more and more apparent, the whole armament under Mindarus soon after left Miletus and sailed northward to unite itself with Pharmazus (Thuc. viii. 61, 62, 80, 99—109). In the battle between the Athenian and Lacedaemonian fleets, which was fought near Abydus in the same year (b. c. 411), and in which the Athenians were vic-

torius, Pharnabazus distinguished himself greatly by his zeal in behalf of his allies, urging his horse into the sea, and fighting as long as possible (Xen. Hell. i. 1. § 6; Diod. xiii. 46; Plut. Alex. 27). In b.c. 410 he aided Mandarus in the capture of Cyzicus; and in the battle which took place there soon after [Mandarus], he not only gave valuable assistance to the Lacedaemonians with his forces, which were drawn up on the shore, but, when fortune declared against his friends, he checked the pursuit of the victorious Athenians, and sheltered the fugitives in his camp. He also supplied each of them with arms and clothing and with pay for two months, setting them to guard the coasts of his province, and bidding them take courage, as there was plenty of timber in the king's country to build them another fleet. For this purpose he furnished them himself with money and materials, and enabled them to set about the construction of new ships at Antandrus. He then prepared to march to the help of Chalcedon, which seemed to be in danger from the Athenian fleet under Alcibiades; but it is probable that the return of the latter to the Hellespont induced Pharnabazus to relinquish his intention and to remain where his presence appeared more necessary. It was about this time also that Hermocrates was indebted to his generosity for an unsolicited supply of money for the purpose of procuring ships and mercenaries to effect his return to Syracuse [Hermocrates]. In B.C. 409, Pharnabazus was defeated by Alcibiades and Tharsylus near Abydus, and his province was ravaged by the Athenians (Xen. Hell. i. 1. §§ 14, &c., 31, 2. §§ 16, 17; Diod. xiii. 49—51, 63; Plut. Alex. 28.) In n.c. 408, the success of Alcibiades and his colleagues at Chalcedon against Pharnabazus and the Spartan harmost, Hippocrates, who was slain in the battle, induced the satrap to accept terms of accommodation from the Athenians, and he further engaged to give a safe conduct to the ambassadors whom they purposed sending to Dareius (Xen. Hell. i. 3. §§ 4—14; Diod. xiii. 66; Plut. Alex. 30, 31.) Early in the following spring he was journeying with the embassy in question on their way to the Persian court, when they were met by some Spartan envoys returning from Susa, who had obtained from the king their wishes, and closely followed by Cyrus, who had been invested by his father with the government of the whole sea-coast of Asia Minor, and had been commissioned to aid the Lacedaemonians in the war. At the desire of the prince, Pharnabazus detained the Athenian ambassadors in custody, and three years elapsed before he could obtain leave to dismiss them (Xen. Hell. i. 4. §§ 1—7). According to Diodorus (xiv. 22) it was he who gave information to Artaxerxes of the designs of Cyrus; but the name of Pharnabazus may be a mistake of the author for Tissaphernes in this passage as it certainly is in other parts of his work, e. g. xiii. 36, 37, 38. When the Ten Thousand Greeks, in their retreat, had reached Calpe in Bithynia, Pharnabazus sent a body of cavalry to act against them, and these troops made an ineffectual attempt to check the progress of their march. (Xen. Anab. vi. 4. §§ 24, &c., 5. §§ 26—32.) On their arrival at Chrysopolis, on the eastern shore of the Bosporus, the satrap induced Anaxibius by large promises, which he never redeemed, to withdraw them from his territory. [Anaxibius.] The great authority with which Tissaphernes was invested by Artaxerxes in Asia Minor, as a reward for his services in the war with Cyrus, naturally excited the jealousy of Pharnabazus; and the hostile feeling mutually entertained by the satraps was taken advantage of by Dercyllidas, when he passed over into Asia, in b.c. 399, to protect the Asiatic Greeks against the Persian power. [Dercyllidas.] In b.c. 396, the province of Pharnabazus was invaded by Agesilaus, but the Lacedaemonian cavalry was defeated by that of the satrap. In 395, Tithraustes, who had been sent by Pharnabazus to put Tissaphernes to death, and to succeed him in his government, made a merit with Agesilaus of his predecessor's execution, and urged him to leave his province un molested, and to attack that of Pharnabazus instead, a request to which Agesilaus acceded, on condition that Tithraustes should bear the expense of the march. Pharnabazus met the enemy, and gained a slight advantage over one of their marauding parties; but a few days after this his camp was surprised and captured by Herippidas, and he was himself obliged to wander, a hunted fugitive, about his own territory, until at length a conference was arranged between him and Agesilaus by a friend of both parties, Apollonides of Cyzicus. Xenophon gives us a graphic account of the interview, in which the satrap upbraided the Lacedaemonians with the ill return they were making him for his services in the Peloponnesian war, and which ended with a promise from Agesilaus to withdraw from his territory, and to refrain from any future invasion of it, as long as there should be any one else for him to fight with. (Xen. Hell. iii. 4. §§ 12, &c., 25, &c., iv. 1. §§ 1, 15—41; Plut. Ages. 9—12; Diod. xiv. 35, 79, 80; Just. vi. 1.) Meanwhile, as early apparently as n.c. 397, Pharnabazus had connected himself with Conon, and we find them engaged together down to 393 in a series of successful operations under the sanction and with the assistance of the Persian king. [Conon.] Pharnabazus, in the last-mentioned year, returned to Asia, and we have no further account of him for some time. His satrapy was invaded by Anaxibius in 393, but it does not appear whether he was himself residing there. (Xen. Hell. iv. 3. §§ 32.) Two years after we find Ariobarzanes holding the government of Pharnabazus, who had gone up to court to marry the king's daughter. (Xen. Hell. v. 1. § 28; Ages. iii. 5; Plut. Art. 27.) So far we are on sure ground; but it is very difficult to decide to what period we should refer the unsuccessful expedition of the Persians to Egypt under Pharnabazus, Abrocomes, and Tithraustes. Rehdantz, however, gives some very probable reasons for placing it in b.c. 392—390. (Rehdantz, Vit. Iphi., Chabir., Timoth. pp. 32, 239—242; comp. Isocr. Paneg. p. 69, d.; Aristoph. Plut. 173; Just. vi. 6.) In b.c. 377, Pharnabazus, by his remonstrances with the Athenians, obtained the recall of Chabrias from the service of Acoros, king of Egypt, and also a promise to send Iphicles to co-operate with the Persian generals in the reduction of the rebellious province. The expedition, however, under Iphicles and Pharnabazus ultimately failed in b.c. 374, chiefly through the dilatory proceedings and the excessive caution of the latter, who excused himself to his colleague by the remark that while his words were in his own power, his actions were in that of the king. 2. A Persian general, son of Artabazus [No. 4.], was joined with Autophradates in the command of the fleet after the death of Memnon, in B. C. 333. [AUTOPHRADATES.] They succeeded in reducing Mytilene, Temedos, and Chios, and, having despatched some ships to Cos and Halicarnassus, they sailed with 100 of their fastest vessels to Siphnos. Here they were visited by Agis, king of Sparta, who came to ask for money and troops to support the anti-Macedonian party in the Peloponnesus. But just at this crisis intelligence arrived of Alexander's victory at Issus, and Phar nabuzs, fearing that the effect of it might be the revolt of Chios, sailed thither with 12 ships and 1500 mercenaries. He did not, however, prevent the islanders from putting down the Persian government, and he was himself taken prisoner; but he escaped, and took refuge in Cos. (Arr. Arb. ii. 1, 2, 13, iii. ii. 2; Curt. iii. 5, iv. 1, 5.)

In B. C. 324, Artonis, the sister of Pharabazus, was given in marriage to Eumenes by Alexander the Great; and in B. C. 321 we find Pharabazus commanding a squadron of cavalry for Eumenes, in the battle in which he defeated Craterus and Neopol tolemus. (Arr. Arb. vii. 4; Plut. Eum. 7; Diod. xviii. 30—32.)

P H A R N A C E S (Φάρνακες). 1. The progenitor of the kings of Cappadocia, who is himself styled by Diodorus king of that country. He is said to have married Atossa, a sister of Cambyses, the father of Cyrus; by whom he had a son named Gallas, who was the great-grandfather of Anaphas, one of the seven Persians who slew the Magi. (Diod. xxxi. Exc. Phot. p. 517.) [ANAPHAS]. But the whole genealogy is probably fictitious.

2. Father of Artabazus, who commanded the Parthians and Chorasmians in the expedition of Xerxes against Greece. [ARTABAZUS, No. 2.]

3. Son of Pharabazus, appears to have been satrap of the provinces of Asia near the Helles pont, as early as B. C. 430. (Thuc. ii. 67.) He is subsequently mentioned as assigning Adramyt tium for a place of settlement to the Delians, who had been expelled by the Athenians from their native island, B. C. 422. (Id. v. 1; Diod. xii. 73.)

4. A Persian of high rank, and brother-in-law of Dareius Codomannus, who was killed at the battle of the Granicus, B. C. 334. (Arr. Arb. i. 16, § 5; Diod. xvii. 21.) [E. H. B.]

P H A R N A C E S I. (Φάρνακες), king of Pontus, was the son of Mithridates IV., whom he succeeded on the throne. (Justin. xxxvii. 5, 6; Clinton, P. H. vol. iii. p. 424, 425.) The date of his accession cannot be fixed with certainty; but it is assigned conjecturally by Mr. Clinton to about B. C. 150. It is certain, at least, that he was on the throne before B. C. 183, in which year he succeeded in reducing the important city of Sinope, which had been long an object of ambition to the kings of Pontus. The Rhodians sent an embassy to Rome to complain of this aggression, but without effect. (Strab. xii. p. 545; Polyb. xxiv. 10; Liv. xl. 2.) About the same time Pharnaxes became involved in disputes with his neighbour, Eumenes, king of Pergamus, which led to repeated embassies from both monarchs to Rome, as well as to partial hostilities. But in the spring of 181, without waiting for the return of his ambassadors, Pharnaxes suddenly attacked both Eumenes and Ariarathes, and invaded Galatia with a large force. Eumenes opposed him at the head of an army; but hostilities were soon suspended by the arrival of the Roman deputies, appointed by the senate to inquire into the matters in dispute. Negotiations were accordingly opened at Pergamus, but led to no result, the demands of Pharnaxes being rejected by the Romans as unreasonable; and the war was in consequence renewed. It continued, apparently with various interruptions, until the summer of B. C. 179, when Pharnaxes, finding himself unable to cope with the combined forces of Eumenes and Ariarathes, was compelled to purchase peace by the cession of all his conquests in Galatia and Paphagonia, with the exception of Sinope. (Polyb. xxv. 2, 4, 6, xxvi. 6; Liv. xl. 20; Diod. xxix. Exc. Vales. pp. 576, 577.) How long he continued to reign after this we know not; but it appears, from an incidental notice, that he was still on the throne in B. C. 170. (Polyb. xxvii. 15; Clinton, P. H. vol. iii. p. 426.) The impartial testimony of Polybius confirms the complaints of Eumenes and the Romans in regard to the arrogant and violent character of Pharnaxes. [E. H. B.]

P H A R N A C E S II. (Φάρνακες), king of Pontus, or more properly of the Bosporus, was the son of Mithridates the Great. According to Appian he was treated by his father with great distinction, and even designated as his successor, but we find no mention of him until the close of the life of Mithridates, after the latter had taken refuge from the arms of Pompey in the provinces north of the Euxine. But the schemes and preparations of the aged monarch for renewing the war with the Romans, and even carrying his arms into the heart of their empire, excited the alarm of Pharnaxes, and he took advantage of the spirit of dis content which existed among the assembled troops to conspire against the life of his father. His designs were discovered; but he was supported by the favour of the army, who broke out into open mutiny, declared Pharnaxes their king, and marched against the unhappy Mithridates, who, after several fruitless appeals to his son, was compelled to put an end to his own life, B. C. 63. (Appian. Mithr. 110, 111; Dion Cass. xxxvii. 12. For further details and authorities see MITHRI DATE S.) In order to secure himself in the possess ion of the throne which he had thus gained by par ricide, Pharnaxes hastened to send an embassy to Pompey in Syria, with offers of submission, and hostages for his fidelity, at the same time that he sent the body of Mithridates to Sinope to be at the disposal of the Romans general. Pompey gladly accepted his overtures, and granted him the kingdom of the Bosporus with the titles of friend and ally of the Roman people. (Appian. Mithr. 113, 114; Dion Cass. xxxvii. 14.)

VOL. III.
PHARNASPE.

For some time Pharnaces appears to have remained contented with the limits thus assigned him; and we know no events of his reign during this period, except that he entered into extensive relations, both hostile and friendly, with the surrounding Scythian tribes. (Strab. xi. p. 495, 506.) But the increasing dissensions among the Romans themselves emboldened him to turn his arms against the free city of Phanagoria, which had been expressly excepted from the grant of Pompey, but which he now reduced under his subjection. Not long afterwards, the civil war having actually broken out between Caesar and Pompey, he determined to seize the opportunity of re-establishing himself in his father's dominions, and made himself master, almost without opposition, of the whole of Colchis and the lesser Armenia. Hereupon Deiotarus, the king of the latter country, applied to Domitius Calvinus, the lieutenant of Caesar in Asia, for his support, which was readily granted; but the combined forces of the Roman general and the Galatian king were totally defeated by Pharnaces near Nicopolis in Armenia, and the latter was now enabled to occupy the whole of Pontus, including the important cities of Amisus and Sinope. (Appian. Mithr. 120; Dion Cass. xiii. 45, 46; Hirt. B. Alex. 34—41; Strab. xii. p. 547.) He now received intelligence of the resolu of Asander, to whom he had entrusted the government of Bosporus during his absence, and was preparing to return to chastise his rebel officer, when the approach of Caesar himself com- pelled him to turn all his attention towards a more formidable enemy. Pharnaces at first endeavoured to conciliate the conqueror by peaceful messages and offers of submission, with the view of gaining time until the affairs of Rome should compel the dictator to return thither. But the rapidity and decision of Caesar's movements quickly disconcerted these plans, and brought on a decisive action near Zeln, in which the army of Pharnaces was utterly defeated, and he himself with difficulty made his escape with a small body of horsemen to Sinope. From thence he proceeded by sea to the Bos- porus, where he assembled a force of Scythian and Sarmatian troops, with which he regained possession of the cities of Theodosia and Panticaeum, but was ultimately defeated and slain by Asander. According to Appian, he died in the field fighting bravely; Dion Cassius, on the contrary, states that he was taken prisoner, and subsequently put to death. (Appian, Mithr. 120; Dion Cass. xiii. 45, 48; Hirt. Bell. Alex. 65—71; Plut. Cesar. 50; Suet. Jul. 35.)

Pharnaces was about fifty years old at the time of his death (Appian, I. c.), of which he had reigned nearly sixteen. It appears that he left several sons, one of whom, named Dareius, was for a short time established by Antony on the throne of Pontus. (Appian, B. C. v. 75; Strab. xii. p. 560.) His daughter Damiaris was married to Polemon I. king of Bosporus. (Dion Cass. liv. 24.)

PHARNACES, an engraver of precious stones, two of whose gems are extant. (Stosch, pl. 50; Bracei, vol. ii. No. 93; Spilbury Genus, No. 11; J. C. de Jonge, Notice sur le Cabinet des Médailles dédié au Roi des Pays Bas, 1923.)

PHARNAPATES. [ARNAES, 357, b.]

PHARNASPE (alias Pharnaceus), a Persian, of the family of the Achaemenidae, was the father of Cas-sandane, a favourite wife of Cyrus the Great, (Herod. ii. 1, iii. 2.)

PHARNUCIUS or PHARNUCIUS (alias Pharnucius). 1. An officer of Cyrus the Elder, and one of the chieftains of his cavalry in the war with Croesus. After the conquest of Babylon he was made satrap of the Illeespontine Phrygia and Aeolis. (Xen. Cyrop. iv. 3 § 32, vii. 1. § 52, viii. 6 § 7.)

2. One of the three commanders of the cavalry in the army of Xerxes. A fall from his horse brought on an illness, which prevented him from proceeding with the expedition into Greece, and obliged him to return to Sardis. By his order the horse's legs were cut off at the knees on the spot where he had thrown his master. (Herod. vii. 38.) The name Pharnucus occurs also as that of a Persian command of the Persae of Aeaclylus (305, 293).

3. A Lycian, was appointed by Alexander the Great to command the force sent into Sogdiana against Spitamenes in a.c. 329. The result of the expedition was disastrous. [CARANUS, No. 3.] Pharnuchus had been entrusted with its superinten- dence, because he was acquainted with the language of the barbarians of the region, and had shown much dexterity in his intercourse with them. According to Aristobulus he was conscious of his deficiency in military skill, and wished to cede the command to the three Macedonian officers who were acting under him, but they refused to accept it. (Arr. Anab. iv. 3, 5; Curt. vii. 6, 7.)

PHARNUCIUS (alias Pharnucius), an historian of uncertain date, who wrote a history of Persia. He was a native of Antioch in Mesopotamia, and, as this town was called Asibe or Nasibe by its in- habitants, Pharnucus received the name of Asib- enus or Nasibenus. (Steph. Byz. s. v. 'AroT±)yca; Voss. de Hist. Graec. p. 483, ed. Westermann; comp. Fabr. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 540.)

PHARUS (alias Phoras), the helmsman of Menelaus, from whom the island of Pharos, at the mouth of the Nile, was believed to have derived its name. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Phoras.)

PHARYGAEA (Pharygala), a surname of Hera, derived from the town of Pharygae, in Locris, where she had a temple. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Pho- rau; comp. Strab. ix. p. 426.)

PHASELITES. [THEODECTES.]

PHASIS (alias Phasis), a painter, who is only known by an epigram of Cornelius Longinus, in which he is praised for having painted the great Athenian general Cynegacus, not, as he was usually repre- sented, with one hand cut off (as Herod. vi. 114), but with both his hands still un mutilated; it being but fair, according to the conceit of the epigram- matist, that the hero should not be deprived of those hands which had won him immortal fame! (Brunck, Anhal. vol. ii. p. 200, Anth. Plan. iv. 117.) We have no indication of the painter's age; he was perhaps contemporary with the poet. [P. S.] PHAVORINUS. [FAVORINUS.]

PHAYLLUS (alias Phyllus). 1. An athlete of Crotona, who had thrice gained the victory at the Pythian games. At the time of the Persian invasion of Greece, Phyllus fitted out a ship at his own expense, with which he joined the Greek fleet assembled at Salamis, and took part in the memorable battle that ensued. b.c. 400. This was the only assistance furnished by the Greeks of Italy or Sicily to their countrymen upon that occasion. (Herod. viii. 47; Paus. x. 9. § 2; Plat.}

He was accused of being defeated by Philip and driven out of Thessaly; but on the death of Onomarchus, he appears to have succeeded without opposition to the chief command. He immediately set to work to restore the affairs of the Phocians. By an unsparing use of the vast treasures at his disposal, and by doubling the pay of his mercenaries, he quickly re-assembled a numerous army, in addition to which auxiliaries were furnished him by the Achaeans, Lacedaemonians, and Athenians, and the fugitive tyrants of Phene, Lycophron and Pheidolus, also joined him with a body of mercenaries. The success of his military operations was, however, far from corresponing to these great preparations. He invaded Boeotia; but was defeated in three successive actions, apparently none of them very decisive, as we next find him turning his arms against the Epicenemidians Locrians, and hostilities were carried on with alternations of success but no striking result. Meanwhile Phyllus himself was attacked with a lingering disorder of a consumptive kind, to which he fell a victim after a long and painful illness, n. c. 351. (Diod. xvi. 35—38, 61; Paus. x. 2 § 6; Harpocr. ν. Фαδάλος.) In this natural disease his enemies saw as plainly as in the violent deaths of his predecessors the retributive justice of the offended deities.

It appears certain that Phyllus had made use of the sacred treasures with a far more lavish hand than either of his brothers, and he is accused of bestowing the consecrated ornaments upon his wife and mistresses. (Diod. xvi. 61; Th. v. 16, 29; Athen. xii. p. 605; Ephor. ἱστ. vi. p. 292.) The chief command in his hands appears to have already assumed the character of a monarchy (Dem. c. Aristoc. p. 661.), and began even to be regarded as hereditary, so that he left it at his death to his nephew Phalaecus, though yet a minor. [PHAlAECUS.] [E. H. B.] PHECIA'NUS. [PHICIANUS.] PHEGEUS. Subsequently, however, it was changed again into Psophis (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ψόφης; Paus. viii. 24. § 1). He is said to have been the father of Alpheisoea or Arisoea, Pronous, and Agenor, or of Tomenus and Axion (Paus. vi. 17. § 4, viii. 24. § 4, ix. 41. § 2; Apollod. iii. 7. § 6); and to have purified Alcmaeon after he had killed his mother, but was slain by the sons of Alcmaeon. PHEIDIAS (Φεῖδιας), or in Latin, PHIDIAS. 1. Of Athens, the son of Charmides, was the greatest sculptor and statuary of Greece, and probably of the whole world.

I. His Life. It is remarkable, in the case of many of the ancient artists, how great a contrast exists between what we know of their fame, and even sometimes what we see of their works, and what we can learn respecting the events of their lives. Thus, with respect to Pheidias, we possess but few details of his personal history, and even these are beset with doubts and difficulties. What is known with absolute certainty may be summed up in a few words. He executed most of his greatest works at Athens, during the administration of Pericles: he made for the Eleians the ivory and gold statue of Zeus, the most renowned work of Greek statuary: he worked for other Greek cities; and he died just before the commencement of the Peloponnesian War, in n. c. 432. The importance of the subject demands, however, a careful examination of the difficulties which surround it. The first of these difficulties relates to the cardinal point of the time when the artist flourished, and the approximate date of his birth.

First of all, the date of Pliny must be disposed of. It is well known how little reliance can be placed on the dates under which Pliny groups the names of several artists. Not only do such lists of names embrace naturally artists whose ages differed by several centuries, but even such names as these, which are certainly more important, are disposed of by the same principle on which the dates are generally chosen by Pliny, namely, with reference to some important epoch of Greek history. Thus the 84th Olympiad (n. c. 444—440), at which he places Pheidias, is evidently chosen because the first year of that Olympiad was the date at which Pericles began to have the sole administration of Athens* (Clinton, Fast. Holl. s. a. 444). The date of Pliny determines, therefore, nothing as to the age of Pheidias at this time, nor as to the period over which his artistic life extended. Nevertheless, it seems to us that this coincidence of the period, during which the artist executed his greatest works, with the administration of Pericles, furnishes the best clue to the solution of the difficulty. It forbids us to carry up the artist's birth so high as to make him a very old man at this period of his life; not because old age would necessarily have diminished his powers; though even on this point those who quote the examples of Pindar, Sophocles, and other great writers, do not, perhaps, make sufficient allowance for the difference between the physical force required for the production of such a work as the Oedipus at Colonos and the execution, or even the superintendence, of such works as the sculptures of the Parthenon, and the colossal statues of Athena and Zeus—but the real force of the argument is this; if Pheidias had been already highly distinguished as an artist—

* The vagueness of Pliny's dates is further shown by his appending the words "circa CCC. novemae Urbanea," which give a date ten years higher, i.e. 454. This, however, cannot be very far from the date at which Pheidias began to work.
nearly half a century earlier, it is incredible, first, that the notices of his earlier productions should be so scanty as they are, next, that his fame should be so thoroughly identified as it is with the works which he executed at this period. Such an occasion as the restoration of the sacred monuments of Athens would, we may be sure, produce the artist whose genius guided the whole work, as we know that it did produce a new development of art itself; and it is hardly conceivable that the master spirit of this new era was a man of nearly seventy years old, whose early studies and works must have been of that stiff archaic style, from which even Calamis, who (on this hypothesis) was much his junior, had not entirely emancipated himself. This principle, we think, will be found to furnish the best guide through the conflicting testimonies and opinions respecting the age of Pheidias. Several writers, the best exposition of whose views is given by Thiersch (Ueber die Epochen der bildenden Kunst unter den Griechen, p. 113, &c.), place the works at the beginning of the fifth century B.C., making him already a young artist of some distinction at the time of the battle of Marathon, b.c. 490; and that on the following grounds. Pausanias tells us (i. 28. § 2) that the colossal bronze statue of Athena Promachus, in the Acropolis of Athens, was made by Pheidias, out of the tithe of the spoil taken from the Medes who disembarked at Marathon; and he elsewhere mentions other statues which Pheidias made out of the same spoils, namely, the group of statues which the Athenians dedicated at Delphi (x. 10. § 1), and the acroplath of Athena, in her temple at Platea (ix. 4. § 1). It may be observed in passing, with respect to the two latter works, that if they had exhibited that striking difference of style, as compared with the great works of Pheidias at Athens, which must have marked them had they been made some half century earlier than these great works, Pausanias would either not have believed them to be the work of Ph., or, as we have just seen, have made some observation upon their archaic style, and have informed us how early Pheidias began to work. The question, however, chiefly turns upon the first of the above works, the statue of Athena Promachus, which is admitted on all hands to have been one of the most important productions of the art of Pheidias. The argument of Thiersch is, that, in the absence of any statement to the contrary, we must assume that the commission was given to the artist immediately after the victory which the statue was intended to commemorate. Now it is evident, at first sight, to what an extraordinary conclusion this assumption drives us. Pheidias must already have been of some reputation to be entrusted with such a work. We cannot suppose him to have been, at the least, under twenty-five years of age. This would place his birth in n.c. 515. Therefore, at the time when he finished his great statue of Athena in the Parthenon (v.c. 438), he must have been 77; and after reaching such an age he goes to Elis, and undertakes the colossal statue of Zeus, upon completing which (v. c. 433, probably), he had reached the 82nd year of his age! Results like these are not to be explained away by the ingenious arguments by which Thiersch maintains that there is nothing incredible in supposing Pheidias, at the age of eighty, to have retained vigour enough to be the sculptor of the Olympian Zeus, and even the lover of Pantalces (on this point see below). The utmost that can be granted to such arguments is the establishment of a bare possibility, which cannot avail for the decision of so important a question, especially against the arguments on the other side, which we now proceed to notice.

The question of the age of Pheidias is inseparably connected with one still more important, the whole history of the artistic decoration of Athens during the middle of the fifth century B.C., and the consequent creation of the Athenian school of perfect sculpture; and both matters are intimately associated with the political history of the period. We feel it necessary, therefore, to discuss the subject somewhat fully, especially as all the recent English writers with whose works we are acquainted have been content to assume the conclusions of Müller, Sillig, and others, without explaining the grounds on which they rest; while even the reasons urged by those authorities themselves seem to admit of some correction as well as confirmation. The chief point at issue is this: is there not in the great Athenian school of sculpture, of which Pheidias was the head, its rise at the commencement of the Persian wars, or after the settlement of Greece subsequent to those wars? To those who understand the influence of war upon the arts of peace, or who are intimately acquainted with that period of Greek history, the mode of stating the question almost suggests its solution. But it is necessary to descend to details. We must first glance at the political history of the period, to see what opportunities were furnished for the cultivation of art, and then compare the probabilities thus suggested with the known history of the art of statue and sculpture.

In the period immediately following the battle of Marathon, in b.c. 490, we may be sure that the attention of the Athenians was divided between the effects of the recent struggle and the preparation for its repetition; and there could have been but little leisure for the study of art. To come to the immediate question of art. Though the argument of Müller, that the spoils of Marathon must have been but small, is pretty successfully answered by Thiersch, the probability that the tithe of those spoils, which was dedicated to the gods, awaited its proper destination till more settled times, is not so easily disposed of: indeed we learn from Thucydides (i. 13) that a portion of these spoils (αυτ'α της Μηδικα) were reckoned among the treasures of Athens so late as the beginning of the Peloponnesian war. During the occupation of Athens by the Persians, such a work as the colossal statue of Athena Promachus would, of course, have been destroyed in the burning of the Acropolis, had it been already set up; which it surely would have been, in the space of ten years, if, as Thiersch supposes, it had been put in hand immediately after the battle of Marathon. To assume, on the other hand, as Thiersch does, that Pheidias, in the flight to Sais, succeeded in carrying with him his unfinished statue, with his moulds and implements, and so went on with his work, seems to us a manifest absurdity. We are thus brought to the end of the Persian invasion, when the Athenians found their city in ruins, but obtained, at least in part, the means of restoring it in the spoils which were divided after the battle of Platea (n. c. 479). Of that part of the spoil which fell to the share of Athens, a tithe would naturally be set apart for sacred uses, and would be added to the tithe of the spoils of Marathon. Nor is it by any means improbable that this united sacred treasure may have been distinguished as the spoils of Marathon, in commemoration of that one of the great victories over the Persians which had been achieved by the Athenians alone. There is, indeed, a passage in Demosthenes (Parapros. § 272, ed. Bekk., p. 428) in which this is all but directly stated, for he says that the statue was made out of the wealth given by the Greeks to the Athenians, and dedicated by the city as an ἀνάμνησις of the war against the barbarians. This can only refer to the division of the spoil at the close of the second Persian War, while his statement that the Athenians dedicated the statue as an ἀνάμνησις, clearly implies that the Athenians were accustomed, through national pride, to speak of these spoils as if they had been gained in that battle, the glory of which was peculiarly their own, namely Marathon. This observation would apply also to the Plataeans' share of the spoil; and it seems to furnish a satisfactory reason for our hearing so much of the votive offerings dedicated by the Athenians out of the spoils of Marathon, and so little of any similar application of the undoubtedly greater wealth which fell to their share after the repulse of Xerxes. But in this case, as in the former, we must of necessity suppose a considerable delay. The first objects which engaged the attention of the Athenians were the restoration of their dwellings and fortifications, the firm establishment of their political power, and the transference to themselves of the supremacy over the allied Greeks. In short, the administrations of Aristides and Themistocles, and the early part of Cimon's, were fully engaged with sterner necessities than even the restoration of the sacred edifices and statues. At length even the appearance of danger from Persia entirely ceased; the Spartans were fully occupied at home; the Athenians had converted their nominal supremacy into the real empire of the Aegean; and the common treasury was transferred from Delos to Athens (b.c. 465); at home Cimon was in the height of his power and popularity, and Pericles was just coming forward into public life; while the most essential defences of the city were already completed. The period had undoubtedly come for the restoration of the sacred edifices and for the commencement of that brilliant era of art, which is inseparably connected with the name of Pheidias, and which found a still more complete opportunity for its development when, after the conclusion of the wars which occupied so much of the attention of Cimon and of Pericles during the following twenty years, the thirty years' truce was concluded with the Lacedaemonians, and the power of Pericles was finally established by the ostracism of Thucydides (b.c. 445, 444). When the treasury of Athens was continually augmented by the contributions levied from the revolted allies. There is, indeed, no dispute as to the fact that the period from b.c. 444 to the breaking out of the Peloponnesian War, b.c. 431, was that during which the most important works of art were executed, under the administration of Pericles and under the superintendence of Pheidias. The question really in dispute regards only the commencement of the period.

An important event of Cimon's administration affords a strong confirmation to the general conclusion suggested by the above view of the history of the period: we refer to the transference of the bones of Theseus to Athens, in the year b.c. 468, an event which must be taken as marking the date of the commencement of the temple of Theseus, one of the great works of art of the period under discussion. In this case there was a special reason for the period chosen to undertake the work; though the commencement of the general restoration of the sacred monuments would probably be postponed till the completion of the defences of the city, which may be fixed at b.c. 457—456, when the long walls were completed. Hence, assuming (what must be granted to Thiersch) that Pheidias ought to be placed as early as the circumstances of the case permit, it would seem probable that he flourished from about the end of the 79th Olympiad to the end of the 86th, b.c. 460—432. This supposition agrees exactly with all that we know of the history of art at that period. It is quite clear that the transition from the archaic style of the earlier artists to the ideal style of Pheidias did not take place earlier than the close of the first quarter of the fifth century b.c. There are chronological difficulties in this part of the argument, but there is enough of what is certain. Perhaps the most important testimony is that of Cicero (Brut. 18), who speaks of the statues of Canachus as "rigidi quàrum ut imitentur verita tem," and those of Calamis as "duo quidem, sed tamem molliora quàrum Canachus," in contrast with the almost perfect works of Myron, and the perfect ones of Polycleitus. Quintilian (xii. 10) repeats the criticism with a slight variation, "Duriora et Tuscanis proxima Callon atque Egesias, jam minus rigida Calamis, molliora adhuc supra dictis Myron feceit." Here we have the names of Canachus, Callon, and Hesigeis, representing the thoroughly archaic school, and of Calamis as still archaic, though less decidedly so, and then there is at once a transition to Myron and Polycleitus, the younger contemporaries of Pheidias. If we inquire more particularly into the dates of these artists, we find that Canachus and Callon flourished probably between b.c. 520 and 480. Hesigeis, or Hegias, is made by Pausanias a contemporary of Onatas, and of Ageladas (of whom we shall presently have to speak), and is expressly mentioned by Lucian, in connection with two other artists, Critios and Nesiotes, as τῆς παλαιάς ἄρτας, while Pliny, in his loose way, makes him, and Alcamenes, and Critios and Nesiotes, all rivals of Pheidias in Ol. 84, b.c. 444 [HEGIAS]. Of the artists, whose names are thus added to those first mentioned, we know that Critios and Nesiotes executed works about b.c. 477 [CRITIOS]; and Onatas, who was contemporary with Polygnotus, was reckoned as a Naedalian artist, and clearly belonged to the archaic school (b.c. 444), while the edifices of art with Calamis, in b.c. 467, and probably flourished as late as b.c. 460. Calamis, though contemporary with Onatas, seems to have been younger, and his name (as the above citations show) marks the introduction of a less rigid style of art [CALAMIS*]. Thus we have a

* It is, however, far from certain that the statue of Apollo Alexieacos by Calamis, at Athens, furnishes a sufficient ground for bringing down his date to the great plague at Athens, in b.c. 430, 429. Pausanias merely assigns this as a traditional reason for the surname of the god, whereas we know it to have been an epithet very anciently series of artists of the archaic school, extending quite down to the middle of the fifth century, B.C.; and therefore the conclusion seems unavoidable that the establishment of the new school, of which Pheidias was the head, cannot be referred to a period much earlier.

But a more positive argument for our artist's date is supplied by this list of names. Besides Ageladas, whom most of the authorities mention as the teacher of Pheidias, Dio Chrysostom (Or. iv. p. 553) gives another name, which is printed in the editions πηθείας, but appears in the MSS. as ΗΠΙΟΤ, out of which ΗΠΙΟΤ may be made by a very slight alteration; and, if this conjecture be admitted, we have, as a teacher of Pheidias, Hegias or Hegesias, who, as we have seen, was contemporary with Onatas. Without any conjecture, however, we know that Ageladas of Argos, the principal master of Pheidias, was contemporary with Onatas, and also that he was the teacher of Myron and Polycleitus. It is true that a new set of difficulties here arises respecting the date of Ageladas himself; and these difficulties have led Thiersch to adopt the conjecture that two artists of the same name have been confounded together. This easy device experience shows to be always suspicious; and in this case it seems particularly arbitrary, when the statement is that Ageladas, one of the most famous statuaries of Greece, was the teacher of three others of the most celebrated artists, Pheidias, Myron, and Polycleitus, to separate this Ageladas into two persons, making one the teacher of Pheidias, the other of Myron and Polycleitus. Certainly, if two artists of the name must be imagined, it would be better to make Pheidias, with Myron and Polycleitus, the disciple of the younger.

The principal data for the time for Ageladas are these:—1. He executed one statue of the group of three Muses, of which Canachus and Aristocles made the other two; 2. he made statues of Olympic victors, who conquered in the 65th and 66th Olympiads, B.C. 520, 516, and of another whose victory was about the same period; 3. he was contemporary with Hegias and Onatas, who flourished about B.C. 467; 4. he made a statue of Zeus for the Messenians of Naupactus, which must have been after B.C. 455; 5. he was the teacher of Pheidias, Myron, and Polycleitus, who flourished in the middle of the fifth century, B.C.; 6. he made a statue of Heracles Alexicacos, at Melite, which was supposed to have been set up during the great plague of B.C. 430-429; and 7. he is placed by Pliny, with Polycleitus, Phraodn, and Myron, at Ol. 67, B.C. 492. Now of these data, the 3rd, 4th, and 5th can alone be relied on, and they are homogeneous with the list, for Ageladas may, as a young man, have worked with Canachus and Aristocles, and yet have flourished down to the middle of the fifth century; the 2nd is entirely inconclusive, for the statues of Olympic victors were often made long after their victories were gained; the 6th has been noticed already; and the 7th may be disposed of as another example of the loose way in which Pliny groups artists together. The conclusion will then be that Ageladas flourished during the first half and down to the middle of the fifth century, B.C. The limits of this article do not allow us to pursue this important part of the subject further. For a fuller discussion of it the reader is referred to Müller, de Phidiae Vita, pp. 11, &c. Müller maintains the probability of Ageladas having visited Athens, both from his having been the teacher of Pheidias and Myron, and from the possession by the Attic pagus of Melite of his statue of Heracles (Scot. ud Aris- toph. Ran. 504). He suggests also, that the time of this visit may have taken place after the alliance between Athens and Argos, about B.C. 461; but this is purely conjectural.

The above arguments respecting the date of Pheidias might be confirmed by the particular facts that are recorded of him; but these facts will be best stated in their proper places in the account of his life. As the general result of the inquiry, it is clearly impossible to fix the precise date of the birth of the artist; but the evidence preponderates, we think, in favour of the supposition that Pheidias began to work as a statuary about Ol. 79, B.C. 464; and, supposing him to have been about twenty-five years old at this period, his birth would fall about 489 or 490, that is to say, about the time of the battle of Marathon. We now return to what is known of his life.

It is not improbable that Pheidias belonged to a family of artists; for his brother or nephew Paenennus was a celebrated painter; and he himself is related to have occupied himself with painting, before he turned to statuary. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 8. s. 34.) He was at first instructed in statuary by native artists (of whom Hegias alone is mentioned, or supposed to be mentioned, under the altered form of his name, Hippias, as above), and afterwards by Ageladas. The occasion for the development of his talents was furnished (as has been already argued at length) by the works undertaken, chiefly at Athens, after the Persian wars. Of these works, the group of statues dedicated at Delphi out of the title of the spoils would not doubt be among the first; and it has therefore been assumed that this was the first great work of Pheidias: it will be described presently. The statue of Athena Promachus would probably also, for the same reason of discharging a religious duty, be among the first works undertaken for the ornament of the city, and we shall probably not be far wrong in assigning the execution of it to about the year B.C. 460. This work, from its name, must have established his reputation; but it was surpassed by the splendid productions of his own hand, and of others working under his direction, during the administration of Pericles. That statesman not only chose Pheidias to execute the principal statues which were to be set up, but gave him the oversight of all the works of art which were to be erected. Plutarch, from whom we learn this fact, enumerates the following classes of artists and artificers, who all worked under the direction of Pheidias: τέκτονες, πλάται, χαλκοτόποι, λιονευροί, βαφεῖς, χρυσοῦ μαλακτηρίας καὶ ἐλάφωντος, ζωγράφοι, ποικιλταῖοι, τοροῦτα. (Plut. Peric. 12.) Of these works the chief were the Propylaæa of the Acropolis, and, above all, that most perfect work of human art, the temple of Athena on the Acropolis, called the Parthenon, was dedicated in the year 438 B.C. at the central point of the Athenian polity and reliigion, the highest efforts of the best of artists were employed. There can be no doubt that the sculptured ornaments of this temple, the remains of which form the glory of our national museum, were executed under the immediate superintendence of Pheidias; but the colossal statue of the divinity, which was enclosed within that magnificent shrine, was the work of the artist's own hand, and was for ages esteemed the greatest production of Greek statuary, with the exception of the similar, but even more splendid statue of Zeus, which Pheidias forthwith executed in his temple at Olympia.
The materials chosen for this statue were ivory and gold; that is to say, the statue was formed of plates of ivory laid upon a core of wood or stone, for the flush parts, and the drapery and other ornaments were of solid gold. It is said that the choice of these materials resulted from the determination of the Athenians to lavish the resources of wealth, as well as of art, on the chief statue of their tutelary deity;
for when Pheidias laid before the ecclesia his design for the statue, and proposed to make it either of ivory and gold, or of white marble, intimating however his own preference for the latter, the people at once resolved that those materials which were the most costly should be employed. (Val.
Max. i. 1. § 7.) The statue was dedicated in the 3d year of the 85th Olympic, n. c. 438, in the archonship of Theodorus. The statue itself will be described presently, with the other works of Pheidias; but there are certain stories respecting it, which require notice here, as bearing upon the life and death of the artist, and as connected with the date of his other great work, the colossal statue of Zeus at Olympia.

The scholiast on Aristophanes (Fax. 605) has preserved the following story from the Atticis of Philochoerus, who flourished about n. c. 300, and whose authority is considerable, insomuch as he was a priest and soothsayer, and was therefore well acquainted with the legends and history of his country, especially those bearing upon religious matters. "Under the year of the archonship of Pythodorus (or, according to the correction of Palmerius, Theodoreus), Philochorus says that 'the golden statue of Athena was set up in the great temple, having forty-four talents' weight of gold, under the superintendence of Pericles, and the workmanship of Pheidias. And Pheidias, appearing to have misappropriated the ivory for the scales of the dragons) was condemned. And, having gone as an exile to Elis, he is said to have made the colossal statue of Zeus at Olympia; but having finished this, he was put to death by the Eleians in the archonship of Scythodorus (or, according to the correction of Palmerius, Pythodorus), who is the seventh from this one (i.e. Theodorus), &c." And then, further down, "Pheidias, as Philochorus says in the archonship of Pythodorus (or Theodorus, as above), having made the statue of Athena, pilfered the gold from the dragons of the chrysal-ephantme Athena, for which he was found guilty and sentenced to banishment; but having come to Elis, and having made among the Eleians the statue of the Olympian Zeus, and having been found guilty by them of peculation, he was put to death." (Scho]d. in Arist. ed. Dindorf ; Frawe, Hist.

Pheidias. 247

(Graec. p. 400, ed. Muller.) It must be remembered that this is the statement of Philochorus, as quoted by the scholiasts; but still the general agreement shows that the passage is tolerable genuine. Of the corrections of Palmerius, one is obviously right, namely the name of Pythodorus for Scythodorus; for the latter archon is not mentioned elsewhere. Pythodorus was archon in Ol. 87, i. n. c. 432, and seven years before him was the archonship of Theodorus, Ol. 85, 3, n. c.
438. In the latter year, therefore, the statue was dedicated; and this date is confirmed by Diodorus
(xii. 31), and by Eusebius, who places the making of the statue in the 2d year of the 85th Olympic.*
This is, therefore, the surest chronological fact in the whole life of Pheidias.†

The other parts, however, of the account of Philochoerus, are involved in much difficulty. On the very face of the statement, the story of Pheidias having been first banished by the Athenians, and forthwith put to death by the Eleians, on a charge precisely similar in both cases, may in all certainty pronounced a confused repetition of the same event. Next, the idea that Pheidias went to Elis as an exile, is perfectly inadmissible.‡ This will be clearly seen, if we examine what is known of the visit of Pheidias to the Eleians.

There can be little doubt that the account ofPhi-lochoerus is true so far as this, that the statue at Olympia was made by Pheidias after his great works at Athens. Heyne, indeed, maintains the contrary, but the fallacy of his arguments will presently appear. It is not at all probable that the Athenians, in their engerness to honour their goddess by the originality as well as by the magnificence of her statue, should have been content with an imitation of a work so unsurpassable as the statue of Zeus at Olympia; but it is probable that the Eleians, as the keepers of the sanctuary of the supreme divinity, should have desired to eclipse the statue of Athena; and the fact, that of these two statues the preference was always on the account of Zeus, is no small proof that it was the last executed.
Very probably, too, in this fact we may find one of the chief causes of the resentment of the Athenians against Pheidias, a resentment which is not likely

* It is not, however, absolutely necessary to adopt the other correction of Palmerius, Θεόδωρος for Πυθόδωρος, since Philochorus may naturally have placed the whole account of the trial, flight, and death of Pheidias under the year of his death;
or the scholiasts, in quoting the account of his death, given by Philochorus under the year of Pythodorus, may have mixed up with it the beginning of the story, which Philochorus had put in its proper place, under the archonship of Theodorus.
The correction, however, makes the whole matter clearer,
and the words αὑτῷ τούτῳ rather favour it.

† It is remarked by Muller, with equal ingenuity and probability, that the dedication of the statue may be supposed to have taken place at the Great Panathenae, which were celebrated in the third year of every Olympic, towards the end of the first month of the Attic year, Hemetabocon, that is, about the middle of July.

‡ The form in which Senea puts this part of the story, namely, that the Eleians borrowed Phel-idias of the Athenians, in order to his making the Olympian Jupiter, is a mere fiction, supported by no other writer. (Senee. Rhet. ii. 6.)
to have been felt, much less manifested, at the moment when he had finished the works which placed Athens at the very summit of all that was beautiful and magnificent in Grecian art. It is necessary to bear in mind these arguments from the probabilities of the case, on account of the meagreness of the positive facts that are recorded. There is, however, one fact, which seems to fix, with tolerable certainty, the time when Pheidias was engaged on the statue at Olympia. Paussanias informs us (v. 11, § 2) that, on one of the flat pieces which extended between the legs of the throne of the statue, among other figures representing the athletic contests, was one of a youth binding his head with a fillet (the symbol of victory), who was said to resemble Pansocrates, an Eleian boy, who was beloved by Pheidias; and that Pantarces was victor in the boys' wrestling, in Ol. 86, n. c. 436.* If there be any truth in this account, it follows, first, that the statue could not have been completed before this date, and also that, in all probability, Pheidias was engaged upon it at the very time of the victory of Pantarces. That the relief was not added at a later period, is certain, for there is not the least reason for supposing that any one worked upon the statue after Pheidias, nor would any subsequent artist have the motive which Pheidias had to represent Pantarces at all. A more plausible objection is founded on the uncertainty of the tradition, which Paussanias only records in the vague terms τοῦκαίναντιτο ἐπόσον κλήμωσιν. But it must be remembered that the story was derived from a class of persons who were not only specially appointed to the charge of the statue, but were the very descendants of Pheidias, and who had, therefore, every motive to preserve every tradition respecting him. The very utmost that can be granted is, that the resemblance may have been a fancy, but that the tradition of the love of Pheidias for Pantarces was true; and this would be fixed, pretty nearly, the time of the residence of the artist among the Eleians. If we are to believe Clemens of Alexandria, and other late writers, Pheidias also inscribed the name of Pantarces on the finger of the statue (Colot. p. 16; Arnob. adv. Gent. vi. 13).

Besides urging the objections just referred to against the story of Pantarces, Heyne endeavours to establish an earlier date for the statue from that of the temple; which was built out of the spoils taken in the war between the Eleians and Pisaeans. The date of this war was Ol. 50, n. c. 580; but it is impossible to argue from the time when spoils were gained to the time when they were applied to their sacred uses: and the argument, if pressed at all, would obviously prove too much, and throw back the completion of the temple long before the time of Pheidias. On the whole, therefore, we may conclude that Pheidias was at work among the Eleians about n. c. 436, or two years later than the dedication of his Athena of the Parthenon.

Now, was he there at the invitation of the Eleians, who desired that their sanctuary of the supreme deity, the centre of the religious and social union of Greece, should be adorned by a work of art, surpassing, if possible, the statue which had just spread the fame of Athens and of Pheidias over Greece; or was he there as a dishonoured exile, banished for peculation? All that is told us of his visit combines to show that he went attended by his principal disciples, transferring in fact his school of art for a time from Athens, where his chief work was ended, to Elis and Olympia, which he was now invited to adorn. Among the artists who accompanied him were Colotes, who worked with him upon the statue of Zeus, as already upon that of Athena, and who executed other important works for the Eleians; Panarbus, his relative, who executed the chief pictorial embellishments of the statue and temple; Alcamenes, his most distinguished disciple, who made the statues in the hinder pediment of the temple; not to mention Paronius of Mende, and Cleoetas, whose connection with Pheidias, though not certain, is extremely probable. It is worthy of notice that, nearly at the time when the artists of the school of Pheidias were thus employed in a body at Olympia, those of the Athenian archaic school—such as Praxias, the disciple of Calamis, and Androthenes, the disciple of Eucalmus, were similarly engaged on the temple at Delphi (see Müller, de Pheid. Vit. p. 28, n. y.). The honour in which Pheidias lived among the Eleians is also shown by their assigning to him a studio in the neighbourhood of the Altis (Paus. v. 15. § 1), and by their permitting him to inscribe his name upon the footstool of the god, an honour which had been denied to him at Athens† (Paus. v. 10. § 2; Cic. Tusc. Quaest. i. 15). The inscription was as follows:—

Φειδίας Ἀρχιμενὸς ἔσω Ἀθηναίος μ’ ἐπώνυμον.

Without raising a question whether he would thus solemnly have inscribed his name as an Athenian if he had been an exile, we may point to clearer proofs of his good feeling towards his native city in some of the figures with which he adorned his great work, such as that of Theseus (Paus. v. 10. § 2), and of Salamis holding the aplustrum, in a group with personified Greece, probably crowning her (Paus. v. 11. § 3). These subjects are also important in another light. They seem to show that the work was executed at a time when the Eleians were on a good understanding with Athens, that is, before the breaking out of the Peloponnesian War.

From the above considerations, making allowance also for the time which so great a work would necessarily occupy, it may be inferred, with great probability, that Pheidias was engaged on the statue of Zeus and his other works among the Eleians, for about the four or five years from n. c. 437 to 434 or 433. It would seem that he then returned to Athens, and there fell a victim to the jealousy against his great patron, Pericles, which was then at its height. That he was the object of some fierce attack by the party opposed to Pericles, the general consent of the chief ancient authorities forbids us to doubt; and a careful attention to the internal politics of Athens will, perhaps, guide us through the conflicting statements which we have to deal with, to a tolerably safe conclusion.

The most important testimony on the subject, and one which is in fact enough to settle the question, is that of Aristophanes (Pox. 603),

* The important bearing of this tradition on the question of the age of Pheidias is obvious.

† He had, however been honoured by the inscription of his name on a column as the maker of the throne of the goddess. (Plut. Per. 13.)
where, speaking of the commencement of the war, he says:—

Πρῶτο μὲν γὰρ ἔρεν ἄτις Φείδιας πρᾶξας κακῶς·

Ita Plutarchus {Peric. 31}, who furnishes us with particulars of the accusation against Pheidias. At the instigation of the enemies of Pericles, a certain Menon, who had been employed under Pheidias, laid an information against him for peculation, a charge which was at once refuted, as, by the advice of Pericles, the gold had been affixed to the statue in such a manner that it could be removed and the weight of it examined (comp. Thuc. ii. 13). The accusers then charged Pheidias with impiety, in having introduced into the battle of the Amazons, on the shield of the goddess, his own likeness and that of Pericles, the former as a bald old man*, hurling a stone with both his hands, and the latter as a very handsome warrior, fighting with an Amazon, his face being partially concealed by the hand which held his uplifted spear, so that the likeness was only visible on a side view. On this latter charge Pheidias was thrown into prison, where he died from disease, or, as the less scrupulous partisans of Pericles maintained, from poison. The people voted to his accuser Menon, on the proposal of Glycon, exemption from taxes, and charged the generals to watch over his safety. Plutarch then proceeds (c. 32) to narrate, as parts of the same train of events, and as occurring about the same time, the attacks upon Aspasia and Anaxagoras, and concludes by distinctly affirning that the attack on Pheidias inspired Pericles with a fear, which induced him to blow into a flame the smouldering sparks of the coming war (Οὐ δὲ διὰ Φείδιον προσέπτωμα τῷ δήμῳ, φοβηθεὶς τὸ δικαστήριον, κλέλατο τὸν πόλεως καὶ ὑποτυφώμενον ἐξακολουθεῖν, ἥλιον διακεκάθισθαι τὰ φηγμήματα, καὶ ταπεινώσει τῶν φύλων). To complete the evidence, Philochorus, though he (or the scholiasts who quote him) has made a confusion of the facts, may be relied on for the date, which he doubtless took from official records, namely the archonship of Pythodorus, or B.c. 432. The death of Pheidias happened about the time of the completion of the last of those great works which he superintended, namely, the Propylaea, which had been commenced about the time when he went to Elis, B.C. 437.

It will be useful to give a synopsis of the events of the life of Pheidias, according to their actual or probable dates.

1. B.C.

11. His Works.—The subjects of the art of Pheidias were for the most part sacred, and the following list will show how favourite a subject with him was the tutelary goddess of Athens. In describing them, it is of great importance to observe, not only the connection of their subjects, but, as far as possible, their chronological order. The classification according to materials, which is adopted by Sillig, besides being arbitrary, is rather a hindrance than a help to the historical study of the works of Pheidias.

1. The Athena at Pellene in Achaea, of ivory and gold, must be placed among his earliest works, if we accept the tradition preserved by Pausanias, that Pheidias made it before he made the statues of Athena in the Acropolis at Athens, and at Ptaiaea. (Paus. vii. 27. § 1.) If this be true, we have an important indication of the early period at which he devoted his attention to chryselephantine statuary. This is one of several instances in which we know that Pheidias worked for other states besides his native city and Elis, but unfortunately we have no safe grounds to determine the dates of such visits.

2. It cannot be doubted that those statues which were made, or believed to have been made, out of the spoils of the Persian wars, were among his earliest works, and perhaps the very first of his great works (at least as to the time when it was undertaken, for it would necessarily take long to complete), was the group of statues in bronze, which the Athenians dedicated at Delphi, as a votive offering, out of the tithe of their share of the Persian spoils. The statues were thirteen in number, namely, Athena, Apollo, Miltiades, Erechtheus, Cecrops, Pandion, Celeus, Antiochus, Aegeus, Acamas, Codrus, Theseus, Phyleus. (Paus. x. 30. § 1.)

3. The colossal bronze statue of Athena Promachus, in the Acropolis, was also said to have been made out of the spoils of Marathon; but it is important to remember the sense in which this must probably be understood, as explained above. Böttiger supposes that it was placed in the temple of Athena Polias (Antientuungen, p. 64, Amalthea, vol. ii. p. 314); but there can be no doubt that it stood in the open air, between the Propylaea and the Parthenon, as it is represented on the coin mentioned below. It was between fifty and sixty feet high, with the pedestal, and the point of the spear and the crest of the helmet were visible as far off as Sunium to ships approaching Athens. (Strab. vi. p. 278; Paus. i. 28. § 2; comp. Herod. v. 77.) It was still standing as late as A.D. 395, when it was seen by Alaric. (Zosimus, v. 6.) It represented the goddess holding up both her spear and shield, in the attitude of a combatant. (Ibid.) The entire completion of the ornamental work upon this statue was long delayed, if we are to believe the statement, that the shield was engraved by Mys, after the design of Parhaisius. (See Mys, Parhaisius: the matter is very doubtful, but, considering the vast number of great works of art on which Pheidias and his fellow-artists were engaged, the delay in the completion of the statue is not altogether improbable.) This statue is exhibited in a rude representation of the Acropolis, on an old Athenian coin which is engraved in Müller's Denkmäler, vol. i. pl. xx. fig. 104.

4. The faithful allies of the Athenians, the Plataeans, in dedicating the title of their share of the Persian spoils, availed themselves of the skill of Pheidias, who made for them a statue of Athena Areia, of a size not much less than the statue in the Acropolis. The colossus at Plataea was an acrophy, the body being of wood, and the face, hands, and feet, of Pentelic marble. (Paus. ix. 4. § 1.) The language of Pausanias, here and elsewhere, and the nature of the case, make it nearly certain that this statue was made about the same time as that in the Acropolis.

5. Besides the Athena Promachus, the Acropolis contained a bronze statue of Athena, of such surpassing beauty, that it was esteemed by many not only as the finest work of Pheidias, but as the standard ideal representation of the goddess. (See Paus. i. 28. § 2; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 6. s. 19. § 1; and especially Lucian, Imag. 4. 6. vol. ii. pp. 453, 464, who remarks upon the outline of the face, the smoothness of the cheeks, and the symmetry of the nose.) It is possible that this was Pheidias's own model of the Athena of the Parthenon, executed in a more manageable material, and on a scale which permitted it to be better seen at one view, and therefore more beautiful. The statue was called Lemnia, from having been dedicated by the people of Lemnos. (Paus. l.c.)

6. Another statue of Athena is mentioned by Pliny (l.c.) as having been dedicated at Rome, near the temple of Fortuna, by Paulus Aemilius, but whether this also stood originally in the Acropolis is unknown.

1. Still more uncertainty attaches to the statue which Pliny calls Oldichus (the key-bearer), and which he mentions in such a way as to imply, probably but not certainly, that it also was a statue of Athena. The key in the hand of this statue was probably the symbol of initiation into the mysteries.

8. We now come to the greatest of Pheidias's works at Athens, the ivory and gold statue of Athena in the Parthenon, and the other sculptures which adorned that temple. It is true, indeed, that none of the ancient writers ascribe expressly to Pheidias the execution of any of these sculptures, except the statue of the goddess herself; but neither do they mention any other artists as having executed them: so that from their silence, combined with the statement of Plutarch, that all the great works of art of the time of Pericles were entrusted to the care of Pheidias, and, above all, from the marks which the successive pieces of wood bear of having been designed by one mind, and that a master mind, it may be inferred with certainty, that all the sculptures of the Parthenon are to be ascribed to Pheidias, as their designer and superintendent, though the actual execution of them must of necessity have been entrusted to artists working under his direction. These sculptures consisted of the colossal statue of the goddess herself; and the ornaments of the sanctuary in which she was enshrined, namely, the sculptures in the two pediments, the high-reliefs in the metopes of the frieze, and the continuous bas-relief which surrounded the cella, forming a sort of frieze beneath the ceiling of the peristyle.

The great statue of the goddess was of that kind of work which the Greeks called chryselephantine, and which Pheidias is said to have invented. Up to his time colossal statues, when not of bronze, were chryselephantine, that is, only the face, hands, and feet, were of marble, the body being of wood, which was concealed by real drapery. An example of such a statue by Pheidias himself has been mentioned just above. Pheidias, then, substituted for marble the costlier and more beautiful material, ivory, in those parts of the statue which were unclothed, and, instead of real drapery, he made the robes and other ornaments of solid gold. The mechanical process by which the plates of ivory were laid on to the wooden core of the statue is described, together with the other details of the art of chryselephantine statuary, in the elaborate work of Guinomèrè de Quinency, Le Jupiter Olympien, and more briefly in an excellent chapter of the work entitled the Menagaries, vol. ii. c. 13. In the Athena of the Parthenon the object of Pheidias was to embody the ideal of the virginit-goddess, armed, but victorious, as in his Athena Promachus he had represented the scourer-goddess, in the very attitude of battle. The statue stood in the foremost and larger chamber (the cella) of the temple. It represented the goddess standing, clothed with a tunic reaching to the ankles, with her spear in her left hand and an image of Victory four cubits high in her right: she was girted with the négis, and had a helmet on her head, and her shield rested on the ground by her side. The height of the statue was twenty-six cubits, or nearly forty feet, including the base. From the manner in which Plato speaks of the statue, it seems clear that the gold predominated over the ivory, the latter being used for the face, hands, and feet, and the former for the drapery and ornaments (Hipp. Mag. p. 290). There is no doubt that the robe was of gold, beaten out with the hammer (σφυρηλατος). Its thickness was not above a line; and, as already stated, all the gold upon the statue was so affixed to it as to be removable at pleasure. (See Thuc. ii. 13, and the commentators.) The eyes, according to Plato (L.c.), were of a kind of marble, nearly resembling ivory, perhaps painted to imitate the iris and pupil; there is no sufficient authority for the statement which is frequently made, that they were of precious stones. It is doubtful whether the core of the statue was of wood or of stone. The various portions of the statue were most elaborately ornamented. A sphinx formed the crest of her helmet, and on either side of it were griffons, all, no doubt, of gold. The aegis was fringed with golden serpents, and in its centre was a golden head of Medusa, which, however, was stolen by Philorus (Isocr. adi Collin. 22; Böckh, Corp. Inscr. vol. i. p. 242), and was replaced with one of ivory, which Pausanias saw. The lower end of the spear was supported by a dragon, supposed by Pausanias to represent Eriochthonius, and the juncture between the shaft and head was formed of a sphenite in bronze. Even the edges of the sandals, which were four δακτυλι high, were seen, on close inspection, to be engraved with the battle of the Lapithae and Centaurs. The shield was ornamented on both sides with embossed work, representing, on the inner side, the battle of the giants against the gods, and on the outer, the battle of the Amazons against the Athenians. All these subjects were native Athenian legends. The base, which of itself is said to have been the work of several months, represented, in relief, the birth of Pandon, and her receiving gifts from the gods: it contained figures of twenty divinities. The weight of the gold is supposed to have been 1,789 pounds, the value of which, as already stated, was so removably at pleasure, is said by Thucydides to have been 40 talents (ii. 13), by Philochorus 44, and by other writers 50: probably the statement of Philochorus is exact, the others being round numbers. (See Wesseling, ad Diod. Sic. xii. 40.) Great attention was paid to the preservation of the statue; and it was frequently sprinkled with water, to preserve it from being injured by the dryness of the atmosphere. (Paus. v. 11. § 5.) The base was repaired by Aristocles the younger, about n. c. 397 (Böckh, Corp. Inscr. vol. i. p. 237: Böckh suggests that, as Aristocles was the son of Cleoetis, who appears to have been an assistant of Pheidas in his great works, this artist's family may have been the guardians of the statue, as the descendants of Pheidas himself were of the Zeus at Olympia.) The statue was finally robbed of its gold by Lachares, in the time of Demetius Poliorcetes, about n. c. 296. (Paus. i. 25, § 7.) Pausanias, however, speaks of the statue as if the gold were still upon it; possibly the plundered gold may have been replaced by gilding. We possess numerous statues of Athena, most of which are no doubt imitated from that in the Parthenon, and from the two other statues in the Acropolis. Böttiger has endeavoured to distinguish the existing copies of these three great works (Auctaunt. pp. 90—92). That which is believed to be the nearest copy of the Athena of the Parthenon is a marble statue in the collection of Mr. Hope, which is engraved in the Specimens of Ancient Sculpture, vol. ii. pl. 9, and in Müller's Denkmüller, vol. ii. pl. xix. fig. 292. A less perfect, but precisely similar copy, stood in the Villa Albani. Copies also appear on the reverse of coins of the Antonii, engraved in this work (vol. i. p. 199). These copies agree in every respect, except in the position of the left hand, and of the spear and shield. In Mr. Hope's statue the left hand is raised as high as the head, and holds the spear as a sceptre, the shield being altogether wanting: on the medals, the left hand rests upon the shield, which stands upon the ground, leaning against the left leg of the statue, while the spear leans slightly backwards, supported by the left arm. An attempt has been made at a restoration of the statue by Quatremère de Quincy in his Jupiter Olympien, and a more successful one by Mr. Lucas in his model of the Parthenon. (See also Flaxman's Lectures on Sculpture, pl. 19.) The statue is described at length by Pausanias (i. 24), by Maxime Porfyrios (Dissert. xiv.), and by Pinly (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19, xxxvi. 5. s. 4, § 4). One of the best modern descriptions is that of Böttiger (Auctaunt. pp. 96—93). It is also well described in Elgin and Phigaelan Marbles (vol. i. pp. 136, 137).

The other sculptures of the Parthenon belong less properly to our subject, since it is impossible to say which of them were executed by the hand of Pheidias, though it cannot be doubted that they were all made under his superintendence. It is, moreover, almost superfluous to describe them at any length, inasmuch as a large portion of them form, under the name of the "Elgin Marbles," the choicest treasure of our national Museum, where their study is now greatly facilitated by the admirable model of the Parthenon by Mr. Lucas. There are also ample descriptions of them, easily accessible; for example, the work entitled The Elgin and Phigaelan Monum. It is, therefore, sufficient to state briefly the following particulars. The outside of the wall of the cella was surrounded by a frieze, representing the Panatheniac procession in very low relief, a form admirably adapted to a position where the light was imperfect, and chiefly reflected, and where the angle of view was necessarily large. The metopes, or spaces between the triglyphs of the frieze of the peristyle, were filled with sculptures in very high relief, ninety-two in number, fourteen on each front, and thirty-two on each side; the subjects were taken from the legendary history of Athens. Those on the south side, of which we possess fifteen in the British Museum, represent the battle between the Athenians and Centaurs at the marriage feast of Peirithous. Some of them are strikingly archaic in their style; thus confirming our previous argument, that the archaic style continued quite down to the time of Pheidias, who may be supposed, on the evidence of these sculptures, to have employed some of the best of the artists of that school, to assist himself and his disciples. Others of the metopes display that pure and perfect art, which Pheidias himself introduced, and which has never been surpassed. The architrave of the temple was adorned with golden shields beneath the metopes, which were carried off, with the gold of the statue of the

* Among the numerous other copies of these works, we may mention the authorised publication of the Marbles of the British Museum, the engravings in Müller's Denkmüller der Alten Kunst, and in the plate in Meyer's Kunstgeschichte. The miniature restorations in plaster by Mr. Henning also deserve attention.

by Lachares. (Paus. l.c.) Between the shields were inscriptions. The tympana of the pediments of the temple were filled with most magnificent groups of sculpture, that in the front, or eastern face, representing the birth of Athena, and that in the western face the contest of Athena with Poseidon for the land of Attica. (Paus. i. 24. § 5.) The mode in which the legend is represented, and the identification of the figures, in each of these groups, has long been a very difficult problem. The most recent and most elaborate essay on the subject is that by Welcker, On the sculptured Groups in the Pediments of the Parthenon, in the Classical Museum, vol. ii. pp. 367, &c.

We pass on to the other works of Pheidias at Athens.

9. A bronze statue of Apollo Parnopius in the Acropolis. (Paus. i. 24. § 8.)

10. An Aphrodite Urania of Parian marble in her temple near the Cenmeicous. (Paus. ibid.)

11. A statue of the Mother of the Gods, sitting on a throne supported by lions, and holding a cymbal in her hand, in the Metrom, near the Cenmeicous. The material is not stated. (Paus. i. 3. § 4; Arrian. Perip. Pont. Eux. p. 9.)

12. The golden throne of the bronze statue of Athena Higieia, in the Acropolis, is enumerated by Sillig as among the works of Pheidias; but we rather think that the words τρισεσυτω refer to the great statue in the Parthenon, and not to the apparent antecedent in the preceding sentence, which is, in fact, part of a digression.

Of the statues which Pheidias made for other Greek states, by far the first place must be assigned to:

13. The colossal ivory and gold statue of Zeus in his great temple in the Altis or sacred grove at Olympia. The fullest description of the statue is that given by Pausanias (v. 11).

The statue was placed in the prodromus or front chamber of the temple, directly facing the entrance, and with its back against the wall which separated the prodromus from the oipothodomos, so that it at once showed itself in all its grandeur to a spectator entering the temple. It was only visible, however, on great festivals, at other times it was concealed by a magnificent curtain; the one used in the time of Pausanias had been presented by king Antiochus. (Paus. v. 12. § 4.) The god was represented as seated on a throne of cedar wood, adorned with gold, ivory, ebony, stones, and colours, crowned with a wreath of olive, holding in his right hand an ivory and gold statue of Victory, with a fillet in her hand and a crown upon her head, and in his left hand supporting a sceptre, which was ornamented with all sorts of metals, and surmounted by an eagle. The robe, which covered the lower part of the figure, and the sandals of the god were golden, the former, as we learn from Strabo, of beaten gold (σφυρίλατος), and on the robe were represented (whether by painting or chasing Pausanias does not say, but the former is by far the more probable) various animals and flowers, especially lilies. The throne was brilliant both with gold and stones, and with ebony and ivory, and was ornamented with figures both painted and sculptured. There were four Victories in the attitude of dancing, against each leg of the throne, and two others at the foot of each leg. Each of the front legs was surmounted by a group representing a Theban youth seized by a Sphinx, and beneath each of these groups (that is, on the face of the bar which joined the top of the front legs to the back) Apollo and Artemis were represented shooting at the children of Niobe. The legs of the throne were united by four straight bars (κανδές) sculptured with reliefs, the front one representing various athletic contests, and the other two (for the back one was not visible) the battle between the Amazons and the comrades of Hercules, among whom Theseus was represented. There were also pillars between the legs as additional supports. The throne was surrounded by barriers or walls (ξυμαία τρόφων τοίχων πεπαν- μένα), which prevented all access to it. Of these the one in front was simply painted, the other, which were adorned with pictures by Panagius. The summit of the back of the throne, above the god's head, was surmounted on the one side by the three Graces, on the other by the three Hours, who were introduced here as being the daughters of Zeus, and the keepers of heaven. The footstool of the god was supported by four golden lions, and chased or painted with the battle of Theseus against the Amazons. The sides of the base, which supported the throne, and the whole statue, and which must not be confounded with the walls already mentioned*, were ornamented with sculptures in gold, representing Helios mounting his chariot; Zeus and Hera; Charis by the side of Zeus; next to her Hermes; then Hestia; then Eros receiving Aphrodite as she rises from the sea, and Peitho crowning her. Here also were Apollo with Artemis, and Athena and Hercules, and at the extremity of the base Amphitrite and Poseidon, and Selene riding on a horse or a mule. Such is Pausanias's description of the figure, which will be found to be admirably illustrated in all its details by the drawing, in which M. Quatremère de Quincy has attempted its restoration. (Böttiger, who also gives an elaborate description of the statue, interprets some of the details differently. Andeutungen, pp. 93—107.) Flaxman also has given a restoration of it (Lectures on Sculpture, pl. xx.), in which he assigns far less importance to the throne than De Quinacy does, and less, indeed, than the description of Pausanias seems to suggest. The dimensions of the statue Pausanias professes his inability to state; but we learn from Strabo that it almost reached to the roof, which was about sixty feet in height. We have no such statement, as we have in the case of the Athena, of the weight of the gold upon the statue, but some idea of the greatness of its quantity may be formed from the statement of Lucian, that each lock of the hair weighed six minae (Jasp. Trag. 25). The completion of the statue is said by Pausanias to have been followed by a sign of the favour of Zeus, who, in answer to the prayer of Pheidias, struck the pavement in front of the statue with lightning, on a spot which was marked by a bronze urn. This pavement was of black marble (no doubt to set off the brilliancy of the ivory and gold and colours), surrounded by a raised edge of Parian marble, which served to retain the oil that was poured over the statue, to preserve the ivory from the injurious effects of the moisture exhaled from the marshy ground of the Altis, just as, on the contrary, water was used to protect the ivory of the Athena from the excessive dryness of the air of the Acropolis; while, in the case of another of Pheidias's chryselephantine statues, the Aesculapius at Epidaurus, neither oil nor water was used, the proper degree of moisture being preserved by a well, over which the statue stood. The office of cleaning and preserving the statue was assigned to the descendants of Pheidias, who were called, from this office. "\textit{Pheidryntas} (φαεδρύντας, fr. φαεδρόν, fr. φαεδρόσ), and who, whenever they were about to perform their work, sacrificed to the goddess Athena Ergane. (Paus. v. 14. § 5.) As another honour to the memory of Pheidias, the building outside of the Altis, in which he made the parts of the statue, was preserved, and known by the name of \textit{Pheidias's workshop} (φιεδαστήριον Φειδίου). His name, also, as already stated, was inscribed at the foot of the statue. (Paus. v. 10. § 3.)

The idea which Pheidias essayed to embody in this, his greatest work, was that of the supreme deity of the Hellenic nation, no longer engaged in conflicts with the Titans and the Giants, but having laid aside his thunderbolt, and enthroned as a conqueror, in perfect majesty and repose, ruling with a nod the subject world, and more especially presiding, at the centre of Hellenic union, over those games which were the expression of that religious and political union, and giving his blessing to those victories which were the highest honour that a Greek could gain. It is related by Strabo (viii. p. 534, a; comp. Vol. Max. iii. 7. ext. 4), that when Pheidias was asked by Pannenus what model he meant to follow in making his statue, he replied, that of Homer, as expressed in the following verses (\textit{H. i.} 528—530).

"\textit{H, καὶ καυσάριν αυτ} αὐτῷ νέως Κρόνιων; Αμβροσίας δέ ἢ ἔρχεται ἀπερήφανῳ ἄνακτιος, Κρατός αὖ ἀθάνατοι μεγένθεν ἐλέειζεν "Ολυμπον."

The imitation of which by Milton gives no small aid to the comprehension of the idea (\textit{Paradise Lost}, lii. 135—137):

"Thus while God spake, ambrosial fragrance fill'd All heaven, and in the blessed spirits elect Sense of new joy ineffable diffus'd."

Expression was given to this idea, not only by the whole proportions and configuration of the statue, but more especially by the shape and position of the head. The height and expansive arch of the forehead, the masses of hair gently falling forward, the largeness of the facial angle, which exceeded 90 degrees, the shape of the eyebrows, the perfect calmness and commanding majesty of the large and full-opened eyes, the expressive repose of all the features, and the slight forward inclination of the head, are the chief elements that go to make up that representation which, from the time of Pheidias downwards, has been regarded as the perfect ideal of supreme majesty and entire comeliness of "the father of gods and men" impersonated in a human form.

It is needless to cite all the passages which show that this statue was regarded as the masterpiece, not only of Pheidias, but of the whole range of Greek art; and was looked upon not so much as a statue, but rather as if it were the actual manifestation of the present deity. Such, according to Lucian (\textit{Imag.} 14), was its effect on the beholders; such Livy (xiv. 28; comp. Polyb. xxx. 15) declares to have been the emotion it excited in Aemilius Paulus; while, according to Arrian (\textit{Disst. Epit.} i. 6), it was considered a calamity to die without having seen it. Pliny speaks of it as a work "\textit{quem nemo aenulatur.}"

(\textit{H. N.} xxxiv. 8. s. 19; § 1; comp. Quintil. xii. 10. § 9.) There is also a celebrated epitaphe of Philip of Thessalonica, in the Greek Anthology, to the effect that either the god must have descended from heaven to earth to display his likeness, or that Pheidias must have ascended to heaven, to behold the god. (Brunck, \textit{Anal.} vol. ii. p. 225):

"\textit{H Θεάς ήλια ἥνε γών ὑναράν, ἑκάκα δεξιον, Φειδία, ὥ σο γ' ἔνθη τῶν θεῶν ὅψιμον."

It was removed by the emperor Theodosius I. to Constantinople, where it was destroyed by a fire in A. D. 475.

Respecting the existing works of art in which the Jupiter of Pheidias is supposed to be imitated, see Böttiger, \textit{Anteenturn.}, pp. 104—106. The nearest imitations are probably those on the old Elean coins, with the inscription \textit{FAEEIGN.} (See Müller Denkmäler, vol. i. pl. xx. fig. 103). Of existing statues and busts, the nearest likenesses are supposed to be the \textit{Jupiter Verospi}, the colossal bust found at Otircoli, and preserved in the \textit{Museo Pio-Clementino}, and another in the Florentine gallery. (See Müller, \textit{Arch.}, d. Kunst, § 349, and Denkmäler, vol. ii. pl. 1.)

14. At Elia there was also a chryselephantine statue of Athena, which was said to be the work of Pheidias. It had a cock upon the helmet. (Paus. vi. 26. § 2.)

16. Of the statues which Pheidias made for other Greek states, one of the most famous appears to have been his chryselephantine statue of Aesculapius at Epidaurus. (Paus. v. 11. § 8; Athenag. \textit{Legat. pro Aristid.} p. 61, ed. Dech."

17. At the entrance of the Isenmumen, near Thebes, there stood two marble statues of Athen and Hermes, surnamed \textit{Pòrmos}; the latter was the work of Pheidias; the former was ascribed to Scopas. (Paus. ix. 10. § 2.)

18. In the Olympiaeum at Megara was an unfinished chryselephantine statue of Zeus, the head only being of ivory and gold, and the rest of the statue of mud and gypsum. It was undertaken by Theocorus, assisted by Pheidias, and was interrupted by the breaking out of the Peloponnesian War. (Paus. i. 40. § 3.) Two interesting points are involved in this statement, if correct: the one, a confirmation respecting the age of Pheidias, who is seen still actively employed up to the very close of his life; the other, an indication of the materials which he employed, in this case, as the core of a chryselephantine statue.

19. Pliny (\textit{H. N.} xxxiv. 8. s. 19), tells a story, which is either suspicious, respecting a contest between various celebrated statues, who, though of different ages, were all living together. The subject for the competition was an Amazon: the artists themselves were the judges, and the prize was awarded to that statue which each artist placed second to his own. The statue thus honoured was by Polycleitus; the second was by Pheidias; the third by Ctesilaus; the fourth by Cydon; and the fifth by Phradmon. If such a competition took place at all, it must have been toward the close of the life of Pheidias. (Comp. POLYCLEITUS.)

The Amazon of Pheidias is highly praised by Lucian (Imag. 4, vol. ii. p. 462). The Amazon of the Vatican, preparing to leap forward, is supposed to be a copy of it. (Müller, Archol. d. Kunst, § 121.)

20, 21, 22. Pliny (l.c.) mentions three bronze statues by Pheidias, which were at Rome in his time, but the original position of which is not known, and the subjects of which are not stated: "putti dusigma, quae Cato in ea quum aceo aquis (sc. Fortuna) posuit pellida, et alteram colossicum nudum."

23. The same writer mentions a marble Venus, of surpassing beauty, by Pheidias, in the portico of Octavia at Rome. He also states that Pheidias put the finishing hand to the celebrated Venus of his disciple Alemenes. (H. N. xxxvi. 5. s. 4. § 3.)

24. The well-known colossal statue of one of the Dioscuri, with a horse, on the Monte Cavallo at Rome, standing on a base, which is evidently much more recent than the statue, and which bears the inscription OPUS FIDIAE, is supposed, from the character of the workmanship, to be rightly ascribed to Pheidias; but antiquarians are by no means unanimous on this point. Possibly it may be the alteram colossicum nudum of which Pliny speaks. (see Platen and Bunsen, Beschreibung Rom, vol. ii. pt. 2. p. 404 ; Wagner, Kunstblatt, 1824, Nos. 93, 94, 96—98; and the engraving in Meyer's Kunstgeschichte, pl. 15.)

Among the statues falsely ascribed to Pheidias, were the Nemesis of Agoracritus, and the Time or Opportunity of Lyssippus (Austen. Ep. 12; see the arts). At Patara in Lycia there were statues of Zeus and Apollo, respecting which it was doubted whether they were the works of Pheidias or of Bryaxis. (Clem. Alex. Protrep. p. 30, c; comp. Tzetz. Chil. viii. 33; Cedren. p. 255, 4, ed. Venet.) This list of the works of Pheidias clearly proves the absurdity of the statement which was put forth by the depreciators of the Elgin marbles, that he never worked in marble. Pliny also expressly states the fact:—"sculpit et marmora." (H. N. xxxvi. 5. s. 4. § 4.)

Pheidias, like most of the other great artists of Greece, was as much distinguished for accuracy in the minutest details, as for the majesty of his colossal figures; and, like Lyssippus, he amused himself and gained fame by his skill, in making images of minor objects, such as cicadas, bees, and flies (Julian, Epist. viii. p. 377, a.). This statement, however, properly refers to his works in the department of tevortinus, or caelatura, that is, chasing, engraving, and embossing in metals; of which art we are informed by Pliny that he was the first great master (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 1; comp. Dict. of Antiq. art, Caelatura). Great parts of the gold on his chrysselephantine statues we know to have been chased or embossed, though it is necessary to avoid confounding these ornaments with the polychromatic decorations which were also lavished upon the statues. The shields of the statues of Zeus and Athena were covered with plates of gold, the reliefs in which belong to the department of caelatura, as does the hair of his Athena, and also the sceptre of his Zeus, which was of all sorts of metals. The shield of his Athenian Promachus furnishes another example of the art, though the chasing on it was executed not by himself, but by Mys. Chased silver vessels, ascribed to him (whether rightly or not, may well be doubted), were in use in Rome in the time of Martial, who describes the perfectly natural representation of the fish upon such a vessel, by saying "adde aquam, natahini!" (iii. 35; comp. Niceph. Greg. Hist. viii.)

It has been stated already that Pheidias was said to have been a painter before he became a sculptor. Pliny states that the temple of the Olympian Zeus at Athens was painted by him (H. N. xxxiv. 18. § 5).

III. The Art of Pheidias. After the remarks, which have been made incidentally in the two preceding sections of this article, it is unnecessary to say much more upon the characteristics of the art of Pheidias. In one word, its distinguishing character was ideal beauty, and that of the sublimest order, especially in the representation of divinities, and of subjects connected with their worship. While on the one hand he set himself free from the stiff and unnatural forms which, by a sort of religious precedent, had fettered his predecessors of the archaic or hieniac school, he never, on the other hand, descended to the exact imitation of any human model, however beautiful; he never represented that distorted action, or expressed that vehement passion, which lie beyond the limits of repose; nor did he ever approach to that almost meretricious grace, by which some of his greatest followers, if they did not corrupt the art itself, gave the occasion for its corruption in the hands of their less gifted and spiritual imitators. The analogy between the works of Pheidias and Polycleitus, as compared with those of their successors, on the one hand, and the productions of Aeschylus and Sophocles as compared with those of Euripides, on the other, is too striking not to have been often noticed; and the difference is doubtless to be traced to the same causes in both instances, causes which were at work in the social life of Greece, and which left their impression upon art, as well as upon literature, though the process of corruption, as is natural, went on more rapidly in the latter than in the former. In both cases, the first step in the process might be, and has often been, mistaken for a step in advance. There is a refinement in that sort of grace and beauty, which appeals especially to sense and passion, a fuller expression of those emotions with which ordinary human nature sympathizes. But the sort of perfection is the riper of the two, which indicates that decay is about to commence. The mind is pleased, but not elevated: the work is one to be admired but not to be imitated. Thus, while the works of Callimachus, Praxiteles, and Scopas, have sometimes been preferred by the general taste to those of Pheidias, the true artist and the aesthetic critic have always regarded the latter as the best specimens of ideal sculpture, and the best examples for the student which the whole world affords. On the latter point especially the judgment of modern artists, and of scholars who have made art their study, respecting the Elgin marbles, is singularly unanimous. It is superfluous to quote those testimonies, which will be found in the works already referred to, and in the other standard writings upon ancient art, and which may be summed up in the declaration of Weleker, that "the British Museum possesses in the works of Pheidias a treasure with which nothing can be compared in the whole range of ancient art." (Class. Mus. vol. ii. p. 368) but it is of importance to refer to Cicero's recognition of the ideal character of the works of Pheidias (Orat. 2):—"Haecque et Phidiae simulacris, quibus nihil in illo genere perfectius videtur, et hic picturis, quas nominavi, cogitare tamen possumus pulchriora. Nunc vero illa artis, quae fuerat Jovis formam, aut Mercuricam, contemplabatur aliquem, qui quo simulatuniom diverser, sed ipse in mente insidiat, species publictudinis eximias quaesum, quam tuisens in opere defensa, adeo simulatuniom artem et num diripiat." It was the universal judgment of antiquity that no improvement could be made on his models of divinities. (Quintil. x. 10. § 3.)

It is sometimes mentioned, as a proof of Pheidias's perfect knowledge of his art, that in his colossal statues he purposely altered the right proportions, making the upper parts unnaturally large, in order to compensate for their diminution in perspective. This notion, however, which is derived from a passage in Plato (Sophist. p. 235, f.; comp. Tzetz. Chil. xi. 381), does not seem to be sufficiently well founded; all that we know of the ancient colossal statues leads rather to the idea that the parts were all in due proportion, and that the breadth and boldness of the masses secured the proper impression on the eye of the spectator. As a proof of Pheidias's knowledge of the anatomical department of his art, it is affirmed by Lucian that from the claw of a lion he calculated the size of the whole animal. (Hermitin. 54, vol. i. 785.) The chief modern authorities on the subject, in addition to the histories of art by Winckelmann, Meyer, Müller, Hirt, Kugler, &c., are the following,—Müller, de Phidiae Vita et Operibus Com- mentationes tres, Gotting, 1827; David, in the Biographia Universelle; Vöckel, Ueber den grossen Tempel und die Statuen des Jupiter zu Olympia, Leipzig, 1794; Siebenkees, Ueber den Tempel und die Bild- stüde des Jupiter zu Olympia, Nürnberg, 1795; Quadremere de Quincy, Jupiter Olympien, &c.; Schorn, Ueber die Studien der Griechischen Künstler; Preller, in Ersch and Gruber's Encyclopädie.

2. A son of the great Pheidias, made, with his brother Ammonias, the colossal statue of a sitting ape, of a sort of basalt, which is at Rome, in the Capitoline Museum. On the base is the inscription

ΦΙΑΙΑΚ ΚΑΙ ΑΜΜΟΝΙΟΙΚ ΑΜΦΟΤΕΡΟΙ ΦΙΑΙΟΤ ΕΠΙΟΤΩΝ.

PHEIDIPPIDES (Φιδίππιδης), a courier, was sent by the Athenians to Sparta in a. c. 490, to ask for aid against the Persians, and arrived there on the second day from his leaving Athens. The Spartans declared that they were willing to give the required help, but unable to do so immediately, as religious scruples prevented their marching from home before the full moon (see Dict. of Ant. s. v. Carneia). On the return of Pheidippides to Athens, he related that, on his way to Sparta, he had fallen in with Pan, on Mount Parnithium, near Tegen, and that the god had bid him ask the Athenians why they paid him no worship, though he had been hitherto their friend, and ever would be so. In consequence of this revelation, they dedicated a temple to Pan, after the battle of Marathon, and honoured him thenceforth with annual sacrifices and a torch-mace (Herod. v. 105, 106; Paus. i. 28, viii. 54; Corn. Nep. Milit. 4; Dict. of Ant. s. v. Lampadophoros). In Pausanas and Cornelius Nepos the form of the name is Pheiddipides, which we also find as a various reading in Herodotus. (E. E.)

PHEIDIPPOS (Φίδειππος), a son of Thessalus, the Hercleid, and brother of Antiphos, led the warriors of the Sporades in thirty ships against Troy. (Hom. H. ii. 678; Strab. x. p. 444.) [L. S.]

PHEIDIPPOS, a vase-painter, whose name appears on a vase in the Camino collection. (R. Rochette, Lettres à M. Schom, p. 65, 2nd ed.) [P. S.]

PHEIDON (Φείδων). 1. Son of Aristodamides, and king of Argos, was the tenth, according to Ephorus, but, according to Theopompos, the sixth in lineal descent from Teneus. Teneus himself being reckoned as the fifth from Hercules. Having broken through the limits which had been placed on the authority of his predecessors, Pheidon changed the government of Argos to a despotism. He then restored her supremacy over Cleonae, Phlius, Sicyon, Epidaurus, Troezen, and Aegina, the cities of her confederacy, "which had before been so nearly dissolved as to leave all the members practically independent." And this, as Mr. Grote observes, is the meaning of what Ephorus tells us in mythical language, that Pheidon recovered "the whole lot of Teneus" (τοιον ηθυλν δενν τον Τηνους), after it had been torn asunder into several parts. He appears next to have attacked Corinth, and to have succeeded in reducing it under his dominion. Not a content however with this, and wishing to render his power there more secure, he sent to require of the Corinthians, for military service, 1000 of their most warlike citizens, intending to make away with them; but Abpron, one of Pheidon's friends, frustrated the design by revealing it to Dander, who had been appointed to command the body of men in question. We hear further, that Pheidon, putting forward the title of his legendary descent, aimed at the extension of his supremacy over all the cities which Hercules had ever taken,—a claim that reached to the greater part of the Peloponnesus. It seems to have been partly as the holder of such supremacy, and partly as the representative of Hercules by lineal descent, that the Pisans invited him, in the 8th Olympiad, to aid them in excluding the Eleians from their usurped presidency at the Olympic games, to celebrate them jointly with themselves. The invitation quite fell in with the ambitious pretensions of Pheidon, who succeeded in dispossessing the Eleians; but the latter, not long after, defeated him, with the aid of Sparta, and recovered their privilege. Thus apparently fell the power of Pheidon; but as to the details of the struggle we have no information. He did not fail, however, without leaving some very striking and permanent traces of his influence upon Greece. It may have been, as bishop Thirlwall suggests, in prosecution of his vast plans, that he furnished his brother Caranus with the means of founding a little kingdom, which became the core of the Macedonian monarchy. And a more undoubted and memorable act of his was his introduction of copper and silver coinage, and of a new scale of weights and measures, which, through his influence, became prevalent in the Peloponnesus, and ultimately throughout the greater portion of Greece. The scale in question was known by the name of the Aeginetan, and it is usually supposed, according to the statement of Ephorus, that the coinage of Pheidon was struck in Aegina; but there seems good reason for believing, with Mr. Grote, that what Pheidon did was done in Argos, and nowhere else,—that "Pheidonian measures" probably did not come to bear the specific name of Aeginetan until there was another scale in vogue, the Euboeic, from which to distinguish them,—and that both the epithets were probably derived, not from the place where the scale first originated, but from the people whose commercial activity tended to make them most generally known,—in the one case the Aeginetans, in the other case the inhabitants of Chelics and Eretria.

We have supposed that the date of Pheidon there is some considerable discrepancy of statement. Pausanias mentions the 8th Olympiad, or b. c. 748, as the period at which he presided at the Olympic games; but the Parian marble, representing him as the eleventh from Hercules, places him in b. c. 895. Hence Larcher and others would understand Pausanias to be reckoning the Olympiads, not from Coroebus, but from Iphitus; but Pausanias and Ephorus tell us that the Olympiad which Pheidon celebrated was omitted in the Eleian register, and we know that there was no register of the Olympiads at all before the Olympiad of Coroebus in b. c. 776. On the other hand, Herodotus, according to the common reading of the passage (vii. 127), calls Pheidon the father of Leocedes, one of the suitors of Agristus, the daughter of Cleithenes of Sicyon; and, as this would bring down the Argive tyrant to a period at least a hundred years later than the one assigned him by Pausanias, some critics have suspected a mututation of the title of Herodotus, while others would alter that of Pausanias from the 8th to the 28th Olympiad, and others again suppose two kings of Argos of the name of Pheidon, and imagine Herodotus to have confounded the later with the earlier. Of these views, which that ascribes incorrectness to the received reading of the passage in Herodotus is by far the most tenable. At any rate, the date of Pheidon is fixed on very valid grounds, which may be found in Clinton, to about the middle of the eighth century b. c.

2. An ancient Corinthian legislator, of uncertain date, who is said by Aristotile to have had in view an arrangement which provided for a fixed and unchangeable number of citizens, without attempting to equalize property (Arist. Pol. ii. 3, ed. Götting; Götting. ad loc.). The scholar on Pindar (Ol. xii. 20) appears to confound this Pheidon with the Argive tyrant, though Müller explains it by saying (Dor. i. 7. § 15) that the latter was sometimes called a Corinthian, because Corinth lay in his dominions. The words, however, of the scholiast, Πηθέων τις άξιω Καπνίνως, will not admit of this charitable interpretation. We have no ground at all for identifying the king of Argos with the Corinthian legislator of Aristotile.

3. One of the thirty tyrants established at Athens in b. c. 404 (Xen. Hell. ii. 3. § 2). He was strongly opposed to Critias and his party in the government, and, therefore, at the battle of Munychia he was appointed one of the new Council of Ten, in the hope that he would bring about a reconciliation with the exiles in the Peiraeae. But he showed no willingness at all for such a course, and we find him shortly after going to Sparta to ask for aid against the popular party. (Xen. Hell. ii. 4. §§ 23, 26; Lys. c. Eustr. p. 125.)

4. An Athenian, who, if we may believe a story preserved in St. Jerome's Paris. i. p. 186; comp. Schmid. ad Xen. Hell. ii. 3. § 2), was slain at a banquet by the thirty tyrants, who then obliged his daughters to dance naked before them on the floor that was stained with their father's blood. To avoid further and worse dishonour, the maidens drowned themselves.

5. A character in the ἤπειρορροφος of the comic poet Mnesimachus. From the context of the fragment in which his name occurs, he seems to have been one of the Phylarchs, who superintended the cavalry of Athens (Mnesim. ap. Ath. ix. p. 402, f.; Meineke, Fragm. Com. Græce. vol. iii. pp. 568, 571). The name occurs also in the Πηνίας of Antiphanes, but does not refer to any real person. (Antiph. ap. Ath. vi. p. 223, a.; Meineke, Fragm. Com. Græce. vol. iii. p. 106.)

PHEMO'NE. [OSSA.]

PHE'MIUS (Φημιος). 1. The famous minstrel, who was the son of Terpium, and entertained with his songs the hero, the son of Odysseus of Ithaca. (Homer. Od. i. 154, xxii. 330, &c. xvii. 263.)

2. One of the suitors of Helen. (Hymn. Fab. 81.)

3. The father of Aegeus, and accordingly the grand-father of Theseus, who is hence called Φημιου πατείς. (Lycoph. 1324, with the note of Tzetze.)

PHE'MONE'ÖE (Φημονώη), a mythical Greek poetess of the ante-Homeric period, was said to have been the daughter of Apollo, and his first priestess at Delphi, and the inventor of the hexameter verse (Paus. x. 5. § 7, 6. § 7; Strab. ix. p. 419; Plin. H. N. vii. 57; Clem. Alex. Strom. i. pp. 323, 334; Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 1094; Eust. Prolog. ad Iliad.; and other authors cited by Fabricius). Some writers seem to have placed her at Delos instead of Delphi (Att. Fort. p. 2690, Puth. Aet. eur. i. 544; att. 1345, with the Calycean Sybil (ad Vic. Aen. iii. 445). The tradition which ascribed to her the invention of the hexameter, was by no means universal; Pausanias, for example, as quoted above, calls her the first who used it, but in another passage (x. 12. § 10) he quotes an hexameter dithich, which was ascribed to the Pleiades, who lived before Phemoneō; the traditions respecting the invention of the hexameter are collected by Fabricius (Bibl. Græce. vol. i. p. 207). There were poems which went under the name of Phemoneō, like the old religious poems which were ascribed to Orpheus, Musaeus, and the other mythological bards. Melampus, for example, quotes from her in his book περί παλαμών (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 116); and Pliny quotes from her respecting eagles and hawks, evidently from some book of augury, and perhaps from a work which is still extant in MS., entitled Oroncefothium (Plin. H. N. x. 3, 8. 9; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. pp. 210, 211; Olearii, Dissert. de poetariis Graecis, Hamb. 1734, 4to.). There is an epigram of Antipater of Thessalia, alluding to Phemonoe, dressed in a φάτον. (Brunck, AnaL vol. ii. p. 114, No. 22; Ath. Pol. vi. p. 596.)

PHENEUS (Φήνευς). 1. An Arcadian autotchthon, is said to have founded the town of Pheneus in Arcadia. (Paus. viii. 14. § 4.)

2. A son of Melas, was slain by Tydeus (Apolloc. i. 8. § 5.)

PHERAEO (Φηραέο). 1. A surname of Artemis at Phere in Thessaly, at Argos and Sicyon, where she had temples. (Callim. Hymn. in Dian, 259; Paus. ii. 10. § 6, 23, § 5.)

2. A surname of Hecate, because she was a daughter of Zeus and Pherae, the daughter of Aeolus, or because she had been brought up by the shepherds of Phere, or because she was worshipped at Phere. (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 1160; Spanheim, ad Callim. l. c.)

PHERAULAS (Φήραυλας). is introduced by Xenophon, in the Cyropaedeis, as a Persian of humble birth, but a favourite with Cyrus, and distinguished by qualities of body and mind which would not have dishonoured the noblest rank. He comes before us in particular as the hero of a graphic scene, exhibiting a disregard of wealth, such as is usually called romantic. (Xen. Cyrop. ii. 3. §§ 7, &c. iii. 8.)

PHERECLUS (Φήρεκλος), a son of Harmonides, is said to have built the ship in which Paris carried off Helen, and to have been slain in the Trojan war by Meriones. (Hom. II. v. 59, &c.; Plut. Thes. 17.)

PHERE'CRATES (Φηρεκράτης), of Athens, was one of the best poets of the Old Comedy (Anm. de Com. p. xxviii.). He was contemporary with the comic poets Cratinus, Crates, Eupolis, Plato, and Aristophanes (Suid. s. v. Πατρέας), being some-what younger than the first two, and somewhat older than the others. One of the most important testimonies respecting him is evidently corrupted, but can be amended very well; it is as follows (Anon. de Com. p. xxix.):—Φηρεκράτης Ἀθηναῖος νῦν ἐκδέχεται γυνόμενος, ἡ δὲ ὑποκρίτις ἐξήλκει Κράτητα. Καὶ αὐτὸ τοῦ μὲν λαδερίου ἀπέστροφ, πρᾶγμα δὲ εἰσηγομένου καὶ ἤφαγόμενος γενειόφορος νεφελίτικος μάθων. Dohre corrects the passage thus:—Φ. Α. νῦν ἐπὶ Θεόδορον, γενειόφορος δὲ ὑποκρίτις ἐξήλκει Κράτητα, κ. τ. λ. and his emendation is approved by Meineke and others of our best critical scholars. From the passage, thus read, we learn that Pherecrates gained his first victory in the archonship of Theodorus, B. C. 458; and that he imitated the style of Crates, whose actor he had been. From the latter part of the quotation, and from an important passage in Aristotle (Poet. 9), we see what was the character of the alteration in comedy, commenced by Crates, and carried on by Pherecrates; namely, that they very much modified the coarse satire and vituperation of which this sort of poetry had previously been the vehicle (what Aristotle calls η ἱκανωτή ἱδία), and constructed their comedies on the basis of a regular plot, and with more dramatic action.* Pherecrates did not, however, abstain altogether from personal satire, for we see by the fragments of his plays that he attacked Alcibiades, the tragic poet Melanthius, and others (Ath. viii. p. 343, e, xii. p. 538, b.; Phot. Lea. p. 626, 10). But still, as the fragments also show, his chief characteristics were, ingenuity in his plots and elegance in diction: hence he is called Ἀναπαύσας (Ath. vi. p. 206, c; Steph. Byz. p. 43; Suid. s. v. Ἀναπαύσας). His language is not, however, so severely purist as that of Aristophanes and other comic poets of the age, as Meineke shows by several examples.

The invention of the new metre, which was named, after him, the Pherecratean, he himself boasts in the following lines (ap. Perpistaest. x. 5, xv. 15, Schol. in Ar. Nub. 563):—

 Δίδρας, πράξεσθαι τὸν γοῦν ἐξερματικῷ καὶ συμπληκτικῷ ἀναπαύσας.

The system of the verse, as shown in the above example, is which may be best explained as a choriambus, with a spondee for its base, and a long syllable for its termination. Pherecrates himself seems to call it an anaapastic metre; and it might be scanned as such: but he probably only means that he used it in the parabases, which were often called ana- paests, because they were originally in the anaapastic metre (fact we hold the anaapastic verse to be, in its origin, choriambus). Hephæstan explains the metre as an ἕπαθημανελικὸν ἀναπαύσις, or, in other words, an ἀναπαυτικὸν διμετρὸν καταλεκτικὸν (Hephaest. ll. c. comp. Gaisford's Notes). The metre is very frequent in the choruses of the Greek tragedians, and in Horace, as, for example, Grato Pyrra sub antro.

There is a slight difference in the statements respecting the number of his plays. The Anonymous writer on comedy says eighteen, Suidas and Eudoxia sixteen. The extant titles, when properly sifted, are reduced to eighteen, of which some are doubtful. The number to which Meineke reduces them is fifteen, namely, 'Αγροι, Αδράμοιοι, Πάτρες, Νοτεινοικάλακος, 'Επίθεμα καί Θελατα, Τειείου δὲ Πανυκλη, Κορανικὸς, Κραστάλων, Δέρου, Μυμακάνθρωπος, Πετάλη, Τυρανν.innerText, Φευδρακήλη. Of these the most interesting is the 'Αγροι, on account of the reference to it in Plato's Protagoras (p. 327, d.), which has given rise to much discussion. Heinrichs has endeavoured to show that the subject of the play related to those corruptions of the art of music of which the comic poets so frequently complain, and that one of the principal performers was the Centaur Cheiron, who expounded the laws of the ancient music to a chorus of wild men (ἄγροι), that is, either Centaurs or Satyrs; and he

* Dindorf reads υπόστυμος for υποκρίτις in the above passage. This makes no real difference in the meaning, except with reference to Pherecrates having been an actor for Crates. The correction seems arbitrary, and moreover unnecessary, as it expresses somewhat obscurely what is clearly stated in the next clause.
PHERECYDES, the name of two Greek writers, one a philosopher of Syros, and another a logographer of Athens, who are frequently confounded with one another. Suidas, indeed, mentions a third Pherecydes of Leros, but he is the same person as the Athenian, as is shown below.

1. Of SYROS, one of the Cyclades, was a son of Babys. The name of his birthplace, coupled with the traditions respecting the Eastern origin of his philosophical opinions, led many writers to state that he was born in Syria or Assyria. There is some difference respecting his date. Suidas places him in the time of Alyattes, king of Lydia, Diogenes Laëritius (i. 121) in the 59th Olympiad b.c. 544. Now as Alyattes died in the 54th Olympiad, both these statements cannot be correct, and the attempt of Mr. Clinton to reconcile them (Ps. Graec. ii. 343, ed. Müller) cannot be admitted, as Müller has shown (Græcis Hist. Græcis et Graecis, xxxi. 35). The date of Diogenes is the more probable one, and is supported by the authority of Cicero, who makes Pherecydes a contemporary of Servius Tullius (Tusc. i. 16).

According to the concurrent testimony of antiquity, Pherecydes was the teacher of Pythagoras. It is further stated by many later writers, such as Clements Alexandrinus, Philo Byblius, &c., the references to whom are all given in the work of Sturz quoted below, that Pherecydes did not receive instruction in philosophy from any master, but obtained his knowledge from the secret books of the Phoenicians. Diogenes Laëritius relates (i. 116, ii. 46) that Pherecydes heard Pittacus, and was a rival of Thales; which latter statement also occurs in Suidas. It is further related, that, like Thales and Pythagoras, Pherecydes was a disciple of the Egyptians and Chaldeans, and that he travelled in Egypt. (Joseph. c. Ant. p. 1054, e.; Cæd. i. p. 94, b.; Theodor. Meliteniota, Prooem. in Astron. c. 12.) But all such statements cannot, from the nature of the case, rest on any certain foundation. The other particulars related of Pherecydes are not worth recording here: those who are curious in such matters will find some details in the sections devoted to him in Diogenes Laëritius (i. 116—122). It may just be mentioned that, according to a favourable tradition in antiquity, Pherecydes died of the lousy disease or Morbitis Pedicularis; though others tell us that he put an end to his life by throwing himself down from a rock at Delphi, and others again give other accounts of his death.

Pherecydes was, properly speaking, not a philosopher. He lived at the time at which men began to speculate on cosmogony and the nature of the gods, but had hardly yet commenced the study of true philosophy. Hence he is referred to by Aristotle (Met. xiii. 4) as partly a mythological writer; and Plutarch (Sull. 36) as well as many other writers give him the title of Theologus. The most important subject which he is said to have taught was the doctrine of the Mystempsychia, or, as it is put by other writers, the doctrine of the immortality of the soul (Suidas; Cic. Tusc. i. 16). He gave an account of his views in a work, which was extant in the Alexandrian period. It was written in prose, which he states as the first to employ in the explanation of philosophical systems. From this work, however, nothing very far as to state that he was the first who wrote any thing in prose, but this honour, however, must be reserved for Cadmus of Miletus. The title, which Pherecydes himself gave to his work, seems to have been Ἐπτάδικοι, though others called it Θεοκρασία, and others again Θεογονία or Θεωλογία. Suidas says that it was in two books; and there is no reason for rejecting this statement on account of its title Ἐπτάδικοι, since this title has evident reference to the nature of its contents. He maintained that there were three principia (Zeus or Aether, Chthona or Chaos, and Cronos or Time), and four elements (fire, earth, air, and water), from which were formed every thing that exists.

2. OF ATHENS, was one of the most celebrated of the early logographers. Suidas speaks of a Pherecydes of Leros, who was likewise an historian or logographer; but Vossius (De Hist. Graec. p. 24, ed. Westermann) has shown that this Pherecydes is the same as the Athenian. He is said to have lived in Leros, where he having been born in the island of Leros, and an Athenian having spent the greater part of his life at Athens; and it may be added that, except in Suidas, we find mention of only one historical writer of this name. (Comp. Diog. Laërt. i. 119; Strab. x. 487, b.) Suidas also makes a mistake in calling him older than his namesake of Syros; but the exact time at which he lived is differently stated. Suidas places him before the 75th Olympiad, b.c. 480; but Eusebius and the Chronicon Paschale in the 81st Olympiad, b.c. 456, and Isidorus (Orig. i. 41) in the 80th Olympiad. There can be no doubt that he lived in the former half of the fifth century b.c., and was a contemporary of Helianus and Herodotus. He is mentioned by Lucian as one of the instances of longevity, and is said to have attained the age of 85 years. (Lucian, de Macrob. 22, where he is erroneously called Σένος instead of Ἀτρός.)

Suidas ascribes several works to the Athenian or Larian Pherecydes. This lexigrapher relates that some looked upon Pherecydes as the collector of the Orphic writings; but this statement has reference to the philosopher. He also mentions a work of his entitled Παρακείμενος εις ετών, which, however, does not belong to the Athenian. The other works spoken of by Suidas, Περί Λέον, Περί Ιστοριών, Περί τῶν Διανύσων ουρών, may have been written by the historian, but not a fragment of them has been preserved. His great work, which is frequently referred to by the Scholiasts and Apollodorus, was a mythological history in ten books, which is quoted by various titles, in consequence of the diversified nature of its contents. It is sometimes called Ιστορία, at other times Ιστορίανες, and sometimes Αρχαιολογία; and from the numerous extracts which are made from it, we are enabled to make out pretty well the subject of each book. It began with a theology, and then proceeded to give an account of the heroic age and of the great families of that time, with which the pride and religious feeling of the later Greeks so closely identified themselves. The fragments of Pherocides have been collected by Sturtz, Περικείμενα Fragmenta. Lips. 1824, 2nd ed.; and by Car. and Theod. Müllner in Fragmenta Historiorum Graecorum, p. xxxiv., &c., p. 70, &c.

PHERENICUS (Φερενίκος), of Heraclea, an epic poet of uncertain age, who treated of Metamorphoses and similar fabulous tales. Atheneus (iii. p. 78, b.) gives a statement from him respecting the origin of the fig-tree and other trees; and Tzetzes (Chil. vii. 144) speaks of him as one of those who treated of the monstrous and fabulous forms of men, and quotes from him two lines respecting the Hyperborei (comp. Schol. ad Pind. Ol. iii. 26.)

PHERES (Φῆρης). 1. A son of Cratethus and Tyro, and brother of Aeson and Amythion; he was married to Peritylene, by whom he became the father of Admetus, Lycurgus, Ecdemone, and Pernias. He was believed to have founded the town of Phere in Thessaly. (Hom. Od. xi. 259; Apollod. i. 9. §§ 11, 14, iii. 10. § 4, 13. § 8.)

2. A son of Jason and Medea. (Apollod. i. 9. § 23; Paus. ii. 3. § 6.)

PHERETIADES (Φηρετιάδης), i.e. a son of Pheres (Hom. ii. ii. 763; comp. Phereus). Euripides (Iph. Aul. 214) applies the same patronymic to Eumelus, the grandson of Pheres. (L. S.)

PHERETIMA (Φηρετίμα), wife of Battus III., and mother of Arcealus III., successive kings of Cyrene,—"a Dorian woman," says Müller, "transformed into an Oriental sultana." It was doubtful through her violent instigations that Arcealus made the attempt to recover the royal privileges, which his father had lost; and, when he failed in this and was driven into exile, Pheretima fled to the court of Evething, king of Salamis in Cyprus, to whom she made persevering but fruitless applications for an army to effect the restoration of her son. [Evething.] Arcealus, however, recovered the throne with the help of auxiliaries from Samos, and in the cruel vengeance which he took on his enemies we seem to trace again the evil influence of his mother. On being obliged to flee a second time from his country, he took refuge with the Barcaeans, the greater part of whom were hostile to him, and joining with some Cyrenaean exiles, put him to death. Meanwhile, Pheretima had remained in Cyrene, administering the government; but, when she heard of her son's murder, she fled into Egypt to Aryanides, the viceroy of Daricus Hystaspis, and, representing that the death of Arcealus had been the consequence of his submission to the Persians, she induced him to avenge it. On the capture of Barca by the Persian army, she caused those who had had the principal share in her son's murder to be impaled, and, not with content with this cruel vengeance, she ordered the breasts of their wives to be cut off. The rest of her enemies in the city were enslaved, and the place was given up to the government of the Battidae and their party. Pheretima then returned to Egypt, where she soon after died of a painful and loathsome disease. (Herod. iv. 102, 163, 167, 200—202, 263; Polyn. viii. 47; Suid. a. e. ἑλάθ; Thrig. Η Ἱστορικά, §§ 39, 41.) [See above, Vol. i. p. 477.] [E. E.]

PHIRRON or PHERON (Φήρων), king of Egypt, and son of Sesoreis. He was visited with blindness, an hereditary complaint, though, according to the legend preserved in Herodotus, it was a punishment for his presumptuous impertinence in throwing a spear into the waters of the Nile when it had overflowed the fields. By attending to the directions of an oracle he was cured, and the circumstances connected with the restoration of his sight strongly illustrate the general corruption of morals among the Egyptian women of the time. He dedicated an obelisk at Heliopolis, in gratitude for his recovery; and Pliny tells us that this, together with another also made by him but broken in its removal, was to be seen at Rome in the Circus of Caligula and Nero at the foot of the Vatican hill. Pliny calls the Pheron of Herodotus Nurecones, or Noreconeus, a name corrupted, perhaps, from Menophthys. Diodorus gives him his father's name. Pheren is of course the same word as Pharaoh. (Herod. i. 111; Diod. i. 59; Pll. H. N. xxxxi. 11; comp. Tac. Ann. xiv. 14; Bunsen, Aegypt. Stelle in der Weltgeschichte, vol. iii. Urbardensbach, p. 86.)

PHERESEPHONE. [PERSEPHON.]

PIERUSA (Φήρωσα), one of the daughters of Nereus and Doris (Hom. ii. xviii. 43; Hes. Theog. 248). One of the Horse was likewise called Pherusa. (Hygin. Fæt. 183.)

PHIALUS (Φίαλος), a son of Bucolion, and father of Simus, is said to have changed the name of the Arcadian town of Phihala to Phiala. (Paus. viii. i. § 5, v. 39. § 2.)

PHIDIAS. [PHIDEIAS.]

PHIDON. [PHIDDON.]

PHIGALUS (Φιγάλος), one of the sons of Lycaon in Arcadia, is said by Pausanias to have founded the town of Phigala (viii. § 1, though in another passage he is called an autochthon (viii. 39. § 2.)

PHILHA (Φίλα), 1. A Macedonian princess, sister of Desdes the prince of Elymiots, was one of the many wives of Philip of Macedon (Dicaearch. ap. Athen. xiii. p. 537, c.)

2. Daughter of Antipater, the regent of Macedonia, is celebrated as one of the noblest and most virtuous women of the age in which she lived. Her abilities and judgment were so conspicuous even at an early age, that we are told her father Antipater, was in his constant habit of consulting her in regard to political affairs. In n. c. 322, she was given by him in marriage to Craterus, as a reward 259.
for the assistance furnished by the latter to Antipater in the Lamian war (Diod. xviii. 18). But if any dependence can be placed on the authority of Antonius Diogenes (ap. Phot. p. 111, b.), she must have been previously married to Balacrus (probably the satrap of Cappadocia of that name) as early as B. C. 332; and this seems to accord well with the statement of Plutarch that she was already past her prime, when after the death of Craterus, who survived his marriage with her scarcely a year, she was again married to the young Demetrius, the son of Antigonus (Plut. Demetr. 14). The exact period of this last marriage is nowhere indicated, but it seems probable that it must have taken place as early as B. C. 310 (comp. Droysen, Hellasimn. vol. i. p. 216; and Niebuhr, Kl. Schrifft. p. 226); it was certainly prior to 315, in which year the remains of her late husband were at length consigned to her care by Ariston, the friend of Eumenes (Diod. xix. 59). Notwithstanding the disparity of age, Phila appears to have exercised the greatest influence over her youthful husband, by whom she was uniformly treated with the utmost respect and consideration, and towards whom she continued to entertain the warmest affection, in spite of his numerous amours and subsequent marriages. During the many vicissitudes of fortune which Demetrius experienced, Phila seems to have resided principally in Cyprus; from whence we find her sending letters and costly presents to her husband during the siege of Rhodes. After the fatal battle of Ipsus, she joined Demetrius, and was soon after sent by him to her brother Cassander in Macedonia, to endeavour to effect a reconciliation and treaty between him and Demetrius. She appears to have again returned to Cyprus, where, in B. C. 293, she was besieged in Salamis by Ptolemy, and ultimately compelled to surrender, but was treated by him in the most honourable manner, and sent together with her children in safety to Macedonia. Here she now shared the exalted fortunes of her husband, and contributed not a little to secure the attachment of the Macedonian people to his person. But when, in B. C. 287, a sudden revolution once more precipitated Demetrius from the throne, Phila, unable to bear this unexpected reverse, and despairing of the future, put an end to her own life at Candæa. (Plut. Demetr. 22, 32, 33, 37, 38, 43; Diod. xx. 92.)

The noble character of Phila is a bright spot in the history of a dark and troubled period. Her influence was ever exerted in the cause of peace, in protecting the oppressed, and in attempting, but too often in vain, to calm the violent passions of those by whom she was surrounded. She left two children by Demetrius; Antigonus, surnamed Gnatas, who became king of Macedonia; and a daughter, Stratonice, married first to Seleucus, and afterwards to his son Antiochus (Plut. Demetr. 31, 37, 53). Besides this, it appears that she must have had a son by Craterus, who bore his father's name. (Niebuhr, Kl. Schrift. p. 225.) The Athenians, in order to pay their court to Demetrius, consecrated a temple to Phila, under the name of Aphrodite. (Athen. vi. p. 254, a.)

4. A daughter of Demetrius Poliorcetes by his mistress Lamia. (Athen. xiii. p. 577, c.)

Suidas (s. v. "Apatos") has confounded her with No. 2.

PHIADÉLPHUS (Φιλαδέλφος), a surname of Ptolemaeus II. king of Egypt [Ptolemaeus II.], and of Attalus II. king of Pergamum [Attalus II.].

Philadælphus is also the name of one of the Deipnosophists, in Athenæus, who calls him a native of Ptolemais, and describes him (i. p. 1) as a distinguished man in philosophical speculation and of an upright life.

PHIADÉLPHUS, ANNIUS. [CIMBER, ANNIUS.]

PHILAENI (Φιλαινεί), two brothers, citizens of Carthage, of whom the following story is told. A dispute between the Carthaginians and Cyrenaeans, about their boundaries, had led to a war, which lasted for a long time and with varying success. Seeing no probability of a speedy conclusion to it, they at length agreed that deputies should start at a fixed time from each of the cities,—or rather perhaps from Leptis Magna and Hesperides or Berenice, the most advanced colonies of Carthage and Cyrene, respectively, on the Great Syrtis,—and that the place of their meeting, wherever it might be, should thenceforth form the limit of the two territories. The Carthaginians paid high honours to their memory, and erected altars to them where they had died; and from these, even long after all traces of them had vanished, the place still continued to be called "The Altars of the Philaeni" (Sall. Jug. 75; Val. Max. v. 6, ext. 4; Pomp. Mol. i. 7; Oros. i. 2; Solin. Polyhist. 27; Sil. Ital. Bell. Pun. xv. 704; Polyb. ii. 39, x. 40; Strab. iii. p. 171, xvii. p. 836; Plin. H. N. v. 4; Thrige, Res Cyrenensis, §§ 49—51). Without intending to throw discredit upon the whole of the above story, we may remark that our main authority for it is Sallust, and that he probably derived her information from African traditions during the time that he was proconsul of Numidia, and at least three hundred years after the event. We cannot, therefore, accept it unreprovedly. The Greek name by which the heroic brothers have become known to us,—Φιλαινεί, or lovers of praise,—seems clearly to have been framed to suit the tale. The exact date of the occurrence we have no means of fixing. Thrige supposes it to have taken place not earlier than PHILOGRiUS.

400, nor later than 330 B.C., at which last-mentioned period, or rather in 331. Cyrene appears to have become subject to Alexander the Great. (Arr. Anab. vii. 9; Diod. xvii. 49; Curt. iv. 7; Thring, § 53.)

PHILAEUS (Φίλαεος), a Greek poetess of Leucas, appears to have lived at the time of the Sophist Polyaenus, who was a contemporary of Isocrates. She was the reputed authoress of an obscene poem on love (περὶ ἀφροδισίων ἀκόλουθος αὐτῆς ήμα), which was classed by Chrysippus along with the Gastronomy of Archestratus. According to Aeschrolus, however, Philaeus did not write this poem; and in an epitaph supposed to be placed on the tomb of Philaeus, Aeschrolus ascribes the work to Polyaenus. This epitaph, which is written in choliambic verses, and which has been preserved by Atheneus, is given in the collection of choliambic poets appended to Lachmann's edition of Baurius, p. 137, Berol. 1845. (Athen. v. p. 229, f., viii. p. 335, b-e, x. p. 457, d.; Polyb. xii. 13.)

PHILAEUS (Φίλαεος), a son of the Telamonian Ajax and Teecmess, from whom the Attic demos of Philaideae derived its name. (Herod. vi. 35; Plut. Sol. 10; Paus. i. 35. § 2, who calls Philaeus a son of Euryouses.)

PHILAEUS or PHILEAS. [ΗΡΩΕΚΟΣ]

PHILLAGRIUS (Φίλαγριος), of Cilicia, was a Greek rhetorician, and a pupil of Lollianus, and consequently lived in the time of the Antonines. An account of him is given by Philostratus (Hist. Soph. li. 8), from which we learn that he was of a very vehement and quarrelsome disposition, and that after various wanderings he eventually settled at Rome.

PHILLAGRIUS (Φίλαγριος), a Rhodian orator, who chose Hyperides as his model. (Dionys. de Dinarch. 8.)

PHILLAGRIUS (Φίλαγριος), a Greek medical writer, born in Epeirus, lived after Galen and before Orissors, and therefore probably in the third century after Christ. According to Suidas (z. r.) he was a physician of a physician named Namauchius, and practised his profession chiefly at Thessalonica. Theophilius gives him the title of περιοδευτής (Comment. in Hippocr. "Aphor.", in Dietz, Schol. in Hippocr. et Gal. vol. ii. p. 457), which probably means a physician who travelled from place to place in the exercise of his profession. He seems to have been well known to the Arabic medical writers, by whom he is frequently quoted *, and who have preserved the titles of the following of his works:—1. De Iatrepigione. 2. De sua quae Gignivius Destinaturn. 3. De quo Medico destinatur. 4. De Morborum Indiciae. 5. De Arthritis Morbo. 6. De Reman et Vescicula Caelula. 7. De Hepatica Morbo. 8. De Morbo Colico. 9. De Morbo Icteric. 10. De Caueri Morbo. 11. De Morsui Canis. (See Wenrich, De Ascutor. Graecor. Version, et Comment. Avrb. Syriac, &c. p. 296.)

Suidas says he wrote as many as seventy volumes, but of these works only a few fragments remain.

The name appears in a very corrupt form in the old Latin translations of these writers, e. g. Filogrius, Filogriusen, Fandylor.; and even in a modern version it is metamorphosed into Philagrius and Philogrius. See Sontheimer's Zusammengestellte Medizittel der Alteren, &c. 1845, pp. 74, 192.

PHILORETUS. [Πυλορέτος], the name assigned to the author of a short medical treatise, De Pulmon., which is sometimes assigned to a physician named, which are preserved by Oribius, Aetius, and others. In Cyril's Lexionon (Cramer's Anecd. Graecar Paris, vol. iv. p. 196) he is enumerated among the most eminent physicians.

2. A physician, whose father, Philostorgius, lived in the time of Valentine and Valentins, in the latter half of the fourth century after Christ: the brother of the physician Posidonius (Philostorg. Hist. Eccles. viii. 10). Fabricius conjectures that he may be the same person to whom are addressed eight of the letters of St. Gregory Nazianzen (Boill. Graec. vol. xiii. p. 304, ed. vet.). This is quite possible, but at the same time it may be stated that the writer is not aware of there being any reason for supposing St. Gregory's correspondent to have been a physician. [W. A. G.]

PHILAMMON (Φίλαμμων), a mythical poet and musician of the ante-Homerian period, was said to have been the son of Apollo and the nymph Chione, or Philonis, or Lencenos (Tatian, adv. Græc. 62, 63; Ovid, Metam. xi. 317; Philorec. ap. Schol. in Hom. Od. xix. 432, Fr. 63, ed. Müller; Hygin, Fab. 161; Theocr. xxiv. 118). By the nymph Argiope, who dwelt on Parrassus, he became the father of Thamyris and Eumolpus (Apollo, i. 3, § 3; Paus. iv. 33. § 3; Eurip. Rhes. 901). He is closely associated with the worship of Apollo at Delphi, and with the music of the cithara. He is said to have established the choresses of girls, who, in the Delphian worship of Apollo, sang hymns in which they celebrated the births of Latona, Artemis, and Apollo; and some ascribe to him the invention of choral music in general. The Delphic hymns which were ascribed to him were citharoedic names, no doubt in the Doric dialect; and it appears that Terpander composed the first citharoedic names in imitation of them, for Pisturet tells us that some of Terpander's citharoedic names were said to have been composed by Philammon, and also that Philammon's Delphian hymns were in lyric measures (μύλασι). Now Pisturet himself tells us just below, that all the early hymns of the period to which the legend supposes Philammon to belong, were in hexameter verse; and therefore the latter statement can only be explained by a confusion between the lyric names of Terpander and the more ancient names ascribed to Philammon (Plut. de Mus, pp. 1132, a., 1133, b.; Euseb. Chron.; Syneccl. p. 162; Pherecyd. i. c.). Pausanias relates that, in the most ancient musical contests at Delphi, the first who conquered was Crysostemis of Crete, the second was Philammon, and the next after him his son Thamyris: the sort of composition sung in these contests was a hymn of Apollo, which Proclus calls a nome, the invention of which was ascribed to Apollo himself, and the first use of it to Crysostemis (Paus. x. 7, § 2; Procl. Chrest. 13, ed. Gaisford). A tradition recorded, but with a doubt of its truth, by Pausanias (ii. 57. § 2), made Philammon the author of the Lernaean mysteries. According to Pherecydes (ap. Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. i. 23) it was Philammon, and not Orpheus, who accompanied the Argonauts. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. i. p. 214; Müller, Dorier, bk. ii. c. 13, vol. i. p. 352, 2nd ed.) [P. S.]

PHILAMMON, historical. [ARSINOE, No. 5.]

PHILARCHUS. [Φιλαρχος.]

PHILARETUS (Φίλαρετος), the name assigned to the author of a short medical treatise, De Pulmon., which is sometimes assigned to a physician named.
Michael Palaeologus. This is a very curious book upon which the editor has bestowed remarkable care; each Carmen is preceded by a short explanatory introduction. (Wernsdorf's Preface to his edition; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. viii. p. 617, &c.) There are other Byzantine writers of the name of Phile, though of little note. Eunapius Phile wrote a Commentary on four orations of Gregorius Nazianzenus. Johnn Phile is said to have written tetrastichs on some psalms of David, and other kindred subjects. Michael Phile, a priest who lived about 1124, is the author of an iambic epitaph on the empress Irene, and a short poem on Alexia and Joannes, the sons of Isaac Porphyrogenitus. These poems are printed in the old edition of Fabricius' Bibli. Graec.; but Harless did not think it worth while to reprint them in the new edition. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. viii. p. 618. Notes s. t. u. v.)

PHILEAS (Φίλεας). 1. A Greek geographer of Athens, whose time cannot be determined with certainty, but who probably belonged to the older period of Athenian literature. He is not only quoted by Dicaearchus (35); but that a still higher antiquity must be assigned to him, would appear from the position in which his name occurs in Avienus (Or. Mar. 42), who places him between Hellanicus and Sclavus, and also from the words of Macrobius (Sat. v. 20), who calls him a vetus scriptor with reference to Ephorus. Phileas was the author of a Periplus, which is quoted several times by Stephanus Byzantinus and other later writers, and which appears to have comprehended most of the coasts known at the time at which he lived. It was divided into two parts, one on Asia, and the other on Europe. From the fragments of it which have been preserved, we learn that it treated of the following countries among others:—of the Thracian Bosporus (Suidas, s. v. Βόσπορος; Schol. ad Soph. Aj. 870); of the Argonautian promontory in the Propontis (Etymol. M. s. v. "Ἀργοσθένος"); of Assos, Gargara, and Antandros (Macrob. L. c.); of Athineia, a Milesian colony on the Propontis (Steph. Byz. s. c.); of Andria, a Macedonian town (Steph. Byz. s. c.); of Thermopylace (Harpoct. Phot. s. t.); of the Thesprotian Ambraeia (Steph. Byz. s. c.).

Even the coast of Italy was included in the work (Steph. Byz. s. v. "Ἀθηναία"). For a further account of this writer, see Osann, Über den Geographen Philostr. und sein Zeitalter, in the Zeitschrift für die Altertumswissenschaft, 1841, p. 635, &c.

PHILEMON (Φήλημων), an Argive sculptor, of unknown date, whose name is found, with that of his son Zeuxippus, in an inscription on a base found at Hermione, in Argolis, ΦΙΛΕΑKGιIΤΕΞΙΠΠΟΣΦΙΛΕΛΕΠΟΗΝΑΝ, i.e. Φήλημων και Ζεύξιππος Φήλεα ἐπιτήρων. (Böckh, Corp. Inscrip. vol. i. p. 603, No. 1229; Welcker, Kass. Text., 1827, p. 530; R. Rochette, Ecrits de M. Scholz, p. 53.)

PHILEMENUS (Φήλημών), a noble youth of Tarentum, who took a leading part in the conspiracy to betray that city into the hands of Hannibal, b. c. 212. Under pretence of pursuing the pleasures of the chase, he used frequently to go out of the city and return in the middle of the night, and thus established an intimacy with some of the gate keepers, so that they used to admit him on a private signal at any hour. Of this he availed himself on a night previously concerted with the Carthaginian general, and succeeded in seizing on one of the gates, by which he introduced a body of 1000 African soldiers into the city, while Nicon admitted Hannibal himself by another entrance (Polyb. viii. 26—32; Liv. xxv. 8—10). When Tarentum was recovered by Fabius, b. c. 205, Philemennus perished in the conflict that ensued within the city itself; but in what manner was unknown, as his body could never be found. (Liv. xxvii. 16.)

[ E. H. B.]

PHILEMON (Φήλημων), an aged Phrygian and husband of Baucis. Once Zeus and Hermes, assuming the appearance of ordinary mortals, visited Phrygia, and no one was willing to receive the strangers, until the hospitable hut of Philemon and Baucis was opened to them, where the two gods were kindly treated. Zeus rewarded the good old couple by taking them with him to an eminence, while all the neighbouring district was visited with a sudden inundation. On that eminence Zeus appointed them the guardians of his temple, and granted to them to die both at the same moment, and then metamorphosed them into trees. (Ov. Met. viii. 621, &c.)

PHILEMON (Φήλημων). 1. A person whom Aristophanes attacks as not being of pure Athenian descent, but tainted with Phrygian blood. (Arist. Ath. 763.)

2. An actor mentioned by Aristotle as having supported the principal part in the Γεροντωμονια and the Εὔβεβεις of Anaxandreides. The great critic praises him for the excellence of his delivery and for the way in which he carried off by it passages which contained repetitions of the same words, and which an inferior actor would have murdered. (Arist. Rhet. iii. 12, § 3.) [E. E.]

PHILEMON (Φήλημων), literary. 1. The first in order of time, and the second in celebrity, of the Athenian comic poets of the New Comedy, was the son of Dumnus, and a native of Soli in Cilicia, according to Strabo (xiv. p. 671): others make him a Syracusean; but it is certain that he went at an early age to Athens, and there received the citizenship (Suid. Eudoc. Hesych. Anonym. C. p. xxx.). Meineke suggested that he came to be considered as a native of Soli because he went there on the occasion of his banishment, of which we shall have to speak presently; but it is a mere conjecture that he went to Soli at all upon that occasion; and Meineke himself withdraws the suggestion in his more recent work (Frag. Com. Grac. vol. ii. p. 52).

There can be no doubt that Philemon is rightly assigned to the New Comedy, although one authority makes him belong to the Middle (Apul. Flor. § 16), which, if not a mere error, may be explained by the well-known fact, that the beginning of the New Comedy was contemporary with the closing period of the Middle. There is, however, nothing in the titles or fragments of Philemon which can be at all referred to the Middle Comedy. Philemon was placed by the Alexandrian grammarians among the six poets who formed their canon of the New Comedy, and who were as follows:—Philemon, Menander, Diphilus, Philippides, Poseidippus, Apollodorus. (Anon. de Com. p. xxx. Την δὲ νίκα κυριάδις γεγονέται μὲν τοιῷδε ἑς ἀπαντότων δὲ τούτων Φήλημων, Μένανδρος, Διφίλος, Φιλιππίδος, Ποσειδίππος, Ἀπολλόδωρος; comp. Rhucknen, Hist. Crit. Orat. Grac. p. xxv.) He flourished in the reign of Alexander, a little earlier than Menander (Suid.), whom, however, he long survived. He began to exhibit before the 118th Olympiad (Anon. L. c.), that is, about b. c. 330. He was, therefore, the first poet of the New Comedy*, and shares with Menander, who appeared eight years after him, the honour of its invention, or rather of reducing it to a regular form, for the elements of the New Comedy had appeared already in the Middle, and even in the Old, as for example in the Cocalus of Aristophanes, or his son Araros. It is possible even to assign, with great likelihood, the very play of Philemon's which furnished the first example of the New Comedy, namely the Hypobolaiues, which was an imitation of the Cocalus. (Clem. Alex. Strom. vi. p. 267; Anon. de Vit. Arist. pp. 13, 14. s. 57, 38.)

Philemon lived to a very great age, and died, according to Aelian, during the war between Athens and Antigonus (ap. Suid. s. v.), or, according to the more exact date of Diiodorus (xxiii. 7), in Ol. 129, 3, b. c. 262 (see Wesseling, ad loc.), so that he may have exhibited comedy nearly 70 years. The statements respecting the age at which he died vary between 96, 97, 99, and 101 years (Lucian, Macrob. 25; Diod. l. c.; Suid. s. v.). He must, therefore, have been born about b. c. 360, and was about twenty years older than Menander. The manner of his death is differently related; some ascribing it to excessive laughter at a ludicrous incident (Suid. Hesych. Lucian, l. c.; Val. Max. ix. 12. ext. 6); others to joy at obtaining a victory in a dramatic contest (Plut. An Semit respon. gerund. p. 785, b.); while another story represents him as quietly called away by the goddesses whom he served, in the midst of the composition or representation of his last and best work (Aelian, op. Suid. s. v.; Apuleius, Flor. 16). There are portraits of him extant in a marble statue at Rome, formerly in the possession of Raffaello, and on a gem: the latter is engraved in Gravina’s Thea-

Although there can be no doubt that Philemon was inferior to Menander as a poet, yet he was a greater favourite with the Athenians, and often conquered his rival in the dramatic contests. Gellus (xvii. 4) ascribes these victories to the use of unfair influence (ambitus gratiaeque et factionibus), and tells us that Menander used to ask Philemon himself, whether he did not blush when he conquered him. We have other proofs of the rivalry between Menander and Philemon in the identity of some of their titles, and in an anecdote told by Athenaeus (xiv. 594, d.). Philemon was, however, sometimes defeated; and it would seem that on such an occasion he went into exile for a time (Stob. Scrm. xxxviii. p. 232). At all events he undertook a journey to the East, whether from this cause or by the desire of king Ptolemy, who appears to have invited him to Alexandria (Alexiph. Epist. ii. 3); and to this journey ought no doubt to be referred his adventure with Magas, tyrant of Cyrene, the brother of Ptolemy Philadelphus. Philemon had ridiculed Magas for his want of learning, in a comedy, copies of which he took pains to circulate; and the arrival of the poet at Cyrene, whither he was driven by a storm, furnished the king with an opportunity of taking a contemptuous revenge, by ordering a soldier to touch the poet’s throat with a naked sword, and then to retire politely without hurting him; after which he made him a present of a set of child’s playthings, and then dismissed him. (Plut. de Cívit. Ira, p. 458, a, de Vir. Etr. Mar. p. 449, c.)

Philemon seems to have been inferior to Menander in the liveliness of his dialogue, for his plays were considered, on account of their more connected arguments and longer periods, better fitted for reading than for acting (Dennet. Phal. de Eloc. § 193). Apuleius (l. c.) gives an elaborate description of his characteristics:—Reperius tamem apud ipsum malatos sales, argumenta lepide infaeta, agnosse lucide explicatos, personas relibus competentes, sententiae vitæ congruentes; joca non infra soccarm, seria non usque ad cothurnum. Rare apud illum corrupta est, uti errores, concessi amores. Nee eo minus et lene perjures, et amator servilis, et servatus callidus, et amica illudex, et uzor inulcis, et mater indecens, et patruus olivargatus, et sodalix opulitarius, et miles proculitor (gloriorum?) sed et parasiti educes, et parentes tenaces, et meretrici process. The exact fragments of Philemon display much lively wit, elegance, and practical knowledge of life. His favourite subjects seem to have been love intrigues, and his characters, as we see from the above extract, were the standing ones of the New Comedy, with which Plautus and Terence have made us familiar. The jest on Magas, already mentioned, is a proof that the personal satire, which formed the chief characteristic of the Old Comedy, was not entirely relinquished in the New; and it also shows the enmity with which the Athenians, in their pride of intellectual superiority, displayed their contempt for the semi-barbarian magnificence of the Greek kings of the East; another example is shown by the wit in which Philemon indulged

The number of Philemon’s plays was 97 (Diod. xxiiii. 7; Anon. de Com. p. 30; Suid. s. v. as amended by Meineke, p. 46). The number of extant titles, after the doubtful and spurious ones are rejected, amounts to about 53; but it is very probable that some of these should be assigned to the younger Philemon. The following is a list of the titles of those plays which are quoted by the ancient writers, but a few of which are still considered doubtful by Meineke:—Αγοροκος, Αγορίτης, Αθηναίος, Αττικά, Ακαλάχτου, Ακαντενεμη, Ακροφανος, Αποκαρενταν, Ατολις, Αραπουζεως, Αδμιλητις, Βαβολανθως, Γαιως, Ετεχενηδρων, Εω-νωρος, Εαμενικουζεως, Επινικομενος, Εδρυως, Εφερίδα, Εφυνος, Ήπαρδων, Ερασωρος, Ερημων, Εφικτηταρχις, Ερωος, Ευσκεφαλιος, Ευτυχιος, Αχαριστος, Κυνω-λας, Κυνουλία, Μετοι λαμαν, Μογυς, Μυριωδœνες, Μωστης, Νεφις, Νεφιμους, νυς, Νυς, Πυργακαιστης, Παιδαρις, Παιδης, Παλαικλη-Pανγυρις, Παρειων, Πητοκοταυων, Πητραγιος, Πταιχυ Πολια, Ποληδος, Πορφόρος, Ζάδως, Σελευκιος, Σφατητης, Καπανδρηκτης, Καπαν-δροι, Ζαγνηφραντας, Φατμα, Φιλοδοφος, Χιφα. Of all these plays, those best known to us are the Εω-νωρος and Ετεχενηδρων, by their imitations in the Mecanistor and Trimmamus of Plautus. The Muριδονεσ furnishes one of the instances in which poets of the New Comedy treated mythological subjects. Respecting the supposed subjects of the other plays see Meineke, and the article in Ersc and Gruber’s Encyclopædia.

The fragments of Philemon have been printed with those of Menander in all the editions mentioned in the article MENANDER. For notices of the works upon Philemon, as well as Menander, on the latter see Meineke’s Menander et Philemonis Reliquiae, and the articles in Hoffmann’s Lexicon Bibliographicum.

Many of the testimonies respecting Philemon are rendered uncertain by the frequently occurring confusion between the names Philemon, Philetæns, Philetæs, Philippides, Philippus, Philiscus, Philistion, Philon, Phileopon, and others with the same commencement, that is, with the initial syllable Φιwhich is often used in MSS., as an abbreviation of these names. Even the name of Diphius is sometimes confounded with Philemon, as well as with Philon (see Meineke, Men. et Phil. Reliq. pp. 7—11). One of the most important instances in which this confusion has been made is in the title of a collection of fragments, arranged in the way of comparison with one another, under the title Συγκριτι Μεθαφραν και Φιλιστιων, which ought undoubtedly to be και Φιλιστων. (See further under PHILISTION.)

2. The younger Philemon, also a poet of the New Comedy, was a son of the former, in whose fame nearly all that belongs to him has been absorbed; so that, although, according to Suidas, he was the author of 54 dramas, there are only two short fragments, and not one title, quoted expressly under his name. There can be little doubt that some of his father’s plays should be assigned to him. (See Meineke, Menandri et Philomonic Re-PHILEMON.

3. A geographical writer, of whom we know nothing, except that he lived before Pliny, by whom he is several times quoted (H. N. iv. 13. s. 27, xxxvii. 2. a. 11; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 485, ed. Westermann).

4. A grammarian, surnamed ἐκρίτικος, the author of a recension of Homer, which is quoted in the scholia of the Codex Venetus (ad Ili. ii. 258, xvi. 467), and of a commentary, entitled Σωματικα ἐπὶ Ὀμηρον, which is quoted by Porphyry (Quaest. Hom. 8).

5. Of Athens, a grammarian, a work or works on the Attic dialect, called under the various titles of Ἀττικαὶ Μέμει, Ἀττικαὶ φωναὶ, Ἀττικαὶ ὁνήματα ἢ γραώσεις, περὶ Ἀττικῶν ὄνοματων (Ath. iii. p. 76, f. xi. p. 466, e. 469, a. 473, b. 483, a. 646, c. 652, f.). Athenaeus also cites the first book of his παντοδαπῶν χρηστοριῶν (iii. p. 114, d. i. p. 11, d.), which is not improbably a part of the same work. There are other quotations from him in Athenaeus, displaying his accurate knowledge, not only of the Attic dialect, but also of the Latin language (xiv. p. 652, f. iii. p. 114, d.; see also Elyn. Mag. p. 563. 82; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 169).

7. The author of a λεξικόν τεχνογράφικον, the extant portion of which was first edited, from a MS. preserved in the Royal Library at Paris, by C. Burney (Lond. 1812), and afterwards by F. Osann (Berlin, 1821). The author informs us in his preface, that his work was intended to take the place of a similar Lexicon by the Grammarian Hyperchius, for which is the true reading, and not Hyperchus, as it stands in the text of Philenem (Suid. s. n., Τετερέγγος, Ἀεων; Tzetz. Chil. x. 305). The work of Hyperchius was entitled ή τοῦ Ἀλκαθέρρους Τετερεγγοῦς οἰωνάμων τεχνογράφιον καθον κοινοῦν συνελέγοντα, and was arranged in eight books, according to the eight different parts of speech [HYPERECHIUS]. Philenem's lexicon was a meagre epitome of this work, the best parts of which he seems to have omitted: it is, however, not without its value in the department of literary history. It is often quoted in the Etymologicon Magnun. The part of it which is extant consists of the first book, and the beginning of the second, περὶ οἰωναμῶν. Hyperchius lived about the middle of the fifth century of our era, and Philenem may probably be placed in the seventh. All the information we have respecting him is collected by Osann, who also supplies important notices of the other writers of this name. (See also Classical Journal, No. xii. pp. 37—42; Museum Criticum, vol. i. pp. 197—200; Schneider, Ueber Philenem, in the Philol. Biblioth. vol. ii. p. 526.) [P.S.] PHILEMON, an engraver on precious stones, two of whose gems are extant. (Bracci, vol. ii. n. 94, 95. [P. S.] PHILEMON, a physiognomist mentioned by Abu-l-Faraj (Hist. Dynast. p. 56), as having said that the portrait of Hippocrates (which was shown him in order to test his skill) was that of a lascivious old man; the probable origin of which story is explained under Hippocrates, p. 484. He is also said by the same author to have written a work on Physiognomy which was extant in his time in a Syriac translation (see Wenrich, De Auctor. Graecor. Ver. Aral. Syria, Pers. SC. p. 296); and there is at present an Arabic MS. on this subject in the library at Leyden which bears the name of Philemon, but which ought probably to be attributed to Polemo. [POLEMO.] (See Catal. Biblioth. Leyd. p. 461. § 1265; and also the Index to the Catalogue, where the mistake is corrected.) [W. A. G.]

PHILETAERUS.

PHILESTIAS (Φιληστίας), a statuary of Eretria, whose age is unknown. He made two bronze oxen, which were dedicated at Olympia, the one by his fellow-citizens, the other by the Coryneans. (Paus. v. 27. § 6.) [P. S.]

PHILESIUS (Φιλησίος), a surname of Apollo at Didyma, where Branchus was said to have founded a sanctuary of the god, and to have introduced his worship. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8; comp. BRANCHUS.) [L. S.]

PHILESIUS (Φιλησίους), an Achaeus, was an officer in the army of Cyrus the Younger, and, after the treacherous capture of Clearchus and the other generals by Tissaphernes, was chosen in the place of Menon. When the Cyrenian Greeks, tired of waiting for the return of Cheirisophus, determined to remove from Trapezos, Philesius and Sophanes, the eldest of the generals, were the two appointed to proceed on ship-board with the older men, the women and children, and the sick. At Cotyora, Philesius was one of those who attacked Xenophon for having, as was presumed, endeavoured secretly to bring over the soldiers to his project of founding a Greek colony on the Exine, without making any public announcement of it. At the same place, in a court held to take cognizance of the conduct of the generals, Philesius was fined 20 minae (somewhat more than 80l) for a deficiency in the cargoes of the ships in which the army had come from Trapezos, and of which he was one of the commissioners. At Byzantium, when Xenophon had calmed the tumult among the Cyrenians consequent on their discovery of the treachery of Amaxibius, Philesius was one of the deputation which was sent to the latter with a conciliatory message. (Xen. Anat. iii. 1. § 47, v. 3. § 1, 6. § 27, 8. § 1, vii. 1. §§ 32, 54.) [E. E.]

PHILETAERUS (Φιλήταιρος). 1. Founder of the kingdom of Pergamus, was a native of the small town of Tiscium in Paphlagonia, and was an eunuch in consequence of an accident suffered when a child (Strab. xii. p. 548, xiii. p. 623). According to Caryactus (op. Athen. xiii. p. 577, b.) he was the son of a courtezan, though writers who flourished under the kings of Pergamus did not scruple to trace back their descent to Hercules. He is first mentioned in the service of Docimus, the general of Antigonus, from which he passed into that of Lysimachus, and soon rose to so high a degree of favour with that monarch as to be entrusted by him with the charge of the treasures which he had deposited for safety in the strong fortress of Pergamus. He continued faithful to his trust till towards the end of the reign of Lysimachus, when the intrigues of Arsinoe, and the death of the young prince Agathocles, to whom he had been closely attached, excited apprehensions in the mind of Philetaerus for his own safety, and led him to declare in favour of Seleucus. But though he hastened to proffer submission to that monarch he still retained in his own hands the fortress of Pergamus, with the treasures that it contained, and, after the death of Seleucus (B.C. 280), took advantage of the disorders in Asia to establish himself in virtual independence. By redeeming from Ptolemy Coromus the body of Seleucus, which he caused to be interred with due honours, he earned the favour of his son, Antiochus I., and by a prudent, but temporizing course of policy, contrived to maintain his position unshaken for nearly twenty years; and at his death to transmit the government of Pergamus, as an independent state, to his nephew Eumenes. He lived to the advanced age of eighty, and died apparently in B.C. 263 (Lucian, Macrob. 12; Clinton, F. II. vol. ii. p.
401). His two brothers, Eumenes and Attalus, had both died before him; but their respective sons successively followed him in the sovereign power (Strab. xiii. p. 623; Paus. i. 8. § 10. § 4; Van Cappelle, de Regibus Pergamensis, pp. 1—7).
Numerous coins are extant bearing the name of Philetaerus (of which one is given below), but it is generally considered by numismatic writers, that these, or at least many of them, were struck by the later kings of Pergamus, and that the name and portrait of Philetaerus were continued in honour of their founder. Other authors, however, regard the slight differences observable in the portraits which they bear, as indicating that they belong to the successive princes of the dynasty, whom they suppose to have all borne the surname or title of Philetaerus. But it may be doubted whether this view can be maintained. (Eckhel, vol. ii. p. 473; Visconti, Iconogr. Grecquee, vol. i. p. 200—210;
Van Cappelle, pp. 141—146.)

PHILETAERUS.

2. A son of Attalus I., and brother of Eumenes II., king of Pergamus. In B.C. 171, he was left by Eumenes in charge of the affairs of Pergamus, while the king and Attalus repaired to Greece to assist the Romans in the war against Perseus.
With this exception he plays no part in history.
(Liv. xiii. 55; Strab. xiii. p. 625; Polyb. xi. 1.)

3. A brother of Dorylas, the general of Mithridates, and ancestor of the geographer Strabo.
(Strab. x. p. 478, xiii. p. 557.)

PHILETAERUS (Φιλήταρχος), an Athenian poet of the Middle Comedy, is said by Ath-enaeus to have been contemporary with Hyperides and Dipoethes, the latter perhaps the same person as the father of the poet Menander (Ath. vii. p.
342, a., xiii. 387). According to Dicaearchus Philetaerus was the third son of Aristophanes, but others maintained that it was Nicostratus (see the Greek lives of Aristophanes, and Suid. s. v. Αριστοφάνης, Φιλήταρχος). He wrote twenty-one plays, according to Suidas, from whom and from Athenaeus
the following titles are obtained: — Αριστοφάνης, Αταλάντη, Αχιλλέας, Κέφαλος, Κυμνιαστής, Κυνηγής, Λαμπρόφορος, Τεθρίς, Φιλάυλος; to which must be added the Μνημε, quoted in a MS.
grammatical work. There are also a few doubtful titles, namely: 'Aδωνιάζουσα, which is the title of a play by Philippides; 'Αγνάλος and Οβρι-pιόν, which are also ascribed to Nicostratus; and Μάλαγρατα, which is perhaps the same as the 'Ασαλάρτη. The fragments of Philetaerus show that many of his plays referred to courtesans.
(Meineke, Frag. Con. Graec. vol. i. pp. 349, 350, vol. iii. pp. 292—300.)

PHILETAS (Φίλητας). 1. Of Cos, the son of Telephus, was a distinguished poet and grammarian (ποιητής ἄριστος καί κριτικός, Strab. xiv. p.
657), who flourished during the earlier years of the Alexandrian school, at the period when the earnest study of the classical literature of Greece was combined, in many scholars, with considerable power of original composition. According to Suidas, he flourished under Philip and Alexander;
but this statement is loose and inaccurate. His youth may have fallen in the times of those kings, but the chief period of his literary activity was during the reign of the first Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, who appointed him as the tutor of his son, Ptolemy II. Philadephus. Clinton calculates that his death may be placed about B.C. 290 (Fast.
Hellen. vol. iii. app. 12. No. 16); but he may possibly have lived some years longer, as he is said to have been contemporary with Aratus, whom Eusebii places at B.C. 272. It is, however, certain that he was contemporary with Hermesianax, who was his intimate friend, and with Alexander Aeto-lus. He was the instructor, if not formally, at least by his example and influence, of Theocritus and Zenodotus of Ephesus. Theocritus expressly mentions him as the model which he strove to imitate. (Id. vii. 39; see the Scholia ad loc.) Philetas seems to have been naturally of a very weak constitution, which at last broke down under excessive study. He was so remarkably thin as to become an object for the ridicule of the comic poets, who represented him as wearing leaden soles to his shoes, to prevent his being blown away by a strong wind; a joko which Aelian takes literally, sagely questioning, however, if he was too weak to stand against the wind, how could he be strong enough to carry his leaden shoes? (Plut. An Scnt sit ger. Respud. 15, p. 791, e.; Ath. xiii. p. 552, b.; Aelian, V. VI. ix. 14, x. 6). The cause of his death is referred to in the following epigram (ap.
Ath. ix. p. 401, e.): —

Ένειξεν, Φίλητας εἰμι· λόγων ὥς φιλονικόν με θέλει καὶ νυκτάν Φασίλειδες ἐσπέραν.

We learn from Hermesianax (ap. Ath. xiii. p. 598,
4) that a bronze statue was erected to the memory of Philetas by the inhabitants of his native island, his attachment to which during his life-time he had expressed in his poems. (Schol. ad Theoc. I.)
The poetry of Philetas was chiefly elegiac (Suid.
Έραμφὸν ἐπηγράμματα καὶ ἐλεγεῖα καὶ ἄλα.)
of all the writers in that department he was established the best after Callimachus; to whom a taste less pedantic than that of the Alexandrian critics would probably have been more justly due. For by his fragments, he escaped the snare of cumbrous learned affectation (Quintil. x. 1. § 58; Procl.
Chrest. 6. p. 379, Gaisf.). These two poets formed the chief models for the Roman elegy: nay, Pro-pertius expressly states, in one passage, that he imitated Philetas in preference to Callimachus (Propert. ii. 34. 31, iii. 1. 1, 3. 51, 9. 43, iv. 6. 2;
Ovid, Art. Amat. iii. 329, Remed. Amor. 759;
Besides his poems, Philetas wrote in prose on grammar and criticism. He was one of the commentators on Homer, whom he seems to have dealt with very freely, both critically and exegetically; and in this course he was followed by his pupil Zenodotus. Aristarchus wrote a work in opposition to Philetas (Schol. Venet. ad II. ii. 111). But his most important grammatical work was that which Athenaeus repeatedly quoted under the title of Ἀρακτα, and which also is cited by the titles ἄρακτος γλώσσα (Schol. ad Apol. Rhod. iv. 309), and simply γλώσσα (Elymus Mag. p. 350. 39). The importance attached to this work, even at the time of its production, is shown by the fact that the comic poet Straton makes one of his persons refer to it (Ath. ix. p. 383; Meineke, Freg. Com. Gracc. vol. iv. p. 546), and by the allusions which are made to it by Athenaeus (l. c.), and by Crates of Mallus, in his epigram on Euphorion (Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 3, Anth. Pal. ix. 318). Nothing is left of it, except a few scattered explanations of words, from which, however, it may be inferred that Philetas made great use of the light thrown on the meanings of words by their dialectic varieties. It is very possible that all the grammatical writings of Philetas, including his notes on Homer, were comprised in this one collection.

2. Of Samos, the author of two epigrams in the Greek Anthology, which are distinguished in the Vatican MS. by the heading Φιλητα Σαιμω. In the absence of any further information, we must regard him as a different person from Philetas of Cos, who, though sometimes called a Rhodian (probably on account of the close connection which subsisted between Cos and Rhodes), is never spoken of as a Samian.

3. Of Ephereus, a prose writer, from whom the scholars on Aristophanes quote a statement respecting the Sibyli, but who is otherwise unknown. (Schol. ad Aristoph. Pac. 1071, At. 963; Suid. s. v. Βάσεις; Vossius, de Hist. Gracc. p. 485, ed. Westermann.)

PHELITES (Φηλήτης), a Greek physician, who lived probably in the fifth century B.C., as he is mentioned by Galen as a contemporary of some of the most ancient medical men. He was one of the persons to whom some ancient critics attributed the treatise Περὶ Διάθησις, De Virtutibus Rationum, which forms part of the Hippocratic Collection. (Galen, De Alimentibus, Fasc. i. 1, vol. vi. p. 473.) [W. A. G.]

PHELEUMENOS (Φηλευμένος), a sculptor, whose name was for the first time discovered in 1809, in an inscription on the support of the left foot of a statue in the Villa Albani, where there is also another statue evidently by the same hand Zoëga, to whom we owe the publication of the PHILIDAS.

PHILIDAS, an eminent Ionian architect, whose name is variously written in different passages of Vitruvius, which, however, almost undoubtedly refer to the same person. (vii. ii. 10; ii. 4. 6.) In this passage (i. 1. § 12) we are told that Phileus published a volume on the Ionic temple of Minerva at Priene; then, just below, that Phileus wrote concerning the Mausoleum, which was built by him and Satyrus; in another passage (i. 1. § 12), he quotes from the commentaries of Pytheus, whom he calls the architect of the temple of Minerva at Priene; and, in a fourth passage (iv. 3. § 1), he mentions Pytheus as a writer on architecture. A comparison of these passages, especially taking into consideration the various readings, can leave no doubt that this Phileus, Phileus, Pytheus, or Pytheus, was one and the same person, although it is hardly possible to determine the right form of the name: most of the modern writers prefer the form Pytheus. From the passages taken together we learn that he was the architect of two of the most magnificent buildings erected in Asia Minor, at one of the best ports of the land. He was the architect of the Mausoleum, which he built in conjunction with Satyrus, and the temple of Athena Polias, at Priene; and also that he was one of the chief writers on his art. The date of the erection of the Mausoleum was soon after Ol. 106. 4, n. c. 358, the year in which Mausolus died; that of the temple at Priene must have been about twenty years later, for we learn from an inscription that it was dedicated by Alexander (Jon. Antig. vol. i. p. 12). This temple was, as its ruins still show, one of the most beautiful examples of the Ionic order. It was peripteral, and hexastyle, with propylaea, which have on their inner side, instead of Ionic pillars, pilasters, the capitals of which are decorated with griffins in relief. (Jon. Antig. vol. i. c. 2; Choisen-Goffart, pl. 116; Mauch, die Griech. u. Röm. Bauordnungen, vol. 40, 41; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorh, pp. 301—303.) [P. S]

PHILIDAS (Φιλίδας), of Megara, an epic-rhymed and lyric poet, is only known by his epitaph on the Thespian who fell at Thermopylae, which is preserved by Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v. Θέας), by Eustathius (ad H. ii. p. 201. 40), and in the Greek Anthology. (Bruneck, Anb. vol. iii. p. 329; Jacobs, Auth. Graec. vol. i. p. 80, xiii. p. 934.) [P. S]

PHILIDAS (Φιλίδης), a Messenian father of Neon and Thrasyllochus, the partisans of Philip of Macedon [Νέων]. It is probable that Philidas himself was attached to the same party, as he is mentioned by Demosthenes in terms of contempt and aversion. (Dem. de Cor. p. 324, de Poed. c. Alex. p. 212; Polyb. xvii. 14.) [E. H. B.]

PHILIDAS (Φιλίδας), an Aetolian, who was sent by Dorimachus, with a force of 600 men, to the assistance of the Eleans during the Social War, b. c. 216. He advanced into Triphylia, but was unable to make head against Philip, who drove him in successive attacks of the fortresses of Lepreum and Saimicum, and ultimately compelled him to evacuate the whole of Triphylia. (Polyb. iv. 77—80.) [E. H. B.]

PHILINNA or PHIIL'INE (Φιλίννα, Φιλινή), the name of many Greek females, as, for instance, of the female dancer of Larissa in Thessaly, who was the mother of Arrhidæus by Philip, the father of Alexander the Great. (Athen. xiii. p. 557, e.; Phot. Bibl. p. 64. 23.) It was also the name of the mother of the poet Theocritus (Ep. 3).

PHILINUS (Φίλινος). 1. A Greek of Agri- gentum, accompanied Hannibal in his campaigns against Rome; who, against a history of the Punic wars, in which he exhibited, says Polybius, as much partiality towards Carthage, as Fabius did towards Rome. His hatred against Rome may have been excited, as Niebuhr has remarked (Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. p. 573), by the unfortunate fate of his native town, which was stormed by the Romans in the first Punic War. How far the history of Philinus came down is uncertain; he is usually called by most modern writers the historian of the first Punic war; but we have the express testimony of Cornelius Nepos (Ann. 113) that he also gave an account of the campaigns of Hannibal; and we may therefore conclude that his work contained the history of the second as well as of the first Punic war. (Corn. Nep. l. c.; Polyb. i. 14, iii. 26; Diod. xxiii. 8, xxiv. 2, 3.) To this Philinus Müller (Frang. Hist. Græc. p. xlvii.) assigns a work Φιλινος, which Suidas (s. v. Φίλινος ὁ Φίλινος) erroneously ascribes to Philinus.

2. An Attic orator, a contemporary of Demostenes and Lycurgus. He is mentioned by Demosthenes in his oration against Meidias (p. 566), who calls him the son of Nicotratus, and says that he was trierarch with him. Harpocrates mentions three orations of Philinus. 1. Πρὶς Διόγχυλο καὶ Συφυλέως καὶ Εὐπριότοι εἰκόνας, which was against a proposition of Lycurges that statues should be erected to those poets (s. v. Σευ- ρέκτ). 2. Κατὰ Δωροδέκατον, which was ascribed likewise to Hyperides (s. v. Ἐπίκαρης). 3. Κρι- χωνδιάς διδακτικά πρὸς Κωρυνίδας, which was ascribed by others to Lycurges (s. v. Κωρυνίδας; comp. Athen. x. p. 423, b; Bekker, Anec. Graec. vol. i. p. 275. 3). An ancient grammian, quoted by Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. vi. p. 748), says that Philinus borrowed from Demostenes. (Rul. Arrhidaeus Graecorum, p. 75, &c.; Westermann, Geschichte der Griechischen Beredsamkeit, § 54, n. 29.)

PHILINUS (Φιλίνος), a Greek physician, born in the island of Cos, the reputed founder of the sect of the Empirici (Cramer’s Anec. Graec. Paris. vol. i. p. 395), of whose characteristic doctrines a short account is given in the Dict. of Autig. s. v. Empirici. He was a pupil of Herophilus, a contemporary of Baccheius [BACCHEIUS], and a predec- eessor of Scarpion, and therefore probably lived in the third century b. c. (Pseudo-Galen, Introduct. c. 4, vol. xiv. p. 683.) He wrote a work on part of the Hippocratic collection directed against Bacheius (Erot. Lex. Hippocr. in v. Αὐσαυρα), and also one on botany (Athen. xv. pp. 661, 682), neither of which is now extant. It is perhaps this latter work that is quoted by Athenæus (xv. 26, pp. 661, 662), Pliny (H. N. xx. 91, and Index to books xx. and xxi.), and Andromachus (ap. Galet, De Compos. Medicus, sec. Lib. vii. 6. De Compos. Medicus, sec. Gen. v. 13, vol. xiii. pp. 113, 842). A parallel has been drawn between Philinus and the late Dr. Hahnemann in PHILIPPIDES.

PHILIPPIDES or more correctly PHILIPPI-CUS (Φιλίππις or Φιλίππος), emperor of Cons tantinople from December, A.D. 711, to the fourth of June, 713. The account of his accession to the throne is related in the life of the emperor Jus-tinian II. Rhinometruss. His original name was Bardanes; he was the son of Nicephorus Patricius; and he had distinguished himself as a general during the reigns of Justinian and his predecessors; he was sent out by exile by Tiberius Alsimus, on the charge of aspiring to the crown. After having been proclaimed by the inhabitants of Cherson and by proclaiming with which he was commanded to exterminate those people by the emperor Justinian II, he assumed the name of Philippicus, or, as extant coins of him have it, Filepicus; Theophanes, however, calls him Philippicus previous to his accession. After the assassination of the tyrant Jus tinian, Philippicus ruled without opposition, though not without creating much dissatisfaction through his dissolute course of life, and his unwise policy in religious matters. Belonging to the sect of the Monothelists, he deposed the orthodox patriarch Cyrus, and put the heretic John in his stead. The whole East soon embraced, or at least tended to, Monothelism; the emperor brought about the abolition of the canons of the sixth council; and the names of the patriarchs, Sergius and Honoria, who had been anathematized by that council, were,
on his order, inserted in the sacred diplachs. Phi-lippicus had scarcely arrived in his capital when Tertilla, king of Bulgaria, made his sudden appearance under its walls, burned the suburbs, and retired with many captives and an immense booty.

During this time the Arabs took and burnt Amasia (712), and in the following year (713) Antioch in Pisidia fell into their hands. The emperor did nothing to prevent these or further disasters; a plot, headed by the patricians Georgius, surnamed Borphus, and Theodore Mycius, was entered into to deprive him of his throne; and the fatal day arrived without Philippicus being in the least prepared for it. On the 3rd of June, 713, he celebrated the anniversary of his death; splendid entertainments were given in the hippodrome, the time of a brilliant cavalcade paraded through the streets of Constantinople, and when the evening approached, the prince sat down with his courtiers to a sumptuous banquet. According to his habit, Philippicus took such copious libations that his attendants were obliged to put him to bed in a senseless state. On a given signal, one of the conspirators, Rufus, entered the bed-room, and, with the assistance of his friends, carried the drunken prince off to a lonely place, where he was deprived of his eyesight. A general tumult ensued, and the drunk men, disregarding the pretensions of the conspirators, proclaimed one of their own favourites, Anastasius II. Philippicus ended his life in obscurity, but we have no particulars referring to the time of his death. (Theophan. pp. 311, 316—6vo; Zonar. vol. ii. p. 96, &c. ed. Paris ; Cedromus,
p. 446, &c.; Paul. Diacon. de Gest. Longob. vi. 31—33; Suid. s. v. Φιλιππιτης; Eckhel. Dict. Num.

PHILIPPIDES (Φιλιππίδης), of Athens, the son of Philocles, is mentioned as one of the six principal comic poets of the New Comedy by the grammarians (Protag. ad Aristoph. p. 30; Tzetz.
Protag. ad Lyceoph. p. 257, with the emendation of Φιλιππίδης for Φιλιπτως, see Philistion). Ac-
According to Suidas, he flourished in the 11th Olympi-ad, or B.C. 335, a date which would throw him back rather into the period of the Middle Comedy.
There are, however, several indications in the fragments of his plays that he flourished under the successors of Alexander; such as, first, his attacks on Stratoctes, the flatterer of Demetrius and Antigonus, which would place him between Ol. 118 and 122 (Plut. Demetr. 12, 26, pp. 994, c. 500, f., Ama
tor, p. 730, f.), and more particularly his ridicule of the honours which were paid to Demetrius through the influence of Stratoctes, in B.C. 301 (Clinton, F. H. sub ann.); again, his friendship with king Lysismachus, who was induced by him to confer various favours on the Athenians, and who assumed the royal title in Ol. 118. 2, B.C.

306 (Plut. Demetr. 12); and the statements of Plutarch (L.c.) and Diodorus (xx. 110), that he ridiculed the Eleusinian mysteries, into which he had been initiated in the archonship of Nicocles, B.C. 302. It is true, as Clinton remarks (F. H.
vol. ii. intro. p. xiv.), that these indications may be reconciled with the possibility of his having flouished at the date given by Suidas; but a sounder criticism requires us to alter that date to suit these indications, which may easily be done, as Meineke proposes, by changing πτως, 111, into πτως, 114, the latter Olympiad corresponding to B.C. 325 (Mei-Com. Gracc. p. 471; in the latter passage Meineke explains that the emendation of Suidas proposed by him in the former, πτως', was a misprint for πτως').

It is a confirmation of this date, that in the list above referred to of the six chief poets of the New Comedy, Philipponides comes, not first, but after Phi-emon, Menander, and Diphilus: for if the list had been in order of merit, and not of time, Menander would have stood first. The mistake of Suidas may be explained by his confounding Philipponides, the comic poet, with the demagogue Philipponides, against whom Hyperides composed an oration, and who is ridiculed for his leanness by Alexis, Arist-ophon, and other poets of the Middle Comedy; an error into which other writers also have fallen, and which Clinton (L.c.) has satisfactorily refuted.

Philipponides seems to have deserved the rank assigned to him, as one of the best poets of the New Comedy. He attacked the luxury and corruptions of his age, defended the privileges of his art, and made use of personal satire with a spirit approaching to that of the Old Comedy (see Meineke, Hist. Crit. pp. 437, 471). Plutarch eulogizes him highly (Demetr. L.c.).
His death is said to have been caused by excessive joy at an unexpected victory (Gell. iii. 15): similar tales are told of the deaths of other poets, as for example, Sophocles, Alexis, and Philemon. It appears, from the passage of Gallius just quoted, that Philipponides lived to an advanced age.

The number of his dramas is stated by Suidas at forty-five. There are fifteen titles extant, namely:
—'Δαναοικατωτως, Αμφαρκανως, Αναγκασμος, Αμφαρκανως, Αμφαρκανως, Αμφαρκανως, Αμφαρκανως, ἀμφαρκανως, Αμφαρκανως,

PHILIPPIDES. 269
of the New Comedy did not abstain from mythological subjects. To the above list should perhaps be added the Τριδώνια των Ρωμαίων. The Κάθοροι of Philonides, and the Νάμνοι of Eubulus or Philip- pides, are erroneously ascribed to Philipides. The latter is only one of several instances in which the names of Philipides and Philippus are confounded (see Meineke, Hist. Crit. pp. 341, 342, 343). Some of the ancient critics charge Philipides with infringing upon the purity of the Attic dialect (Phryn. Ed. p. 363; Pollux, ix. 50), and Meineke produces several words from his fragments as examples. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. ii. pp. 479, 480; Meineke, Frag. Com. Græc. vol. i. pp. 470—475, iv. pp. 467—478, 533, 534; Bernhardy, Gesch. d. Griech. Lit. vol. ii. p. 1017.)

PHILIPPUS (Φιλίππος), minor historical personages. 1. A citizen of Crotone, son of Butadices. Having married the daughter of Telys, king of the rival state of Sybaris, and being obliged in consequence to leave his country, he sailed away to Cyrene; and, when Dorianus, the Spartan prince, son of Anaxandrides, set forth from the Libyan coast, on his Sicilian expedition, Philippus accompanied him with a galley, equipped and manned at his own expense, and was slain in Sicily in a battle with the Carthaginians and Egestaeans. He was the finest man of his time, and a conqueror at Olympia; by virtue of which qualifications the Egestaeans worshipped him after his death as a hero. (Herod. v. 47; comp. above, Vol. i. p. 1066, b.)

2. Son of Alexander I. of Macedonia, and brother of Perdicas II., against whom he rebelled in conjunction with Dardas. The rebels were aided by the Athenians, in consequence of which Perdicas instigated Potidaeans, as well as the Chalcidians and Bottiaeans, to revolt from Athens. When the Athenian generals arrived, Philip acted with them in the campaign of B. C. 432. He seems to have died before B. C. 429, in which year we find his son Amyntas contesting the throne with Perdicas, and aided in his attempt by Sitalces, king of the Odrysian Thracians. (Thuc. i. 57, &c. ii. 95, 100.) [See above, Vol. i. p. 154, b.; & comp. Clint. F. H. vol. ii. p. 225, where a different account is given of Amyntas.]

3. A Lacedaemonian, was sent by the Peloponnesians to Aspendus, in B. C. 411, with two galleys, to take charge of the Phoenician fleet, which Tissaphernes had promised them. But Philippus sent notice from Aspendus to Mindauros, the Spartan admiral, that no confidence was to be placed in Tissaphernes; and the Peloponnesian fleet accordingly quitted Miletus and sailed to the Hellespont, which Philippus had invited them. (Thuc. viii. 87, 99.)

4. A Theban, was one of the members of the oligarchical government established at Thebes after the seizure of the Cadmeia by Phoeibidas in B. C. 382. In B. C. 379, on the night when Pelopidas and his fellow-exiles carried their enterprise for the overthrow of the tyrants into effect, Philippus and Archias were slain by the conspirators at a banquet at the house of Phyllidas. (Xen. Hell. v. 4. §§ 2, &c.; comp. Plut. Pel. 9, &c. de Gen. Soc. 24, 26, 29, 32.)

5. Son of Amyntas, a Macedonian officer in the service of Alexander the Great, who commanded one of the divisions of the phalanx at the battle of the Granicus. (Arr. Anab. i. 14. § 3.) His name does not subsequently appear in the campaigns of Alexander, at least so that it can be distinctly identified; but so many officers in the army bore the name of Philip that it is frequently impossible to say who is the particular person spoken of. Droysen conjectures (Hellenism, vol. i. p. 418. not.) that it is this Philip who was the father of Magas (Paus. i. 7. § 1), but there is certainly no proof of this, and the expression of Pausanias, that the latter was a man of ordinary condition and ignoble birth, is unfavourable to this supposition.

6. Son of Machatas, an officer in the service of Alexander the Great, who was appointed by him in B. C. 327 satrap of India, including the provinces westward of the Hydaspe. (Arr. Anab. vi. 8. § 5.) After the conquest of the Malli and Oxydracae, these tribes also were added to his government. (Id. vi. 14. § 7.) But after the departure of Alexander from India, Philip was assassinated by a conspiracy formed among the mercenary troops under his command, B. C. 326. (Id. vi. 27. § 3; Curt. x. i. § 20.)

Droysen considers this Philip to have been the father of Antigonus, the king of Asia. (Hellenism, vol. i. p. 43. not.) It is certain at least that they were both of the race of the princes of Elymios.

7. Son of Menelias, a Macedonian officer who held the command of the Thessalian cavalry, and that of the other Greek auxiliaries in the service of Alexander. We find him mentioned as holding this post, and rendering important services both at the battles of the Granicus and Arbela; and although the greater part of the Thessalian horse were suffered to return to Greece, he continued to accompany Alexander with the remainder, and is again mentioned during the advance into Bactria. (Arr. Anab. i. 15. § 4, iii. 11. § 15, 25, 26; & Curt. iv. 13. § 29, vi. 6. § 35.)

8. Son of Ballacrus, an officer in the service of Alexander who commanded one taxis or division of the phalanx at the battle of Arbela. (Diod. xvii. 57.) This is the only time his patronymic is mentioned; but there can be little doubt that he is the same person who held a similar command at the passage of the Granicus, three years before. (Arr. Anab. i. 14. § 5.) It is also not improbable that he is the same with the following.

9. Satrap of Sogdiana, to which government he was first appointed by Alexander himself in B. C. 327. He retained his post, as did most of the satraps of the more remote provinces, in the arrangement which followed the death of the king (B. C. 323); but in the subsequent partition at Tripardeus, B. C. 321, he was assigned the government of Parthia instead. (Dexipp. ap. Pind. p. 64, b.; Arrian. ib. p. 71, b.; Diod. xviii. 39, 39.) Here he remained until 318, when Python, who was then seeking to establish his power over all the provinces of the East, made himself master of Parthia, and put Philip to death. (Diod. xix. 14.)

10. A Macedonian officer, who was left by Alexander the Great in command of the garrison at Peucatotis, near the Indus. (Arr. Anab. iv. 28. § 10.)

11. One of the friends of Alexander the Great, who was sent by him to consult the oracle of Ammon concerning the payment of divine honours to Hephaestion. (Diod. xvii. 115.)

12. A brother of Lysimachus (afterwards king of Thrace) in the service of Alexander, who died of fatigue while accompanying the king in pursuit of the enemy, during the campaigns in India. (Justin. xv. 3.)

13. A Macedonian officer, who had served under Alexander throughout his campaigns (probably therefore identical with some one of the preceding), and who in consequence as a man of age and experience was one of the counsellors selected by Antigonus to control and assist his son Demetrius during his first campaign, b. c. 314. (Diod. xix. 69.) He is perhaps the same person who is again mentioned in b. c. 302, as holding the citadel of Sardis for Antigonus, when the rest of the city was betrayed by Phoenix into the hands of Prepelaus, the general of Cassander. (Id. xx. 107.)

14. A Macedonian who commanded the right wing of the army of Eumenes in the battle at Ga-damara, b. c. 316. (Diod. xix. 40.) He is probably identical with some one of those above enumerated, but with which it is impossible to say.

15. Son of Antipater, the regent of Macedonia, and brother of Cassander, by whom he was sent in b. c. 313, with an army to invade Aetolia. But on his arrival in Aetolia the news that Aaeicides, king of Epeirus, had recovered possession of his throne, induced him to turn his arms against that monarch, whom he defeated in a pitched battle. Aaeicides with the remnant of his forces having afterwards joined the Aetolians, a second action ensued, in which Philip was again victorious, and Aaeicides himself fell in the battle. The Aetolians hereupon abandoned the open country, and took refuge in their mountain fastnesses. (Diod. xix. 74.) According to Justin (xii. 14) Philip had participated with his two brothers, Cassander and Iolas, in the conspiracy for the murder of Alexander.

16. Father of Antigonus, king of Asia. (Arr. Anab. i. 29; 5; Justin. xiii. 4. See No. 2.)

17. Son of Antigonus, king of Asia, was sent by his father in b. c. 310, at the head of an army, to oppose the revolt of his general Phoenix, and to recover possession of the towns on the Hellespont held by the latter. (Diod. xx. 19.) He died in b. c. 306, just as Antigonus was setting out for his expedition against Egypt. (Id. xx. 75, where he is called Phoenix, though it appears certain that Antigonus had only two sons, Demetrius and Philip. See Droysen, Hellenism. vol. i. p. 465, note.)

18. A son of Lysimachus, king of Thrace, who was put to death together with his elder brother Lysimachus, by the usurper Ptolemy Ceraunus, b. c. 281. (Justin. xxiv. 3.) [LYSIMACHUS, Vol. II. p. 687. a.]

19. An officer who held the citadel of Sicyon for Ptolemy, king of Egypt, but surrendered it by capitulation to Demetrius Poliorcetes, b. c. 303. (Diod. xx. 102.)

20. An Epeiroit, who took a leading part in negotiating the treaty of peace concluded between Philip V., king of Macedonia, and the Roman general P. Sempronius Tuditanus at Phoenice, in Epeirus, b. c. 295. (Liv. xxix. 12.)

21. A Macedonian officer, who commanded the garrison of Cassandreia when that place was besieged by the Roman praetor C. Marcus Figulus, together with Eumenes, king of Pergamus, in the second Macedonian war, b. c. 169. The Romans succeeded by mining in opening an entrance through the walls; but before they could take advantage of it, Philip by a sudden sally threw their troops into confusion, and made a great slaughter of them. This disaster caused the praetor to turn the siege into a blockade; and the arrival of ten Macedonian ships, which made their way into the town with a strong reinforcement of troops, soon after compelled him to abandon the enterprise altogether. (Liv. xiv. 11, 12.)

22. A Macedonian, sent as ambassador by Perseus to the Rhodians, shortly before the commencement of the second Macedonian war, to try to induce them to remain neutral during the impending contest. (Polyb. xxvii. 4.)

23. An Achaean, who, as belonging to the party favourable to the Romans, was one of those selected for the embassy of congratulation after the defeat of Perseus, b. c. 168. (Polyb. xxx. 10.)

24. Son of Alexander of Megalopolis. His father's pretended descent from Alexander the Great appears to have filled him with the most puerile schemes of ambition. On the marriage of his sister Apama with Amyntander, king of Athamania, Philip accompanied her, and contrived to obtain great influence over the mind of Amyntander, who gave him the government of Zacynthus, and allowed him to direct in great measure the administration of affairs. When Antiochus came into Greece (b. c. 192) he gained over Philip to his interests by pretending to regard him as the rightful heir to the Macedonian throne, and even holding out to him hopes of establishing him upon it; by which means he obtained the adherence of Amyntander also. Philip was afterwards chosen by Antiochus for the duty of burying the bones of the Macedonians and Greeks slain at Cynoscephalae, a measure by which he vainly hoped to conciliate popularity. He was next appointed to command the garrison at Pellinaea, but was soon compelled to surrender to the Romans, by whom he was sent a prisoner to Rome. When first taken captive he accidentally met Philip, the king of Macedonia, who in derision greeted him with the royal title. (Liv. xxxv. 47, xxxvi. 8, 13, 14, 31; Appian. Syr. 13, 17.)

25. A brother of Perseus, king of Macedonia, apparently a brother of Philip by a subsequent marriage, as he was so much younger than his brother, that the latter adopted him as his son, and appears to have continued to regard him as the heir to his throne even after the birth of his own son Alexander. Thus we find him holding the post of honour next to the king on occasions of state; and after the fatal battle of Pydna he was the constant companion of Perseus during his flight and the period of his refuge at Samothrace, and surrendered together with him to the Roman praetor Cn. Octavius. He was led in triumph before the ear of Aeaminlius Paulus, b. c. 167, and afterwards consigned to captivity at Alba, where he survived his adopted father but a short time. (Liv. xili. 52, xlv. iv. xlv. 6; Plut. Aemili. 33, 37; Zonar. ix. 24.) According to Polybius (Fr. Vat. xxxvii. p. 447) he was only eighteen years old at the time of his death.

26. A friend and officer of Antiochus the Great, who held the office of commander of the elephants (magister elephantorum, a title of high rank at the court of Syria), and who, under that monarch, in which post he was mentioned both at the battle of Raphia, between Antiochus and Ptolemy Philopator, b. c. 217 (Polyb. v. 82), and again at the battle of Magnesia against the Romans, b. c. 190. (Liv. xxxvii. 41; Appian. Syr. 33.) As he is said by Polybius to have been brought up with Antiochus he can scarcely on chronological grounds be the same with the following.

27. One of the friends and ministers of Antiochus Epiphanes, king of Syria, who was appointed by him on his deathbed (b.c. 164) to be the guardian of his son Antiochus V. He returned to Syria, bearing with him the signet ring of the deceased monarch, and assumed the government during the absence of the young king and Lysias (who had been previously appointed regent) in Judaea. But on receiving the intelligence Lysias hastened to make peace with Judas Maccabæus, and returned to oppose Philip, whom he defeated and put to death. (Joseph. Ant. xii. 9. §§ 2, 6, 7.)

PHILIPPUS, an architect, entitled "Philippus" on his epitaph, which was found at Nîmes. Whether he was the architect of any of the great Roman works which still adorn that city, such as the Maison carrée and the amphitheatre, is a matter of pure conjecture. (Gruter, p. dxxiii. 5.) [P.S.]

PHILIPPUS, Aurelius, the teacher of Alexander Severus, afterwards wrote the life of this emperor. (Lamprid. Alex. Sever. 3.)

PHILIPPUS (Φίλιππος), son of HEROD the Great, king of Judæa, by his wife Cleopatra, was appointed by his father's will tetrarch of the districts of Gaulonitis, Trachonitis, and Batanaea, the sovereignty of which was confirmed to him by the decision of Augustus. He continued to reign over the dominions thus entrusted to his charge for the space of thirty-seven years (b.c. 4 — a.d. 34), a period of uniform tranquillity, during which his mild and equitable rule made him universally beloved by his subjects. He founded the city of Caesarea, surnamed Panæa, but more commonly known as Caesarea Philippi, near the sources of the Jordan, which he named in honour of Augustus, while he bestowed the name of Julius upon the town of Bethsaida, which he had greatly enlarged and embellished. Among other edifices he erected there a magnificent monument, in which his remains were deposited after his death. As he left no children, his dominions were after his decease annexed to the Roman province of Syria. (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 8. § 1, xviii. 2. § 1, 4. § 6, B. J. i. 33. § 8, ii. 6. § 3.) This Philip must not be confounded with Herod surnamed Philip, who was the son of Herod the Great by Mariamme [HERODES PHILIPPUS]. [E. H.B.]

PHILIPPUS I., M. JUVIUS, Roman emperor a.d. 244—249, was an Arabian by birth, a native of Trachonitis, according to Victor; of the colony of Bostra, according to Zonaras. Of his early history we know nothing, except that he is said to have been the son of a seafaring robber captain, and we are equally ignorant of the various stages of his military career. Upon the death of the excellent Mithidæus [MISITHES; GORDIANUS III.], during the Persian campaign of the third Gordian, Philippus was at once promoted to the vacant office of praetorian prefect. The treacherous arts by which he procured the ruin of the young prince his master, and his own elevation to the throne, are detailed elsewhere [GORDIANUS III.]. The senate having ratified the choice of the troops, the new sovereign proclaimed his son Caesar, concluded a disgraceful peace with Sapor, founded the city of Philippopolis, and then returned to Rome. These events took place in the early part of a.d. 244. The annals of this period, which are sin-

true faith, and that a multitude of ancient writers unite in declaring that Constantine was the first Christian sovereign of Rome. The student will find all the arguments stated with great candour and all the authorities arranged with great precision in Tillemont, and we have nothing to add, except that the inquiry is a mere matter of curiosity, for it is agreed on all hands that this conversion, if real, exercised no influence on the condition of the Church, which certainly could have had little reason to be proud of such a bloodstained and compromising proselyte. (Aur. Vict. de Caes. xxviii. Epit. xxviii.; Eutrop. ix. 3; Zosim. i. 23, iii. 32; Zonar. xii. 19; Echkel, vol. vii. p. 328; Euseb. H. E. vi. 34, 39, 41, viii. 10; Hieron. de Viris Iii. c. 54; Chrysost. in Gent. vol. I. p. 658; Tillemont, Notes sur l'Empereur Philippe, in his Histoire des Empereurs, vol. iii. p. 494.) [W. R.]

PHILIPPUS I. (Φίλιππος), king of MACEDONIA, son of Argaeus, was the sixth king, if we follow the lists of Dexippus and Eusebius, but the third, according to Herodotus and Thucydides, who, not reckoning CARANUS and his two immediate successors (Coenus and Thurimnas or Turimnas), look upon Perdiccas I. as the founder of the monarchy. Eusebius assigns to Philip I. a reign of 38 years, Dexippus one of 33. Neither statement appears to rest on any positive testimony; and Justin tells us that his death was an untimely one. He left a son, named Aëropus, who succeeded him. (Herod. vii. 137—139; Thuc. ii. 100; Just. vii. 2; Cint. F. H. vol. ii. p. 221.)

PHILIPPUS II. (Φίλιππος), the 16th king of MACEDONIA, if we count from Caranus, was the youngest son of Amyntas II. and Eurydice, and was born in B.C. 392. According to one account, which Suidas mentions (σ. ε. Κάρανος), but for which there is no foundation, he and his two elder brothers, Alexander II. and Perdiccas III., were suppositional children, imposed by Eurydice on Amyntas. The fact of Philip's early residence at Thebes is too well supported to admit of doubt, though the circumstances which led to his being placed there are differently related. In Diodorus (xvi. 2), we read that Amyntas, being overcome in war by the Illyrians, delivered Philip to them as a hostage for the payment of some stipulated tribute, and that by them he was sent to Thebes, where he sojourned in the house of the father of Epamninondas, and was educated with the latter in the Pythagorean discipline. The same author, however, tells us, in another passage (xv. 67), that he was one of those whom Pelopidas brought away with him as hostages for the continuance of tranquillity in Macedonia, when he had gone thither to mediate between Alexander II. and Ptolemy of Aulon, in B.C. 368; and with this statement Plutarch agrees (Pelop. 26); while Justin says (vii. 5), that Alexander, Philip's brother, gave him as a hostage, first to the Illyrians, and again a second time to the Thebans. Of these accounts, the last-mentioned looks like an awkward attempt to combine conflicting stories; while none of them are easily reconcileable with the statement of Aeschines (de Fals. Leg. pp. 31, 32; comp. Nep. Iph. 3), that, shortly after the death of Alexander II., Philip was in Macedonia, and, together with his elder brother Perdiccas, was presented by Eurydice to Iphicrates, in order to move his pity and obtain his protection against the pretender Pausanias. On the whole, the superposition of Thirlwall is far from improbable (Greece, vol. v. p. 163), viz. that when Pelopidas, subsequently to the visit of Iphicrates to Macedonia, marched a second time into the country, and compelled Ptolemy of Aulon to enter into an engagement to keep the throne for the younger sons of Amyntas, he carried Philip back with him to Thebes, as thinking him hardly safe with his mother and her paramour. As for that part of the account of Diodorus, which represents Philip as pursuing his studies in company with Epaminondas, it is sufficiently refuted by chronology (see Wesseling, ed. Diod. xv. 2) nor would it seem that his attention at Thebes was directed to speculative philosophy so much as to those more practical points, the knowledge of which he afterwards found so useful for his purposes—military tactics, the language and politics of Greece, and PHILIPPUS II., M. JU'LIS, son of the foregoing, was a boy of seven at the accession (A. D. 244) of his father, by whom he was forthwith proclaimed Caesar, and three years afterwards (247) chosen consul, being at the same time admitted to share the purple with the title of Augustus. His second consulship (248) corresponds with the celebration of the solar solemnities, and in the autumn of 249 he was slain, according to Zosimus, at the battle of Verona, or murdered, according to Victor, at Rome by the praetorians, when intelligence arrived of the defeat and death of the emperor. Nothing has been recorded with regard to this youth, who perished at the age of twelve, except that he was of a singularly serious and stern temperament, so that from early childhood he could never be induced to smile, and on perceiving his father indulging in hearty merriment, called forth by some buffoonery at the games, he turned away his head with a marked expression of disgust.

His names and titles were the same with those of the elder Philip, with the addition of Severus, found upon some Pamphylian coins, and derived, it would seem, from his mother Otagilia Severa. The appellation C. Julius Saturinus, assigned to him by Victor, rests upon no other authority, and is not confirmed by medals or inscriptions. (Aur. Vict. de Caes. xxviii. Epit. xxviii.; Zosim. i. 22.) [W. R.]

of the characters of its people. He was still at Thebes, according to Diodorus, when his brother Perdiccas III. was slain in battle against the Illyrians, in b. c. 360; and, on hearing of that event, he made his escape and returned to Macedonia.

But this statement is contradicted by the evidence of Speusippus (ap. Ath. xi. p. 506, é), from whom we learn that Plato, conveying the recommendation through Eurphaeus of Oreus, had induced Perdiccas to invest Philip with a principality, which he was in possession of when his brother's death placed him in the supreme government of the kingdom. On this he appears to have entered at first merely as regent and guardian to his infant nephew Amyntas [Amyntas, No. 3]; but after no long time, probably in b. c. 359, he was enabled to set aside the claims of the young prince, and to assume for himself the title of king,—aided doubtless by the durers which thickened round Macedonia at that crisis, and which obviously demanded a vigorous hand to deal with them. The Illyrians, flushed with their recent victory over Perdiccas, threatened the Macedonian territory on the west— the Paeonians were ravaging it on the north— while Pausanias and Argaeus took advantage of the crisis to put forward their pretensions to the throne. Philip was fully equal to the emergency. By his tact and eloquence he sustained the failing spirits of the Macedonians, while at the same time he introduced among them a stricter military discipline, and organized their army on the plan of the phalanx; and he purchased by bribes and promises the forbearance of the Paeonians, as well as of Cotys, the king of Thrace, and the chief ally of Pausanias. But the claims of Argaeus to the crown were favoured by a more formidable power,—the Athenians, who, with the view of recovering Amphipolis as the price of their aid, sent a force under Mantias to support him. Under these circumstances, according to Diodorus, Philip withdrew his garrison from Amphipolis, and declared the town independent,—a measure, which, if he really resorted to it, may account for the lukewarmness of the Athenians in the cause of Argaeus. Soon after he defeated the pretender, and having made prisoners of some Athenian citizens in the battle, he not only released them, but supplied with valuable presents the losses which each had sustained; and this conciliatory step was followed by an embassy offering to renew the alliance which had existed between Macedonia and Athens in the time of his father. The politic generosity thus displayed by Philip, produced a most favourable impression on the Athenians, and peace was concluded between the parties after midsummer of b. c. 359, no express mention, as far as appears, being made of Amphipolis in the treaty. Being thus delivered from his most powerful enemy, Philip turned his arms against the Paeonians, taking advantage of the death of their king Agis, justified his previous promise, and reduced them to submission. He then attacked the Illyrians with a large army, and having defeated them in a decisive battle, he granted them peace on condition of their accepting the lake of Lychnus as their eastern boundary towards Macedonia. [BARDYLLS.]

Thus in the short period of one year, and at the age of four-and-twenty, had Philip delivered himself from his dangerous and embarrassing position, and provided for the security of his kingdom. But energy and talents such as his could not, of course, be satisfied with mere security, and henceforth his views were directed, not to defence, but to aggrandizement. It was in the city of the important town of Amphipolis, which he could never have meant seriously to abandon, was his first step in this direction, and the way in which he accomplished it (b. c. 358) is one of the most striking specimens of his consummate craft. Having found pretexts for war with the Amphipolitans, his policy was to prevent interference with his proceedings on the part of Athens and of Olynthus (both of which states had an interest in resisting his attempt), and, at any rate, to keep them from uniting against him. Accordingly, in a secret negotiation with the Athenians, he led them to believe that he was willing to restore Amphipolis to them when he had taken it, and would do so on condition of their making him master of Pydna [Chandemus, No. 2]. When therefore the Athenians sent an embassy to Athens to propose an alliance for the defence of Amphipolis, their overtures were rejected (Dem. Olynth. ii. p. 19), and while their ardour for the contest would be thus dashed by the prospect of engaging in it single-handed, Philip still more effectually secured their forbearance by surrendering to them the town of Anthemus (Dem. Phil. ii. p. 70). He then pressed the siege of Amphipolis, in the course of which an embassy, under Hierax and Stratoes, was sent by the Amphipolitans to Athens, to ask for aid; but Philip rendered the application fruitless by a letter to the Athenians, in which he repeated his former assurances that he would place the city in their hands. Freed thus from the opposition of the only two parties whom he had to dread, he gained possession of Amphipolis, either by force, as Diodorus tells us, or by treachery from within, according to the statement of Demosthenes. He then proceeded at once to Pydna, which seems to have yielded to him without a struggle, and the acquisition of which, by his own arms, and without the Athenians, made him a pretext for declining to stand by his secret engagement with them. (Dem. Olynth. p. 11, de Halaeus, p. 83, c. Aristoc. p. 659, c. Lcpt. p. 476; Diod. xvi. 8.) The hostile feeling which such conduct necessarily excited against him at Athens, made it of course still more important for him to pursue his policy of dividing those whose union might be formidable, and of detaching Olynthus from the Athenians. Accordingly, we find him next engaged in the siege of Potidææ, together with the Olynthians, to whom he delivered up the town on its capture, while at the same time he took care to treat the Athenian garrison with the most conciliatory kindness, and sent them home in safety. According to Plutarch (Alex. 3), Philip had just taken Potidææ when tidings of three prosperous events reached him at once; these were, a victory in a horse-race at the Olympic games,—the defeat by Parmenion of the Illyrians, who, while engaged with the Paeonians and Thracians against the Macedonian power,—and the birth of Alexander; and, if we combine Plutarch's statement with the chronology of Diodorus (xvi. 22), we must place the capture of Potidææ in b. c. 356. Soon after this success, whenever it may have occurred, he attacked and took a settlement of the Thasians, called Crenides from the springs (κρηνης) with which it abounded, and, having introduced into the place a number of new colonists, he named it Philippi after himself.
One great advantage of this acquisition was, that it put him in possession of the gold mines of the district, the mode of working which he so improved as to derive from them, so Diodorus tells us, a revenue of 1000 talents, or 243,750l. — a sum, however, which doubtless falls far short of what they yielded annually on the whole. (Diod. xvi. 8; comp. Strab. vii. p. 323; Dem. Olynth. i. p. 11, Philipp. i. p. 50.)

From this point there is for some time a pause in the active operations of Philip. He employed it, no doubt, in carefully watching events, the course of which, as for instance the Social war (b. c. 357—353), was of itself tending towards the accomplishment of his ambitious designs. And so well had he disposed these, that although ascension against him had been excited at Athens, no suspicion of them, no apprehension of real danger appears to have been felt there; and even Demosthenes, in his speech against war with Persia (περὶ συμμορίων), delivered in b. c. 354, as also in that for the Megalopolitans (b. c. 353), makes no mention at all of the Macedonian power or projects (comp. Dem. Philipp. iii. p. 117; Clint. P. H. vol. ii. sub annis 353, 341.) In b. c. 354, the application made to Philip by Callias, the Chalcedian, for aid against Ploutarchus, tyrant of Eretria, gave him an opportunity, which he did not neglect, of interposing in the affairs of Euboea, and quietly laying the foundation of a strong Macedonian party in the island. (Callias, No. 4.)

But there was another and a nearer object to which the views of Philip were directed,—viz. ascendency in Thrace, and especially the mastery of the Chersonesus, which had been ceded to the Athenians by Cersoleptes, and the possession of which would be of the utmost importance to the Macedonian king in his struggle with Athens, even if we doubt whether he had yet looked beyond to a wider field of conquest in Asia. It was then perhaps in b. c. 353, that he marched as far westward as Maroneia, where Cersoleptes opened a negotiation with him for a joint invasion of the Chersonesus,—a design which was stopped only by the refusal of Amadocus to allow Philip a passage through his territory. No attempt was made to force one; and, if we are right in the conjectural date assigned to the event, Philip would naturally be unwilling to waste time in such a contest, when the circumstances of the Sacred War promised to afford him an opportunity of gaining a sure and permanent footing in the very heart of Greece. (Dem. c. Arist. p. 681.)

The capture of Methone, however, was a necessary preliminary to any movement towards the south, lying as it did between him and the Thessalian border, and serving as a shelter to his enemies, and as a station from which they could annoy him. He did not take it till after a lengthened siege, in the course of which he himself lost an eye. The inhabitants were permitted to depart with one garment, but the town was utterly destroyed and the land appropriated to Macedonian colonists. (Diod. xvi. 31, 35; Dem. Olynth. i. p. 12, Philipp. i. p. 41, iii. p. 117; Plut. Porr. 8; Luc. de Barth. Hist. 36.) He was now able to take advantage of the invitation of the Aeacidae to aid them against Lycomphon, the tyrant of Phæne, and advanced into Thessaly, b. c. 352. To support Lycomophon, the Phocians sent Phayllus, with a force of 7000 men, but he was defeated and driven out of Thessaly by Philip, who followed up this success with the capture of Pagasæ, the port of Pheræ. Soon, however, Philip was himself obliged to retreat into Macedonia, after two battles with Onomarchus, who had marched into Thessaly against him with a more numerous army; but his retreat was only a preliminary to a more vigorous effort. He shortly returned with augmented forces, ostentatiously assuming the character of champion of the Delphic god and avenger of sacrilege, and making his soldiers wear crowns of laurel. One battle, in which the Phocians were defeated and Onomarchus himself was slain, gave Philip the ascendency in Thessaly. He established at Pheræ what he wished the Greeks to consider a freegovernment, but he took and garrisoned Magnesia, and then advanced southward to Thermopylae. The pass, however, he found guarded by a strong Athenian force, and he was compelled, or at least thought it expedient to retire, a step by which indeed he had nothing to lose and much to gain, since the Greek states were unconsciously playing into his hands by a war in which they were weakening one another, and he had other plans to prosecute in the North. But while he withdrew his army from Greece, he took care that the Athenians should suffer annoyance from his fleet. With this Lemnos and Imbros were attacked, and some of the inhabitants were carried off as prisoners, several Athenian ships with valuable cargoes were taken near Geraestas, and the Paralus was captured in the bay of Marathon. These events are mentioned by Demosthenes, in his first Philippic (p. 49, ad fin.), delivered in b. c. 352, but are referred to the period immediately following the fall of Olynthus, b. c. 347, by those who consider the latter portion of the speech in question as a distinct oration of later date [Demosthenes]. It was to the affairs of Thrace that Philip now directed his operations. As the ally of Amadocus against Cerseleptes (Theopomp. ap. Harpocr. s. v. Αμαδοκός), he marched into the country, established his ascendency there, and brought away one of the sons of the Thracian king as a hostage [see Vol. I. p. 674]. Meanwhile, his movements in Thessaly had opened the eyes of Demosthenes to the real danger of Athens and Greece, and his first Philippic (delivered, as we have remarked, about this time) was his earliest attempt to rouse his countrymen to energetic efforts against their enemy. But the half-century, which had elapsed since the Peloponnesian war, had worked a sad change in the Athenians, and energy was no longer their characteristic. Reports of Philip's illness and death in Thrace amused and soothed the people, and furnished them with a welcome excuse for inaction; and, though the intelligence of his having attacked Heraeum on the Propontis excited their alarm and a momentary show of vigour, still nothing effectual was done, and throughout the greater part of b. c. 351 feebleness and irresolution prevailed. At some period in the course of the two following years Philip would seem to have interposed in the affairs of Epeirus, dethroning Argybës (if we may depend on the statement of Justin, which is in some measure borne out by Diodorus), and transferring the crown to Alexander, the brother of Olympias (Just. vii. 6, viii. 6; Dem. Olynth. i. p. 13; comp. Diod. xvi. 72; Wess. ad loc.). About the same time also he showed at least one symptom of his designs.
against the Persian king, by receiving and sheltering the rebels, Artabazus and Memnon. In b.c. 349 he commenced his attacks on the Chalcidian cities. Olynthus, in alarm, applied to Athens for aid, and Demosthenes, in his three Olynthiac orations, roused the people to efforts against the common enemy, not very vigorous at first and fruitless in the end. But it was not from Athens only that Philip might expect opposition. The Thessalians had for some time been murmuring at his retention of Pegasus and Magnesia, and his diversion to his own purposes of the revenues of the countries arising from harbour and market duties. As Thessaly, he complained, had hitherto endeavored to still by assurances his Athenian sympathies; but just at this crisis the recovery of Phere by Peitholus gave him an opportunity of marching again into Thessaly. He expelled the tyrant, and the discontent among his allies was calmed or silenced by the appearance of the necessity for his interference, and their experience of its efficacy. Returning to the north, he prosecuted the Olynthian war. Town after town fell before him, for in all of them there were traitors, and his course was marked by wholesale bribery. In b.c. 348 he laid siege to Olynthus itself, and, having taken it in the following year through the treachery of Lathenes and Euthycrates, he razed it to the ground and sold the inhabitants for slaves. The conquest made him master of the threefold peninsula of Puteiene, Sithonia, and Acta, and he celebrated his triumph at Dion with a magnificent festival and games. [LASTHENES; ARCHELAUS.]

After the fall of Olynthus the Athenians had every reason to expect the utmost hostility from Philip, and they endeavoured, therefore, to bring about a coalition of Greek states against him. The attempt issued in failure; but the course of events in Greece, and in particular the turn which affairs in Phocis had taken, and the symptoms which Athens had given of a conciliatory policy towards Thebes, seemed to Philip to point to such a league as by no means improbable; and he took care accordingly that the Athenians should become aware of his willingness to make peace. This disposition on his part was more than they had ventured to hope for, and, on the motion of Philocrates, ten ambassadors were appointed to treat with him, Aeschines and Demosthenes being among the number. Philip received the embassy at Pelti, and both then and in the subsequent negotiations employed effectually his usual craft. Thus, while he seems to have been explicit in requiring the surrender of the Athenian claim to Amphipolis and the recognition of the independence of Cardia, he kept the envoys in the dark as to his intentions with regard to the Thebans and Phocians,—a point of the highest interest to Athens, which still cast a jealous eye upon Thebes and her influence in Boeotia. Nor were his purposes with respect to these matters revealed even when the terms of peace and alliance with him were settled at Athens, as the Phocians were neither included in the treaty nor expressly shut out from it. The same course was adopted with reference to Cersoleptes, king of Thrace, and the town of Halus in Thessaly, which, acting on behalf of the Pharsalians, Philip had sent Parmenion to besiege. As for Thrace,—since the dominions of Cersoleptes formed a barrier between Macedonia and the Athenian possessions in the Chersonesus,—it was of the greatest importance to Philip to establish his power there before the final ratification of the treaty, in which the Athenians might have insisted on a guarantee for its safety. Accordingly, when the second embassy, consisting probably of the same members as the former one, arrived in Macedonia to receive the king's oath to the compact of alliance, they found that he was absent in Thrace, nor did he return to give them an audience till he had entirely conquered Cersoleptes. Even then he delayed taking the oath, unwilling clearly that the Athenian ambassadors should return home before he was quite prepared for the invasion of Phocis. Having induced them to accompany him on the march, he pronounced that in the following year he would commence the war at Phere, and now expressly excluded the Phocians from it. Deserted by Pelaueus, who had made conditions for himself and his mercenaries, the Phocians offered no resistance to Philip. Their cities were destroyed, and their place in the Amphictyonic council was made over to the king of Macedonia, who was appointed also, jointly with the Thebans and Thessalians, to the presidency of the Pythian games. Ruling as he did over a barbaric nation, such a recognition of his Hellenic character was of the greatest value to him, especially as he looked forward to an invasion of the Persian empire in the name of Greece, united under him in a great national confederacy. That his own ambition should point to this was natural enough; but the "Philip" of Isocrates, which was composed at this period, and which urged the king to the enterprise in question, is perhaps one of the most striking instances of the blindness of an amiable visionary. The delusion of the rhetorician was at any rate not shared by his fellow-citizens. The Athenians, inignant at having been out-witted and at the disappointment of their hopes from the treaty, showed their resentment by omitting to send their ordinary deputation to the Pythian games, at which Philip presided, and were disposed to withhold their recognition of him as a member of the Amphictyonic league. They were dissuaded, however, by Demosthenes, in his oration "on the Peace" (b.c. 346), from an exhibition of anger so perilous at once and impotent.

Philip now began to spread his snares for the establishment of his influence in the Peloponnesus, by holding himself out to the Messenians, Megalopolitans, and Argives, as their protector against Sparta. To counteract these attempts, and to awaken the states in question to the true view of Philip's character and designs, Demosthenes went into the Peloponnesus at the head of an embassy; but his eloquence and representations met with no success, and Philip sent ambassadors to Athens to complain of the step which had been taken against him and of the accusations with which he had been assailed. These circumstances (b.c. 344) gave occasion to the second Philippic of Demosthenes, but, though the jealousy of the Athenians was fully roused, and the answer which they returned to Philip does not appear to have thoroughly satisfied him, still no infringement of the peace took place.

The same year (344) was marked also by a successful expedition of Philip into Illyria, and by his expulsion for the third time of the party of the tyrants from Phere, a circumstance which furnished him with an excuse and an opportunity for reducing the whole of Thessaly to a more thorough dependence on himself (Diod. xvi. 59. 2). In Philostratius, p. 153; Ps.-Dem. de Hal., p. 84.) It appears to have been in b.c. 343 that he made an ineffectual attempt to gain an ascendency in Messenia, through the traitors Ptoeodorus and Periak (Dem. de Cor. pp. 242, 324, de Itals. Leg. p. 435; Plut. Mor. 15); and in the same year he marched into Epeirus, and compelled three refractory towns in the Cossapian district,—Pandosia, Bucheta, and Elateia,—to submit themselves to his brother-in-law Alexander (Pseudo-Dem. de Hal. p. 84). From this quarter he mediated an attack on Ambacia and Acrarnania, the success of which would have enabled him to effect an union with the Aetolian, whose favour he had secured by a promise of taking Naupactus for them from the Achaennae, and so to open a way for himself into the Peloponesus. But the Athenians, roused to activity by Demosthenes, sent ambassadors to the Peloponnesians and Acrarnanians, and succeeded in forming a strong league against Philip, who was obliged in consequence to abandon his design. (Dem. Phil. iii. pp. 129, 129; Aesch. c. Ctes. pp. 65, 67.)

It was now becoming more and more evident that actual war between the parties could not be much longer avoided, and the negotiations consequent on Philip's offer to modify the terms of the treaty of 346 served only to show the elements of discord which were smouldering. The matters in dispute related mainly: 1. to the island of Halonnesus, which the Athenians regarded as their own, and which Philip had seized from it a band of pirates; 2. to the required restitution by Philip of the property of those Athenians who were residing at Potidaea at the time of its capture by him in 356; 3. to Amphipolis; 4. to the Thracian cities which Philip had taken after the peace of 346 had been ratified at Athens; 5. to the support given by him to the Cardians in their quarrel about their boundaries with the Athenian settlers in the Chersonesus [Diopeithes] and of these questions not one was satisfactorily adjusted, as we may see from the speech (περὶ Ἀλωννησοῦ) which was delivered in answer to a letter from Philip to the Athenians on the subject of their complaints. Early in B.C. 342 Philip marched into Thrace against Tereus and Cersobleptes, and established colonies in the conquered territory. Hostilities ensued between the Macedonians and Diopeithes, the Athenian commander in the Chersonesus, and the remonstrance sent to Athens by Philip called forth the speech of Demosthenes (περὶ Χερσονήσου), in which the conduct of Diopeithes was defended, as also the third Philipic, in consequence of which the Athenians appear to have entered into a successful negotiation with the Persian king for an alliance against Macedonia (Phil. Ep. ad Ath. ap. Dem. p. 160; Dio. xvi. 75; Paus. i. 29; Att. Anth. ii. 14). The operations in Euboea in B.C. 342 and 341 [Callias; Clearchus; Parmenion; Phocion], as well as the attack of Callias, sanctioned by Athens, against the towns on the bay of Pagasae, brought matters nearer to a crisis, and Philip sent to the Athenians a letter, yet exact, defending his own conduct and arraigning those Philip. But the siege of Perinthus and Byzantium, in which he was engaged, had increased the feelings of alarm and anger at Athens, and a decree was passed, on the motion of Demosthenes, for succouring the endangered cities. Chares, to whom the armament was at first entrusted, effected nothing, or rather worse than nothing; but Phocion, who superseded him, compelled Philip to raise the siege of both the towns (B.C. 339). (With respect to Selymbria, see Newman, in the Classical Museum, vol. i. pp. 153, 154.)

This gleam, however, of Athenian prosperity was destined to be as short as it was glorious. Philip, baffled in Thrace, carried his arms against Athens, a Scythian prince, from whom he had received insult and injury. The campaign was a successful one; but on his return from the Danube his march was opposed by the Triballi, and in a battle which he fought with them he received a severe wound. This expedition he would seem to have undertaken partly in the hope of deluding the Greeks into the belief that Grecian politics occupied his attention less than heretofore; and meanwhile Aesclines and his party were blindly or treacherously promoting his designs against the liberties of their country. For the way in which they did so, and for the events which ensued down to the fatal battle of Chaeroneia, in B.C. 338, the reader is referred to the article DEMOSTHENES.

The effect of this last decisive victory was to lay Greece at the feet of Philip; and, if we may believe the several statements of Theopompus, Dio- dorus, and Plutarch, he gave vent to his exultation in a most unseemly manner, and celebrated his triumph with drunken orgies, reeling forth from the banquet to visit the field of battle, and singing descriptively the commencement of the decrees of Demosthenes, falling as it does into a comic Iambic verse:—

Δημοσθένης Δημοσθένους Πανακις τάδ' ἐπιευν. (Theopomp. ap. Ath. x. p. 435; Dio. xvi. 87; Plut. Dem. 20.) Yet he extended to the Athenians treatment far more favourable than they could have hoped to have received from him. Their citizens who had been taken prisoners were sent home without ransom, due funeral rites were paid to their dead, whose bones Philip commissioned Antipater to bear to Athens; their constitution was left untouched; and their territory was even increased by the restoration of Oropus, which was taken from the Thebans. On Thebes the conqueror's vengeance fell more heavily. Besides the loss of Oropus, he deprived her of her supremacy in Boeotia, placed her government in the hands of a faction devoted to his interests, and garrisoned the Cadmea with Macedonian troops. The weakness to which he thus reduced her made it safe for him to deal leniently with Athens, a course to which he would be inclined by his predilection for a city so rich in science and art and literature, no less than by the wish of increasing his popularity and his character for moderation throughout Greece. And now he seemed to have indeed within his reach the accomplishment of the great object of his ambition, the invasion and conquest of the Persian empire. In a congress held at Corinth, which was attended, according to his invitation, by deputies from every Grecian state with the exception of Sparta, war with Persia was determined on, and the king of Macedonia was appointed to command the forces of the national confedency. He then advanced into the Peloponnesus, where he invaded and ravaged Laconia, and compelled the Lacedaemonians to surrender a portion of their territory to Argos, Tegae, Megalopolis, and Messenia; and, having thus weakened and humbled Sparta and established his power through the whole of Greece, he returned home in the latter end of B.C. 338.

In the following year his marriage with Cleo-

the daughter of Attalus, one of his generals [CLEOPATRA, No. 1], led to the most serious disturbances in his family. Olympias and Alexander withdrew in great indignation from Macedonia, the young prince taking refuge in Illyria, which seems in consequence to have been involved in war with Philip, while Olympias fled to Epeirus and incited her brother Alexander to take vengeance on her husband. But this danger Philip averted by promising his daughter Cleopatra in marriage to his brother-in-law [CLEOPATRA, No. 2], and Olympias and her son returned home, still however marshaling rebellions under the aegis of daughter with Alexander. The breach between Philip and Alexander appears to have been further widened by the suspicion which the latter entertained that his father meant to exclude him from the succession. This feeling was strengthened in Alexander's mind by the proposed marriage of his half-brother Arrhidaeus with the daughter of Ptolemaus, the Carian satrap, to whom accordingly he sent to negotiate for the hand of the lady for himself. Philip discovered the intrigue, and, being highly exasperated, punished those who had been the chief instruments of it with imprisonment and exile. Meanwhile, his preparations for his Asiatic expedition were not neglected, and early in B.C. 336 he sent forces into Asia, under Parmenion, Amyntas, and Attalus, to draw over the Greek cities to his cause. But the great enterprise was reserved for a higher genius and a more vigorous hand. In the summer of the last-mentioned year Philip held a grand festival at Aegae, to solemnize the marriage between a daughter of Alexander and of Epeirus. It was attended by deputies from the chief states of Greece, bringing golden crowns as presents to the Macedonian king, while from the Athenians there came also a decree, declaring that any conspirator against Philip who might flee for refuge to Athens, should be delivered up. The solemnities of the second day of the festival commenced with a splendid procession, in which an image of Philip was presumptuously borne along amongst those of the twelve Olympian gods. He himself advanced in a white robe between his son and the bridegroom, having given orders to his guards to keep at a distance from him, as he had sufficient protection in the goodwill of the whole of Greece. As he drew near to the theatre, a youth of noble blood, named Pausanias, rushed forward and plunged into his side with fatal effect a Celtic sword, which he had hidden under his dress. The assassin was immediately pursued and slain by some of the royal guards. His motive for the deed is stated by Aristotle (Polit. v. 10, ed. Bekk.) to have been private resentment against Philip, to whom he had complained in vain of a gross outrage offered to him by Attalus. Olympias and Alexander, however, were suspected of being implicated in the plot, and the suspicion seems only too well-grounded as far as Olympias is concerned. The murder, it is said, had been preceded by omens and warnings. Philip had consulted the Delphic oracle about his projected expedition to Asia, and had received the ambiguous answer,— Εστεπταμεν οδ η ταυρος, ζεχε τελος, εστιων η θυσιαν. Again, the oracle of Trophonius had desired him to beware of a chariot, in consequence of which he never entered one; but the sword with which Pausanias slew him had the figure of a chariot carved in ivory on its hilt. Lastly, at the banquet which closed the first day's festivities at Aegae, the tragedian Neoptolemus recited, at Philip's desire, a piece of lyrical poetry, which was intended to apply to the approaching downfall of the Persian king, and spoke of the vanity of human prosperity and of far-reaching hopes cut short by death. (Diod. xvi. 91, 92; Ael. V. H. iii. 45; Cic. de Fatt. 3; Paus. viii. 7.)

Philip died in the forty-seventh year of his age and the twenty-fourth of his reign, leaving for his son a great work indeed to do, but also a great help for it. In the accomplishment of the condition of Greece and of Macedonia; Greece so far subject as to be incapable of impeding his enterprise,—Macedonia with an organized army and a military discipline unknown before, and with a body of nobles bound closely to the throne, chiefly through the plan introduced or extended by Philip, of gathering round the king the sons of the great families, and providing for their education at court, while he employed them in attendance on his person, like the pages in the feudal times. (Ael. V. H. iv. 49; Arr. Anab. iv. 13; Curt. viii. 6, 8; Val. Max. iii. 3, ext. 1.)

Philip had a great number of wives and concubines. Besides Olympias and Cleopatra, we may mention, 1. his first wife Audata, an Illyrian princess, and the mother of Cynane; 2. Phila, sister of Derdas and Machatas, a princess of Elymioiadas; 3. Nicesipolis of Phereas, the mother of Thessalonica; 4. Philiana of Larissa, the mother of Arrhidaeus; 5. Meda, daughter of Cithelas, king of Thrace; 6. Aristea, daughter and wife of Ptolemy L, king of Egypt, with whom she was pregnant when she married Lagus. To these numerous connections, temperament as well as policy seems to have inclined him. He was strongly addicted, indeed, to sensual enjoyment of every kind, with which (not unlike Louis XI. of France, in some of the lighter parts of his character) he combined a turn for humour, not always over nice, and a sort of easy, genial good-nature, which, as it costs nothing and calls for no sacrifice, is often found in connection with the propensity to self-indulgence. Yet his passions, however strong, were always kept in subjection to his interests and ambitious views, and, in the words of bishop Thirlwall, "it was something great, that one who enjoyed the pleasures of animal existence so keenly, should have encountered so much toil and danger for glory and empire" (Greece, vol. vi. p. 86). He was fond of science and literature, in the patronage of which he appears to have been liberal; and his able station of Lycean minds is shown, if not by his presumed intimacy with Plato, at any rate by his undoubted connection with Aristotle. His own physical and mental qualifications for the station which he filled and the career of conquest which he followed, were of the highest order;—a robust frame and a noble and commanding presence; "ready eloquence, to which art only applied the cultivation requisite to satisfy the fastidious demands of a rhetorical age; quickness of observation, acuteness of discernment, presence of mind, fertility of invention, and dexterity in the management of men and things" (Thirlwall, vol. v. p. 169). In the pursuit of his political objects he was, as we have seen, unscrupulous, and ever ready to resort to duplicity and corruption. Yet, when we consider the humanity and generous clemency which have gained for him from Cicero (de Off. i. 26) the praise of having been "always

PHILIPPUS.

PHILIPPUS V. (ΣΆΛΙΤΡΟΣ), king of MACEDONIA, son of Demetrius II., was one of the ablest and most eminent of the Macedonian monarchs. It appears that he was born in the year B.C. 237, and he was thus only eight years old at the death of his father Demetrius. The sovereign power was consequently assumed by his uncle Antigonus Doson, who, though he certainly ruled as king rather than merely as guardian of his nephew, was faithful to the interests of Philip, whom he regarded as his natural successor, and to whom he transferred the sovereignty at his death, in B.C. 220, to the exclusion of his own children. (Polyb. ii. 45, 70, iv. 2; Paus. viii. 8 § 9; Justin. xxviii. 4; Porphry. ap. Euseb. Arm. p. 158.) He was careful however to appoint friends of his own to all the more important offices of the state; one of whom, Apelles, bore the title of guardian of the young king (Polyb. iv. 67), though the latter seems to have in fact assumed the administration of affairs into his own hands from the very beginning of his reign. The prudent and vigorous administration of Antigonus had greatly strengthened the Macedonian empire; but the youth of Philip, who was only seventeen years old at the time of his accession (Polyb. iv. 5; Justin makes him only fourteen), was regarded with contempt by his enemies, and the Aetolians seized the opportunity to commit acts of aggression and hostility in the Peloponnes. Aratus and the Achaenians immediately applied to the young king for assistance; but Philip, though not unmindful of his allies, was at first unwilling to engage in open war with the Aetolians on account of what he regarded as mere plundering expeditions. Soon, however, the defeat of the Achaenians at Caphyae, and the daring outrage of the Aetolians in seizing and burning Cy- naetha, aroused him to the necessity of immediate action, and he proceeded in person to Corinth at the head of a considerable force. He arrived too late to act against the Aetolians, who had already quitted the Peloponnes, but by advancing to Teges he succeeded in overwhelming the Lacedaemonians, who were secretly disposed to favour the Aetolians, and for a time prevented them from quitting the cause of their allies. He next pres- sided at a general assembly of the Achaenians and other allied states at Corinth, at which war was declared against the Aetolians by the common consent of all present, including besides Philip himself and the Achaenians, the Boeotians, Phocians, Epeiros, Acarnanians, and Messenians. Few of these, however, were either disposed or ready to take an active part in immediate hostilities, while the Lacedaemonians and Eleans openly espoused the cause of the Aetolians. It was evident there- fore that the chief burden of the war would de- volve upon Philip and the Achaenians, and the young king returned to Macedonia to prepare for the con- test. (Polyb. iv. 5, 9, 16, 19, 22—39, 31—56; Plut. Arat. 47.) His first care was to fortify his own frontiers against the neighbouring barbarians, and

COIN OF PHILIPPUS IV. KING OF MACEDONIA.

PHILIPPUS IV. (ΦΆΛΙΤΡΟΣ), king of MACEDONIA, was the eldest son of Cassander, whom he succeeded on the throne, B.C. 297, or, according to Clinton, early in 296. The exact period of his reign is uncertain, but it appears to have lasted only a few months, when he was carried off by a consumptive disorder, B.C. 296. No events are recorded of us of this short interval; but it appears that he maintained the friendly relations with Athens which had been established by his father, and he was probably advancing into Greece to support his partisans in that country, when his death took place at Elateia in Phocis. (Paus. ix. 7, § 3; Justin. xv. 4, xvi. 1; Porphyry. ap. Euseb. Arm. p. 155; Dexipp. ap. Syncell. p. 504, ed. Bonn; Droysen, Hellensm. vol. i. pp. 565, 566; Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. pp. 180, 236.) [ E. COIN OF PHILIPPUS II. KING OF MACEDONIA.

PHILIPPUS III. (ΦΆΛΙΤΡΟΣ), king of MACEDONIA, the name of Philip was bestowed by the Macedonian army upon Arrhidæus, the bastard son of Philip II., when he was raised to the throne after the death of Alexander III., and is the only appellation which appears upon his coins. He returned to Macedonia, where he and his wife Eurydice were put to death by order of Olympias, B.C. 317. For his life and reign, see Arrhi- daeus. [ E. H. B. ]

PHILIPPUS.
he was able to conclude a treaty with Scerdilaidas, king of Illyria, who undertook to assail the Aetolians by sea. Early in the ensuing spring (B.C. 219) Philip entered Epeiros with an army of 15,000 foot and 800 horse, and was quickly joined by the whole forces of the Epeiros and Acarnanians; but his successes were limited to the reduction of some forts and towns on the frontiers of Aetolia and Acarnania, and to the ravage of the adjoining country, when he was recalled to Macedonia by the news of an invasion of the Dardanians. The barbarians, indeed, retired on hearing of his return, but Philip spent the remainder of the summer and autumn in Thessaly, and it was not until the winter had already set in, and his Rhodian allies had begun to despair of his arrival, that he suddenly presented himself at Corinth at the head of a small but select army. This unexpected manoeuvre was completely successful; he surprised and totally defeated a force of Aetolian and Elean troops under Euripidas, and following up his advantage, took the strong fortress of Psophis by a sudden assault, lade waste without opposition the rich plains of Elis, and then advancing into Triphyila, made himself master of the whole of that region, though abounding in strongholds, within six days. After this brilliant campaign, he took up his quarters at Argos for the remainder of the winter. (Polyb. iv. 37, 57, 61—82.)

The ensuing spring (B.C. 218) he first turned his attention to the reduction of the important island of Cephallenia, but failed in an attack on the city of Palaec in consequence of the treachery and misconduct of one of his own officers, Leonidas, who purposely prevented the troops under his command from carrying the breach by assault. Hereupon Philip abandoned the enterprise; but landing suddenly at the head of the Ambrian gulf, he penetrated unexpectedly into the heart of Aetolia, where he surprised the capital city of Thermus, in which all the wealth and treasures of the Aetolian leaders were deposited. The whole of these fell into the hands of the king, and were either carried off or destroyed, together with a vast quantity of arms and armour; but not content with this, Philip set fire to the sacred buildings, and destroyed all the statues and other works of art with which they were adorned. The Aetolians in vain attacked his army on his retreat, and he succeeded in carrying off the spoils in safety to his fleet. (Polyb. v. 2—9, 13, 14.) Having by this sudden blow struck terror into the Aetolians themselves, he next turned his arms against their Peloponnesian allies, and returning all haste to Corinth, assembled the Achaean forces, and invaded Lacedaemon before the Spartans had heard of his having quitted Aetolia. Descending the valley of the Eurotas he passed close to Sparta itself, laid waste the whole country as far as Taenarum and Malea, and on his return totally defeated the forces with which Lycurgus had occupied the heights near Sparta, in order to intercept his retreat. (Id. v. 17—24.) An attempt was now made by the Chians and Rhodians to effect a peace by their mediation; but though Philip consented to a truce for the purpose of carrying on the negotiations, these proved abortive, and the war was still continued. The operations of the next year (B.C. 217) were less brilliant, but fortune still favoured the arms of Philip and his allies; the king, who had returned to Macedon, took the important fortress of Byllazora, in Paonia, which was well calculated to check the inroads of the Dardanians, and afterwards invaded Thessaly, where he reduced the Phthiotic Thebes. The Achaeans, on their side, had raised large forces, and carried on the war with much success in the Peloponnesian. Meanwhile, events of far greater importance had been passing in Italy, and the news of the battle of Thrasymene, which reached Philip while he was celebrating the Nemean games at Argos, determined him to listen to the overtures for peace which had been renewed by the neutral powers, the Chians, Rhodians, and Ptolemy, king of Egypt. A treaty was soon brought about, by which Philip promised that both parties should retain what they then possessed; and thus ended, after a duration of three years, the contest commonly known as the Social War. (Polyb. v. 24, 29, 30, 97—105.)

During the course of these events it is certain that the character of Philip appears in the most favourable light. Throughout the military operations he displayed uncommon abilities. His daring and rapid movements disconcerted all the plans of his enemies; and the boldness of his conceptions was accompanied with a vigour and skill in the execution of them, which might have done credit to the oldest and most practised general. But his military talents were accompanied with merits of a still higher order. His policy inclined always to the side of clemency and moderation, and he had established a well-earned popularity throughout Greece, by repeated proofs of generosity and good faith. So high, indeed, was his character in these respects, that all the cities of Cretæ are said to have voluntarily united in placing themselves under his protection and patronage (Polyb. vii. 12; Plut. Arct. 48). Unfortunately these favourable dispositions were not destined to last long; and the change that subsequently came over his character appears to have commenced almost immediately after the close of the Social War. It is scarcely probable, as suggested by Plutarch, that his naturally evil disposition had been hitherto restrained by fear, and that he now first began to show himself in his true colours; Polybius more plausibly ascribes the change in his character to the influence of evil councillors; though these very probably did no more than accelerate the natural effects too often produced by the intoxication of success and the possession of arbitrary power at an early age. It is certain at least that the evil counsellors were not wanting. Apelles and the other officers to whom the chief posts in the administration had been confided by Antigonus Doson, had hoped to hold the uncontrolled direction of affairs, under the reign of the young king, and could ill brook to see their power supplanted by the growing influence of Aratus, who at this period chiefly swayed the counsels of Philip. Having failed in repeated attempts to undermine the power of the Achaean leader, by calumnies and intrigues, they went so far as to engage in the most treasonable schemes for frustrating all the designs of Philip himself, and thwarting the success of his military enterprises. Their machinations were at length discovered, and Apelles himself, together with Leontius and Megales, the partners of his guilt, were severely put to death. (Polyb. iv. 76, 82—87; v. 2, 4, 14—16, 25—29; Plut. Arct. 48.)

But the removal of these adversaries was far from giving to Aratus the increased power and in-fience which might have been anticipated. A more dangerous rival had already made his appearance in Demetrius, king of Macedon, who, after his expulsion from his own dominions by the Romans (Dexterius, p. 966, a.), had taken refuge at the court of Philip, and soon acquired unbounded influence over the mind of the young king. It was the Pharian exile who first gave a new turn to the foreign policy of Philip, by directing his attention to the state of affairs beyond the Ionian sea; and persuaded him to conclude peace with the Aetolians, in order to watch the contest which was going on in Italy. (Polyb. iv. 66, v. 12, 101, 105; Justin. xxi. 2, 3.) The ambition of the young king was flattered by the prospect thus held out to him, but he did not deem the time yet come openly to take part in the contest, and in the meanwhile his attention was turned to the side of Illyria. Scerdilæidas, king of that country, had abandoned the alliance of the Macedonian monarch, by whom he deemed himself aggrieved; and had taken advantage of Philip's absence in Greece to occupy some towns and fortresses on the frontiers of the two countries. The recovery of these occupied Philip during the remainder of the summer of 217, and the winter was spent principally in the preparation and equipment of a fleet with which he designed to attack the coasts of Illyria. But scarcely had he entered the Adriatic in the following summer (B. C. 216), when the rumour that a Roman fleet was coming to the assistance of Scerdilæidas inspired him with such alarm that he made a hasty retreat to Cephallenia, and afterwards withdrew to Macedon, without attempting anything farther (Polyb. v. 108—110). But the news of the great disaster sustained by the Roman arms at Cannae soon after decided Philip openly to espouse the cause of Carthage, and he despatched Xenophanes to Italy to conclude a treaty of alliance with Hannibal. Unfortunately the ambassador, after having successfully accomplished his mission, on his return fell into the hands of the Romans, who thus became aware of the projects of Philip, and immediately stationed a fleet at Brundusium, to prevent him from crossing into Italy; while the king himself, on the contrary, remained for a long time in ignorance of the result of his negotiations, and it was not till late in the following year (n. c. 215) that he sent a second embassy, and a treaty of alliance was definitively concluded between him and the Carthaginian general. (Liv. xxi. 33, 34, 38, 39; Polyb. iii. 2, vii. 9; Appian, Mac. 1; Justin, xxix. 4.)

Whether Philip really meditated at this time the invasion of Italy, or was merely desirous of establishing his power over all the countries east of the Adriatic, it is certain that the proceedings were marked by an unaccountable degree of hesitation and delay. He suffered the remainder of the season of 215 to pass away without any active measures, and though in the following year (B. C. 214), he at length appeared in the Adriatic with a fleet, with which he took the town of Oricus, and laid siege to the important city of Apollonia, his arms were soon paralysed by the arrival of a small Roman force under M. Laevinus, and he was not only compelled to raise the siege of Apollonia, but destroyed his own ships to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy, and effected his retreat to Macedon by land. (Liv. xxi. 40.) The following year (213), he was more successful, having made himself master of the strong fortress of Lissus, the capture of which was followed by the submission of great part of Illyria (Polyb. viii. 12); but this decisive blow was not followed up; and the apparent inaction of the king during the two following years is the more remarkable, because the occupation of Tarentum by Hannibal would have seemed likely, at this juncture, to facilitate his communications with Italy.

Meanwhile, the proceedings of Philip in Greece were but too well calculated to alienate all the favourable dispositions previously entertained towards him. In B. C. 215, he had interposed in the affairs of Messenia, in a manner that led to a fearful massacre of the oligarchical party in that state: the reproaches of Aratus on this occasion were bitter and vehement, and from henceforth all friendship was at an end between them. Philip was, however, still so far swayed by his influence as to refrain at that time from the design of seizing by treachery on the fortress of Ithome; but after his return from his unsuccessful expedition to Illyria (B. c. 214) he returned to this project, and sent Demetrius of Pharos to carry it into execution. The latter was killed in the attempt; but his death produced no change in the counsels of Philip, who now invaded Messenia himself, and laid waste the open country with fire and sword. Meanwhile, the breach between him and Aratus had become daily more complete, and was still further widened by the discovery that the king was carrying on a criminal intercourse with the wife of the younger Amutas. At length the king was induced to listen to the insidious proposal of Taurion, and to rid himself of his former friend and counsellor by means of a slow and secret poison, n. c. 213. (Polyb. vii. 10—14, viii. 10, 14; Plut. Arat. 49—52.)

The war between Philip and the Romans had been carried on, for some time, with unaccountable slackness on both sides, when it all at once assumed a new character in consequence of the alliance entered into by the latter with the Aetolians. In the treaty concluded by the Roman praetor, M. Valerius Laevinus, with that people (before the end of n. c. 211), provision was also made for comprising in the alliance Scerdilæidas, king of Illyria, and Attalus, king of Pergamus, and the king of Macedonia thus found himself threatened on all sides by a powerful confedency. (Liv. xxi. 24; Justin. xxi. 4.) This news at length roused him from his apathy. Though it was then midwinter, he hastened to provide for the safety of his frontiers, both on the side of Illyria and that of Thrace, and then marched southwards, with an army, to the succour of the Aetolians, who were attacked by the Aetolians, but the latter withdrew on learning the approach of Philip, and the king returned to Macedonia. Hostilities were renewed in the spring (n. c. 210), and the Romans opened the campaign by the capture of Anticyra; but after this, instead of supporting their allies with vigour, they withdrew the greater part of their forces, and P. Sulpicius Galba, who had succeeded Laevinus in the command, found himself unable to effect anything more than the conquest of Agena, while Philip succeeded in reducing the strong fortress of Echinus in Tessaly, notwithstanding all the efforts of the Romans and Aetolians to relieve it. (Liv. xxvi. 25, 26, 28; Polyb. ix. 41, 42.)
The next summer (v. c. 209)*, the arms of Philip were directed to the support of his allies, the Achaenians, who were unable to make head against the Lacedaemonians, Messenians, and Eleans. Marching through Thessaly, he defeated the Aetolian general Pyrrhus, though supported by some Roman troops furnished him by Gaiba, in two successive actions, forced the pass of Thermopylae, and made his way successfully to the Peloponnesse, where he celebrated the Ieranion games at Argos. The Rhodians and Chians, as well as the Athenians and Ptolemy, king of Egypt, now again interposed their good offices, to bring about a peace between the contending parties, and negotiations were opened at Aegium, but these proved abortive in consequence of the arrogant demands of the Aetolians, in whom the arrival of Attalus at this juncture had excited fresh hopes. Philip now invaded Elis in conjunction with the Achaean praetor Cycliadas, but was worsted in an engagement under the walls of the city, in which, however, the king greatly distinguished himself by his personal bravery; and the inroads of the Dardanians, and other Barbarian tribes now compelled him to return to Macedonia. (Liv. xxvii. 29—33; Justin. xxix. 4.)

At the opening of the campaign of 208, Philip found himself assailed on all sides by the formidable confederacy now organized against him. Sulpicius with the Roman fleet, in conjunction with the king, had just taken Aegium, and consequently the northern frontiers, and his allies, the Achaenians, Aetolians, and Boeotians, were clamorous for support and assistance against the Aetolians and Lacedaemonians. The energy and activity displayed by the king under these trying circumstances, is justly praised by Polybius; while he sent such support as his means enabled him to his various allies, he himself took up his post at Demetrias in Thessaly, to watch the proceedings of Sulpicius and Attalus; and though he was unable to prevent the fall of Oreus, which was betrayed into their hands [PLATOR], he not only saved Chalcis from a similar fate, but narrowly missed surprising Attalus himself in the neighbourhood of Opus. The king of Pergamus was soon after recalled to the defence of his own dominions against Prusias, king of Bithynia, and was forced to keep the sea single-handed, withdrew to Aegina. Philip was thus left at liberty to act against the Aetolians, and to support his own allies in the Peloponnesse, where Machanidas, the Lacedaemonian tyrant, retired on his approach. The king was content with this success; and after taking part in the general assembly of the Achaenians at Aegium, and ravaging the coasts of Aetolia, returned once more into his own dominions. (Polyb. x. 41, 42; Liv. xxviii. 5—8; Justin. xxx. 4.)

The events of the succeeding years of the war are very imperfectly known to us, but it is evident that matters took a turn decidedly favourable to Philip and his allies. Atalus continued in Asia,

* Concerning the chronology of these events, and the error committed by Livy, who assigns this campaign to the year 206, see Schorn (Gesch. Griechenl. p. 196, not.).—Thirlwall (Hist. of Greece, vol. viii. p. 268, not.).—Clinton (P. H. vol. iii. p. 43) has followed Livy without comment.

and the Romans, whose attention was directed wholly towards affairs in Spain and Africa, lent no support to their Grecian allies. Meanwhile, the Achaenians, under Philopoemen, were victorious in the Peloponnesse over Machanidas, and the Aetolians, finding themselves abandoned by their allies, and unable to cope single-handed with the power of Philip, who had a second time carried his ravages into the heart of their country, and plundered their capital city of Thermas, at length concluded peace with the king, upon terms dictated by the conqueror. What these were we know not, but the treaty had hardly been concluded, when a Roman fleet and army, under P. Sempronius Tuditanus, arrived at Dyrrhachium. Philip hastened to oppose him, and offered him battle, but the Roman general shut himself up within the walls of Apollonia; and meanwhile the Epeirots, by their intervention, succeeded in bringing about a peace between the two parties. A preliminary treaty was concluded between Philip and Sempronius at Phoenice in Epeirus, b. c. 205, and was readily ratified by the Roman people, who were desirous to give their undivided attention to the war in Africa. (Liv. xxxix. 12; Polyb. xi. 4, 7; Appian. Mac. Exc. 2.)

It is probable that both parties looked upon the peace thus concluded as little more than a suspension of hostilities. Such was clearly the view with which his lifetime it went with Philip. Witticism, as he was hardly well aware of their sentiments in this respect. Hence he not only proceeded to carry out his views for his own aggravation and the humiliation of his rivals in Greece, without any regard to the Roman alliances in that country, but he even went so far as to send a strong body of auxiliaries to the Carthaginians in Africa, who fought at Zama under the standard of Hannibal. (Liv. xxx. 26, 33, 42, xxxi. 1.) Meanwhile, his proceedings in Greece were stained by acts of the darkest perfidy and the most wanton aggression. The death of Ptolemy Philopator, king of Egypt (b. c. 205), and the infancy of his successor, at this time opened a new field to the ambition of Philip, who concluded a league with Antiochus against the Egyptian monarch, according to which the Cyclades, as well as the cities and islands in Ionia subject to Ptolemy, were to fall to the share of the Macedonian king. (Polyb. iii. 2; x. 20; Appian. Mac. Exc. 3; Justin. xxx. 2.)

In order to carry out this scheme, it was necessary for Philip to establish his naval power firmly in the Aegean, and to humble that of Attalus and the Rhodians, and the latter object he endeavoured to effect by the most nefarious means, for which he found ready instruments in Dicaearchus, an Aetolian pirate, and Heraclides, an exile from Tarentum, who seems at this period to have held the same place in the king's confidence previously enjoyed by Demetrius of Pharos. While Dicaearchus, with a squadron of twenty ships, cruised in the Aegean, and made himself master of the principal islands of the Cyclades, Heraclides contrived to ingratiate himself with the Rhodians, and then took an opportunity to set fire to their arsenal, and burn great part of their fleet. (Polyb. xii. 4, 5, x. 20, xviii. 37; Dion. xxvii. Exc. Vales. pp. 573, 575; Polyaeus, v. 17, § 2.) Meanwhile, Philip himself had reduced under his dominion the cities of Lysimachia and Chaledon, notwithstanding they were in a state of alliance-with the Aetolians, and he next proceeded to lay siege to Cius, in Ephesus. The Rhodians (who had not yet recovered from the terms of peace with Philip, though his share in the perfidy of Heracleides could be no secret) in vain interposed their good offices in favour of Cius: their representations were treated with derision; and the king having made himself master of the place, gave it up to plunder, sold all the inhabitants as slaves, and then consigned the empty city to his ally, Prusias, king of Bithynia. On his return to Macedonia, he inflicted a similar fate on Thasos, though it had surrendered on capitulation. (Polyb. xvi. 21—24; Liv. xxxii. 33.) But these repeated injuries at length roused the Rhodians to open hostilities: they concluded a league with Attalus (b. c. 201), and equipped a powerful fleet. Philip had taken Samos, and was besieging Chios, when the combined fleets of the allies presented themselves, and a general battle ensued, in which, after a severe and long-protracted struggle, the allies were victorious, although the Rhodian admiral, Theophriscus, was killed, and Attalus himself narrowly escaped falling into the hands of the enemy. The advantage, however, was by no means decisive, and in a second action off Lade, Philip obtained the victory. This success appears to have left him almost free scope to carry on his operations on the coasts of Asia; he took Chios, ravaged without opposition the dominions of Attalus, up to the very walls of Pergamus, and afterwards reduced the whole of the district of Peraea held by the Rhodians on the main land, including the cities of Iasus and Bargylia. But meanwhile the Rhodians and Attalus had strengthened their fleet so much that they were greatly superior at sea, and Philip was, in consequence, compelled to take up his winter-quarters in Caria. It was not till the ensuing spring (b. c. 200), that he was able to elude, by a stratagem, the vigilance of his enemies, and effect his return to Europe, where the state of affairs imperiously demanded his presence. Attalus and the Rhodians having failed in their attempt to overtake him, repaired to Aegina, where they readily induced the Athenians, already on hostile terms with Philip, to join their alliance, and openly declare war against the Macedonian king. (Polyb. xvi. 11, 12, 24—26; Polyena. iv. 17, § 2; Liv. xxxi. 14, 15.)

But a more formidable enemy was now at hand. The Romans were no sooner free from their long-protracted contest with Carthage than they began to lend a favourable ear to the complaints that poured in on all sides from the Athenians, the Rhodians, Attalus, and Ptolemy, against the Macedonian monarch, and notwithstanding some reluctance on the part of the people, war was declared against Philip, and the conduct of it assigned to the consul P. Sulpicius Galba, b. c. 200. But it was late in the season before he was able to set out for his province; and after sending a small force, under C. Claudius Centho, to the assistance of the Athenians, he took up his quarters for the winter at Apollonia. Meanwhile Attalus and the Rhodians neglected to prosecute the war, perhaps waiting for the arrival of the Roman forces. Philip, on his part, was not slow in availling himself of the respite thus granted him. While he sent Nicanor to invade Attica, he himself turned his arms towards Thrace, where he reduced in succession the important towns of Aenus and Maroneia, and then advancing to the Chersonese, laid siege to Abydos. The desperate resistance of the inhabitants prolonged the defence of this place for so long a time that it would have been easy for their allies to have relieved them, but Attalus and the Rhodians neglected to send them assistance, the remonstrances of the Roman ambassador, M. Aemilius Lepidus, were treated with derision by Philip, and the city ultimately fell into his hands, though not till almost the whole of the inhabitants had perished either by the sword of the enemy or by their own hands. (Liv. xxxi. 2—5, 6, 14, 16—18; Polyb. xvi. 27—34.)

Immediately after the fall of Abydos, Philip learnt the arrival of Sulpicius in Epeirus, but finding that the consul had already taken up his winter-quarters, he took no further measures to oppose him. Claudius, who had been sent to the support of the Athenians, was more unperturbed, and not content with guarding the coasts of Attica, he, by a bold stroke, surprised and plundered Chalcis. Philip, on this news, hastened to oppose him, but finding that Claudius had already quitted Chalcis, which he was not strong enough to hold, the king pushed on with great rapidity, in the hopes of surprising Athens itself, an object which, in fact, he narrowly missed. Foiled in this scheme, he avenged himself by laying waste the environs of the city, sparing in his fury neither the sepulchres of men, nor the sacred groves and temples of the gods. After this he repaired to Corinti, and took part in an assembly of the Achaeans, but failed in inducing that people to take part more openly in the war with the Romans; and having a second time ravaged the territory of Attica, returned once more into Macedonia. (Liv. xxxi. 10, 22—26.)

The consul, Sulpicius, was now, at length, ready to take the field, b. c. 199. He had already gained some slight successes through his lieutenant, L. Apastus, and had been joined by the Illyrian prince Pleuratus, Amynander, king of Aethamania, and the Dardanian, Bato. The Aetolians, on the contrary, though strongly solicited both by Philip and the Romans, as yet declined to take part in the war. Sulpicius advanced through Dassaretia, where Philip met him with his main army, and several unimportant actions ensued, in one of which, near Octolophus, the Romans gained the victory; and this advantage, though of little consequence in itself, had the effect of deciding the Aetolians to espouse the Roman cause, and they joined with Amynander in an inroad into Thessaly. At the same time the Dardanians invaded Macedonia from the north, and Philip found it necessary to make head against these new enemies. He accordingly quitted his strong position near the camp of Sulpicius, and having eluded the vigilance of the Roman general, effected his retreat un molested into Macedonia, from whence he sent Aethanagors against the Dardanians, while he himself hastened to attack the Aetolians, who were still in Thessaly, intent only upon plunder. Philip fell upon them by surprise, put many of them to the sword, and totally defeated their army, which would have been utterly destroyed, had it not been for their ally, Amynander. The Roman general meanwhile, after pushing on into Eordina and Orestis, where he took the city of Celetrus, had fallen back again into Epeirus, without affecting anything of importance: the Dardanians had been repulsed and defeated by Atheniangors, and thus, on the whole, the result of the campaign had been certainly not unfavourable to Philip. (Liv. xxxi. 27—43.)

It was apparently late in the season before the new consul, P. Villius Tappulus, arrived in Epeirus to succeed Sulpius, and a mutiny that broke out in his own army prevented him from undertaking any hostile operations. Philip meanwhile had followed up his victory over the Aetolians by laying siege to Thamact, in Thessaly, but the courage and conduct of the garrison prevented this siege, until so late a period of the year, that Philip was compelled to abandon the enterprise, and return to Macedonia for the winter. (Id. xxxii. 3, 4.) After spending this period of repose in the most active preparations for renewing the contest, he took the field again with the first approach of spring, n. c. 198, and established his camp in a strong position near the pass of Antigoneia, where it completely commanded the direct route into Macedonia. Villius advanced to a position near that of the king, but was wholly unable to force the pass; and while he was still deliberating what to do, his successor Flamininus arrived, and took the command of the army. (Id. ib. 5, 6, 9.) The events of the war from this period till its termination have been already fully given under FLAMININUS.

By the peace finally granted to Philip (n. c. 196), the king was compelled to abandon all his conquests, made in Europe and Asia, withdraw his garrisons from all Greek cities, surrender his whole fleet to the Romans, and limit his standing army to 5000 men, besides paying a sum of 1000 talents. Among the hostages given for the fulfilment of these hard conditions, was his son Demetrius. (Polyb. xviii. 27; Liv. xxxiii. 30.) Whatever resentment and enmity he might still entertain against his conquerors, Philip was now effectually humbled, and it is certain that his conduct towards Rome at this time is characterised by every appearance of good faith and of a sincere desire to cultivate the friendship of the all-powerful republic. At the suggestion of the Roman deputy, Cn. Cornelius, he sent an embassy to Rome, to request that the treaty of peace might be converted into one of alliance (Polyb. xviii. 31); and in the following year (195), he sent a strong body of auxiliaries to the assistance of Flamininus against Nabia. (Liv. xxxiv. 26.) At a subsequent period he resisted, all the efforts of the Aetolian envoy, Nicander, to induce him once more to take up arms in concert with Antiochus, as well as the tempting offers of that monarch himself, who spared no promises in order to gain him over to his alliance. (Id. xxx. 12, xxxii. 23.) At the commencement of n. c. 191, he sent ambassadors to Rome, with offers of support and assistance against Antiochus, who was then already in Greece. The Syrian king had the imprudence at this time to give personal offence to Philip, who immediately engaged in measures of more active hostility, sent all the assistance in his power to the Roman praetor, Baebius, and co-operated with the Romans in the siege of Limnaea, while he took the opportunity to expel Amyander from Athisania, and make himself master of that province. (Id. xxxvi. 4, 13, 14.) Though he took no part in the decisive battle at Thermopylae, he joined the consuls Acilius Glabrio shortly after, and it was arranged between them that Philip should besiege Lamia at the same time that Glabrio carried on the siege of Hermlea, but the latter city having fallen first, the king was ordered to desist from the siege of Lamia, which thereupon surrendered to the Romans. Philip was indignant at being thus balked of his prize, but he nevertheless obtained permission from the consul, while the latter was occupied in the siege of Naupactus, to turn his arms against some of the cities which had taken part with the Aetolians; and not only sallied himself master of Demetrias, and other places in Thessaly, but overran the whole of Perrheibia, Aperantia, and Dolopian. (Id. xxxvi. 23, 33, 34, xxxiv. 23.) The Romans, at this period, evinced their satisfaction with the conduct of Philip by restoring to him his son Demetrius and the other hostages, and remitting all the arrears of tribute, which remained yet unpaid (Pol. xx. 13, xxi. 9; Liv. xxxvi. 33): the king, in return, rendered them still more important services, by providing every thing necessary for the march of their army through Macedonia and Thrace, when advancing to the attack of Antiochus in Asia; and securing its passage, without obstruction, as far as the Hellespont. (Liv. xxxvii. 7; Appian. Mac. Exc. 7, § 3.) But the seeds of fresh disputes were already sown, and Polybius has justly remarked that the real causes of the second war of the Romans with Macedonia arose before the death of Philip, though it did not break out till a later period. The Romans, engaged in the contest with Antiochus, and stood in need of the support of the Macedonian king, he had been allowed to retain possession of the conquests he had made during that war; and though Athamaia had been again wrested from him by Amyander and the Aetolians, he still held many towns in Perrheibia and Thessaly, which he had captured from the Aetolians, with the express permission of Acilius Glabrio. But after the fall of Antiochus, deputies from those states appeared at Rome (n. c. 165), to demand the restitution of the cities in question, and at the same time Eumenes warned the senate of the increasing power of Philip, who was diligently employed in strengthening his internal resources, while he was secretly enlarging his frontiers on the side of Thrace, and had made himself master of the important cities of Aenus and Maroneia. This was enough to arouse the jealousy of the senate. After the usual form of sending deputies to inquire into the matters on the spot, it was decreed that Philip should surrender all his conquests in Perrheibia and Thessaly, withdraw his garrisons from the cities of Thrace, and confine himself within the ancient limits of Macedonia. (Liv. xxxix. 23—29, 33; Polyb. xxii. 4, 6, 11, 13, 14.)

The indignation of the king was vehemently excited by these commands, but he was not yet prepared to resist the power of Rome, and accordingly complied, but, before he withdrew his troops from Maroneia, made a barbarous massacre of many of the unhappy citizens. At the same time he sent his younger son, Demetrius, to Rome, to answer the complaints which were now pouring in from all sides against him; and the young prince was received with so much favour by the senate, that they agreed to pardon all the past grounds of offence against Philip, out of consideration for his son. (Polyb. xxii. 15, 14, xxiv. 1—3; Liv. xxxix. 34, 35, 46, 47.) Unhappily the partiality thus displayed by the Romans towards De-
Besides his two sons already mentioned, he left a third son, named Philip (but whether legitimate or not we are not informed), who could have been born but a few years before the death of his father. [PHILIPPUS, No. 25.] (In addition to the ancient authorities cited in the course of the above narrative, the reign and character of Philip will be found fully discussed and examined by Schor, Gesch. Griechenlands, Bonn, 1833; Plathe, Gesch. Macedoniens, vol. ii.; Thirlwall’s Greece, vol. viii. chap. 63—66; and Brandstatter, Gesch. des Aetolischen Bundes, Berlin, 1844.) [E. H. B.]

COIN OF PHILIPPUS V. KING OF MACEDONIA.

PHILIPPUS, MARCIUS. 1. Q. MARCIUS Q. F. Q. N. PHILIPPUS, consul b. C. 281, with L. Aemilius Barabula, had to carry on war with the Etruscans, and had a triumph on the 1st of April on account of his victory over them. In b. C. 263 he was magister equitum to the dictator Cn. Fulvius Maximus Centumalus (Fasti Capit.).

2. L. MARCIUS Q. F. PHILIPPUS, the father of No. 3, formed a hospitable connection with Philip V., king of Macedonia (Liv. xlii. 38), though on what occasion is not mentioned. This fact is alluded to in the annexed coin of the Marcia gens, which bears on the obverse the head of the Macedonian monarch, and on the reverse L. PHILIPPUS, with a horseman galloping, probably in reference to the name.

One is disposed to think that this L. Marcus was the first person of the gens who obtained the surname of Philippus in consequence of his connection with the king of Macedonia, and that the Fasti erroneously give this cognomen to the consul of b. C. 281.

3. Q. MARCIUS L. F. Q. N. PHILIPPUS, son of No. 2, was praetor b. C. 186, and obtained Sicily as his province. Two years afterwards, b. C. 186, he was consul with Sp. Postumius Albinus. These consuls were commanded by the senate to conduct the celebrated inquiry into the worship of Bacchus, which had been secretly introduced into Italy and been the occasion of much immorality and profanity. We accordingly find the name of Philip in the senatus consultum de Bacchanalibus, which has come down to us. After Philippus had finished his share in these investigations, he set out for Liguria, where he and his colleague had to carry on war. Here, however, he was unsuccessful. In the country of the Apuani, he was surprised by the enemy in a narrow pass, and lost 4000 of his men. The recollection of his defeat was preserved by the name of the salutus Marcus, which was given to the spot from this time. In B.C. 183, Philippus was sent as ambassador into Macedonia, with orders to watch likewise the Roman interests in Southern Greece; and although he compelled Philippus to withdraw his garrisons from various places, yet the report which he presented to the senate was unfavourable to the Macedonian monarch. In B.C. 169, Philippus was chosen a decemvir sacram. Some years afterwards, B.C. 171, Philippus was again sent with several others as ambassador into Greece to counteract the designs and influence of Perseus. He and the other ambassadors first visited Epeirus, Aetolia, and Thessaly, next to proceed to Boeotia and Euboea, and from thence to cross over to Peloponnesus, where they were to join their other colleagues. In Thessaly Philippus received an embassy from Persesus, praying for a conference, and grounding his plea on the hospitable connection which had been established between his father and the father of the Roman ambassador. With this request Philippus complied, and the conference took place on the banks of the river Peneus. The Roman ambassador persuaded the king to send ambassadors to Rome, and for this purpose a suspension of hostilities was agreed upon; and thus Philippus completely accomplished the object he had in view, as the Romans were not yet prepared to carry on the war. Philippus next went to Boeotia, where he was also successful in carrying out the Roman views, and he then returned to Rome. In the report of the embassy which he gave to the senate, he dwelt with pride upon the way in which he had deceived Persesus; and although the senators of the old school denounced such conduct as unworthy of their ancestors, the majority of the body viewed it with so much approbation as to send Philippus again into Greece, with unlimited power to do whatever he might think most for the interest of the state.

These services did not go unrewarded, and in B.C. 169 Philippus was a second time chosen consul, and had as his colleague Cn. Servilius Caepio. The conduct of the Macedonian war fell to Philippus. This war had already lasted two campaigns, during which Persesus had maintained his ground against two consul armies. Philippus lost no time in crossing over into Greece, where he arrived early in the spring of B.C. 169, and received in Thessaly the army of the consul of the preceding year, A. Hostilius Mancinus. Here he did not remain long, but resolved to cross over the river Pinus ridge of Olympus and thus descend into Macedonia near Heracleum. Persesus was stationed with the main body of his forces near Diom, and had taken possession of the mountain passes which led into the plain. If Persesus had remained firm, he might have cut off the Roman army, or compelled it to retract its steps across the mountains with great loss; but, at the approach of the consul, he lost courage, forfeited the advantages of his position, and retreated to Pydna. Philippus followed him, but was unable to accomplish any thing worthy of mention, and in the following year handed over the army to his successor L. Aemilius Paulus, who brought the war to a close. We learn from Livy that Philippus was at this time more than sixty years of age. In B.C. 164, Philippus was censor with L. Aemilius Paulus, and in his censorship he set up in the city a new sun-dial. (Liv. xxxviii. 25, xxxix. 6, 14, 20, 48, xl. 2, 3, 42, xlii. 37-47, xliii. 13, xlv. 1-16; Polyb. xxiv. 4, 6, 10, xxv. 1, xxxvii. 10, &c.; Plin. H. N. vii. 60; Cic. Brut. 20.)

4. Q. Marcius Philippus, the son of No. 3, served under his father in Macedonia, B.C. 169. (Liv. xlv. 3.) This is the only time he is mentioned, unless, perchance, he is the same as the Q. Philippus, of whom Cicero says (pro Bulb. 11) that he had been condemned, and lived as an exile at Nuceria, of which state he was made a citizen.

5. L. Marcius Q. f. Q. N. Philippus, failed in obtaining the tribunate again, but nevertheless acquired afterwards all the high dignities of the state (Cic. pro Planc. 21). He was tribune of the plebs, B.C. 104, in which year he brought forward an agrarian law, of the details of which we are not informed, but which is chiefly memorable for the statement he made in recommending the measure, that there were not two thousand men in the state who possessed property (Cic. de Off. ii. 21). He seems to have brought forward this measure chiefly with the view of acquiring popularity, and he quietly dropped it when he found there was no hope of carrying it. In B.C. 100, he was one of the distinguished men in the state who took up arms against Saturninus and his crew (Cic. pro C. Rabir. 7). He was a candidate for the consuls-hip B.C. 93, but was defeated in the comitia by Herennius; but two years afterwards he carried his election, and was consul in B.C. 91, with Sex. Julius Caesar. This was a very important year in the internal history of Rome, though the events of it are very difficult clearly to understand. It was the year in which M. Livius Drusus, who was then tribune of the plebs, brought forward the various important laws, the object and tendency of which have been discussed elsewhere [Drusus, No. 6]. It is sufficient to state here that Drusus at first enjoyed the full confidence of the senate, and endeavoured by his measures to reconcile the people to the senatorial party. Philippus was a personal enemy of Drusus, and as he belonged to the popular party, he offered a vigorous opposition to the tribune, and thus came into open conflict with the senate. The exasperation of parties rose to the greatest height, and even the senate itself was disgraced by scenes of turbulence and indecency. On one occasion Philippus declared in the senate that he could no longer carry on the government with such a body, and that there was need of a new senate. This roused the great orator L. Licinius Crassus, who, in the course of his speech, in which he is said to have surpassed his usual eloquence, that man could not be his consul who refused to recognise him as senator (Cic. de Orat. iii. 1; Quintil. viii. 3. § 89; Val. Max. vi. 2. § 2). In the forum scenes of still greater violence occurred. There Philippus strained every nerve to prevent Drusus from carrying his laws. On one occasion he interrupted the tribune while he was haranguing the people; whereupon Drusus ordered one of his clients to drag Philippus to prison; and the order was executed with such violence that the blood started from the nostrils of the consul, as he was dragged away by the throat (Val. Max. i. 5. § 2; Florus, iii. 17; Aur. Vict. de Vir. Ill. 66). The opposition of the consul was, however, in vain; and the laws of the tribune were carried. But a reaction followed almost immediate: all parties in the state who had just before united in favour of Drusus, now began to look upon him with mistrust and suspicion. In this state of affairs, Philippus became reconciled to the senate, and to the leading members of that body, with whom he had hitherto been at deadly feud; and accordingly, on the proposition of the consul, who was also an augur, a senatus consultum was passed, declaring all the laws of Drusus to be null and void, as having been carried against the auspices (Cic. de Prov. Cons. 9, de Leg. ii. 12, Fragment. vol. iv. p. 449, ed. Orelli; Ascon. in Cornel. p. 68). Nothing else is recorded of the consulsuhip of Philippus, except that he recommended the senate to lay claim to Egypt, in consequence of its having been left to them by the will of Alexander. (Cic. de Leg. Agr. ii. 16.)
PHILIPPUS.

In b. c. 86, Philippus was censor with M. Perperna, and it is recorded of him that he expelled his own uncle App. Claudius from the senate. (Cic. pro Dom. 52.)

In the civil wars between Marius and Sulla, Philippus took no part. His original predilections might have had him to join Marius; but the experience he had had of the Roman mob in his consulship, together with his reconciliation to the senate, led him probably to desire the success of Sulla. Cicero speaks of him as belonging to the party of the latter; but as he continued at Rome during Cinna's usurpation, and was suffered to remain unmolested, he must have been regarded as neutral in the strife (Cic. ad Att. viii. 3). On Sulla's death, he deprecated any immediate change, and accordingly resisted the attempts of Lepidus, b. c. 78, to alter the constitution which had been recently established (Sall. Hist. i. 18, 19). But Philippus was no friend to the aristocracy in heart, and accordingly gave his support to Pompey, by whose means the people eventually regained most of their former political power. Thus he was one of those who advocated sending Pompey to conduct the war in Spain against Sertorius, and is recorded on the occasion to have said, "Non se Pompeium sua sententia pro consule, sed pro consulibus mittere." (Cic. pro Leg. Man. 21, Phil. xi. 8; Plut. Pompey 17.) He appears, likewise, to have been a personal friend of Pompey, for he had defended him previously in b. c. 86, when he was accused of having appropriated to his own use the booty taken at Asculum in the Marsic war, b. c. 89. (Cic. Brut. 64; Val. Max. vi. 2 § 8; Plut. Pompey 4.) It would seem that Philippus did not live to see the return of Pompey from Spain.

Philippus was one of the most distinguished orators of his time. His reputation continued even to the Augustan age, whence we read in Horace (Epist. i. 7. 46):—

"Strenuus et fortis causisque Philippus agendis Clarus."

Cicero says that Philippus was decidedly inferior as an orator to his two great contemporaries Crassus and Antonius, but was without question next to them. In speaking he possessed much freedom and wit; he was fertile in invention, and clear in the development of his ideas; and in altercation he was witty and sarcastic. He was also well acquainted with Greek literature for that time (Cic. Brut. 47). He was accustomed to speak extempore, and, when he rose to speak, he frequently did not know with what word he should begin (Cic. de Or. ii. 78); hence in his old age it was with both contempt and anger that he used to listen to the studied periods of Hortensius (Cic. Brut. 55). Philippus was a man of luxurious habits, which his wealth enabled him to gratify; his fish-ponds were particularly celebrated for their magnificence and correctness. The same mention of the ancients along with those of Lucullus and Hortensius (Varr. R. R. iii. 3, § 10; Colum. viii. 16; Plin. H. N. ix. 54, s. 80). Besides his son, L. Philippus, who is spoken of below [No. 6], he had a step-son Gellius Publicola [Publicola].

(Our knowledge respecting Philippus is chiefly derived from Cicero, the various passages in whose writings relating to him are collected in Orelli, Onom. Tull. vol. ii. p. 380, &c.; comp Meyer, Orator. Roman. Fragment. p. 323, &c., 2d ed.; Westermann, Gesch. der Röm. Bistumsamt, § 43.)

6. L. MARCIUS L. F. Q. N. PHILIPPUS, the son of the preceding, seems to have been praetor in b. c. 60, since we find him praeproetor in Syria in b. c. 59 (Appian, Syr. 51). He was consul in b. c. 56, with Cn. Cornelius Lentulus Marcellinus. Philippus was closely connected with Caesar's family. Upon the death of C. Octavius, the father of the emperor Augustus, Philippus married his wife Atia, who was the daughter of Julia, the sister of the dictator, and he thus became the step-father of Augustus (Suet. Octav. 8; Vell. Pat. ii. 59, 60; Cic. Phil. iii. 6; Appian, B. C. iii. 10, 13; Plut. Octavius 41). Ovid, indeed, says (Fast. vi. 809), that he married the sister of the mother (matertera) of Augustus, and hence it has been conjectured that Philippus may have married both sisters in succession, for that he was the step-father of Augustus cannot admit of dispute. (The question is discussed by Orelli, Onom. Tull. vol. ii. p. 382.)

Notwithstanding his close connection with Caesar's family, Philippus remained neutral in the civil wars. He was at Rome when the senate took open measures against Caesar at the beginning of b. c. 49; and in the division of the provinces among the leading members of the senate, he was purposely passed over (Caes. B. C. i. 6). He subsequently obtained permission from Caesar to take no part in the struggle, and remained quietly in Italy during the whole of the war. Caesar, however, with his usual magnanimity, did not resent this lukewarmness in his cause, but continued to show him marks of friendship and esteem. Philippus was also on good terms with Cicero, who mentions him not unfrequently, and calls him in joke Augustus fictus, in allusion to his name Philippus (Cic. ad Att. ix. 12, 15, 16, 18, xiii. 52).

Philippus was a timid man. After the assassination of Caesar, he endeavoured to dissuade his step-son, the young Octavius, from accepting the inheritance which the dictator had left him (Vell. Pat. ii. 60; Suet. Aug. 8; Appian, B. C. iii. 10, 13; comp. Cic. ad Att. xiv. 12). When Antony and the senate came to an open rupture, Philippus was one of the ambassadors sent to the former at Mutina by the senate, and was much blamed by Cicero, because, being the ambassador of the senate, he brought back to that body the shameless demands of Antony. (Cic. ad Fam. xii. 4, Phil. viii. 10, ix. 1.)

Philippus must have attained a good old age. He lived till his step-son had acquired the supremacy of the Roman world, for we find him mentioned as one of the Roman nobles, who ornamented the city with public buildings at the request of the emperor. He built the temple of Hercules and the Muses, which had been first erected by M. Fulvius Nobilius, consul b.C. 189, and he surrounded it with a colonnade, which is frequently mentioned under the name of Porticus Philippus. (Suet. Octav. 29; clari monimenta Philippi, Ov. Fast. vi. 801; Mart. v. 49. 9; Plin. H. N. xxxv. 10; Becker, Römisch. Alterthümer, vol. i. p. 613.)

Philippus left two children, a son [No. 7], and a daughter, Marcia, who was the second wife of Cato Uticensis. [Marci, No. 4.]

7. L. MARIUS L. F. L. N. PHILIPPUS, the son of the preceding, was tribune of the plebs, b.C. 49, when he put his veto upon one of the appointments which the senate wished to make (Caes. B. C. i. 6). He was praetor in b.C. 44, and is in that year called by Cicero, vix patre, avo, majoribus suis dignissimux. (Cic. Phil. iii. 10.)

8. Q. (MARCUS) PHILIPPUS, proconsul in Asia, in b.C. 54, to whom Cicero sends two recommendatory letters (ad Fam. xii. 73, 74). The connection of this Philippus with the other members of the family is not known.

One of the coins belonging to the Philippus has been given above. The following one, which was also struck by some member of the family, refers to the two greatest distinctions of the Marcia gens. The obverse represents the head of Ancus Marcus, the fourth king of Rome, from whom the gens claimed descent [Marcia gens]; the reverse gives a representation of an aqueduct, with the letters AQVA MR (i.e. Aqua Marcia) between the arches, supporting an equestrian statue. This Aqua Marcia was of the most important of the Roman aqueducts, and was built by the praetor Q. Marcii Rex in b.C. 145.

PHILIPPUS (Φιλίππος), king of Syria, was a son of Antiochus VIII., and twin-brother of Antiochus X. After the defeat and death of their elder brother Seleucus VI., Philip and Antiochus united their arms against Antiochus X., who then occupied the throne of Syria; but they were defeated in a decisive battle, in which Antiochus XI. perished. Philip nevertheless assumed the royal title, and was able to maintain himself in the possession of a part of Syria. The fourth brother, Demetrius III., was now set up as king at Damascus by Ptolemy Lathurus, and made common cause with Philip against Antiochus X. The fate of the latter is uncertain, but it is clear that Philip and Demetrius succeeded in making themselves masters of the whole of Syria, which they appear to have divided between them. Their concord, however, did not last long; Demetrius was the first to turn his arms against Philip, but the latter was supported not only by Straton tyrant of Bernea, but by a large Parthian army under a general named Mithridates, who blockaded Demetrius in his camp, and ultimately took him prisoner. After this Philippus made himself master of An-}

PHILIPPUS (Φιλίππος), literary and ecclesiastical. 1. ABUCARA or ABUVARA, one of the Greek scholiasts on the Enchiridion of the Greek grammarian, Hephæstion of Alexandria [Hepahestion, No. 1], or perhaps the compiler of the Scholia, usually published in the various editions of Hephæstion. The Scholia are ascribed to our Philip in a MS. in the King’s Library at Paris. (Catal. MStorum Biblioth. Regiae, No. mmdclxxiv. No. i. vol. ii. p. 539, fol. Paris, 1740; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. p. 709; Vossius, De Hist. Graec. lib. iii.)

2. Of AMPHIPOLIS, a Greek writer of unknown date, remarkable for his obscenity, of which Suidas (s. v. ἀναμνήσεως) has given a sufficiently significant specimen. He wrote, according to Suidas (s. v. Φιλίππος):—1. Ποιηματα βιβλια α’, Rhodiiaca Libri XIX., a history of Rhodes, which Suidas especially stigmatizes for the obscurity of its matter. 2. Κολοανδας βιβλια β’, Coiaca Libri duobus, a history of the island of Cos. 3. Θουραδα, De Sensibus, or more probably Θουραδα, Thedisa, a history of Thosae, also in two books. He wrote some other works not enumerated by Suidas. Theodorus Priscianus, an ancient medical writer (Logius, c. 11), classes Philip of Amphipolis with Herodian and Iamblichus, the Syrian [Iamblichus, No. 1], as a pleasant writer of amatory tales, whose works tended to allure the mind to the pursuit of pleasure. All his works appear to be lost. (Suidas II. ec.; Theodor. Priscian. l.c.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. viii. pp. 159, 160; Vossius, De Hist. Graec. lib. iii.)

3. APOSTOLUS. [No. 11.]

4. CAESARIENNSIS SYNODI RELATOR. The account of the council of Caesarea, held A.D. 196, which (if indeed it be genuine) was written by Theophilus of Caesarea, who lived about that time [Theophilus], was published by the Jesuit Bucherius, in his notes to the Canon Paschali of Victorius of Aquitania, fol. Antwerp, 1634, as the work of one Philippus; the editor being ap-Cave, Cave, and Trithem. are not these more the Philippus, there His Hist. Jacobs, Ivii., p. 174—1747. 8.

7. CHOLLIDEUS, or CHOLLIDENIUS (Xολλίδευς, more correctly Χολλίδευς), mentioned in Plato’s will, given by Diogenes Laërtius (iii. 41), as the owner of land adjoining a farm or estate which Plato bequeathed to his son Ademantius. Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 11) notices this occurrence of the name of Philippus: and the compiler of the index to Fabricius has unwittingly converted the Attic landowner into a Platonic philosopher.

8. COMICUS, the Comic Writer, of whom scarcely anything is known, except it be the title of some of his comedies, and even with respect to these there is considerable difficulty. Suidas (s. v.), on the authority of Athenaeus, ascribes to him a comedy entitled Οὐνυθίακας, Οχυματικας; but Grotius assigns the play not to Philippus, but to Philippiades. There is consequently not one known drama to which the title of Philip is clear and indisputable. Philip is probably the γελουτοποιὸς Φιλίππος, “the laughter-exciting Philip” of Maximius Tyrius (Dissert. xxvi. vol. i. p. 492, ed. Reiske), and the Φίλιππος κωιδωνικαῖος of Themistius (Paraphr. Aristotelis Lib. i. De Anima, c. 3, sub fin. p. 68, b. ed. Althus, Venice, 1533, or c. 15, in the Latin version of Hermodorus Barbarus), who cites a saying of Dadales, one of his characters. (Suidas, l. c.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. pp. 728, 743, 747, 748, vol. ii. p. 480.)

9. DIACONUS, the Deacon. [No. 11.]

10. EPIGRAMMATICUS. Among the writers whose Epigrammata are inserted in the various editions of the Anthologia Graeca, or in other works, are several who bear the name of Philip; as Philip the Macedonian [No. 15], and Philip of Thessalonica [see below]. There are two others: a Philip whom Fabricius styles Junior, and assigns to the fifth or sixth century after Christ, of whom there is an extant Epigramma in Amores sibi arri dentes Constatissipoli, which is assigned to Philip of Thessalonica, among whose epigrams it is No. Ivi., in the editions of Brunck, vol. ii. p. 227, and Jacobs, vol. ii. p. 211; and a Philip called Byzantius, whose Epigramma in Hercules is given in the Mythologiae of Natalis Comes, lib. vii. pp. 691, 692, ed. sine loci not. 1653, and assigned to Philip of Thessalonica (No. ii.) in the Anthologia of Brunck, vol. ii. pp. 225, 226, and Jacobs, vol. ii. p. 209. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 491.)

11. EVANGELISTA, the Evangelist. Among the spurious gospels which were produced in the early ages of the Church, was one to which some of the Gnostic sects appealed (Epiph. Haeres. xxvi. 15), and which they ascribed to Philip, whether to the Apostle Philip or the deacon Philip, who in one passage in the New Testament (Acts, xxii. 8) is called the Evangelist, is not clear. A passage from this apocryphal gospel is cited by Epiphanius (ibid.) and Timotheus, the presbyter of Constantinopole and Meursium, Varia Divina, p. 117), and Leontius of Byzantium (De Sect., act. a. lect. iii.) mentions Τό κατά Φιλίππου Εὐαγγέλιον, Evangelium secundum Philippum, as among the spurious books used by the Manicheans. Whether this was the same book with that used by the Gnostics, is not determined. (Fabric. Cod. Apocryph. N. T. vol. i. p. 376, &c.)

12. Of GORTyna, a Christian writer of the second century. He was bishop of the Church at Gortyna in Crete, and was spoken of in the highest terms by Dionysius of Corinth (Dionysius, literary, No. 22), in a letter to the Church at Gortyna and the other Churches in Crete (apud Euseb. H. E. iv. 23), as having inspired his flock with manly courage, apparently during the persecution of Marcus Aurelius. Philip wrote a book against Marcion (Marcionis contra Marcionem), which was extant in the ancient ages, but is now lost: Trithemius speaks of it as extant in his day, but his exactness as to whether books were in existence or not is not great. He also states that Philip wrote Ad Diversos Epistolae and Varrii Tractatus, but these are not mentioned by the ancients. (Euseb. H. E. iv. 21, 23, 25; Hieron. De Viris Illust. c. 30; Trithem. De Script. Bibli. Eccles. c. 19; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 172, vol. i. p. 74, ed. Oxford, 1740—1743.)

13. GRAMMATICUS s. RHETOR s. SOPHISTA. Suidas (s. v. Φίλιππος σοφιστής) ascribes to this writer a work on the aspirates, Περί πνευμάτων. De Spiritibus, taken from Herodian, and arranged in an alphabetical order: also a work Περί συναλλαγής, De Synallogia. Nothing more is known of the works or the writer, who must have lived at a later period than Herodian [HERODIANUS AElius], who belongs to the age of the Antonines. In the Greek of the Roman copy, there was a word εἰς αὐτὸν γελόειν, “to laugh at himself,” which has been taken to refer to that which he is said to have written. But it is not certain that this jest was a real one, but an effect of style, for which he was criticized by Plotinus, who, in the passage quoted above, says that the writer is not realy a true historian, but a sophist (vide Reiske, Not. ad Plutarch, l. c.) that εἰς αὐτὸν γελόειν is a corrupt reading, and that it should be εἰς αὐτὸν γελόειν. [No. 30.]

15. MACEDO, the MACEDONIAN. An Epigramma in the Anthologia Graeca (lib. iv. c. 11, vol. ii. p. 232, ed. Brunck, vol. ii. p. 216, No. lxiv. ed. Jacobs) is ascribed by Fabricius to a Philippus Macedo, Philip the Macedonian, supposed by him to have been a different person from Philip of Thessalonica (see below), and to have lived in the reign of Caligula, whose bridge at Puteioli has been thought to be referred to. But Jacobs (Animadvers. in loc.) considers the reference to be to the Portus Julius formed by Agrippa in Lake Lucrinus near Baiae, and places the Epigramma among those of Philip of Thessalonica.

16. MEDMARIUS (ὃ Μηδμαίος), an astronomer of Mediana or Medma in Magna Graecia (about 26 miles N. E. of Rhegium), and a disciple of Plato, under whose direction he turned his attention to the mathematical sciences. His observations, which were made in the Peloponnese and... in Locris, were used by the astronomers Hipparchus, Geminus the Rhodian, and Ptolemy. He is said by Stephanus of Byzantium (De Urbibus s. v. Medue) to have written a treatise on the winds. He is mentioned by several ancient writers, as Vitruvius (Architect. ix. 7, s. ut ali 4), Pliny the elder (H. N. xviii. 31, s. 74), Plutarch (Quod non possit suaviter vivi seu prudens. Epicur. Opera, vol. x. p. 500, ed. Reiske), who states that he demonstrated the figure of the moon; Procus (In i. Euclit. Element. Lib. Comment.), and Alexander Aphrodisiannis. In the Latin version of Procus, by Franc. Baroccius (lib. ii. c. 4), Philip is called Mendaenus, which is doubtless an error either of the printer or translator, or perhaps of the MS. which he used. Mende was in Macedonia, in the peninsula of Pallene. Fabricius also states that "Philippus Mendaenus extracted and explained all the mathematical passages which he had noticed in the works of his instructor Plato;" but he does not give his authority for the statement. Mendaenus is here, too, an evident error for Medmaeus. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 10, vol. vi. p. 243.)

17. MECARICUS (ὁ Μεκαρικός), i.e. the MECARIC PHILOSOPHER [comp. Eucleides of MEKRA]. Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 113) has given an extract from a work of this Philip, containing some account of Stilpo of Megara [STILPO], who lived during the struggles of the successors of Alexander the Great.

18. MENDAEUS. [No. 16.]

19. Of OPUS. Suidas (s. v. Φιλάδοφος) has this remarkable passage: "— a philosopher who divided the Loges (s. De Legibus) of Plato into twelve books (for he is said to have added the Loges or himself), and was the hearer of Socrates and of Plato himself; devoting himself to the contemplation of the heavens (σχολια τοις μετεμ). He lived in the days of Philip of Macedonia." Suidas then gives a long list of works written by Philip. It is evident that the passage as it stands in Suidas is imperfect, and that the name of the author of the numerous works which he mentions has been lost from the commencement of the passage. It appears, however, from the extract occupying its proper place in the Lexicon according to its present heading, that the defect existed in the source from which Suidas borrowed. Ruster, the editor of Suidas (not. in loc.), after long investigation, was enabled to supply the omission by comparing a passage in Diogenes Laërtius (iii. 37), and to identify "the philosopher" of Suidas with Philip of the Locrian town of Opus, near the channel which separates Euboia from the main land. The passage in Laërtius is as follows: "Some say that Philip, the Opuntian transcribed his (Plato's) work, De Legibus, which was written in wax (i.e. on wooden tablets covered with a coat of wax). They say also that the "Επιμνημις, Επίμνημις (the thirteenth book of the De Legibus), is his;" i.e. Philip's. The Επιμνημις, whether written by Philip or by Plato, is usually included among the works of the latter. [PLATO.] Diogenes Laërtius elsewhere (iii. 46) enumerates Philip among the disciples of Plato. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 104.)

20. ORI APOLLINIS INTERPRETES (Voss. De Historici Graeciis, lib. iii.). [HORAPOLLO.]

21. PARODUS, the PARODIST. In a fragment of the Parodist, Matron [MATRON], quoted by Athenaeus, in which apparently there is an enumeration of Parodists who had lived long before Matron, two or more writers of the name of Philip are mentioned, with the laudatory epithet "eminent" (σοι τε Φιλάρχον, "nobles Philip"); but of their country, works, or age, except that they lived long before (φάρος, "olim") Matron himself, who cannot be placed later than the time of Philip king of Macedon, nothing is known.

22. PRESBYTER, Gennadius (De Viris Illustrib. c. 62) states that Philip the Presbyter was a disciple of Jerome, and that he died in the reign of Marcian and Avitus over the Eastern and Western Empires respectively, i.e. a.d. 456. [AVITUS; MARCIANUS.] He wrote, 1. Commentarius in Job; 2. Familtiores Epistolae, of which Gennadius, who had read them, speaks highly. These Epistolae have perished; but a Commentarius in Joba addressed to Nectarius has been several times printed, sometimes separately under the name of Philip (two editions, fol. and 4to. Basel, 1527), and sometimes under the name and among the works of Venerable Bede and of Jerome. Vallarinus and the Benedictine editors of Jerome give the Commentarius in their editions of that father (vol. v. p. 678, &c. ed. Benedict., vol. xii. col. 565, &c. ed. Vallars.), but not as his. The Prologus or Praefatio ad Nectarium are omitted, and the text differs very widely from that given in the Cologne edition of Bede (vol. iv. p. 447, &c.) fol. 1612, in which the work is given as Bede's, without any intimation of its doubtful authorship. Cave, Oudin, and Vallarsi agree in ascribing the work to Philip, though Vallarsi is not so decided in his opinion as the other two. [Gennad. l.c.; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 440, vol. i. p. 434; Oudin, Litt. de l'Antiquité, Ecles. vol. i. col. 116; Vallarsi, Opera Hieron. vol. iii. col. 825, &c. vol. xi. col. 556, 566; Fabric. Bibl. Med. et Infin. Latina. vol. v. p. 295, ed. Mansi.]

23. Of PRUSA (ὁ Προσειστής), a stoic philosopher, contemporary with Plutarch, who has introduced him as one of the speakers in his Symposium. (vii. quest. 7.)

24. RHETOR. [No. 13.]

25. SCRIPTOR DE AGRICULTURA. Athenaeus (iii.) mentions a Philippus, without any distinctive epithet, as the author of a work on Agriculture, either entitled Μεσερωμη, Georgicum, or similar to the work of Androton, another writer on agriculture [ANDROTON], which bore that title. Nothing more is known of this Philip.

26. Of SIDE (ὁ Σίδηρις, ὁ ι. Σιδηρίς, ὁ ἀριστής τοῦ Σίδηρα), a Christian writer of the first half of the fifth century. His birth must be placed in the latter part of the fourth century, but its exact date is unknown. He is the native of Side in Pamphylia, and according to his own account in a fragment published by Dodwell (see below), when Rhodon, who succeeded Didymus in the charge of the Catechetical school of Alexandria, transferred that school to Side, Philip became one of his pupils. If we suppose Didymus to have retained the charge of the school till his death, a.d. 396 [DIDYMUS, No. 4], at the advanced age of 86, the removal of the school cannot have taken place long before the close of the century, and we may infer that Philip's birth could scarcely have been earlier than a.d. 380. He was a kinsman of Troilus of Side, the rhetorician, who was tutor to Socrates the ecclesiastical historian, and was indeed so eminent that Philip regarded his relationship to him as a subject of exultation (Socrates, "E. E. vii. 27). Having entered the church, he was ordained deacon, and had much intercourse with Chrysostom; in the titles of some MSS. he is styled his Syccelus, or personal attendant, which makes it probable that he was, from the early part of his ecclesiastical career, connected with the church at Constantinople. Liberatus (Breviar. c. 7) says he was ordained deacon by Chrysostom; but Socrates, when speaking of his intimacy with that eminent man, does not say he was ordained by him. Philip devoted himself to literary pursuits, and collected a large library. He cultivated the Asiatic or diffuse style of composition, and became a voluminous writer. At what period of his life his different works were produced is not known. His Ecclesiastical History was, as we shall see, written after his disqualification in obtaining the patriarchate: but as his being a candidate for that high office seems to imply some previous celebrity, it may be inferred that his work or works in reply to the emperor Julian's attacks on Christianity were written at an earlier period. On the death of Atticus patriarch of Constantinople A.D. 425 [Atticus] Philip, then a presbyter, apparently of the great church of Constantinople, and Proclus, another presbyter, were proposed, each by his own partizans, as candidates for the vacant see; but the whole people were bent upon the election of Sisinnius, also a presbyter, though not of Constantinople, but of a church in Elnea, one of the suburbs. (Socrates, "E. E. vii. 26.) The statement of Socrates as to the unanimity of the popular wish leads to the inference that the supporters of Philip and Proclus were among the clergy. Sisinnius was the successful candidate; and Philip, mortified at his defeat, made in his Ecclesiastical History such severe strictures on the election of his more fortunate rival, that Socrates could not venture to transcribe his remarks; and has expressed his strong disapproval of his headstrong temper. On the death of Sisinnius (A.D. 428) the supporters of Philip were again desirous of his appointment, but the emperor, to prevent disturbances, determined that no ecclesiastical of Constantinople should succeed to the vacant see; and the ill-fated heresarch Nestorius [Nestorius], from Antioch, was consequently chosen. After the deposition of Nestorius at the council of Ephesus (A.D. 431), Philip was a third time candidate for the patriarchate, but was again unsuccessful. Nothing is known of him after this. It has been conjectured that he was dead before the next vacancy in the patriarchate A.D. 434, when his old competitor Proclus was chosen. Certainly there is no notice that Philip was again a candidate; but the prompt decision of the emperor Theodosius in Proclus' favour prevented all competition, so that no inference can be drawn from Philip's quiescence.

Philip wrote, 1. Multa volumina contra Imperatorum Julianum Apostatam. (Liberatus, Breviar. c. 7; comp. Socrates, "E. E. vii. 27.) It is not clear from the expression of the manuscripts which we have given as the title, whether Philip wrote many works, or, as is more likely, one work in many parts, in reply to Julian. 2. Istoria Χριστιανη, Historia Christiana. The work was very large, consisting of thirty-six B60ai or B6eia, Libri, each subdivided into twenty-four τομοι or ἄλογα, i.e. sections. This voluminous work appears to have comprehended both sacred and ecclesiastical history, beginning from the Creation, and coming down to Philip's own day, as appears by his record of the election of Sisinnius, already noticed. It appears to have been finished not very long after that event. Theophanes places its completion in A.M. 5922, Alex. era = A.D. 439; which, according to him, was the year before the death of Sisinnius. That the work was completed before the death of Sisinnius is probable from the apparent silence of Philip as to his subsequent disappointments in obtaining the patriarchate: but as Sisinnius, according to a more exact chronology, died A.D. 428, we may conclude that the work was finished in or before that year, and, consequently, that the date assigned by Theophanes is rather too late. The style was verbose and wearisome, neither polished nor agreeable; and the matter such as to display ostentatiously the knowledge of the writer, rather than to conduce to the improvement of the reader. It was, in fact, crammed with matter of every kind, relevant and irrelevant: questions of geometry, astronomy, arithmetic and music; descriptions of islands, mountains and trees, rendered it cumbersome and unreadable. Chronological arrangement was disregarded. The work is lost, with the exception of three fragments. One of these, De Scholae Catecheticae Alexandrinae Successione, on the succession of teachers in the Catechetical School of Alexandria, was published from a MS. in the Bodleian Library at Oxford, by Dodwell, with his Dissertationes in Irenaeum, Avo. Oxford, 1689, and has been repeatedly reprinted. It is given in the ninth volume of the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, p. 401. Another fragment in the same MS., De Constantino, Maximiano, et Lib. Augustino, was prepared for publication by Crusius, but has never, we believe, been actually published. The third fragment, Τα γενέματα έν Περιοδει μεταξά Χριστιανών Ἐλλήνων τε και Πολύ-διων, Acta Disputationis de Christo, in Persidea, inter Christianos, Gentiles, et Judaeos habita, is (or was) in the Imperial Library at Vienna. Philip was present at the disputation. (Socrates, "E. E. vii. 26, 27, 29, 35; Liberatus, l.c.; Phot. Bibl. cod. 35; Theophan. Chronog. p. 75, ed. Paris, p. 60, ed. Veneti, vol. p. 133, ed. 27. SOLITARIUS. The title Solitarius is given by bibliographers to a Greek monk of the time of the emperor Alexius I. Commensus, of whom nothing further seems to be known than what may be gleaned from the titles and introductions of his extant works. He wrote:—1. Διαπτρες, Dioptra, s. Annalis Fidei et Vitae Christiennae, written in the kind of measure called "versus politici,"* and in

The work, in its complete state, consisted of five books; but most of the MSS. are mutilated or otherwise defective, and want the first book. Some of them have been interpolated by a later hand. Michael Psellus, and the older writer of that name, who died about A.D. 1078, but one of later date, wrote a preface and notes to the Dioptra of Philip. A Latin prose translation of the Dioptra by the Jesuit Jacobus Pontanus, with notes, by another Jesuit, Jacobus Gretererus, was published, 4to. Ingolstadt, 1604; but it was made from a mutilated copy, and consisted of only four books, and these, as the translator admits in his Praefatio ad Lectorum, interpolated and transposed at libitum. Philip wrote also:—2. Τῷ κατά πνεύμα νῦν καὶ ιερή Καντωνίαν περί προσβάζα καὶ προστασίας ἀπὸ, Επίστολα Απολογικα τον Φίλιππον Φιλίππου. Διδ. Cave has, without sufficient authority, ascribed to our Philip two other works, which are indeed given in a Vienna MS. (Codex 213, apud Lambe.) as Appendices to the Dioptra. One of these works (Appendix secunda), Οτοι οὖν ἔφαγε το τοιούτον πάχας ὁ Χριστός ἐν τῇ δείειν, ἀλλὰ τὸ αὐξάνον, Demonstratio quod Christus in Sacra Coena non legale sed verum comederit Pascha, may have been written by Philip. Its arguments are derived from Scripture and St. Ephemius. The other work, consisting of five chapters, De Fide et Cærenomini Armeniorum, Jacobitarum, Chatzitzariorum et Romanorum seu Francorum, was published, with a Latin version, but without an author’s name, in the Actarum Novum of Combehia, fol. Paris, 1648, vol. ii. col. 261, &c., but was, on the authority of MSS., assigned by Combehia in a note, to Demetrius of Cyzicus [DEMETRIUS, No. 17], to whom it appears rightly to belong (comp. Cave, Hist. Litt. Dissertatio I. p. 6; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. 414). The Chatzitzarri (Χατζίτζαραί) were a sect who paid religious homage to the image of the Cross, but employed no other images in their worship. The work of Demetrius appears under the name of Philip in the fourteenth (post-

The measure is retained in English as a ballad metre, and may be illustrated by the old ditty of "The Unfortunate Miss Bayley," the first two lines of which closely resemble in their cadence those cited in the text:—

PHILIPPUS. 293

Zonae, Bionor, Antigonus, Diodorus, Evenus, and some others whose names he does not mention. The earliest of these poets seems to be Philodemus, the contemporary of Cicero, and the latest Automedon, who probably flourished under Nerva. Hence it is inferred that Philip flourished in the time of Trajan. Various allusions in his own epigrams proves that he lived after the time of Augustus. (Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. xiii. pp. 934—936.)

[PHILIPPUS (Φίλιππος), the name of several physicians.

1. A native of Acrania, the friend and physician of Alexander the Great, of whom a well-known story is told by several ancient authors. He was the means of saving the king’s life, when he had been seized with a severe attack of fever, brought on by bathing in the cold waters of the river Cydnus in Cilicia, after being violently heated, n. c. 333. Parmenion sent to warn Alexander that Philippos had been bribed by Dareius to poison him; the king, however, would not believe the information, nor doubt the fidelity of his physician, but, while he drank off the draught prepared for him, he put into his hands the letter he had just received, fixing his eyes at the same time steadily on his countenance. A well-known modern picture represents this incident; and the king’s speedy recovery fully justified his confidence in the skill and honesty of his physician. (Q. Curt. iii. 6; Valer. Max. iii. 8, in fine; Plut. Vit. Alex. c. 19; Arrian, ii. 4; Justin, xi. 8; Diod. Sic. xvi. 31.)

2. A native of Epeirus at the court of Antigonus, king of Asia, n. c. 323—301. Celsus tells us an anecdote (De Med. iii. 21, p. 56) that, when another physician said that one of the king’s friends, who was suffering from dropsy caused by his intemperate habits, was incurable, Philippos undertook to restore him to health; upon which the other replied that he had not been thinking so much of the nature of the disease, as of the character of the patient, when he denied the possibility of his recovery. The result justified his prognosis.

3. A contemporary of Juvenal at Rome, about the beginning of the second century after Christ. (Sat. xiii. 125.)

He is also mentioned by Galen, De Febr. Diifer. ii. 6, vol. vii. p. 347, De Plent. c. 4, vol. vii. p. 530. It is uncertain whether the Philippus of Macedonia, one of whose antidotes is quoted by Galen (De Antid. ii. 8, vol. xiv. p. 149), is the same person.

A sophist of this name is said by Aëtius (i. 4, 96, p. 186) to have promised immortality to those persons who would engage to follow his directions, but it is not specified that he was a physician; neither is it known whether the father of the celebrated physician, Archigenes, whose name was Philippos (Suid. s. v. Ἀρχιγενής), was himself a member of the medical profession. [W. A. G.]

PHILISCUS (Φιλισκός), a citizen of Abydus, who in n. c. 368 was sent into Greece by Ariobarzanes, the Persian satrap of the Hellespont, to effect a reconciliation between the Thebans and Lacedaemonians. He came well supplied with money, and in the name of Artaxerxes II.; but in a congress which he caused to be held at Delphi, he failed to accomplish his object, as the Thebans refused to abandon their claim to the sovereignty of Boeotia, and Lacedaemon would not acknowledge the independence of Messenia. Upon this Philiscus, leaving behind him a body of 2000 mercenaries for the service of Sparta, and having been honoured, as well as Ariobarzanes, with the Athenian franchise, returned to Asia. Here, under cover of the satrap’s protection, he made himself master of a number of Greek states, over which he exercised a tyrannical and insolent sway, till he was at last assassinated at Lampacus by Thersagoras and Excceustes (Xen. Hell. vii. 1 § 27; Diod. xv. 70; Dem. c. Aristoc. pp. 666, 667). Diodorus places the mission of Philiscus to Greece in n. c. 369, a year too soon. [E. E.]

PHILISCUS (Φιλισκός), literary i. 1.: An Athenian comic poet of the Middle Comedy, of whom little is known. Suidas simply mentions him as a comic poet, and gives the following titles of his plays: Αἰδώς, Αἰδων, Θημιστοκής, Ὀλυμπος, Παῦλος γονα, Ἑρωκαὶ Αἱροφητίδα γονα, Ἀρτεμιδος καὶ Ἀθαλώνας. These mythological titles sufficiently prove that Philiscus belonged to the Middle Comedy. The nativities of the gods, to which most of them relate, formed a very favourite class of subjects with the poets of the Middle Comedy. (Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. pp. 278, &c.) Eudocius omits the title Ερωκαὶ Αἱροφητίδα γονα, and Lobek has pointed out the difficulty of seeing how the nativities of Hermes and Aphrodite could be connected in one drama (Aplaph. p. 437); a difficulty which Meineke meets by supposing that we ought to read Ερωκαὶ γονα, Ἀφροδιταῖς γοναις, which has two distinct titles (Hist. Crit. p. 281, 282). The Themistocles is almost without doubt, wrongly ascribed by Suidas to the comic poet Philiscus, instead of the tragic poet of the same name. Another play is cited by Stobaeus (Ser. Ixxiii. 53), namely the Φιλάργυρος, or, as Meineke thinks it ought to be, Φιλάργυρος.

Philiscus must have flourished about n. c. 400, or a little later, as his portrait was painted by Parrhasius, in a picture which Pliny thus describes (H. N. xxxv. 10. s. 36. § 5):—et Philiscum, et Liberam patrem adstante Virtute," from which it seems that the picture was a group, representing the poet supported by the patron deity of his art, and by a personalized representation of Art, to intimate the excellence he had attained.

PHILISCUS.

Naeke has clearly shown that this statement can only refer to Philiscus the comic poet, and not to any other of the known persons of the same name. (Sched. Crit. p. 26; Opusc. vol. i. p. 42).

There are very few fragments of Philiscus preserved. Stobaeus (l.c.) quotes two verses from the Φιλίσκου, and elsewhere (xxix. 40), two from an unknown play. Another verse from an unknown play is quoted by Dicæarchus (Vit. Græc. p. 30, Buttmann); and another is preserved in the Palatine Anthology (xi. 441, vol. i. p. 443, ed. Jacob), which Jacob wrongly ascribes to the rhetorician of Miletus. (Meineke, Frag. Com. Græc. vol. i. pp. 423, 424, vol. iii. pp. 579, 580; Naeke, l.c.).

2. Of Miletus, an orator or rhetorician, was the disciple of Isocrates, having been previously a noted flute player (Suid. s. c.; Dionys. Halic. Ep. ad Amm. p. 120). He wrote a life of the orator Lycurgus, and an epitaph on Lyssias; the latter is preserved by the pseudo-Plutarch (Vit. X. Oret. p. 336), and in the Greek Anthology (Brunck, Aned. vol. i. p. 184; Jacobs, Anth. Græc. vol. i. p. 101, volii. p. 936). Remembering the constant confusion of the names Philiscus and Philistus, we may safely ascribe to this orator the ἄγαμορφικα, which Suidas mentions among the works of the historian Philiscus of Syracuse. (Suid. s. c. Φιλιστός; it is also to be observed that Suidas, in addition to his article Φιλιστός, gives a life of the Syrian historian under the head of Φιλίσκος ί Διηθ. Φιλιστός, comp. Philistus). Suidas (s. e. Τιμαέας) states that the historian Timaeus was a disciple of Philiscus of Miletus; another disciple was Neanthes of Cyzicus (Ruhnken, Hist. Crit. Græc. Græc. vol. lxxxiii., Opusc. p. 367; Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. p. 25).

3. Of Aegina. It is doubtful whether there was one or two cynic philosophers of this name from Aegina. Suidas has two, of one of whom he says that he was the disciple of Diogenes the Cynic, or, according to Hermippus, of Stilpon, that he was the teacher of Alexander in grammar, and that he wrote dialogues, one of which was entitled Κόθρος; of the other, Suidas says that, having gone from Aegina to Athens, in order to see the city, he heard Diogenes, and addicted himself to philosophy; and that his brother, having been sent by his father to Athens to fetch him home, also stayed there, and became a philosopher; and lastly, the father himself, having gone to Athens in search of his sons, became infected with the philosophical mania; the rest of the article refers to Diogenes himself. The latter article is taken from Diogenes Laërtius (vi. 75, 76), who mentions the name of the father, Onesiocrates, and who evidently only speaks of one cynic philosopher of the name of Philiscus (comp. vi. 73, 80, 84). This is, therefore, very probably one of the many cases in which Suidas makes two articles out of the same name, by copying statements from two different authors. We do not see the force of Naeke’s argument (Sched. Crit. p. 23), that the Philiscus of whom the tale in Diogenes and Suidas is told, could hardly, for chronological reasons, be the same person as the teacher of Alexander. Some ancient writers ascribed to Philiscus some, or even all, of the tragedies of Diogenes the Cynic, probably through confounding him with the celebrated tragic poet of the same name (Diog. Laér. vi. 72; Julian. Oraz. viii. vii.; Naeke, l.c.; Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. p. 505, n.) Aelian has preserved a short exhortation of Philiscus, addressed to Alexander (V. H. xiv. 11).

4. Of Corycyra, a distinguished tragic poet, and one of the seven who formed the Tragic Pleiad, was also a priest of Dionysus, and in that character he was present at the coronation procession of Polemy Philadelphus in n. c. 284. (Athv. v. p. 188, c.) Pliny (H. N. xxxv. 10. s. 36, § 20) states that his portrait was painted in the attitude of meditation by Proteogenes, who is known to have been still alive in n. c. 304. It seems, therefore, that the time of Philiscus must be extended to an earlier period than that assigned to him by Suidas, who merely says that he lived under Polemy Philadelphus. He wrote 42 dramas, of which we know nothing, except that the Theatistoeles, which is enumerated among the plays of Philiscus the comic poet, ought probably to be ascribed to him: such subjects are known to have been chosen by the tragedians, as in the Marathoonianos of Lycophron. The chorobium hexameter verse was named after Philiscus, on account of his frequent use of it (Hephaest. p. 53). There is much dispute whether the name should be written Φιλισκος or Φιλίσκος, but the former appears to be the true form, though he himself, for the sake of metre, used the latter. (Naeke, Sched. Crit. pp. 18, &c., in Opusc. vol. i. pp. 28, &c.; Welcker, Die Griech. Trag. p. 1265.) [P. S.]

PHILISCUS, artists. 1. A painter, of whom we have no information, except the mention, by Pliny, of his picture of a painter’s studio, with a boy blowing the fire. (H. N. xxxv. 11. s. 40, § 36).

2. Of Rhodes, a sculptor, several of whose works were placed in the temple of Apollo, adjoining the portico of Octavia at Rome. One of these statues was that of the god himself: the others were Latona and Diana, the nine Muses, and another statue of Apollo, without drapery. Within the portico, in the temple of Juno, was a statue of Venus, by the same artist (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 5, s. 4, § 10). From this statement it is evident that Philiscus made some of the statues expressly for the temples, but whether at the time of their first erection by Metellus (n. c. 146), or of their restoration by Augustus more than a hundred years later, cannot be determined with certainty. Most of the writers on art place him at the earlier date; but at all events he belonged to that period of the revival of art which, according to Pliny, began with the 155th Olympiad (n. c. 160), and which extended down to the time of the Antonines; during which period the Rhodian school sent forth several of the best statuaries and sculptors, and Rome became a great seat of the arts. The group of Muses, found in the villa of Cassius at Tivoli, is supposed by Visconti to be a copy of that of Philiscus. Meyer takes the beautiful statue at Florence, known as the Apollo, for the naked Apollo of Philiscus; it is engraved in Müller’s Denkmäler d. alten Kunst, vol. ii. pl. xii. fig. 126. (Meyer, Kunstgeschichte, vol. iii. pp. 35, 120; Hirt, Gesch. d. bild. Künst, p. 299; Müller, Archiäol. d. Kunst, §§ 160, n. 2, 393, n. 2.) [P. S.]

PHILISTION (φιλιστίων) of Nicæa or Magnesia, a monographer, who flourished in the time of Augustus, about a.d. 7 (Hieron, in Euseb. Chron. ol. 196. 3). He was an actor, as well as a writer of minstrels, and is said, in an epitaph preserved in the Greek Anthology, to have died of excessive laughter (Jacobs, Anth. Græc. vol. iv. p. 230; Anth. Pal. vol. ii. p. 349). He is frequently mentioned by the Greek writers of the second century and downwards, Suidas, who, by some extraordinary error, has placed his death in the time of Socrates, makes him a native of Prusa, and says that he wrote κωμῳδίας βιολαγμάς (that is, minstrel songs), that he wrote a play called Μεταφωταλ, and a work entitled Φαλύγελος. He is mentioned by Tzetzes (Proleg. ad Lycephr. p. 257), among the poets of the New Comedy, but the name is there, almost certainly, an error for Phili dippus.

We have no fragments of Philistion, but there is a work extant under the title of Αἴγυπτιος Μεναδόρου καὶ Φιλιστίωνος, which is a collection of lines, containing moral sentiments, from Menander and some other poet of the New Comedy, who of course could not be Philistion the mimeographer. All difficulty is however removed by the emendation of Meineke, who substitutes Φιλιστίωνος for Φιλιστιώνος (Comm. Philo-lemon). The work was first edited by N. Rigaultus, Par. 1613, afterwards, in a much improved state, by J. Rutgersius, in his Var. Lect. vol. iv. pp. 355—367, with the notes of Heinsius. Boissonade has published the work, from a Paris MS., in his Ana dota, vol. i. p. 146—150, whence Meineke has transferred it into his Fragmenta Comicorum Graecorum, vol. iv. pp. 335—339. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. ii. p. 486; Meineke, Menand. et Phil. Rhet. Praef. p. vii. &c.; Clinton, F. H. Sub ann. a. d. 7; Bernhardy, Geschichte der Griech. Litt. vol. ii. p. 924.) [P. S.] PHILISTION, an engraver of medals, whose name occurs in two forms, ΦΙΛΙΣΤΙΩΝ (ἐπόλεως) and ΦΙΛΙΣΤΙΩΝΟΣ (ἐφόρος), in very small characters, but perfectly distinct, on the crest of the helmet of Minerva, which forms the type of a great number of coins of Velia. (Hauck, Rochette lettre à M. Scharon, 94, 2d ed.) [P. S.] PHILISTION (Φιλιστίων), a physician, born either at one of the Greek towns in Sicily (Diog. Laér. Vit. Philos. viii. 8. §§ 86, 89), or among the Locri Epizephyri in Italy (Galien, De Med. Med. i. 1, vol. x. p. 6; Ruf. Ephes. De Corp. Hum. Part. Appell. p. 41; Plut. Sympos. vii. 1. § 3; Aur. Gell. Noct. Att. xvii. 11. § 3; Athen. iii. 83, p. 115). He was a tutor to the physician Chrysippus of Cnidus (Diog. Laér. l. c. § 89) and the astronomer and physician Eudoxus (Callim. ap. Diog. Laér. § 86), and therefore must have lived in the fourth century B.C. He was one of those who defended the opinion that what is drunk goes into the lungs (Plut. l.c.; Aur. Gell. l.c.). Some ancient critics attributed to Philistion the treatise De Salubrit Victus Ratione (Galien, Comment. in Hippocr. De Ratione Morb. Acut. p. 117, vol. xxv. p. 455, Comment. in Hippocr. Aphor. vi. 1, vol. xviii. pt. i. p. 9), and also that De Victus Ratione (Galien, De Aliment. Facult. i. 1, vol. vi. p. 473), both of which form part of the Hippocratic Collection; and by some persons he was considered to be one of the founders of the sect of the Empirici (De Sublyg. Empir. c. 1, vol. ii. p. 340, ed. Chart.). He wrote a work on materia medica (Galien, De Succeed. init. vol. xix. p. 721) and on Cookery (Athen. xii. 12, p. 516), and is several times quoted by Pliny (H. N. xx. 15, 34, 48) and Galen (De Nat. Facult. ii. 8, vol. ii. p. 110, De Usu Respir. c. 1, vol. iv. p. 471, De Med. Med. l. i. 5, vol. x. pp. 28, 111). "Orbíbasius attributes him to the invention of a machine for reducing luxations of the humerus (De Machinam. c. 4, p. 164). He is perhaps the person mentioned by M. Aurelius Antoninus (vi. 47).

A brother of Philistion, who was also a physician, but whose name is not known, is quoted by Caecilius Aurelianus. (De Morb. Chron. iii. 8, v. 1, pp. 488, 555.) [W. A. G.]

PHILISTIS (Φιλιστίς), a queen of Syracuse, known only from her coins, which are numerous, and of fine workmanship, and from the occurrence of her name (bearing the title of queen, as it does also on her coins) in an inscription in large letters on the great theatre of Syracuse. The circumstance that it is here associated with that of Nereis, the wife of Gelen, as well as the style and fabric of the coins, which closely resemble those of Hieron II. and his son, leads to the conclusion that these were struck during the long reign of Hieron II., and the most probable conjecture is that Philistis was the wife of Hieron himself. (Rochette, Mémoires de l'Acad. d'Industrie, pp. 65—78; Visconti, Teomogr. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 21—25. The earlier disquisitions and hypotheses on the subject are cited by these two authors.) [E. H. B.]

PHILISTUS (Φιλίστος). 1. An Athenian, son of Pasicles, who accompanied Nereus, the son of Codrus, on his migration to Ionia, where he founded a temple on the promontory of Mycale, dedicated to the Eleusinian Demeter. (Herod. ix. 97.)

2. A Syracusan, son of Archondes or Archomenides (Suid. v. Φιλίστος; Paus. v. 23, § 6), one of the most celebrated historians of antiquity, though, unfortunately, none of his works have come down to us. The period of his birth is not mentioned, but it can hardly be placed later than B.C. 435. Plutarch expressly speaks of him as having been an eye-witness of the operations of Gylippus during the siege of Syracuse by the Athenians, in B.C. 415, and also tells us that he was an old man at the time of his death in B.C. 356. (Plut. Nic. 19, Dion. 35.) It seems also probable that he was considerably older than Dionysius. The first occa sion on which we hear of his appearance in public life was after the capture of Agrigentum by the Carthaginians in B.C. 406, when Dionysius, then a young man, came forward in the assembly of the people to inflame the popular indignation against their unsuccessful generals, and the magistrates having imposed on him a fine for turbulent and seditious language, Philistus not only discharged the fine, but expressed his willingness to do so often as the magistrates should think fit to inflict it. (Diod. xiii. 91.) Having by this means paved the way for the young demagogue to the attain dment of the supreme power, he naturally enjoyed a high place in his favour during the period of his rule; so great indeed was the confidence repose in him by Dionysius, that the latter entrusted him with the charge of the citadel of Syracuse, upon the safe custody of which his power in great mea sure depended. According to one account, also, it was Philistus who, by his energetic and spirited counsels, prevented Dionysius from abandoning Philistus

It is perhaps too much to represent Philistus, as has been done by some writers of antiquity, as a man naturally disposed in favour of absolute power ("hominem amicum non magis tyranno quam tyrannidi," says Cornelius Nepos, Dion, 3); but it is clear that he was desirous to uphold by every means a despotism under the favour of which he enjoyed wealth and power, and had the opportunity of indulging his natural taste for luxury and magnificence. There seems no doubt that he possessed very considerable talents of a practical as well as literary kind, but he wholly wanted the lofty and generous spirit which should animate the citizen of a free republic: and this character was reflected in his writings, which presented a marked contrast to those of Thucydides in their spirit and sentiments, notwithstanding a close imitation in style. (Plut. Dion, 36; Dion. Hal. de Vett. Script. p. 427, Ep. ad Pomp. p. 780, ed. Reiske.)

In regard to the writings of Philistus much confusion has been caused by a passage of Suidas (v. Φιλίστους), where that author has confused him with the orator Philiscus, the pupil of Isocrates, and has in consequence attributed to him various rhetorical and oratorical works, which unquestionably are assigned to the latter. The statement that the historian Philistus was also a pupil of Isocrates, is derived solely from a passage in Cicero (de Orat. ii. 22), where it seems certain that we should read Φιλίστους: for Cicero himself has in another passage distinctly mentioned Philistus in opposition to the pupils of Isocrates, Theopompos, and Ephorus. On chronological grounds also it seems impossible to admit the assertion. Suidas, on the contrary, calls him a pupil of Euenus, an elegiac poet, but this also seems to be a mistake (Goeller, de Situ Sirec. pp. 108—118).

Suidas also enumerates several historical works, especially a history of Egypt, in 12 books, one of Phoenicia, and another of Libya and Syria; all which he expressly ascribes to the author of the Sicilian history. But as no trace of any of these works is to be found in any other authority, it has been reasonably doubted whether they are genuine works, which (Wessing, ad Diad. xii. p. 615; Goeller, l. c. pp. 106, 124.) Some authors, however, have supposed that these writings are to be attributed to a second Philistus, who was really a native of Naucratis in Egypt, which would account also for the error of Suidas, who calls our historian Ναυκράτης ὁ Συρακοσιός. (Bayle, Dict. Crit. s. v. Philist, not. C.) It is certain, however, that no mention is elsewhere found of any other writer of the name of Philistus; nor does any ancient author except Suidas allude to any work of his composition besides his celebrated Sicilian history. This consisted of two portions, which might be regarded either as two separate works, or as parts of one great whole, a circumstance which explains the discrepancies in the statements of the number of books of which it was composed. The first seven books comprised the general history of Sicily, commencing from the earliest times, and ending with the capture of Agrigentum by the Carthaginians, n. c. 406. Diodorus tells us that this portion included a period of more than 800 years: he began with the mythical times, and the alleged colonies in Sicily, founded by Daedalus and others before the Trojan war; besides which he appears to have entered at some length into the origin and migrations of the original inhabitants. of the island—the Scyattians and Sicels. (Dion. Hal. Ant. Rom. i. 22 ; Diod. v. 6 ; Theon. Porphyr. p. 16.) The second part, which formed a regular sequel to the first, contained the history of the elder Diodorus in four books, and that of the younger in two; the latter was necessarily imperfect, a circumstance which Dionysius of Halicarnassus absurdistly ascribes to his desire to imitate Thucydides. As it ended only five years after the accession of the younger tyrant, it is probable that Philistus had not found time to continue it after his own return from exile. (Diod. xiii. 103, xxv. 39 ; Dion. Hal. Ep. ad Pomp. p. 780, ed. Reiske ; Suid. s. v. Pho!.; Steph. Byz. s. v. Kastor; Goeller, de Situ Syrac. pp. 125—132, who has carefully examined and reconciled the conflicting statements of ancient authors, and given a clear idea of the arrangement and division of the work of Philistus.)

In point of style Philistus is represented by the concurrent testimony of antiquity as imitating and even closely resembling Thucydides, though still falling far short of his great model. Cicero calls him "capitulis, creber, acutus, brevis, paene pusillus Thucydidis." (ad Q. Fr. ii. 13.) Quintilian also terms him (Inst. Or. x. 1. § 74) "imitator Thucy- didis, et ut multo inferius, in sua aliquatenus lucidior." This qualified praise is confirmed by the more elaborate judgment of Dionysius of Halicarnassus, who censures Philistus also for the unskilful arrangement of his subject, and the monotony and want of art displayed in his ordinary narrative. (Ep. ad Pomp. 5, p. 779—782, de Vett. Script. p. 427.) Longinus, who cites him as occasionally rising to sublimity, intimates at the same time that this was far from being the general character of his composition. (De Subl. 40.) His conciseness also led him not unfrequently into obscurity, though in a less degree than Thucydides; and this defect led many persons to neglect his works even in the days of Cicero. (Cic. Brut. 17.) Dionysius of Halicarnassus, however, associates his name with those of Herodotus, Thucydides, Xenophon, and Theopompos, as the historians most deserving of study and imitation (Ep. ad Pomp. p. 767); but his writings seem to have been almost wholly neglected by the rhetoricians of a later period; and Hermogenes (de Formis, p. 396) passes over his name in common with Ephorus and Theopompos as wholly unworthy of attention. It is more remarkable that he does not appear to have been included by the Alexandrian critics in their canon of historical authors. (Creuzer, Historische Kunst d. Griechen, p. 229 ; Goeller, l. c. p. 184.) But the reputation that he enjoyed in Greece itself shortly before that period is attested by the fact that his history was among the books selected by Harrexalites to send to Alexander in Upper Asia. (Plut. Alex. 9.)

The gravest reproach to the character of Philistus as an historian is the charge brought against him by many writers of antiquity that he had sought to palliate the tyrannical deeds of Dionysius, and give a specious colour to his conduct in order to pave the way for his own return from exile. Plutarch calls him a man eminently skilled in inventing specious pretences and fair speeches to cloak unjust actions and evil dispositions. (Dion. 36.) He was severely reprehended on the same account by Timaeus. How far the history of Dionysius transmitted to us by Diodorus is founded on the authority of Philistus it would be interesting to ascertain; but we have no means of doing so. It is probable, however, that much of his narrative of the wars of Dionysius against the Carthaginians is derived from Philistus, who was not only a contemporary but an eye-witness of the scenes which he described, and sometimes an important actor in them. (Wesseling, ad Dion. xiv. p. 675; Theon. Porphyr. p. 19; Arnold's 'Rome,' vol. i. p. 466, not.)

The fragments of Philistus have been collected, and all the circumstances transmitted to us concerning his life and writings fully examined and discussed by Goeller in an appendix to his work, De Situ et Origine Syracusanus (Bvo. Lips. 1818); the fragments are reprinted from thence, together with a life of the author by C. Muller, in the Fragmenta Historiorum Graecorum, published by Didot at Paris, 1841. [B. H. B.]

PHILLATUS (Philatus, another reading is Philatos), a grammarian, contemporary with the historian Olympiodorus, about a. d. 467. Phoitus (Cod. lxxx.) in his epitome of Olympiodorus mentions him as having received the honour of a statue from the Athenians, for teaching them how to glue parchments together. [W. M. G.]

PHILLIS (Philis), of Delos, surnamed mou- sakos, was a writer on music. (Athen. i. p. 21, f.) Athenaeus quotes two works by him, one entitled Peri khonon (xiv. p. 634, d), and the other Peri mousokeis, which consisted of two books at least (xiv. p. 636, b). He is the same person as Phyllis (Philis) d mousokeis, mentioned by the Scholast on Aristophanes along with Aristotle (ad Rhan, 1337, ad Vesp. 1231), and as Phyllis (Phylas) d mousokeis, as he is called by Suidas. All the manuscripts of Athenaeus however exhibit the reading Phyllis. (See Schweighauser, ad Athen. xiv. p. 634, d.)

PHILLYREA (Philleura), according to some accounts, the mother of Hypeusus. (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. ix. 26.) See PHILYRA. [L. S.]

PHILO. [PHILON.]

PHILO. 1. A freedman of M. Caelius Rufus (Cic. ad Fam. ii. 12, viii. 3).

2. A freedman of Pompey, was distinguished by his energetic assistance of the Pompeian party in Spain, b. c. 45. (Bell. Hisp. 35; Cicad. Att. xiv. 4.)

PHILO. C. CURTIUS, consul b. c. 445, with M. Genucius Augurinus. For the events of this year see AUGURINUS, GENUCHUS, No. 2.

PHILO, PUBLIUS or PUBLIUS. Respecting the orthography, see PUBLILIA GENVS. This family of the Publili claimed descent from the celebrated Volero Publilus who was tribune of the plebs b. c. 472; and accordingly we find the two Philes, who were consular tribunes in b. c. 400 and 399 respectively, described as grandsons of Volero. [See below, Nos. 1 and 2.]

1. L. PUBLIUS L. F. VOLER. N. PHILO VOLSCUS, consular tribune b. c. 400, is called by Livy a patrician, but this is certainly an error, since the family was without question plebeian. Livy likewise calls him simply L. Publius Volusus, but we learn from the Caepuliani Fasti that Philo was also one of his surnames. (Livy. v. 12; Fast. Capit.)
PHILO.

3. Q. Publius Q. Q. N. Philo, a distinguished general in the Samnite wars, and the author of one of the great reforms in the Roman constitution. He was consul b.c. 339, with T. Aemilius Mamercinus, and defeated the Latins, over whom he triumphed. In the same year he was appointed dictator by his colleague Aemilius Mamercinus, and, as such, proposed the celebrated Pubiliae Leges, which abolished the power of the patrician assembly of the curiae, and elevated the plebeians to an equality with the patricians for all practical purposes. It would seem that great opposition was expected from the patricians, and that Philo was therefore raised to the dictatorship, that the proposed reforms might be carried with the authority of the highest magistracy in the state. As he could not have been appointed dictator without the sanction of the senate, it has been inferred by Niebuhr, with much probability, that the Pubililian laws were brought forward with the approbation of the senate, which was opposed to the narrow-mindedness of the great body of the patricians. According to Livy (viii. 12) there were three Pubilian laws. The first is said to have enacted "that plebiscita should bind all Quirites" (ut plebiscita omnes Quirites tenerent), which is to the same purpose as the subsequent lex Hortensia. Niebuhr, however, supposes that the effect of the lex Pubilia was to render a senatusconsultum a sufficient confirmation of a plebiscitum, and to make the confirmation of the curiae unnecessary; and that the effect of the lex Hortensia was to render unnecessary even the confirmation of the senate, and to give to the tributa comitia complete legislative force (Comp. Dict. of Ant. s. v. Plebiscitum). The second law enacted, "ut legum, quae comitia centuriaria ferentur, ante inum suffragium patres auctores ferrent." By patres Livy here means the curiae, that is, the assembly of the patricians; and accordingly this law enacted that the curiae should confirm (auctores fereat ; comp. Dict. of Ant. s. v. Auctor) the results of the votes respecting all laws brought before the comitia centuriaria, previous to the commencement of the voting: in other words, the veto of the curiae in the enactment of laws, by the centuriae, was abolished. The third law enacted that one of the two consults should necessarily be a plebeian; and Niebuhr conjectures that there was also a fourth law, which applied the Licinian law to the pretorship as well as the consulship, and which provided that in each alternate year the pretor should be a plebeian. (Comp. Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. pp. 146, &c., 154, 418, &c.; Arnold, Hist. of Rome, vol. ii. p. 154, &c.)

In b.c. 337 Philo was the first plebeian pretor; in b.c. 335 he was magister equitum to the dictator L. Aemilius Mamercinus; and in b.c. 332 he was censor with Sp. Postumius Albinus: during this censorship the Macedon and Scipitian tribes were added, and the Roman franchise was given to the Acerrani. (Livy. viii. 15—17 ; Vell. Pat. l. 14.)

In b.c. 327 Philo was consul for a second time, with L. Cornelius Lentulus. He was sent against Palæopolis in southern Italy, to which he laid siege; but as he was unable to take the town before the expiration of his year of office, his imperium was prolonged, with the title of proconsul, by means of a senatusconsultum and a plebiscitum: this is the first instance in Roman history in which a person was invested with proconsular power. Philo succeeded in taking Palæopolis in the following year, b.c. 326, in consequence of the treachery of two of its chief citizens, Charilaus and Nympheus, who enticed the Samnite garrison out of the town, and opened the gates to the Romans. Philo obtained a triumph on his return to Rome. (Livy. viii. 22—26.)

In b.c. 320 Philo was consul a third time, with L. Papirius Cursor. They were elected to the consulship as being two of the most distinguished generals of their time, in consequence of the great defeat which the Romans had sustained in the previous year near Caudium. Both consuls marched into Samnium. Papirius, who had laid siege to Luceria, was shut up in his fortified camp by the Samnite army, which had come to the relief of Luceria, and was reduced to great extremities. He was, however, relieved from his difficulties by the advance of the other army under Philo, who defeated the Sammites and took their camp. (Livy. ix. 7, 13—15 ; comp. Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. p. 324, &c., who points out various improbabilities in Livy's account.)

In b.c. 315 Philo was consul a fourth time, with L. Papirius Cursor (Fast. Capit.; Dio. xxi. 66). The consuls of this year are not mentioned by Livy, who simply says (ix. 22) that the new consuls remained at Rome, and that the war was conducted by the dictator Q. Fabius. PHILo. VETURIUS. 1. L. Veturius L. F. Post. N. Philo, was consul b.c. 220, with C. Latarius Catulus, two years before the commencement of the second Punic war. The two consuls are stated to have advanced as far as the Alps, and to have gained many people for the Romans without fighting; but we have no particulars of their expedition. In the second year of the Punic war, b.c. 217, Philo was appointed dictator for the purpose of holding the comitia, and in b.c. 210 he was censor with P. Licinius Crassus Dives, and died while he held this office. (Zonar. viii. 20, p. 405, a.; Liv. xxiii. 53, xxvii. 6.)

2. L. Veturius L. F. L. N. Philo, was curule aedile b.c. 210, and praetor b.c. 209, when he obtained the jurisdiction peregrina, and likewise Cisalpine Gaul as his province. He remained in Gaul as praetor during the following year, b.c. 208, and next year, b.c. 207, he served under Claudius Nero and Livius Salinator, and was sent to Rome along with Q. Caecilius Metellus to convey the joyful news of the defeat and death of Hasdrubal. It was mainly owing to his services in this war that he was elected consul in b.c. 207, with Q. Caecilius Metellus, who had shared with him in the glories of the campaign. The two consuls received Bruttii as their province, in order to prosecute the war against Hannibal; but their year of office passed by without any important occurrence, and Philo returned to Rome to hold the comitia, while his colleague remained in Bruttii. In b.c. 203 Philo was magister equitum to his former colleague Metellus, who was nominated dictator for the purpose of holding the comitia. Finally he accompanied Scipio to Africa, and after the battle of Zama, b.c. 202, was sent to Rome to announce the glorious news of the defeat of Hannibal. (Livy. xxvii. 6, 7, 22, xxviii. 9—11, 38, xxix. 11, xxx. 38, 40; Cic. Brut, 14.)
PHILOCHORUS.

PHILO'CHARES, a distinguished painter, as is evident from the way in which he is mentioned by Pliny, who says that Augustus fixed in the walls of his Curia two pictures, the one of an enfant still by Niæs, the other by Philochoræs, a father and his youthful son, in so admirable a manner, that the family likeness was perfectly preserved, though the difference of age was clearly marked; over the heads of the figures was an eagle, with a serpent in its claws. The picture bore an inscription by the artist himself, declaring that it was his painting: at least, so we understand the words, "Philochores hoc suum opus esse testatus est." The figures also seem to have had their names inscribed near them; for Pliny remarks on this example of the wondrous power of art, that Glancion and his son Aristippus, persons otherwise utterly obscure, should be gazéd upon for so many ages by the Roman senate and people. It is worthy of notice that the other picture in the Curia was also inscribed with the artist's name — "Nicias scriptum est inississe." (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 4. s. 10.)

The modern writers on art suppose that this Philochoræs was the same person as the brother of Aeschines, of whose artistic performances Demosthenes speaks contemptuously, but whom Ulpian ranks with the most distinguished painters. If so, he was alive in B. C. 343, at the time when Demosthenes refers to him. (Demosth. de Fals. Legat. p. 329, e. § 237, Bekker; Ulpian, ad Demosth. p. 366, c. Silling. a. v.; Hirt, Gesch. d. bild. Künste, p. 261.)

PHILOCH'ARIDAS (Φλωκαρίδας), a Lacedaemonian of distinction, the son of Eryxidaidas. He was one of the delegates who ratified the year's truce between the hostile confederacies of the Athenians and Peloponnesians in B. C. 423. In B. C. 421 he was again one of the Peloponnesians who took the oaths to the general peace, and was one of the ambassadors sent to the countries on the borders of Thrace, to see after the fulfilment of the terms of the treaty. A little later he was one of those who took the oaths to the separate treaty between the Lacedaemonians and Athenians, and in B. C. 420 was one of the ambassadors who were sent to Athens to counteract the negotiations of the Argives, and were tricked by Alcibiades. (Thuc. iv. 119, v. 19, 21, 24, 44.)

PHILOCHORUS (Φλωκωρος), a celebrated Athenian writer, chiefly known by his Athias, or work on the legends, antiquities, and history of Attica. According to Suidas (s. v.) Philochorus was an Athenian, the son of Cyicus, a seer and a diviner (μάντις καὶ ἱεροσόφος); his wife was Archestrate; he was a contemporary of Eratosthenes, but the latter was an old man, when Philochorus was young; he was not a recipient of the instigation of Antigonus, because he was accused of being favourable to Ptolemy. But this statement of Suidas is not correct, so far as it relates to the date of Philochoros, as has been shown by several modern writers. Antigonus Doson died B. C. 220; while Eratosthenes, who died about B. C. 196 at the age of eighty, was only fifty-six at the death of the above-mentioned king: it therefore follows, if we place credit in Suidas, that Philochoros must have been put to death, when he was still a young man, a fact which is excessively improbable, as well on account of the very numerous works which he composed, as of the important office which he held in his native city. We are not, however, left to mere probability, in order to refute Suidas; for Philochoros himself relates that he held the office of ἱέραρχος at Athens in B. C. 306, in which year he interpreted a portent that appeared in the Acropolis (Dionys. Deinarch. c. 3); and he must consequently have been of mature age as early as that year. It would therefore appear that Suidas, with his usual carelessness, reversed the respective ages of Philochoros and Eratosthenes. The latter part of the account of Suidas, namely that Philochoros was put to death by Antigonus, there is no reason to question. Suidas says that the Athias of Philochoros came down to Antiochus Theos, who began to reign B. C. 261. Now it was about this time that Antigonus Gonatas took possession of Athens, which had been abetted in its opposition to the Macedonian king by Ptolemy Philadelphus; and it would, therefore, appear that Philochoros, who had been in favour of Philadelphus, was killed shortly afterwards, at the instigation of Gonatas. We may accordingly safely place the active life of Philochoros from B. C. 306 to B. C. 260.

These few facts are all that we know of the life of Philochoros, but they are sufficient to show that he was a person of some importance at Athens. He seems to have been anxious to maintain the independence of Athens against the Macedonian kings, but fell a victim in the attempt. The following is a list of his numerous works, many of which are mentioned only by Suidas.

1. Αρτιάς, also called Ἀρτεμίδας and Ἰστορία, consisted of seventeen books, and related the history of Attica, from the earliest times to the reign of Antiochus Theos. The first two books treated of the mythical period, and gave a very minute account of all matters relating to the worship of the gods. The real history of the country is given in the last fifteen books, of which the first four (iii.—vi.) comprised the period down to his own time, while the remaining eleven (vii.—xvii.) gave a minute account of the times in which he lived (n. c. 319—261). Bock conjectures, with much probability, that the first six books originally formed a distinct work, and appeared before the remaining eleven. Philochoros seems to have been a diligent and accurate writer, and is frequently referred to by the scholiasts, lexicographers, as well as other later authors. The industry of modern scholars has collected from these sources one hundred and fifty-five distinct fragments of his work, many of them of considerable length, and supplying sufficient information to enable us to make out with tolerable certainty the subjects contained in each book. These fragments are given in the works referred to at the close of this article. Philochoros paid particular attention to chronology. From the time that archons succeeded to kings at Athens, he commenced the history of every year with the name of the archon, and then narrated the events of that year, so that his work was in the form of annals. It appears from those passages in which his own words are preserved, that his style was clear and simple.

2. Ἐποιημί τῆς Βυζ. Αρτιάς. We likewise learn from Suidas that an epitome of the larger work was also made by Asinius Pollio Trallianus, a contemporary of Pompeius Magnus (Suid. s. v. Πομπ. Ἀρτιάς). Vossius has conjectured (De Histor. Graec. p. 197, ed. Westermann), with some probability, that the epitome which Philochoros was said to have made, was really the work of Pollio, as we can hardly imagine that the latter would have drawn upon an abridgement, when one was already in existence, compiled by the author himself; but to this it has been replied that Pollio's epitome was intended for the Romans, while the one made by Philochorus himself was, of course, designed for the Greeks.

3. Πρὸς τὴν Δήμωνος Ἀθηνᾶς αὐτήθη ή γράφει αὐτήν Ἀλεξάνδρου. (Comp. Harpocrat. s. v. 'Hegesia.' It is stated by Yossinis (ibid. p. 155), and repeated by subsequent writers, that Philochorus wrote his Athis against Demon's; but this is hardly warranted by the words either of Suidas or Harpocration. It would appear only that Philochorus wrote a separate treatise, under the title given above, to point out the errors of Demon.

4. Πέρι τῶν 'Αθηναίων έν διώκαις ἀντέχεις Ψευδάλοδρυς. Socratides was archon b.c. 374; there are two archons of the name of Apollodorus, one b.c. 350, the other b.c. 319; of these the latter is probably the one intended, because, from the year b.c. 319 began the contemporary portion of his history. This work appears to have been intended to remove difficulties in the way of the chronology of that period, and was thus preparatory to his history.

5. Οлимπίας ἐν βίβλοις β'. Philochorus, in his Athis, did not use the Olympiads as a reckoning of time; but, as he paid particular attention to chronology, he drew up this work, probably influenced by the example of Timaeus.

6. Πέρι τῆς τεταρτάλεως, that is, the towns of Oenoa, Marathon, Probabilithus, and Tricorythus. (Athen. vi. p. 235, d.; Suid. s. v. 'Tetralidh 又好又ς'. Schol. ad Soph. Oed. Col. 1102.)

7. Ἐνγραφάματα Ἀττικὰ, that is, a collection of Attic inscriptions, and no doubt chiefly as served to elucidate the history of Attica. (Comp. Boekh. Corp. Inscr. vol. i. p. viii.)

8. Ἡπεμποτικὰ, omitted by Suidas in his list of the works of Philochorus, but mentioned by the lexicographer in another passage (s. v. Βουχέτα; comp. Strab. vii. p. 379).

9. Δηλακά, βιβλιά β'. (Clem. Alex. Admon. ad Gent. pp. 18, d. 30, d. ed. Syll.)

10. Πέρι τῶν Ἀθηναίων ἀγώνων βιβλία ε'. (Comp. Krause, Olimpia, p. xi.)

11. Πέρι ἑορτάτων, omitted by Suidas, but quoted by Harpocrature (s. v. 'Αλώα, Χαντόη).

12. Πέρι θύμων, also omitted by Suidas. It gave an account of the sacred days, and explained the reason of their sanctity. (Procus, ad Ies. Op. 770.)

13. Πέρι δυσών ε', a book of a similar nature to the preceding, giving an account of sacrifices.

14. Πέρι μαρτυρίων δ'. In this work Philochorus made a collection of the ancient oracles, and explained the various modes of Divination (Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 334, d. Syll.; Athen. xiv. p. 648, d.). The Περί συμβόλων, mentioned by Suidas as a separate work, was probably only part of the Περί μαρτυρίων, since συμβολα are only a species of divinatio.

15. Πέρι καθαρῶν, probably contained a collection of the καθαρία, purifications or expiations, which Museaeus and Orpheus are said to have invented.

16. Πέρι μυστηρίων τῶν 'Αθηνάων.

17. Πέρι Ἀλκιβιάδος.

18. Πέρι τῶν Ζωρφακίων μεθών βιβλία ε'.

19. Πέρι Ἑρώπου, gave an account of the life of Euphrides, vindicated him from the attacks which had been made against him, and explained the principles on which his tragedies were constructed. (Suidas, s. v. Εὐρόπης; Diog. Laërt. ii. 44, ix. 55; Gall. xv. 29.)

20. Συναγωγή πρᾶξεων, ήτοι ποιηθείσης γραμματίων, probably gave an account of the lives of the illustrious Pythagorean women, such as Theano, Melissa, &c.

21. Η πρὸς 'Αλυτοῦν ἐπιστολή, seems to have related some sentiments connected with the worship of the gods. (Phot. Lex. s. v. Τρισκλη.)

22. 'Επιστολή τῆς Διονυσίων πραγματείας περὶ Ἰππίων. It is uncertain who this Dionysius was.

PHILOCLES (Φιλοκλῆς), historical. I. An Athenian, who, together with Adeimantus, was joined with Conon in the command of the fleet on the deposition of the generals who had conquered at Arginusa (b.c. 406). Philocles was the author of the proposal for the mutiny of all the prisoners who should be taken in the sea-fight which the Athenians contemplated; but it seems doubtful whether the decree in question was passed in an assembly at Athens, or in one held at Aegospotami before the battle; also whether it determined on the amputation of the right thumb, according to Phutarch, or the right hand, as Xenophon tells us. The same spirit of cruelty was exhibited by Philocles on the capture of a Corinthian and Andrian trireme, the crews of which he ordered to be thrown down a precipice. In retribution for these deeds he was slain at Lampsacus by Ly sundes, into whose hands he had fallen at the battle of Aegospotami in b.c. 405 (Xen. Helle. i. 7, i. 1, §§ 30—32; Diod. xiii. 104—106; Plut. Lys. 9, 13; comp. Cic. de Off. iii. 11; Ael. V. H. ii. 9; Thirwall’s Greece, vol. iv. pp. 148, &c.)

2. An officer and friend of Philip V. of Macedon. In b.c. 200, when Philip was compelled by Attalus I. and the Rhodians to winter in Caria, Philocles was with him, and formed a plan, which did not, however, succeed, for gaining possession of the town of Mylasa. In the same year he was sent by Philip into Attica to ravage the country, and made an unsuccessful attempt on Eleusis, and also afterwards, in conjunction with Philip, on Athens and the Peiraeus. In b.c. 198 he was stationed at Chalcis in Euboea, and failed in an endeavour to succour Eretria, which the combined forces of the Romans, the Rhodians, and Attalus were besieging, and which was taken by them very shortly after the repulse of Philocles. In the same year, however, he compelled L. Quintius Flamininus and Attalus to raise the siege of Corinth, having brought up through Boeotia to the promontory of Juno Acraea, just opposite Sicyon, a reinforcement of 1500 men; and in consequence of this success he was invited to Argos by the Macedonian party in the town, and made himself master of it. In the war between Prusias and Eumenes II. of Pergamus, Philip sided with the former, and sent Philocles to his court to negotiate with him, and also to Rome to explain and defend his conduct. In b.c. 184 Philocles and Apelles were joined by Philip with his son Demetrius in an embassy to Rome, to plead his cause before the senate, and avert their anger. In B.C. 181 Pho-locles and Apelles were again sent to Rome, to inquire into the truth of an accusation brought by Perseus against Demetrius, of having formed a design for changing the succession to the throne in his own favour, and of having communicated it to T. Quintius Flamininus and other Romans. The envoys had been chosen by Philip because he thought that they were impartial between his sons. They were however subpoenaed by Perseus, and brought back with them a forged letter, professing to be from Flamininus to Philip, and confirming the charge. [DEMETRIUS]. On the discovery of the fraud, Philip caused Philecles to be arrested and put to death, B.C. 179. According to one account, no confession could be wrung from him even by torture. (Polyb. v. 24, xxi. 14, xiv. 1. 3; Liv. xxi. 16, 26, xxii. 16, 23, 25, xxxix. 34, 46, xI. 20. 23, 54, 55; Just. xxi. 2, 5.) [E. E.]

Suidas states that Philecles was contemporary with Euripides (adapting the emendation of Clinton, meta for καθά), and that he composed 100 tragedies, among which were the following: — Ημερήσιον, Ναύξιον, Οιδέσιον, Οινείιον, Πρίαμον, Πηρέλατον, Φιλόκλητον. Besides these, we learn from the Didascalic of Aristotle (ap. Schol. ad Aristoph. Ap. 281) that he wrote a tetralogy on the fates of Procris and Philomela, under the title of Pandionis, one play of which was called Τηρεύς ἦ Ἐσωφ, Tereus, or the Hoopoe, and furnished Aristophanes with a subject of ridicule in the Birds, where he not only introduces the Hoopoe as one of the chief characters, but gives point to the parody by making him say, in answer to the surprise expressed by Pithocleus at seeing another hoopoe (v. 281):

> ἄλλος οὗτος μὲν ἐστὶν Φιλοκλῆς ἢ ἐτούτος ἢ τούτῳ πάπας, διότερ εἰ λέγοις ἰπτινόν Καλλίον καὶ ἰπτινόν Καλλιάς, which we may perhaps explain, taking a hint from the scholiast, thus: — "I am the original hoopoe: the other is the son of Philecles, and my grandson," insinuating that Philecles, the author of the Tηρεύς ἦ Ἐσωφ, was himself indebted to an earlier play on the same subject, namely, according to the scholiast, the Tereus of Sophocles. That Philecles, indeed, was an imitator of Sophocles, might be conjectured from the identity of some of the titles mentioned by Suidas with those of plays by Sophocles; and there is also reason to believe that the tragedians who succeeded the three great masters of the art were in the habit of expanding their single plays into trilogies. In the general character of his plays, we must, however, regard Philecles as an imitator, not of Sophocles, but of Aeschylus, whom, on account of his relationship, he would naturally, according to the custom of the Greeks, have for his teacher. That he was not altogether unworthy of his great master, may be inferred from the fact that, on one occasion he actually gained a victory over Sophocles, an honour to which, as Aristides indignantly remarks (ii. p. 256), Aeschyllus himself never attained. The circumstance is the more remarkable, as the drama of Sophocles to which that of Philecles was preferred, was the Oedipus Tyrannus, which we are accustomed to regard as the greatest work of Greek dramatic art.

It is useless to discuss the various conjectures by which modern critics have attempted to explain this curious fact: its chief importance is in the proof it furnishes that Philecles must have been a poet of real excellence, for otherwise he could not, under any circumstances, have been preferred to Sophocles. It is true that a different impression might be gathered from the terms in which the comic poets refer to him; but it ought never to be forgotten that the poets of the Old Comedy were essentially and avowedly caricaturists: nay, a man's being abused by them is in itself a proof that he was eminent enough to be worth abusing. The following are some of the attacks made by the comic poets upon Philecles. Teleclesides says that, though related to Aeschylus, he had nothing of his spirit (Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. ii. p. 366). The same poet seems to have attacked him for departing from the purity of the Attic language (see Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. vol. i. p. 90). Cratinus charged him with corrupting the fable, that, is probably, of Tereus, in his Pandionis (Schol. ad Soph. Antig. 402; Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. ii. p. 226). Aristophanes not only ridicules his Hoopoe, but compares him to another bird, the κορόδος, or crested lark (Ap. 1293). In another place he says that, being ugly himself, he makes ugly poetry (Thesm. 168); and elsewhere he insinuates that the lyric odes of Philecles were anything but sweet and pleasing (Vesp. 462). In explanation of these passages the scholars inform us that Philecles was little and ugly, and that his head was of a sharp projecting shape, which gave occasion to the comparison between him and a crested bird, such as the hoopoe; but explanations of this sort are very often nothing more than fancies of the commentators, having no other foundation than the text which they affect to explain. On the last-quoted allusion of Aristophanes, however, the grammarians do throw some light, for they tell us that Philecles was nicknamed Bile and Salt (Χολός, Ἀλαίως), on account of a certain harshness and unpleasantness in his poetry (Suid.; Schol. in Aristoph. Ap. 281, Vesp. 462); from which we may infer that, in his attempt to imitate Aeschylus, he fell into a harsh and repulsive style, unredemed by his uncle's genius.

The date of Philecles may be determined by his victory over Sophocles, which took place in B.C. 429, when he must have been at the least 40 years old, for his son Morimus is mentioned as a poet only five years later. We possess no remains of his poetry except a single line, which seems to come from a satyrical drama (Ath. ii. p. 66). This line has led Meineke to doubt whether there was not a comic poet of the same name, identical, perhaps, with Philocrates, the father of Philipides. The scholiast on Aristophanes (Ae., 281) and Suidas, followed by Eudocius, expressly mention a comic poet Philocrates; but the passages themselves contain abundant proof that they refer to one and the same person as the subject of this article. The error of writing κωμικός and κωμῳδία for τραγούδις and τραγῳδία, and conversely, is excessively common in the works of the grammarians; and especially when, as often happens, the tragic poet has been an object of ridicule to the comic poets, which we have seen to be the case with Philocrates.

2. The great-grandson of the former, son of Asyt- damas the elder, and brother of Asyt达mas the younger, was also a tragic poet, according to the scholiast on Aristophanes (Ae., 281), but a general, according to Suidas. Kaysm enters on an elaborate and ingenious argument to show that there is no ground for supposing that the second Philocrates was a tragic poet; but he ought probably to accept the express statement of the scholiast, and to change σπαρτηγός in Suidas into τραγουδις. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 314; Welcker, die Griech. Trag. p. 967; Kaysm, Hist Crit. Trag. Graec. p. 46; Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. p. 521; Bode, Gesch. d. Hellen. Dichtkunst, vol. iii. pt. i. pp. 539, 539; Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. p. xxxv.) [P. S.]

PHILOCRATES, artist. 1. An Egyptian artist, of the mythical, or, at all events, of an unknown period, to whom some ascribed the invention of the first step in painting, which others attributed to Cleaneas, a Corinthian, namely, tracing the outline of the shadow of a figure cast on a wall, σκία, σκιώχαιμα, a silhouette. (Plin. ii. N. xxxv. 3. a. 5; comp. ARDICES.)

2. An Athenian architect, of Acharnae, who is not mentioned by any ancient author, but who must have been one of the chief architects of the best period of Greek art, for he was the architect of the beautiful Ionic temple of Athens Polias, in Ol. 111, B.C. 336—332, as we learn from the celebrated inscription relating to the building of the temple, which was found in the Acropolis, and is now in the British Museum. (Böckh, Corp. Inscri. vol. i. No. 160, where Böckh enters into an elaborate and valuable discussion of all that is known of the temple.) [P. S.]

PHILOCRATES (Φιλοκράτης). 1. An Athen- ian, son of Demeca, was commander of the reinforcement which was sent to the siege of Melos in B.C. 416, and enabled the Athenians to bring it to a successful issue. (Thuc. iv. 116.)

2. An Athenian, son of Ephialtes, was sent in B.C. 390 with ten triremes to Cyprus, to the aid of Evagoras, though the latter had revolted from the king of Persia (Aratxeres II.), who was an ally of the Athenians at the time. On his voyage, Philocrates fell in with Teleutias, the Lacedaemonian, who was sailing to Rhodes with 27 ships, and who, notwithstanding the enmity between Sparta and Persia, attacked and captured the whole Athenian squadron (Xen. Hell. iv. 8. § 24; comp. Lys. pro Bon. Arist. pp. 153—155; Diod. xiv. 97, 98.) In a passage of Demosthenes (c. Aristocler. p. 639) we are told that on one occasion, when the Lacedaemonians, with solemn assurances of good faith, had offered to give any pledge for it which might be required, Philocrates answered that no pledge could be satisfactory to him except a proof of their not being able to do injury. In this passage, however, the name of Iphiocrates occurs as a various reading. The person of whom we have been speaking was perhaps the same Philocrates, who, after the execution of Ergocles for treason and peculation, was accused, in the speech of Lyssias, yet extant, of being in possession of the confiscated property of the traitor, whose intimate friend he had been, and who during his command had made him his triarch and receiver of his money. (Lys. c. Erg., c. Phil. pp. 179—182; Schn. ad Xen. Hell. l. c.) [Thrasylulus.] The name Philocrates in Xen. Hell. iv. 4. § 8, seems clearly to be an error for Iphiocrates. (Schn. ad loc. ; comp. Diod. xiv. 66 ; Polyben. l. d.)

3. An Athenian orator, of the demes of Agnus, who took a most prominent part in bringing about the peace with Philip in B.C. 346. Together with Demotheus, he strongly supported the petition made by the friends of some of the Athenian prisoners taken in Olynthus, in B.C. 347, that an ambassador should be sent to negotiate about their ransom. He also came forward with a motion, which was carried unanimously, to permit Philip to send a herald and ambassadors to Athens to treat for peace. For this he was impeached by Lycius, as having originated an illegal decree; but he was defended by Demotheus (illness preventing his personal appearance at the trial), and was acquitted. Matters being at length ripe for the final step, Philocrates moved that ten ambassadors should be appointed to negotiate with the Macedonian king. A decree to this effect was passed, and he was himself included in the embassy. In the same year, when the Macedonian ambassadors arrived at Athens, Philocrates proposed to concede everything to Philip, and to exclude expressly the Phocians and Halus and Cersobleptes from the treaty. This proposal of his, however, was opposed both by Aeschines and Demotheus, and he was obliged to abandon it. He was again a member of the second embassy, which was sent to receive from Philip the ratification of the peace and alliance; and, on the return of the envoys to Athens, when Demotheus endeavored to excite suspicion in the people of Philip's intentions with respect to Phocis, Philocrates joined Aeschines in persuading them to pay no regard to his warnings, and bore him down with ribaldry and clamour, tauntingly remarking that it was no wonder that his own way of thinking should differ from that of one who was so well equipped to be a water-drinker. He then carried a decree, which, while it greatly praised Philip for his fair professions, and extended the treaties to his successors, declared that if the Phocians would not surrender the temple to the Amphictyons, the Athenian people would assist in compelling them. Thus he played all along into the hands of Philip, and it seems altogether beyond a doubt that he had suffered himself to be corrupted, and received Olynthian prisoners and lands in Phocis at the price of his treason. Indeed, he himself made no secret of his newly-gotten wealth, which he ostentatiously displayed, and expended in luxury and profusion. In B.C. 344 Demotheus, in his second Philippic, called the attention of the Athenians to the manner in which they had been misled by Aeschines and Philocrates, without however mentioning the name of either of them; and, if the latter felt himself endangered in consequence, it may account for his putting himself forward (towards the end probably of 344 or the beginning of the next year) as the mover of a decree, renouncing with Philip on the seizure of some Athenian ships by one of his admirals. Shortly after this, however, Philoctetes was capitated to Olympos by Hyperides through an ἐσπευσία, for his treason, and it seemed expedient to go into voluntary exile before the trial came on. Of his subsequent fortunes we have no certain information. Demosthenes, in his speech on the Crown, speaks of Philoctetes as one of those who assailed him with false accusations after the battle of Chaeroneia in n. c. 339; and from this it might be inferred that the traitor had then returned from banishment, but Aeschines mentions him as still an exile in n. c. 330 (c. Cleon. p. 65), and we may therefore believe, with Mr. Newman, that Philoctetes was still dangerous to Demosthenes in 338 by his voice or pen, "with which he could pretend to reveal scandalous secrets, owing to his former intimacy with him." (Heges. de Hel. pp. 82, 83; Dem. de Cor. pp. 230, 232, 239, 310, de Fals. Leg. pp. 343, 344, 345, 353, 356, 371, 375, 377, 386, 394, 405, 454, 440, c. Aristol. pp. 708, 784; comp. Dem. de Phil. p. 56; Nem. de Phil. Leg. p. 29, 30, 35, 36; Plut. de Garr. 15; comp. Newman in the Classical Museum, vol. i. pp. 141, 152.)

4. A Rhodian, was one of the ambassadors sent from Rhodes in n. c. 167, after the war with Perseus, to aver the anger of the Romans,—an object which they had much difficulty in effecting. (Polyb. xxx. 4, 5; Liv. xiv. 20—25.) [E. E.]

PHILOCTETES (Φιλοκτήτης), a son of Poesas (whence he is called Ποεσιάτης, Ov. Met. xiii. 313) and Demonassa, the most celebrated archer in the Trojan war (Hom. Od. iii. 190, viii. 219; Hygin. Fab. 102). He led the warriors from Methone, Thaucaecia, Meliboea, and Olion, against Troy, in seven ships. But on his voyage thither he was left behind by his men in the island of Lemnos, because he was ill of a wound which he had received from the bite of a snake, and Medon, the son of Oileus and Rhene, undertook the command of his men (Hom. H. ii. 716, &c.). This is all that the Homeric poems relate of him, with the addition that he returned home in safety (Od. iii. 190); but the cyclic and tragic poets have spun out in various ways this slender ground work of the story of Philoctetes. He is said to have been the disciple, friend, and armour-bearer of Heracles (Philost. Imag. 17), who instructed him in the art of using the bow, and who bequeathed to him his bow, with the never-erring poisoned arrows (Philost. Her. 5). These presents were a reward for his having erected and set fire to the pile on mount Oeta, where Heracles burnt himself (Diod. iv. 38; Hygin. Fab. 39; Ov. Met. iv. 230, &c.). According to others, however, it was Poesas, Morimus, Hyllus, or Zamenus himself who performed that service to Heracles (Apollod. ii. 7, § 7; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 50; Soph. Trach. in fin.). Philoctetes was also one of the suitors of Helen, and, according to some traditions, it was this circumstance which obliged him to take part in the Trojan war (Apollod. iii. 10. § 8). On his journey thither, while staying in the island of Chryse, he was bitten by a snake. This misfortune happened to him as he was showing approach too near to the serpent which was guarding the temple of the goddess (Soph. Phil. 1527; Philost. Imag. 17; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 330; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 911), or while he was looking at the tomb of Troilus in the temple of Apollo Thymbraeus, or as he was showing to his companions the altar of Heracles (Philost. l. c.; Schol. on Soph. Phil. 268); for it is said that during a sacrifice which Palamedes offered to Apollo Smintheus (Dict. Cret. ii. 14). Hera, it is said, was the cause of this misfortune, being enraged at Philoctetes having performed the above-mentioned service to Heracles (Hygin. Fab. 102), though some related that the snake's bite was the consequence of his not having returned the love of the nymph Chryse (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 911). According to some accounts, moreover, the wound in his foot was not inflicted by a serpent, but by his own poisoned arrows (Serv. ad Aen. iii. 402). The wound is said to have become ulcerated, and to have produced such an intolerable smell, and such intolerable pains, that the moanings of the hero alarmed his companions. The consequence was, that on the advice of Odysseus, and by the command of the Aetridhe, he was exposed and left alone on the solitary coast of Lemnos (Ov. Met. xxx. 315; Hygin. Fab. 102). According to some he was there left behind by the Heraclean force of Hephaestus in Lemnos knew how to heal the wound (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 330), and Pylius, a son of Hephaestus, is said to have actually cured him (Ptol. Heph. 6), while, according to others, he was believed to have died of the wound (comp. Paus. ii. 22. § 6). According to the common tradition, the sufferer remained in Lemnos during the whole period of the Trojan war, until in the tenth year Odysseus and Diomedes came to him as ambassadors, to inform him that an oracle had declared that without the arrows of Heracles Troy could not be taken. The tradition which represents him as having been cured, adds that while the war against Troy was going on, he, in conjunction with Euneus, conquered the small islands about the Trojan coast, and expelled their Carian inhabitants. As a reward for these exploits he received a part of Lemnos, which he called Acesa (from δέκας, a crowd), and at the request of Dioneus he went northwards and, on the advice of his friends, he then proceeded to Troy to decide the victory by his arrows (Philost. Her. 5; comp. Hygin. Fab. 102; Q. Smyrn. ix. 323, 460; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 911; Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. i. 100). According to the common story, however, Philoctetes was still suffering when the ambassadors arrived, but he nevertheless followed their call. After his arrival before Troy, Apollo sent him into a profound sleep, during which Machaon (or Podalirius, or both, or Asclepius himself) cut out the wound, washed it with wine, and applied healing herbs to it (Tzetz. ad Lyc. l. c.; Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. i. 109; Propert. ii. 1. 61; Q. Smyrn. x. 180; Soph. Phil. 133, 1437). Philoctetes was thus cured, and soon after, after the fall of Paris, when Troy fell in the hands of the Greeks (Soph. Phil. 1436; Apollod. iii. 12 § 6; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 64; Hygin. Fab. 112; Conon. Narr. 23). On his return from Troy he is said to have been cast upon the coast of Italy, where he settled, and built Petelia and Crimissa. In the latter place he founded a sanctuary of Apollo Alaeus, to whom he dedicated his bow (Strab. vi. p. 254; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 911; Serv. ad Aen. iii. 402). Afterwards a band of Rhodians also came to Italy, and as they became Philodotus, involved in war with the colonists from Pallene, Philocletes assisted the Rhodians, and was slain. His tomb and sanctuary, in which heifers were sacrificed to him, were shown at Maculla. (Tzetz. ad Lyce. 911, 927.)

Philodameia (Φιλοδαμεία), one of the daughters of Danaus, became by Hermes the mother of Pharis. (Paus. iv. 30. § 2, vii. 22. § 3; comp. Pharis.)

Philodamus, of Bassus, a chaser in gold, mentioned in a Latin inscription. (Gruter, p. dxxviii. 10.)

Philodemus (Φιλόδημος), an Argive, was sent by Hieronymus, king of Syracuse, to Hannibal in n. c. 215, to propose an alliance. In n. c. 212, when Marcellus was besieging Syracuse, we find Philodemus governor of the fort of Euryalus, on the top of Eppolae, and this he surrendered to the Romans on condition that he and his garrison should be allowed to depart uninjured to join Epicydes in Achradina. (Polyb. vii. 7; Liv. xxiv. 6, xxv. 25.)

Philodemus (Φιλόδημος) of Gadarn, in Palestine, an Epicurean philosopher and epigrammatic poet, contemporary with Cicero, who makes a violent attack upon him, though without mentioning his name, as the abettor of Piso in all his profligacy (Cic. in Pis. 26, 29), though in another place he speaks of him in the following high terms:—"Si ronem et Philodemum cum optimis viros, tum dixitissimos homines" (De Fin. ii. 35); and indeed, in the former passage, while attacking his character, he praises his poetical skill and elegance, his knowledge of philosophy, and his general information, in the highest terms. From the language of Cicero, it may be inferred that Philodemus was one of the most distinguished Epicurean philosophers of his time, and that he lived on terms of intimacy with men of the highest rank in Rome. He is also mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (x. 3), by Strabo (xvi. p. 759), and by Horace (Sat. i. 2. 121).

His epigrams were included in the Anthology of Philip of Thessalonica, and he seems to have been the earliest poet who had a place in that collection. The Greek Anthology contains thirty-four of them, which are chiefly of a light and amatory character, and which quite bear out Cicero's statements concerning the licentiousness of his matter and the elegance of his manner. Of his prose writings Diogenes (L.c.) quotes from the tenth book τῆς τῶν φιλοσόφων συντάξεως, and a MS. has been discovered at Heraclaeum containing a work by him on music, περὶ μουσικῆς. (Menag. ad Diog. Lec. l.c.; Fabric. Bib. Graec. vol. iii. p. 609, iv. p. 491; Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 83; Jacobs, Anh. Graec. vol. ii. p. 70, xiii. p. 937; Orelli, Onom. Tullian. s. v.)

Philodie (Φιλοδίη), a daughter of Ilanuch and the wife of Leucippus, by whom she became the mother of Hileueia and Pheobe. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 3; comp. Dioscur.)

Philodotus (Φιλόδωτος), a physician of whom Alexander Trallianus * (De Medici. 1. 17, p. 165) tells an anecdote of the ingenious way in which he cured a melancholy and hypochondriacal patient, who fancied he had had his head cut off. Philodotus suddenly put on his head a leaden hat, * It is probable, however, that the true reading in this passage is Philotimus. (Philotimus.)

the weight of which made the poor man think that he had recovered his head, so that he was free from his fancy ever after. Of the date of Philodotus it can only be said that he must have lived in or before the sixth century after Christ. [W. A. G.]

Philoeutius (Φιλοεύτιος), the celebrated cow- herd of Odysseus, who is frequently mentioned in the Odyssey (xx. 24, 183, 254, xxi. 240, 388, xxii. 359.)

Philogenes. 1. A slave or freedman of Atticus, frequently mentioned in Cicero's letters (ad Att. v. 13, 20, vi. 2, 3, &c.).

2. A geographer of Italy, spoken of by Tzetzes (ad Lycoth. 1005).

Philolaus (Φιλόλαος), that is, friend of the people, was a surname of Asclepius, under which he had a temple in Laconia (Paus. iii. 22. § 7). It occurs also as the proper name of a son of Menos and the nymph Pareia, in Paros. (Apollod. ii. 9. § 5, iii. 1. § 2.)

Philolaus (Φιλόλαος), a Corinthian of the house of the Bacchiadæ. Having become en- mauled of a youth named Diocles, and the latter having quitted Corinth, Philolaus accompanied him. They settled in Thebes, where Philolaus proposed some laws, which were adopted by the Thebans (Aristot. Pol. ii. 9.)

Philolaus (Φιλόλαος), a distinguished Pytho- tagorean philosopher. According to Diogenes Laërtius (vii. 84) he was born at Crotona; according to other authorities (Iamblich, Vit. Pyth. 36) at Tarentum. It is more probable that these are varying statements with regard to the same person, than that two different persons of the same name are meant. The most probable datum for ascertaining the age of Philolaus is the account of Plato (Phaed. p. 61. d.) that he was the instructor of Simmias and Cebes at Thebes. This would make him a contemporary of Socrates, and agrees with the statement that Philolaus and Democritus were contemporaries (Apollod. ap. Diog. Laer. ix. 38). The statement that after the death of Socrates Plato heard Philolaus in Italy, which rests only on the authority of Diogenes Laërtius (iii. 6), may safely be rejected. Philolaus is not mentioned among the Pythagorean teachers of Plato by Cicero, Appuleius, or Hieronymus (Interp. ad Diog. Laer. iii. 6). Philolaus lived for some time at Hieraclea, where he was the pupil of Aresas, or (as Plutarch calls him) Arcesus (Iamblich. Vit. Pyth. c. 36, comp. Plut. de Gen. Sacr. 13), though the account given by Plutarch in the passage referred to involves great inaccuracies, see Böckh. Philolaus, p. 8. The absurd statement of Iamblichus (c. 23) that Philolaus was a pupil of Pythagoras, is contradicted by himself elsewhere (c. 31), where he says that several generations intervened between them. The date when Philolaus removed to Thebes is not known. Böckh (ibid. p. 10) conjectures that family connections induced Philolaus and Lysis to take up their abode in Thebes; and we do, in point of fact, hear of a Philolaus of the house of the Bacchiadæ, who gave some laws to the Thebans. (See the preceding article.) That Philolaus was driven out of Italy at the time when the Pythagorean brotherhood was broken up (i.e. shortly after the overthrow of Sybaris), is inconsistent with the chronology, though it is possible enough that there may have been, at a later period, more than one expulsion of Pythagoreans who attempted to revive in different cities of Italy something like their old organization. The statements that Philolaus was the instructor of Gorgias, and a disciple of Lysis, for the purpose of paying sepulchral honours to whom he came to Thebes (Olympiodorus ad Plat. Phaed. ap. Wytenbach ad Phaed. p. 130, who mentions him instead of Theonar), are of no authority. According to Diogenes Laërtius (viii. 46), Phaenon of Philus, Xenophilus, Echecrates, Diocles, and Polyneustus of Philus were disciples of Philolaus. Böckh (l.c. p. 15) places no reliance whatever on the story that Philolaus was put to death at Crotona on account of being suspected of aiming at the tyrants, a story which Diogenes Laërtius has even taken the trouble to put into verse (Diog. Laërt. viii. 84; Suid. s. v. Φίλολαος, Φιλολαος).

Pythagoras and his earliest successors do not appear to have committed any of their doctrines to writing. According to Porphyrius (Vit. Pyth. p. 40) Lysis and Archippus collected in a written form some of the principal Pythagorean doctrines, which were handed down as heir-looms in their families, under strict injunctions that they should not be made public. But amid the different and inconsistent accounts of the matter, the first publication of the Pythagorean doctrines is pretty uniformly attributed to Philolaus. He composed a work on the Pythagorean philosophy in three books, which Plato is said to have procured at the cost of 100 minae through Dion of Syracuse, who purchased it from Philolaus, who was at the time in deep poverty. Other versions of the story represent Plato as purchasing it himself from Philolaus or his relatives when in Sicily. (Diog. Laërt. viii. 15, 55, 84, 83, iii. 9; A. Gallius, N. A. iii. 17; Iamblichus, Vit. Pyth. 31. p. 172; Tzetzes, Chil. x. 792, &c. xi. 38, &c.) Out of the materials which he derived from these books Plato is said to have composed his Timaeus. But in the age of Plato the leading features of the Pythagorean doctrines had long ceased to be a secret; and if Philolaus taught the Pythagorean doctrines at Thebes, he was hardly likely to feel much reluctance in publishing them; and amid the conflicting and improbable accounts preserved in the authorities above referred to, little more can be regarded as trustworthy, except that Philolaus was the first who published a book on the Pythagorean doctrines, and that Plato read and made use of it. (Böckh, l.c. p. 22.) Although in the Phaedon and the Gorgias Plato expresses himself as if he had derived his knowledge of the doctrines of Philolaus from hearsay, yet, besides that such a representation would be the more natural and appropriate as put in the mouth of Socrates, who was not a great reader, the minuteness and exactitude with which the doctrines of Philolaus are referred to, and the obvious allusions to the style in which they were expressed, show clearly enough that Plato derived his acquaintance with them from writings; and the accordance of the exact terms of Philolaus with what is found in Plato points to the same result.

In one passage (viii. 85) Diogenes Laërtius speaks of the work of Philolaus as one book (βιβλίον ὕψωτες). Elsewhere (iii. 9, viii. 15) he speaks of three books, as do A. Gallius and Iamblichus. In all probability, what Philolaus had written was comprised in one treatise, divided into three books, though this division was doubtless made not by the author, but by the copyists. The first book of the work is quoted by Nicomachus (Harmon. i. p. 17) as τὸ πρῶτον Ψυχομνυσιος, and the passage quoted by him is said by Stobaeus (Ed. i. 22. § 7. p. 545) to be ἐκ τοῦ Φιλολάου περὶ κάσιμου. It appears, in fact, from this, as well as from the extant fragments, that the first book of the work contained a general account of the origin and arrangement of the universe. The second book appears to have borne the title ἐπὶ φιλολαος, and to have been an exposition of the nature of numbers, which in the Pythagorean theory are the essence and source of all things (Böckh, l.c. p. 27, &c.). It is no doubt from the third book that a passage is quoted by Stobaeus (Ed. i. 21. § 2. p. 418) as being ἐν τῷ περὶ φυσικῆς; and from other sources it appears that the third division of the treatise did, in reality, treat of the soul.

There is no satisfactory evidence that any other writings of Philolaus were known except this work. More than one author mentions a work by Philolaus, entitled the Βίοι Χρήσεως. But from the nature of the references to it, it appears all but certain that this is only another name for the above-mentioned work in three books, and to have been a collective name of the whole. The name was very likely given, not by Philolaus himself, but by some admirer of him, who regarded his treatise as the fruit of a sort of mystic inspiration, and possibly in imitation of the way in which the books of Herodotus were named. (Böckh, L. c. p. 34, &c.)

Several important extracts from the work of Philolaus have come down to us. These have been carefully and ably examined by Böckh (Philolaos des Pythagoreers Lehren, nebst den Bruchstücken seines Werkes, Berlin, 1819). As the doctrines of Philolaus, generally speaking, coincided with those that were regarded as genuine doctrines of the Pythagorean school, and our knowledge of many features in the latter consists only of what we know of the former, an account of the doctrines of Philolaus will more fittingly come in a general examination of the Pythagorean philosophy. The reader is accordingly referred on this subject to Pythagoras. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 682, vol. iii. p. 61.) [C. P. M.]

PHILOMAC'HUS, artist. (ΠΗΡΟΜΑΧΟΣ.)

PHILEΜELEIA (Φιλομελεΐα). 1. A daughter of king Pandion in Attica, who, being dishonoured by her brother-in-law Tereus, was metamorphosed into a nightingale or swallow. (Apollod. i. 14. § 3; comp. Tereus.)

2. The mother of Patroclus (Hygin. Fab. 97), though it should be observed that she is commonly called Polyemele. (Schol. ad Hom. Od. iv. 343, xvii. 154.)

3. A daughter of Actor, and the wife of Peleus, by whom she is said to have been the mother of Achilles. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 558; comp. Peleus.)

4. One of the daughters of Prism. (Hygin. Fab. 90.)

PHILOMELEIDES (Φιλομελείδης), a king in Lesbos who compelled his guests to engage with him in contest of wrestling, and was compassed by Odysseus (Hom. Od. iv. 343, xvii. 134). Some commentators take this name to be a metronymic, derived from Philomele, No. 2. [L. S.]

PHILOME'LLUS (Φιλομέλιος), a son of Iasion and Demeter, and brother of Phitos, is said to have invented the chariot when Boites was placed among the stars by his mother. (Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 4.)

PHILON.

PHILEMELUS (Φιλομηλέας), one of the witnesses to the will of Theophrastus, who died B.C. 287 (Diog. Laërt. v. 57). He is perhaps the same with Philomelus, mentioned by Nemesius, the Pythagorean-Platonic philosopher, in connection with Mnaseas and Timon, as belonging to the school of the sceptics. (Euseb. P. E. xiv. p. 751, ed. 1686.)

PHILEMENUS. [Philomenus.]

PHILEMENUS (Φιλομήνος), the author of a work, Περὶ τῶν ἀνθρώπων τῶν Δικαιωμένων (Athen. p. 74, f.). As Athenaeus, in another passage (p. 445, a.), ascribes the same work to Philomenus, it would appear that there is a mistake in the name of one of these passages.

PHILOMENUS. 1. A freedman of Livius, is described in an inscription as inaurator, that is, insaurator, a glider, one of those artists, or perhaps rather artificers, whose employment consisted in covering known statues and other objects with thin beaten leaves of the precious metals, and who were called by the Greeks Αὔρωμοι, and by the Romans VASCECTUIUS.URIVOS. (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 384, 2nd ed.)

2. The architect of a monument of a certain Cornelia, is designated in the inscription as at the same time a scene-painter and a contractor for public works (πικτός σκηνογράφος, ιδεμ ἐκεκτόμος). There are other instances of the union of these two professions. (Orelli, Inschr. Lat. select. No. 2636; R. Rochette, c.)

PHILOMENUS (Φιλομηνος), historical. 1 A Phocian, who was charged with the administration of the sacred treasures under PHILAECUS. He was accused of peculation and embezzlement, and put to death in consequence, after having been compelled by the torture to disclose the names of those who had participated in his guilt, b.c. 347. (Diod. xvii. 56.)

2. A native of Aenania in Thessaly, was an officer of the Greek mercenaries in the service of Alexander, which had been settled by that monarch in the upper provinces of Asia. After the death of Alexander these troops, actuated by a common desire to return to their native country, abandoned the colonies in which they had been settled, and assembling to the number of 20,000 foot and 3000 horse, chose Philon to be their leader. They were, however, defeated by Python, who was sent against them by the regent Perdiccas; and the remainder submitted to him on favourable terms, but were afterwards barbarously massacred by the Macedonians in pursuance of the express orders of Perdiccas (Diod. xvii. 7). The fate of Philon himself is not mentioned.

3. There is a Philon mentioned by Justin (xiii. 4) as obtaining the province of Illyria, in the division of Alexander's empire after his death: but this is certainly a mistake, and the name is probably corrupt.

4. A citizen of Chalcis in Euboea, who appears to have taken a leading part in favour of Antiochus the Great, as his surrender was made by the Romans one of the conditions of the peace concluded by them with that monarch, b.c. 150. (Polyb. xxi. 14, xxii. 26; Liv. xxxvi. 45, xxxviii. 38.)

5. A follower and flatterer of Agathocles, the favourite of Poltemy Philopator. During the sedition of the Alexandrians against Agathocles, Philon had the imputation to irritate the populace by an insulting speech, on which he was instantly attacked and put to death: and his fate was quickly followed by that of Agathocles himself. (Polyb. xx. 33; Athen. vi. p. 251, e.)

6. A native of Cossus, who commanded a force of Cretan mercenaries in the service of Poltemy Philopator, king of Egypt. (Polyb. v. 65.)

7. A Thessalian, who accompanied the Achaean deputies on their return from the camp of Q. Caecilius Metellus (b.c. 146), and endeavoured, but in vain, to induce the Achaenians to accept the terms offered by them to the Roman general. (Polyb. xvi. 14.)

PHILON (Φιλων), literary and mechanical. Many persons of this name occur, most of whom notices will be found in Jonsius (De Script. Hist. Phill. iii. 44), and Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 750, &c.). To these articles a general reference is made. The philosophers are spoken of below separately; but the other persons of this name that deserve particular notice are:

1. OF ATHENS. While Demetrius prevailed at Athens, Sophocles of the Sunian district (Σωνεύος), got a law passed, ordaining that no philosopher should teach in Athens, without the express consent of the boule and the people, on pain of death. This had the effect of driving the Theophrastas, and all the other philosophers, from Athens. (Diog. Laërt. v. 38.) Hence Athenaeus erroneously represents this law as expressly banishing them (xiii. p. 610, f.; compare Pollux, ix. 43, where the law is said to have been aimed at the Sophists). This law was opposed by Philon, a friend of Aristotle, and defended by Democrates, the nephew of Demosthenes. (Athen. l. c.) The exertions of Philon were successful, and next year the philosophers returned, Democrates being sentenced to pay a fine of five talents. (Diog. Laërt. l. c., where for Φιλωνος read Φίλωνος.) The date of this transaction is doubtful. Alexis (apud Athen. l. c.) merely mentions Demetrius, without enabling us to judge whether it is Phaleorus, b.c. 316, or Poliorcetes, b.c. 307. Clinton leans to the former opinion. (Hist. of Ancient Philosophy, vol. iii. p. 379, Engl. Transl.) Jonsius (De Script. Hist. Phill.) places it as low as about b.c. 300. It is not improbable that this Philon is the slave of Aristotle, whom, in his will, he ordered to receive his freedom. (Diog. Laërt. v. 15.)

2. OF BYZANTIUM, a celebrated mechanician, and a contemporary of Ctesibius. As much confusion has arisen regarding the era of these two men, and of Heron the pupil of Ctesibius (see Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. pp. 222, 234; Antholog. Graec. ed. Jacobs, vol. xiii. p. 399; Montucla, Histoire des Mathematiques, vol. i. p. 268), it will be necessary to attend to the correct date. Athenaeus, the mechanician, mentions that Ctesibius dedicated his work to Marcellus. This Marcellus has been supposed to be the illustrious captor of Syracuse, without any evidence. Again, the epigrammatist Hedylius speaks (Athen. xi. p. 497, c.) of Ctesibius in connection with a temple to Arisias, the wife and sister of Poltemy Philadelphia. Hence it has been stated that Ctesibius flourished about the time of Poltemy Philadelphia and Euphorines I. b.c. 285—222, and Athenaeus, in that of Archimedes, who was slain B. c. 212. The inference drawn from the hydraulic invention of Ctesibius is untenable, as we might well be enabled to ornament a temple already existing, and there is no ground for believing that the Marcellus, to whom Athenaeus dedicated his work, is the person assumed. On the contrary, Philon, and therefore the rest, must have lived after the time of Archimedes, as we learn from Tzetzes (Chii. ii. v. 152) that Philon, in one of his works, mentions Archimedes. There is no reason, therefore, why we should reject the express statement of Athenaeus (iv. p. 174, c), where he mentions Ctesibius as flourishing in the time of the second Euergetes, Ptolemny Phileron, who began to reign B.C. 146. Fabricius, with odd inconsistency, places the era of Philon at n. c. 601 = B. C. 153, which is sufficiently correct. Consequently Heron must be placed later. (See Schwelkhäuser, ad Athenaeum, vol. vii. p. 607, &c.; Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. p. 585.) All that we know of his history is derived from his own notices in the work to be mentioned immediately; that he had been at Alexandria and Rhodes, and had profited by his intercourse with the engineers of both places (pp. 51, 80, 84).

Among his works is one wherein he took a wide range, treating of the formation of harbours, of weirs, and the other mechanical powers; as well as all other contrivances connected with the besieging and the defending of cities. Hence, Vitruvius (vii. Praefat.) mentions him among the writers on military engineering. Of this, two books, the fourth and fifth, have come down to us, and are printed in the Veterum Mathematicorum Opera, of Thevenot, Paris, 1639, wherein Pouchard revised the fragment of Philon, which occurs pp. 49—104. The fourth book is headed, ἐν τῷ Φίλωνος βελοκούβαν, and the general subject is the manufacture of missiles. He mentions in it an invention of his own, which he denominates ὀξείδια (p. 56). In the fifth book we are shocked to find that while recommending a besieging army to devastate the open country on the approach of an enemy, he advises them to poison the springs and the grain which they cannot dispose of (p. 103); and what renders this the worse, he mentions his having treated of poisons in his book on the preparations that should be made for a war. What principally attracted attention to this work in modern times is his notice of the invention of Ctesibius (p. 77, &c.). The instrument described by him, named ἀποθερών, acted on the property of air when condensed; and is, evidently, in principle the same with the modern air-gun. The subject is investigated by Albert Louis Meister in a short treatise entitled De Catapulta polybola Commentatio, qua loca Philonis Mechanici, in libro iv. de torum constructione exteae, illustratur, Gottingae, 1768. It has also attracted the notice of Dutens, in his Origine de Découvertes attribuées aux Modernes, vol. i. p. 265, ed. Paris, 1776. Further details of this fragment will be found in Fabricius, vol. iv. p. 231, &c. According to Montucla, Philon was well skilled in Geometry, and his solution of the problem of the two mean proportionals (Pappus, Coll. Math. lib. viii.), although the same in principle with those of Archimedes, is, in peculiar merits in practice. We learn from Pappus (c. c.) that he wrote a treatise on mechanics, the object of which was nearly the same as Heron's. (Montucla, vol. i. p. 268.)

To Philon of Byzantium is attributed another work, Πεζτω τῶν ἔρωτας Βασιλακεων, On the Seven Wonders of the World. But Fabricius (ibid. Grœc. vol. iv. p. 238) thinks that it is impossible that an eminent mechanician like Philon Byzantius could have written this work, and conjectures that it was written by Philon Hermecleotes. No one can doubt that he is right in his first conjecture, but it seems more probable that it is the production of a later rhetorical writer, who gave it the name of Philon of Byzantium, as that of a man, who, from his life and writings, might be supposed to have chosen it as a subject for composition. It exists in only one MS. which, originally in the Vatican, was in 1816, in Paris, No. 389. It was first edited by Allatius, Rome, 1640, with a loose Latin translation, and desultory, though learned notes. It was re-edited from the same MS. by Dionesius Salvagnius Boe- sius, ambassador from the French court to the pope, and included in his Miscellanea, printed at Leyden, 1661. This edition has a more correct translation than that of Allatius, but abounds in typographical errors, there being fewer than 150 in 14 pages. Gronovius reprinted the edition of Allatius, in his Theaetver Antiquitatum Graecarum, vol. vii. pp. 2645—2666. It was finally reprinted at Leipzig, 1816, edited by J. C. Orelli. This edition, which is undoubtedly the best, contains the Greek, with the translations of both Allatius and Boessius, (with the exception of a fragment of a mutilated chapter, reprinted from the translation of L. Holstein, which originally appeared in Gronovius, ibid. vol. vii. p. 389), the notes of Allatius and others, along with some passages from other writers who had treated of the same or similar subjects, the fragments of the sophist Callinicus, and Adrian the Tyrian, and an Index Graecolat. The wonders treated of are the Hanging Gardens, the Pyramids, the statue of Jupiter Olympus, the Walls of Baby- lon, the Colossus of Rhodes, the Temple of Artemis at Ephesus, and, we may presume, from the proemium, the Mausoleum; but the last is entirely wanting, and we have only a fragment of the Ephesian temple. The style, though not wholly devoid of elegance, is florid and rhetorical. Orelli regrets the lost portions, as he thinks that the author had actually beheld the three last won- ders. There does not appear to be much ground for this, and the whole seems to have been adopted from the reports of others.

3. CARPATHIUS (from Carpathus, an island north-east of Crete), or rather CARPASUS (from Carpasia, a town in the north of Cyprus). His birth-place is unknown; but he derived this cognomen from his having been ordained bishop of Carpasia, by Epiphanius, the well-known bishop of Constantia. According to the statement of Joannes and Polybius, bishop of Rhinoscuri, in their life of Epiphanius, Philon, at that time a deacon, was sent, along with some others, by the sister of the emperors Arcadius and Honorius, to bring Epipha- nius to Rome, that, through his prayers and the laying on of hands, she might be saved from a dan- gerous disease under which she was labouring. Pleased with Philon, Epiphanius not only ordained him bishop of Carpasia, but gave him charge of his sarcophagus and his remains during his lifetime. This was about the beginning of the fifth century. (Caes. Hist. Litt. p. 240, ed. Genov.) Philo Carpasia is principally known from his Commentary on the Caniciles, which he treats allegorically. A Latini transl. or rather paraphrase of this commentary, with ill-assorted interpolations, from the commentary of Gregorius I., by Salutatus, was published, Paris, 1537, and reprinted in the Biblioth. Pat. Lugdun. vol. v. Fragments of Philon's Commentary are inserted in this translation, which is falsely ascribed to Eusebius, edited by Meursius, Lugd. Batav. 1617. In these, he is simply named Philon, without the surname. Bandurius, a Benedictine monk, promised in 1705 a genuine edition, which he never fulfilled. It was published from a Vatican MS. in 1750, under the name of Epiphanias, and edited by Fogginius. The most important edition, however, is that of Giacomellus, Rome, 1772, from two MSS. This has the original Greek, a Latin translation, with notes, and is accompanied by the entire Greek text of the Capitula, principally from the Alexandrian recension. This is reprinted in Galland, N. Bibl. P.F. vol. ix. p. 715; Ernesti (Newesten Theog. Bibl. vol. iii. part 6), in a review of this edition, of which he thinks highly, is of opinion that the commentary, as we now have it, is but an abridgment of the original. Besides this commentary, Philon wrote on various parts both of the Old and New Testament, fragments of which are contained in the various Catena. (Suidas, s. v.; Cave, l. c.; Fabric. Bibli. Graec. vol. vii. pp. 398, 611, viii. p. 645, x. p. 479.)

4. Of Gadara, and a pupil of Sorous. He extended to 10,000 decimal places the approximation of the proportion of the diameter to the circumference of the circle. (Eutoc. Comment. in Archim. de Dint Circ. in Montucula, vol. i. p. 340.)

5. The Geographer, is mentioned by Strabo (ii. p. 77) as having written an account of a voyage to Aethiopia. According to a conjecture of Vossius (De Hist. Graec. p. 486, ed. Westermann) this is the same with the Philon quoted by Antigonius Caryaustus (Hist. Mirab. c. 160).

6. Heracleiotus. Porphyry refers to a work of his, Περί Σαμαραίας. (Soh. Eclog. Physic. p. 130, ed. 1609.) He is probably the same with the Philon, the first book of whose work is quoted as an authority by Suidas (s. v. Παλαιφατος). This work is there entitled, Περί παραβάσεως λοταρία. Some authorities are quoted by Aelian, from a similar work written by a Philon (II. A. xii. 37). We have no means of determining his age, but as he states that Palæephatus was a friend of Aristotle, he must have lived subsequently to that philosopher. (Suidas, l. c.) To him has been conventionally referred the work, De Septem Orbitis Miraculis, described under Philon of Byzantium. (No. 2.) (Fabric. Bibli. Graec. vol. iv. p. 235.)

7. Herennius Philus. Suidas (s. v. Φίλου) styles this Philon only Herennius. According to him he was a grammarnian, and, if the text be correct, filled the office of consul. But, if Suidas actually made this statement, it must, as is remarked by Kuster (ad locum), have been through oversight. He was born about the time of Nero, and lived to a good old age, having written of the reign of Hadrian. This is all that we know of his life, except on his own authority, as given by Suidas, that he was in his 78th year in the consulsip of Herennius Severus, from whose patronage he doubtless received his surname. This consulsip, Suidas states, occurred in the 220th Olympiad, the last year of which was A.D. 104. Now, granting that this is the year meant, it has been deemed highly improbable that he should have lived to chronicle the reign of Hadrian, who succeeded A.D. 117, when, according to this computation, Philon must have been 91 years old, especially as Hadrian reigned 21 years. The consulsip of Herennius Severus unfortunately cannot aid us, for there is no consul of that name about this period; there is a Catilus Severus, A.D. 120, and Huenius Severus, A.D. 141, and Herennius must have been a consul suffectus. Scaliger, Tillemon, and Clinton, have proposed various emendations on the text of Suidas, Clinton conjecturally assigning his birth to A.D. 47, and consequently his 78th year to A.D. 124. (Fasti Rom. pp. 31, 111.) After all, the text of Suidas may be correct enough. He expressly says that the life of Philon was very long protracted, παρατάγον ἐπὶ μακρὸν; and regarding Hadrian all he says is, he wrote τέξι τειχίς βασιλείας, not that he wrote a history of his reign. Eusebius also mentions a Philon, whom he styles Byblius. This Philon Byblius had, according to the account of Eusebius, translated the works of a certain ancient Phoenician named Sanchoniathon (Zerychmethoq) on the result of multifarious inquiries into the Phoenician mythology. Eusebius gives the preface of Philon Byblius, and copious extracts, but not seemingly at first hand. He states that he had found them in the writings of Porphyry. (Praxe. Evangel. ii. p. 31, &c.) Byblius is evidently a patronymic from Byblius, a Phoenician town. Now Suidas (s. v. Εὔμητος), states that Hermippus of Berythus, also a Phoenician town, was his disciple. Hence, this has long been held—as there is nothing in date to contradict it—that the Philon Herennius of Suidas, and the Philon Byblius of Porphyry, are one and the same. (See Dodwell's Discourse concerning Sanchoniathon, printed at the end of Two Letters of Advice, 1691.) This opinion will deserve examination in the inquiry into the writings of Sanchoniathon. Philon, was a voluminous writer. In addition, 1. to his work on Hadrian's reign, Suidas mentions his having written, 2. a work in thirty books on cities and their illustrious men, which was abridged by Aelius Serenus in three books (s. v. Σερένους), which is confirmed in the Etymologicon Magnum (s. v. Αρασιν, Βουκέαρις); 3. a work, Περί κτήσεως καὶ ἐκλογήσι βιβλίων, in 12 books. Of this, the treatise Περί χρυσοτοξαθείας is probably a part (Etym. Mag. s. v. Χρυσόρως). He states that he wrote other works, but does not enumerate them. Eudocia (p. 424) assigns to him, 4. four books of Epigrams, from which we have perhaps a distich in the Anthologia Graeca. (Jabobs, vol. iii. p. 110.) There are besides attributed to him, 5. a Commentary on the Metaphysics of Aristotle. (Fabric. Bibli. Graec. vol. iii. p. 258.) 6. A rhetorical work, Πορογραφία, perhaps a dictionary of rhetoric (Etym. Mag. s. v. Διάλεξις). In the Etymologicon Magnum, we have noticed Νηπτικια (s. v. Νηπτικια), and Περί Ρωμαίων διαλεξών (s. v. Διάλεξις); but these seem all divisions of the same rhetorical work. 7. Περί διαφοράν συμμαθημάτων, which is said to be extant in one of the public libraries of Paris. Eustathius quotes extensively from this or the rhetorical work. (Fabric. Bibli. Graec. vol. v. p. 718.) Manegeus (ad Laetitii Anaximineum, p. 71) attributes to him the similar treatise generally ascribed to Ammonius; and Valckenperer adds to his edition of Ammonius, 1739, a treatise by Erasmus Philon, De Differentia Synagogenae, which will be found along with the treatise of Ammonius at the end of Scapula's Lexicon. (See Valkenaer's Preface to Ammonius.) This he thinks to be the work of a later writer, who has appropriated, and that incorrectly, Philon's name. 8. Περί ταύτης, on the authority of Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v. Κέρτος). This Fabricius thinks to have contained a history of eminent physicians, and he deeply regrets its loss (vol. xii. p. 307, ed. vol.). 9. Ιστορία παραδοσιών, in three books. (Euseb. P. E. p. 32.) 10. A work on the Jewish-writers. (Euseb. P. E. p. 45.) 11. Εὐθοδοὺς υπομνήματα. (Euseb. P. E. p. 41.) Vossius (De Hist. Graec. p. 292, ed. Westermann) inadvertently attributes the last three to Porphyry, and has been partially followed by Fourmont (Réflexions sur l'Histoire des Anciens Peuples, vol. i. p. 21). These three must be assigned, on the authority of Eusebius, to Herennius Philon, if he is the same as Philon Byblius, who alone is mentioned by Eusebius, just as the former name alone, or standing without Herennius, is found elsewhere. (See Salmassius, Πλιν. Ερείπ. p. 866.) Lastly it may be mentioned that Vossius (ibid. p. 254) attributes to him the Aldusian, which with more probability he elsewhere assigns (p. 486) to Philon the geographer. But the work which has made his name most celebrated in modern times, and of which alone we have any fragments of consequence, is the translation of the Phoenician work already referred to. For the controversy regarding the genuineness and authenticity of this work, see SANCINATHON.

8. ΜΕΤΑΠΟΙΝΤΙΝΟΣ, a musician and poet. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Μεταπόιντινος.)

9. ΜΟΝΚ. An ascetic treatise, bearing the name of Philon Monachus, whom Cave (H. L. p. 176, Diss.) deems to be much later than the other ecclesiastical writers of the same name, is preserved in the library of Vienna (Cod. Theol. 325, No. 15). It is entitled, Contra Pulcritudinem Hominum. 10. The Pythagoreans. Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. i. p. 305), and Sozomenes (i. 12), mention Philon διός Πυθαγόρας. It is probable from their language that he both mean by the person so designated, a work on the Pythagoreans. (Ibid. iii. c. 4. p. 17) is strongly of opinion that Philon the elder, and this Philon mentioned by Clemens, are the same. Fabricius, who alone held this opinion, was led to change his views (Fabric. Bibl. vol. i. p. 862), and tacitly assumes (vol. iv. p. 738) that Sozomenes indicated Philon Judaeus by this epithet.

11. ΡΗΤΟΡΙΚΗΝ AND PHILOSOPHER, Cave, Giacomelli, and Ernesti, are of opinion that this is no other than Philon Carpæus. His era agrees with this, for the philosopher is quoted by Athanasius Sinaita, who flourished about A. D. 561. We need not be startled at the term philosoper as applied to an ecclesiastic. This was not uncommon. Michael Pselius was termed the prince of philosophers, and Nicetas was surnamed, in the same name as Philon, βούτωρ καὶ φιλόσοφος. Besides, Polybius, in the life of Epiphanius alluded to above, expressly calls Philon of Carpæa αὐτόν ἄνδρα δεδομένον, which Tillemon and others erroneously understand to mean a man who has changed from the profession of the law to that of the church. Cave shows that the βούτωρ held an office in the church itself, somewhat analogous to our professorship of ecclesiastical history. Our only knowledge of Philon, under this name, whether it be Philon Carpæus or not, is from an incited work of Anastasius Sinaita, preserved in the library of Vienna and the Bodleian. Glycas (Annal. p. 282, &c.), it is true, quotes, as if from Philon, but he has only borrowed verbatim and without acknowledgment, from Anastasius. The work of Anastasius referred to, is entitled by Cave, Demonstration Historicæ de Moyna et Angelica summæ Scriptoris Dignitati. Philon's work, therein quoted, is styled a Church history, but, if we may judge from the only specimen of it we have, we need hardly regret its loss. It consists of a tale regarding a monk, that being excommunicated by his bishop, and having afterwards suffered martyrdom, he was brought in his coffin to the church, but could not rest till the bishop, warned in a dream, had formally absolved him. (Cave, Hist. Litt. p. 176, ed. Genevae, 1720 ; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 429.)

12. ΣΕΝΙΟΡ. Josephus (Apion. i. 23), when enumerating the heathen writers who had treated of Jewish history, mentions together Demetrius Phalerus, Philon, and Eusebom. Philon he calls οὖς τοιοῦτος, probably to distinguish him from Philon Judaeus, and he cannot mean Herennius Philon, who lived after his time. Clemens Alexandrinus (Stromat. i. p. 146) also couples together the names of Philon the elder and Demetrius, stating that their lists of Jewish kings differed. Hence Vossius thinks that both authors refer to the same person. (De Hist. Graec. p. 486, ed. Westermann.) And in this Joniis agrees with him, while he notices the error of Josephus, in giving Demetrius the surname of Phalerus. (De Script. Hist. Phil. iii. p. 4. 17.) As Huetius (Demonstrat. Evangel. p. 62) was of opinion that the apocryphal Book of Wisdom was written by this Philon, he was necessitated to consider him as an Hellenistic Jew, who, unskilled in the original Hebrew, had it translated, and then expanded it, in language peculiar to his class. (Ibid. pp. 62, 246, &c.) Fabricius thinks that the Philon mentioned by Josephus, may have been a Gentile, and that a Philon different from either Philon Judaeus or Philon of Antioch, was the author of the Book of Wisdom. Eusebius (I Prop. Evangel. ix. 20, 24) quotes fifteen obscure hexameters from Philon, without giving hint of who he is, and merely citing them as from Alexander Polyhistor. These evidently form part of a history of the Jews in verse, and were written either by a Jew, in the character of a heathen, as Fabricius hints is possible, or by a heathen acquainted with the Jewish Scriptures. This is, in all probability, the author, and the work referred to by Josephus and Clemens Alexandrinus. Of course the author must have lived before the time of Alexander Polyhistor, who came to Rome, n. c. 83. It is doubtful whether he is the same writer with the geographer of the same name, mentioned above.

13. Of Tarsus, a deacon. He was a companion of Ignatius of Antioch, and accompanied the martyr from the East to Rome. A. D. 107. He is twice mentioned in the epistles of Ignatius (ad Philadelph. c. 11, ad Smyrnensis, c. 13). He is supposed to have written, along with Rhea Agathus, the Martyrium Ignatii, for which see IGNATIUS, in this work, Vol. II. p. 466, b. (Comp. Cave, Hist. Litt. p. 28, ed. Genevae, 1720.)
PHILON.

14. Of Thersites, is quoted by Plutarch as an authority in his Life of Alexander (c. 46). He is probably the same Philon, who is mentioned as an authority for the Indian Antissa by Stephanus Byzantinus (s. e. "Artu sia").

15. Thyanensis, a geometrician of profound abilities, if we may judge from the subject of his writings, which regarded the most transcendental parts of ancient geometry, the consideration of curve lines. In particular, he investigated the lines formed by the intersection of a plane with certain curved surfaces. These lines are called by Pappus παλαιοιδες (Coll. Math. iv. post prop. 40). The nature of the surfaces or the lines is unknown; but Pappus informs us that their investigation excited the admiration of many geometers; among others, of Menelaus of Alexandria. As Menelaus was in Rome A.D. 98, Philon must have preceded him. (Montucla, vol. I. p. 316.) [W.M.G.]

PHILON (Φίλων), philosopher, from whom the Jew, sprung from a priestly family of distinction, was born at Alexandria (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 8 § 1, xx. 5 § 2, xix. 5 § 1; Euseb. H. E. ii. 4; Phil. de Legat. ad Caesiam, ii. p. 567, Manegy). After his life, from early youth upwards, had been wholly devoted to learning, he was compelled, when he had probably already reached an advanced age, in consequence of the persecutions which the Jews had to suffer, especially under the emperor Caius, to devote himself to public business. With four others of his race he undertook an embassy to Rome, in order to procure the revocation of the decree which exacted even from the Jews divine homage for the statue of the emperor, and to ward off further persecutions. The embassy arrived at Rome in the winter of A.D. 39-40, after the termination of the war against the Germans, and was still there when the prefect of Syria, Petronius, received orders, which were given probably in the spring of A.D. 40, to set up the colossal statue of Caius, in the temple at Jerusalem. Philon speaks of himself as the oldest of the ambassadors (Phil. de Congressu, p. 530, de Leg. Spec. ii. p. 299, de Legat. pp. 572, 598; comp. Joseph. Ant. xviii. 8 § 1). How little the embassy accomplished its object, is proved not only by the command above referred to, but also by the anger of the emperor at the request of the mildly-disposed Petronius, that the execution of the command might be deferred till the harvest was over (see the letter of Petronius in Phil. p. 583). Nothing but the death of the emperor, which ensued in January A.D. 41, saved Petronius, for whose death orders had been given (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 8 § 9). If Philon, at the time of the embassy, was, as is not improbable, about 60 years old, the date of his birth will be about B.C. 20. In the treatise on the subject, which without doubt was written not earlier than the reign of the emperor Claudius, he speaks of himself as an old man. As to other events in his personal history, we only know with certainty of a journey undertaken by him to Jerusalem (Phil. de Prov. ap. Euseb. Proph. Evang. viii. 14, in Manegy, ii. p. 464). On the statement of Eusebius (H. E. ii. 17; comp. Hieronym. Catalog. Script. Ecclesiast.), that Philon had already been in Rome in the time of the emperor Claudius, and had become acquainted with the Apostle Peter, as on that of Photius (Cod. 105), that he was a Christian, no dependence whatever can be placed.

The writings of Philon may be arranged in several classes. Of these the first division, and probably the earliest in point of time, includes the books de Mundi Inconscius, Quod omnis Probatus Librum, and de Vita Contemplativa. The beginning of the third (ii. p. 471, Manegy) refers to the second, which treats of the Essenes. A second division, composed probably not before Philon was an old man, treats of the oppressions which the Jews had to endure at that time (adversus Flaccum, Legatio ad Caesiam, and probably also de Nobilitate), which appears to be a fragment from the lost Apology for the Jews. See Dähne, über die Schriften des Juden Philon, in Ullmann's and Umbreit's Theologische Studien und Kritiken, 1833, p. 990. All the other writings of Philon have reference to the books of Moses. At the commencement stands an exposition of the account of the creation (de Mundi Opificio). Then follows, according to the ordinary arrangement, a series of allegorical interpretations of the following sections of Genesis, of the first-mentioned treatise (Phil. de Congressu, p. 530, de Legat. pp. 572, 598; comp. Joseph. Ant. xviii. 8 § 1). How little the embassy accomplished its object, is proved not only by the command above referred to, but also by the anger of the emperor at the request of the mildly-disposed Petronius, that the execution of the command might be deferred till the harvest was over (see the letter of Petronius in Phil. p. 583). Nothing but the death of the emperor, which ensued in January A.D. 41, saved Petronius, for whose death orders had been given (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 8 § 9). If Philon, at the time of the embassy, was, as is not improbable, about 60 years old, the date of his birth will be about B.C. 20. In the treatise on the subject, which without doubt was written not earlier than the reign of the emperor Claudius, he speaks of himself as an old man. As to other events in his personal history, we only know with certainty of a journey undertaken by him to Jerusalem (Phil. de Prov. ap. Euseb. Proph. Evang. viii. 14, in Manegy, ii. p. 464). On the statement of Eusebius (H. E. ii. 17; comp. Hieronym. Catalog. Script. Ecclesiast.), that Philon had already been in Rome in the time of the emperor Claudius, and had become acquainted with the Apostle Peter, as on that of Photius (Cod. 105), that he was a Christian, no dependence whatever can be placed.

The writings of Philon may be arranged in several classes. Of these the first division, and and conditions of men, of the good as of the bad, to universal natural relations. The written laws are explained first generally in the Deaglogus, then, according to their more special ends, in the treatises de Circumcisione, de Monarchia, de Præmia Sacerdotum, de Victimis, &c. (comp. A. F. Gförer, Kriftische Geschichte des Urchristenthums, pt. i. Philon, p. 11, &c.). On the assumption that the allegorical writings were composed chiefly for Jews, and those relating to the laws, whether set forth in the conduct of living models, or written, for Hellenes (de Vita Mosis, lii. 80), Gförer (l. c.) would entirely separate the one class from the other, and make the latter (the historicising), not the former (the allegorical), follow immediately the treatise de Mundi Opfario. He refers the statement of Philon himself (de Præmia ac Poenis l.c.):—"The declarations of the prophet Moses divide themselves into two classes; the one relates to the creation of the world, the contents of the second are of an historical kind, the third embraces the laws"—merely to the treatise on the creation of the world and the two series of writings relating to the law (ib. p. 23, &c.). On the other hand Dähne (l. c. p. 994, &c.) remarks with regard, that the historical part, according to the express remark appended in the passage of Philon referred to, is said to contain the description of wicked and virtuous modes of life, and the punishments and rewards which are appointed to each in the different races, i.e. what is treated in the allegories. Dähne further directs attention partly to a passage in the life of Moses (ii. p. 141), according to which Philon separates the books of Moses into two parts—the historical, which at the same time contains accounts of the origin of the world and genealogies, and one relating to commands and prohibitions; partly to the circumstance that elsewhere (de Abrak. pr.) we find what in the other passage is called the historical part spoken of as belonging to the kósmos; that so here again it is clearly enough indicated that the allegorical books hang together with the work on the creation; and both these passages differ from that before adduced (de Præm. et Poen. in this), in that the latter in the two portions of Genesis, to which the kósmos is to be considered as equivalent, are again separated. Gförer's attempt (in the preface to the second edition of his Philon, p. xii. &c.) to establish his assumption against Dähne's objections cannot be regarded as satisfactory, and the series of allegorical books should rather (with Mangey, Dähne, &c.) come immediately after the account of the creation.

To the treatises of Philon contained in the earlier editions, there have recently been added not only those found by Barocci in a Florentine manuscript, de Festo Capitini, and de Paradosiis, but also a series both belonging to the dissertations on the laws (Philon et Virgilii Interpretes, Mediolan. 1813), but also the treatises, discovered by Baut. Acher in an Armenian version and translated into Latin, De Providentia and De Animalibus (Venet. 1822, fol. min.), Quesition. et Solution. in Genesis, Serm. IV. in Exod. II., a short summary, in the form of question and answer, of the doctrines unfolded at length in the other treatises (comp. Dähne, l. c. p. 10, 37, &c.), Sermo de Cappone, de Jona, et de tribus Angelis Abrabamo apparenisibus, (Philonis Judaici Paralipomena Armenia, ib. 1826, fol. min.) Of the latter, however, the Serm. de Cappone et de Jona must be looked upon as decidedly spurious (comp. Dähne, l. c. p. 907, &c.), as also, among those printed earlier, the book de Mundo cannot pass as philosophical. The really or apparently lost books of Philon are enumerated in Fabisch's Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 727, &c.). Turnebus's edition of the writings of Philon (Paris, 1592, fol.) appeared, emended by Hoeschel, first Colon. Allobrog. 1613, then, reprinted, Paris, 1640, Francoc. 1691, &c.). These were followed by Mangey's splendid edition (Lond. 1742, 2 vols. fol.). Still, without detracting from its merits, it is far from complete; and how much remains to be done in order to make a really good edition, was shown by Valckenaer, Ruhnken, Markland, and others, at an earlier period, and more recently by Fr. Creuzer (Zur Kritik der Schriften des Juden Philo, in Ullmann's and Umbreit's theologischen Studien und Kritiken, 1832, pp. 1—43). The edition of Pfeiffer (Erlang. 1785—92, 5 vols. 8vo) contributed but little to the correction of the text, and that of E. Richter (Lips. 1828—30, 8 vols. 12mo) is little more than a reprint of Mangey's, including the pieces discovered in the mean time. Dr. Grossmann (Quesitionum Philonearum part. prin. Lips. 1829) holds out the hope of a new critical edition.

Even as early as the times of Alexander and Ptolemaeus Lagi, many Jews had been settled in Alexandria. In the times of Philon two of the five divisions of the town were exclusively occupied by them, and they had settled themselves in a scattered manner even in the rest. (Ad. Place, p. 523, &c.) Having become more closely acquainted with Greek philosophy by means of the museum established by the first Ptolemies, Soter and Philadephus, and of the libraries, the learned Jews of Alexandria began very soon to attempt the reconciliation of this philosophy with the revelations contained in their own sacred writings. The more firmly however they were convinced of the divine origin of their doctrines, the less could they regard as contradictory or new what they recognised as truth in the Greek philosophy. Thence arose on the one hand their assumption that this truth must be an efflux, though a remote one, of the divine revelation, on the other hand, their endeavour, by means of a profounder penetration into the hidden sense of their holy books, to prove that it was contained in them. In reference to the first point, in order to establish the derivation of the fundamental truths of Greek philosophy from the Mosaic revelation, they betook themselves to fictitious references and supposed writings; and with regard to the second point, in order to distinguish between a verbal and a hidden sense, they had recourse to allegorical interpretations. Aristotle however had previously declared his views on both of these points in the dedication of his mystical commentary to Ptolemaeus Philometer (ap. Euseb. Praep. Evang. viii. 10; comp. Alex. Strom. i. p. 343). In the allegorical interpretation referred to definite maxims (canones), they proceeded on the assumption that everything contained in the law must have an immediate influence upon the instruction and amendment of men, and that the whole body of its precepts stands in a hidden connexion, which must be disclosed by a more profound understanding of them.

This new philosophy of religion, which was obtained through the appropriation of Greek philosophy by means of an allegorical interpretation of the Mosaic records, is taught us most clearly in the writings of Philon; for although his creative powers MUNDI OPIF. 4), matter was looked upon by him as the source of all imperfection and evil (de Justitia, p. 367); whereas in otherpassages,in whichhe especially brings into notice the non-existence of matter, God is represented as the creator, as distinguished from the mere fashioner of the universe (de Somn. i. p. 632, &c.). Philon could not conceive of the unchangeable, absolutely perfect Deity as the immediate cause of the changeable, imperfect world; hence the assumption of a mediate cause, which, with reference as well to the immanent and transient activity attributed to him for the projection and realisation of the primeval form of the universe, as to the thinking and speaking faculty of man, designated by one and the same word (δόγαν, ἐν διανοιᾳ, ἐν διδασκαλίᾳ and φωνεῖν), he designated as the divine Logos (de Cherub. p. 162, de Migrat. Abrah. p. 436, &c., de Vita Moses, iii. p. 154, &c.), within which he then again distinguished on the one hand the divine wisdom (the mother of what was brought into existence), and the activity which exerts itself by means of speech (Leg. alleg. i. p. 52, 58, &c., p. ii. p. 82, de Eritreatest, p. 361, &c., de Sacrific. i. p. 175, &c.), on the other hand the goodness (δυνατοτης), the power (ἀρετη, ἐξουσία, το κράτος), and the world-sustaining grace (de Sacrific. i. p. 189, Quoest. in Gen. i. 57, de Cherub. i. 143, &c.). As the pattern (παραδειγμα) of the visible world he assumed an invisible, spiritual world (σοφα διαφαν-, νηστος, de Opif. i. 6, 7, &c.), and this he regarded platonically as the collective totality of the ideas or spiritual forms (Dähne, l. c. p. 253); the principle of the mediate cause he regarded as powers invisible and divine, though still distinct from the Deity (de Migrat. Abrah. p. 464, &c., Dähne, p. 240, &c.); the spiritual world as completely like God, as his shadow (de Opif. M. p. 3, Leg. alleg. iii. p. 106, &c.), the world of sense in like manner as divine, by virtue of the spiritual forms contained in it (de Mund. Opif. i. p. 5). The relation of the world to the Deity he conceived of partly as the extension (ἐκτελειου) of the latter to the former (de Nomin. mutat. p. 582, &c.), or as the filling of the void by the boundless fulness of God (de Opif. Mund. p. 36, &c.); partly under the image of effulgence: the primal existence was then looked upon by him as the pure light which shed its beams all around, the Logos as the nearest circle of light proceeding from It, each single power as a separate ray of the primordial light, and the universe as an illumination of matter, fading away more and more in proportion to its distance from the primal light (de Somn. i. p. 638, 641, &c., de Praem. et Poen. p. 414, Leg. alleg. i. p. 47, &c., iii. p. 120, &c.). Thus we already find in Philon in a very distinct form the outlines of the doctrine of emanations, which subsequently was further developed on the one hand by the Gnostics, on the other by the Neo-platonists.

2. THE MEARGIAN OR DIALECTICIAN, was a disciple of Diodorus Cronus, and a friend of Zenon, though older than the latter, if the reading in Diogenes Laërtius (vii. 16) is correct. In his Menexenus he mentioned the five daughters of his teacher (Clem. Alex. Strom. iv. p. 528, a. ed. Potter), and disputed with him respecting the idea of the possible, and the criteria of the truth of hypothetical propositions. With reference to the first point Philon approximated to Aristotle, as he conceived that not only what is, or will be, is possible (as Diodorus maintained), but also what is in itself conformable to the particular purpose of the object in question, as of chalk to burn (κατὰ ψηλὸν λαέ- нятиеν ἐντεσθεντάτην; Alex. Aphrodis. Nat. Qual. i. 14. Compare on the whole question J. Harris, in Upton's Arrian Dissertat. Epist. ii. 19, ap. Schwabäusser, vol. ii. p. 515, &c.) Diodorus had allowed the validity of hypothetical propositions only where the antecedent clause could never lead to an untrue conclusion, whereas Philon regarded those as false which with a correct antecedent had an incorrect conclusion (Sext. Empir. adv. Math. viii. 113, &c. Hypotyp. ii. 110, comp. Cic. Acad. ii. 47, de Fato, 6). Both accordingly had sought for criteria for correct sequence in the members of hypothetical propositions, and each of them in a manner corresponding to what he maintained respecting the idea of the possible. Chrysippus attacked the assumption of each of them.

The Philon who is spoken of as an Athenian and a disciple of Pyrrhon, though ridiculed by Timon as a sophist, can hardly be different from Philon the dialectician (Dio. Laec. iii. 67, 69). Hieronymus (Jov. 1) speaks of Philon the dia- lectician and the author of the Menexenus, as the instructor of Carneades, in contradiction to chro- nology, perhaps in order to indicate the sceptical direction of his doctrine.

3. The Academic, a native of Larissa and a disciple of Clitomachus. After the conquest of Athens by Mithridates he removed thence to Rome, where he settled as a teacher of philosophy and rhetoric. Here Cicero was among his hearers (Cicad. ad Fum. xiii. 1, Acad. i. 4, Brut. 89, Tusc. ii. 3). When Cicero composed his Questions Academicæ, Philon was no longer alive (Acad. ii. 6); he was already in Rome at the time when the dialogue in the books de Oratore is supposed to have been held (R. C. 92, de Orat. iii. 28). Through Philon the sceptics of the Academy returned to its original starting point, as a polemical antagonism against the Stoics, and so entered upon a new course, which some historians have spoken of as that of the fourth academy (Sext. Emp. Hypotyp. i. 290). He maintained that by means of con- ceptive notions (καταλαβῆτε φαινατα) objects could not be comprehended (καταλάβην), and were comprehensible according to their nature (Sext. Emp. Hypotyp. i. 235; Cic. Acad. Quaest. ii. 6). How he understood the latter, whether he referred to the evidence and accordance of the sensations which we receive from things (Aristo- cles, ap. Euseb. Praep. Evan. xiv. 9), or whether he had returned to the Platonic assumption of an immediate spiritual perception, is not clear. In opposition to his disciple Antiochus, he would not admit of a separation of an Old and a New Aca- demy, but would rather find the doubts of scepti- cism even in Socrates and Plato (Cic. Acad. Quaest. ii. 4, 5, 29), and not less perhaps in the New Academy the recognition of truth which burst through its scepticism. At least on the one hand, even though he would not resist the evi- dence of the sensations, he wished even here to meet with antagonists who would endeavour to refute his positions (Aristo-cles, l.c.), i.e. he felt the need of subjecting afresh what he had provisionally set down in his own mind as true to the examina- tion of scepticism; and on the other hand, he did not doubt of arriving at a sure conviction respec- ting the ultimate end of life. [Ch. A. B. J.]

PHILON (Φιλον), the name of several physi- cians, whom it is almost impossible to distinguish with certainty.

1. A native of Tarsus in Cilicia, of whose date it can only be certainly determined that he lived in or before the first century after Christ, as Galen speaks of him as having lived sometime before his own age. He was the author of a celebrated an- tidote, called after his name Philonium, Φιλόνιων. He embodied his directions for the composition of this medicine in a short enigmatical Greek poem, preserved by Galen, who has given an explanation of it (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Loc. iv. 4, vol. xii. p. 267, &c.). This physician is supposed by Sprengel (Hist. de la Méd. vol. ii.) and others to have been the same person as the grammarian, Herennius Philon, but probably without sufficient reason. His antidote is frequently mentioned by the ancient medical writers, e. g. Galen (Ad Glau. de Meth. Med. ii. 8, vol. xi. p. 114, Comment. in Hippocr. “ Epid. VI.” vi. 5, vol. xvii. pt. ii. p. 331, De Compos. Medicam. sec. Loc. vii. 7, vol. xiii. p. 292, De Locis Affect. ii. 5, vol. viii. p. 84, De Meth. Med. xii. 1, vol. x. p. 818), Aretaeus (De Cur. Morb. Chron. ii. 5, p. 335), Paulus Aegineta (iii. 23, vii. 11, pp. 440, 657), Hippocrates (Orph. i. 47, pp. 94, 679), Aetius (iii. 4, 28, iii. 3, ii. 3, i. 1, 107, pp. 382, 478, 611, 660), Joannes Acturarius (De Meth. Med. v. 6, p. 263), Marcellus (De Medecin. cc. 20, pp. 529, 341), Alexander Trallianus (pp. 271, 577, ed. Basili.), Nicolaus Myrupees (De Compos. Medicam. i. 243, 383, pp. 412, 437), Avicenna (Canon. v. 1. vol. ii. p. 278, ed. Venet. 1595). This Philon may perhaps be the physician whose collyrium is quoted by Celsus (De Medico. vi. 6, p. 119).

2. The physician who is mentioned among several others by Galen (De Meth. Med. i. 7, vol. x. p. 53) as belonging to the sect of the Methodici, is perhaps a different person from the preceding, and must have lived some time in or after the first century n. c. He may, perhaps, be the contemporary of Plutarch, in the second century after Christ, who is intro- duced by him in his Syntomia (i. 6. 2, iv. 1. 1, vi. 2. 1, vili. 9. 1). He was of opinion that the disease called Elephantiasis first appeared shortly before his own time; but in this he was probably mistaken. See Jul. Alb. Hofmann's treatise, Rabbi Caninae ad Celsum usque Historia Critica, p. 53. (Lips. 8vo. 1526.)

A physician of this name is also mentioned by St. Epiphanius (adv. Haeresi. i. 1, 3); and a writer on metals, by Athenaeus (vii. p. 329). [W.A.G.]

PHILON (Φιλων), artists. 1. Son of Antipa- ter, a statesman who lived in the time of Alexander the Great, and made the statue of H epheastion. (Tatian. Ort. adv. Graec. 55, p. 121, ed. Worth). He also made the statue of Zeus Ouries, which stood on the shore of the Black Sea, at the en- trance of the Bosporus, near Chalcedon, and formed an important landmark for sailors. It was still perfect in the time of Cicero (in Verr. iv. 58), and the base has been preserved to modern times, bearing an inscription of eight elegant verses, which is printed in the works of Wheeler, Spon, and Chishull, and in the Greek Anthology (Brunck, Asal. vol. iii. p. 192; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. iv. p. 159; comp. Siliig, Catal. Artif. s. v.). Philon is mentioned by Pline among the statues who made athleteis et armatios et venatores sacrificantissce. (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 84).
2. A very eminent architect at Athens in the time of the immediate successors of Alexander. He built for Demetrius Phalerens, about b. c. 318, the portico of twelve Doric columns to the great temple at Eleusis. He also constructed for the Athenians, under the administration of Lycurgus, an armamentarium in the Peiraeus, containing arms for 1000 ships (Plin. H. N. vii. 37. s. 38). This work, which excited the greatest admiration (Cic. de Orat. i. 14; Strab. ix. p. 395, d.; Val. Max. viii. 12. ext. 2), was destroyed in the taking of Athens by Sulla. (Plut. Sulla, 14). He wrote works on the architecture of temples, and on the naval basin which he constructed in the Peiraeus. (Vitr. vii. Praef. § 12.)

3. A sculptor (Ἀθηναῦος), whose name appears on an inscription recently discovered at Delphi. (Ross, Inscr. Graec. Incid. Fasc. i. n. 73, p. 30; R. Rochette, Lettres à M. Schorr, p. 384, 2nd ed.)

4. An engraver of medals, whose name is seen on the front of the helmet of the head of Minerva, which is the type of several coins of Herculeia in Lucania. The letters are extremely minute, and the inscription is sometimes in the form ΦΙΛ, sometimes ΦΑΙ. (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorr, p. 94, 2nd ed.)

PHILONI/CUS, artists. 1. C. Cornelius, a Roman artist in silver, whose name occurs in an inscription found at Narbonne, FABER ARGENT. (Gruter, p. dxxxix. 5.) This inscription is one of several proofs that this branch of the art was diligently cultivated in Gaul under the early emperors. In other inscriptions we find mention made of Vastarit Argentarit, specimens of whose work are furnished by beautiful silver vases, which have been found in Gaul. (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorr, p. 385, 2nd ed.)

2. M. Canuleius, an artist, whose name occurs in an inscription (Gruter, p. xxv. 1), where he is designated as Geniarius, that is, a maker of little figures of genii. (R. Rochette, l. c.) [P. S.]

PHILONIDES (Φιλονίδης), an Athenian comic poet of the Old Comedy, who is, however, better known as one of the two persons in whose names Aristophanes brought out some of his plays, than by his own dramas. The information we have of him as a poet can be stated in a very few words; but the question of his connection with Aristophanes demands a careful examination.

Before becoming a poet, Philonides was either a fuller or a painter, according to the different texts of Suidas and Eudocius, the former giving γαρφαίος, the latter γαρφαί. Three of his plays are mentioned, Αὐπηκός, Κόδυρος, and Φιλατραίος (Suid. s. v.). The title of Κόδυρος would of itself lead us to suppose that it was an attack upon Themenes, whose party fickleness had gained him the well-known epithet Κόδυρος, and this conjecture is fully confirmed by the following passage of a grammarian (Bekker, Anecd. p. 100. 1): Ἐπαρκόντας τοῦ κλήρους Φιλατραίος Κόδυρος, where we ought no doubt to read Φιλανθρόπος, for no such play of Philemon is ever mentioned, but the Κόδυρος of Philonides, besides being mentioned by Suidas, is several times quoted by Athenaeus and other writers. The plural name of the title, Κόδυρος, is no doubt because the chorus consisted of persons of the character of Themenes. We have another example of that confusion between names beginning with Φιλ, which has been noticed under PHILEMON, in the fact that many fragments, which Stobaeus has preserved under the name of Philonides, are evidently from the New Comedy, and ought to be ascribed to Philemon or Phileippides. (Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. i. pp. 102—104, vol. ii. pp. 421—425; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 482.)

The other question respecting Philonides is one of very great importance in connection with the literary history of the Old Comedy in general, and of Aristophanes in particular. It is generally believed that Philonides was an actor of Aristophanes, who is said to have committed to him certain of his chief characters. But the evidence on which this statement is based is furnished by some of the best modern critics as leading to a very different conclusion, namely, that several of the plays of Aristophanes were brought out in the names of Callicrates and Philonides. This question has been treated of by such scholars as Ranke, C. F. Hermann, Fritzsch, Hanovius, W. Dindorf, and Droysen; but by far the most elaborate and satisfactory discussion of it is that by Theodor Bergk, prefixed to his edition of the fragments of Aristophanes, in Meineke's Fragmenta Comicorum Graecorum, vol. ii. pp. 902—939.

It must be remembered that, when a poet wished to exhibit a drama, he had first to apply to either the first or second archon for a chorus, his obtaining which depended on the opinion of the archon as to the merits of his play; and also that no small degree of personal and political influence was involved in the application to Callicrates and Aristophanes for a chorus. He could not, however, have succeeded in obtaining a chorus, if he had not encountered the proverbial capriciousness of an Athenian audience, whose treatment even of old favourites was, as Aristophanes complains, no small discouragement to a young candidate for their favour. In order to reduce the obstacles which a young poet found thus placed in his way upon the very threshold, two courses were customary: the candidate for dramatic honours either brought out in his own name the play of some popular poet, the intrinsic merit of which was sure to obtain a chorus, or else he availed himself of the reputation of a well-known poet by applying for a chorus in his name. The result was that by the former plan, which we know to have been adopted by the sons of Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Aristophanes, the young poet's name became known, and he could more easily hope to obtain a chorus for one of his own plays; and, in the latter case, the reception of his works would encourage him to appear again under his own name, or the contrary. There is, in fact, a passage of Aristophanes, which, if the figure be interpreted closely, would suggest the notion that it was customary for a young poet to pass through the following three stages: the first, assisting another poet in the composition of the less important passages of his plays (like the pupils of a great artist), as we know Epolus to have worked under Aristophanes in the Knights; then putting out his own dramas under the name of another poet, in order to see how the popular favour inclined; and lastly, producing them in his own name. These several stages are perhaps intimated by the phrases, ἥρεται γένεσθα, πρεπετλώσθα καὶ τοὺς ἄρχοντας διαβρόθησαι, καὶ θυρεοῦντας αὐτὸν τινα, in the passage alluded to (L. d. 341—343; Bergk, l. c. pp. 916, 917). In addition to the reasons just stated, there is a very common opinion, founded on the statement of a grammarian (Schol. in Aristoph. Nub. 530), that an express law forbad a poet to exhibit a drama in his own name while he was under thirty years of age; but Bergk has shown (L.c. pp. 906, 907) that this law is probably one of those innumerable ficitions of the commentators, who state as facts things which are simply the expression of their own notion of their author's meaning; for Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides are all known to have brought out plays in their own names while they were under thirty.

Now, in every case, the name enrolled in the public records was that of the person in whose name the chorus was applied for, whether he were the real author or not, and this is the name which appears in the Didascalia prefixed to a play under the form ἔβδαδχῦ διὰ Καλλιτράτου (Acharn.), or διὰ αὐτοῦ τοῦ Ἀριστοφάνου (Equit.). In fact, according to the original spirit of the institution, the chorus was the only essential part of a play, and the public functionaries knew nothing of the author as such, but only of the teacher of the chorus.

Now we can easily understand, when, a poet was wealthy and fond of enjoyment, he might choose to assign the laborious duty of training the chorus and actors to another person; and thus, besides the reasons already stated for a poet's using another's name at the commencement of his career, we see another ground on which he might continue that practice, after his reputation was established.

Now we learn from Aristophanes himself, to say nothing of other evidence, not only the fact that he brought out his early plays in the names of other poets, but also his reasons for so doing. In the Parabasis of the Knights (v. 514), he states that he had pursued this course, not from want of thought, but from a sense of the difficulty of his profession, and from a fear that he might suffer from that frankness of taste which the Athenians had shown towards other poets, as Magnes, Crates, and others. Again, in the Parabasis of the Clouds (v. 530), he expresses the same thing in the following significant language:

Καίγω, παρείσον γὰρ ἐτὶ ἡ, κοινῷ ἔποι ἑτοὶ τεκεῖν ἐξέφυγα, παῦ ἐμὲ εἰρέα τις λαβοῦν ἀνάλατο, where the last words evidently imply, if the figure is to be interpreted consistently, that the person in whose name he brought out the play referred to (the Daidalies) was another poet. It was evidently the word ἔποι in this passage that misled the scholiast into his fancy of a legal prohibition.

We must now inquire what light the ancient grammarians throw upon the subject. The author of the anonymous work, Περὶ κωμιδιᾶς, who is decidedly one of the best of these writers, states (p. xxiv.), that "Aristophanes first exhibited (ἐξήθε) in the archonship of Dionysus (b.c. 427), in the name of Callistratus (Σιὰ Καλλιτράτου); for his political comedies (τὰ πολιτικά) they say that he gave to him, but those against Euripides and Socrates to Philonides; and on account of this (first drama) being esteemed a good poet, he conquered on subsequent occasions (τῶν λυετών, sc. χρώμων), enrolling his own name as the author (ἐγγραφομένοις). Afterwards he gave his dramas to his son" (Araros). The play which he exhibited on this occasion was the Αὐταλαῖς (Ναύ. l. c. and Schol.). To the same effect another respectable grammarian, the author of the life of Aristophanes, tells us (p. xxxv.) that "being at first exceedingly cautious and otherwise clever, he brought out (καλεῖς, the regular word for bringing into a contest) his first dramas in the names of (Σιὰ) Callistratus and Philonides; wherefore he was ridiculed ... on the ground that he laboured for others; but afterwards he contended in his own name (αὐτὸς ἄνωτάς)." Here again the phrase "that he laboured for others" must imply that Callistratus and Philonides were poets.

Thus far all is clear and consistent. Aristophanes, from motives of modesty and caution, but not from any legal necessity, began to exhibit, not in his own name, but in that of Callistratus, and afterwards of Philonides. The success of these first efforts encouraged him to come forward as the avowed author of his plays; and again, towards the close of his life, he aided his son Araros, by allowing him to bring out some of his dramas (the Cocius for example) in his own name. But at the close of this very same Life of Aristophanes (p. xxxix) we find the error which we have to expose, but yet combined with truth as to the main fact, in the statement that "the author of Aristophanes were Callistratus and the Philonides, of whose names (Σιὰ ἀυτῆ) he exhibited his own dramas, the public (or political) ones (τὰ διοικοῦντα) in the name of Philonides, and the private (or personal) ones (τὰ διοικαῦντα) in that of Callistratus." It seems that the grammarian, though himself understanding the meaning of Σιὰ, copied the error into which some former writer had been led, by supposing that it referred to the actors: for, that it cannot have that sense in the passage before us, is obvious from the tautology which would arise from so translating it, and from the force of the ἀνευρεῖ, namely, "the actors of Aristophanes were Callistratus and Philonides, by whom as actors he exhibited his own dramas." We may, however, with great probability regard the passage as a later interpolation: how little credit is due to it is plain from the fact that the distribution of subjects in the last case of the latter with the testimony already cited, ready cited, nor with the information which we derive from the Didascaliae, as to the plays which were assigned respectively to Philonides and Callistratus. From the Didascaliae and other testimonies, we find that the Babylonians (b. c. 426) and the Acharnians (b. c. 425) were also brought out in the name of Callistratus; and that the first play which Aristophanes exhibited in his own name was the Knights, b. c. 424 (ἐβδαδχῦν ... Σιὰ αὐτοῦ τοῦ Ἀριστοφάνου, Didasc.). And hence the notion has been hastily adopted, that he henceforth continued to exhibit in his own name, until towards the close of his life, when he allowed Araros to bring out his plays. But, on the contrary, we find from the Didascaliae that he bought out the Birds (b. c. 414) and the Lysistrata (b. c. 411) in the name of Callistratus (Σιὰ Καλλιτράτου).

Thus far the testimonies quoted have only referred to Philonides in general terms: it remains to be seen what particular plays Aristophanes brought out in his name. From the above statements of the grammarians it might be inferred that Aristophanes used the name of Philonides in this manner before the composition of the Knights; but this is probably only a part of the error by which it was assumed that, from the time of his exhibiting the _Knights_, it was his constant custom to bring out his comedies in his own name. It is true that the scholiast on the passage from the Clouds, quoted above, in which the Daidaleis is referred to, explains the phrase παῖς ἔτρα παίς ἔτρα as meaning Φιλωνίδης καὶ Καλλιστράτως, and Dindorf, by putting together this passage and the above inference, imagines that the Daidaleis was brought out in the name of Philonides (Frag. Arist. Dact.) ; but the scholiast is evidently referring, not so much to the bringing out of this particular play (οὐ παῖς ἔτρα cannot mean two persons, nor were dramas ever brought out in more than one name) as to the practice of Aristophanes with respect to several of his plays. There is, therefore, no reason for the violent and arbitrary alteration of the words of the grammarians, who, as above quoted, expressly says that the play was exhibited διὰ Καλλιστράτου. There is, therefore, no evidence that Aristophanes exhibited under the name of Philonides previous to the date of the Knights; but that he did so afterwards we know on the clearest evidence. His next play, the Clouds (n. c. 423), we might suppose to have been brought out in the name of Philonides, on account of the statement of the grammarians, that Aristophanes assigned to him the plays against Socrates and Euripides, coupled with the known fact that the Frogs were exhibited in the name of Philonides; but, however this may be, we find that, in the following year, n. c. 422, Aristophanes brought out two plays, the Peace and the Wasps, both in the name of Philonides, and gained with them the first and second prize. This statement rests on the authority of the difficult and certainly corrupt passage in the Didascalia of the Wasps, into the critical discussion of which we cannot here enter, further than to give, as the result, the following amended reading, which is founded on the Ravenna MS., adopted both by Dindorf and Bergk, and of the correctness of which there can now hardly be a doubt: — ἐδιδάχθη ἐπὶ ἀρχοντος Ἀμυνίου διὰ Φιλωνίδην ἐν τῇ τῇ διάμαθι: β' (i.e. δυντέρων) ἢ, εἰς ἅρμια: καὶ ἐνεκτρι προσώς Φιλωνίδης Πραγμάτω, Ἀλέκων Πέρσεθείς γ' (i.e. τρίτως); from which we learn that the Wasps was exhibited at the Lenaea, in the 89th Olympiad, in the year of the Archon Amynias, under the name of Philonides, and that it gained the second place, the first being assigned to the Frogs, which was also exhibited in the name of Philonides, and which we know from other sources to have been a play of Aristophanes (see the Fragments), and the third to the Πράγματα of Lecon.*

In the year n. c. 414 we again find Aristophanes exhibiting two plays (though at different festivals), the Amphiaraurus, in the name of Philonides, and the Birds, in that of Callistratus (Arg. in Arc.); and, lastly, we learn from the Didascalia to the Frogs, that that play also was brought out in the name of Philonides. We thus see that Aristophanes used the name of Philonides, probably, for the Clouds (see Bergk, & c. pp. 918, 914), and certainly for the Wasps, the Peace, the Amphiaraurus, and the Frogs. The Daidaleis, the Babylo-

* Clinton (F. H. vol. ii. p. xxxviii, n. i.) gives a very good account of the extraordinary cases which have been founded on this passage; to which must be added his own, for, on the strength of a reading which cannot be sustained, he makes the passage mean that Aristophanes gained the first prize with the Wasps, and some poet, whose name is not mentioned, the second with the Peace.

These views are further supported by Bergk, in an elaborate discussion of all the passages in Aristophanes for which he bear upon the matter; which must be read by all who wish to master this important question, the literary history of Aristophanes.

There still remain, however, one or two questions which must not be passed over. Supposing it established, that Aristophanes brought out many of his plays in the names of Callistratus and Philonides, might they not also be the chief actors in those plays, and, if not, who and what were they? From what has been said in the early part of this article, a strong presumption may be gathered that the persons in whose names the dramas of others were exhibited were themselves poets, who had already gained a certain degree of reputation, but who, from advancing years, or for other reasons, might prefer this sort of literary partnership to the risk and trouble of original composition. Indeed, it would appear, on the face of the thing, an absurdity for a person, did not profess to be a poet, to enrol his name with the archon as the author of a drama, and to undertake the all-important office of training the performers. But we have the evidence of Aristophanes himself, that those in whose names he exhibited his dramas, were poets, like himself, θέραποι ποιηταί (Vesp. 1016; comp. Schol.): we have already seen that Philonides was a poet of the Old Comedy; and with reference to Callistratus, we have no other information to throw doubt on that contained in the above and other passages of Aristophanes and the grammarians.

The fact, that we have only three titles of plays by Philonides, and none by Callistratus, accords with the view that they were chiefly employed as διδασκαλοί of the plays of Aristophanes. We have seen, indeed, that one or two of the grammarians state that they were actors; but, with all the evidence on the other side, there can be little doubt that this statement has merely arisen from a mistake as to the meaning of the word διὰ in the Didascalia. That word has its recognized meaning in this connection, and no one hesitates to give it that meaning in the Didascalia of the earlier plays: there is no good authority for supposing it to designate the actor: the Didascalia were not designed to record the name of the actor, but that of the poet, whether real or professed; the terms διδασκαλοί, χοροδιδασκάλοι, καμώρθωνδιδασκάλοι, are used as precisely equivalent to ποιητής and καμώρθωνποιητής: and the notion of the χοροδιδασκάλος and the chief actor could be the same person involves the almost absurd idea of the chief actor's training himself. The common story about Aristophanes taking upon himself the part of the chief actor, as in the Knights, is shown by Bergk to be, in all probability, a mere fabrication of some grammarians, who mistook the meaning of ἐθύδαξ ζῇ αὐτῷ τοῦ Ἀριστοφάνου in the Didascalia; and there is no clear case, after the regular establishment of the PHILO'NONE (Φιλο'νόμη). 1. A daughter of Nycticus and Arcadia, and a companion of Artemis, became by Ares the mother of Lycastus and Parrhasius; but from fear of her father she threw her twin babes into the river Erymanthus. They were carried by the river-god into a hollow oak tree, where they were suckled by a she-wolf, until the shepherd Tythlius found them and took them home. (Plut. Paral. min. 36.)

PHILO'NOMUS (Φιλόνομος), a son of Elecorn and Aepixa. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 5; Strab. viii. pp. 364, 384; comp. Elecron.).

PHILO'PATOR (Φιλόπατρος). This name, which we find given as an epithet or distinctive appellation to several of the kings of Syria and Egypt, appears to have been borne as a proper name by two kings of Cilicia; at least no other is mentioned either by historians or on their coins.

PHILO'PATOR I. was a son of TARCONIMI-TOUS I. In common with his father he had espoused the cause of Antony during the civil war between the latter and Octavian, but on learning the tidings of the battle of Actium, and the death of Tarconditemus B. c. 31, he declared in favour of the conqueror. He was nevertheless deprived of his kingdom by Octavian, and we do not learn that he was subsequently reinstated, though in n. c. 20 we find his paternal dominions restored to his brother, Tarconditemus. (Dion Cass. li. 2, 7, liv. 8.)

PHILO'PATER II. is known only from the mention by Tacitus of his death in n. d. 17. (Tac. Ann. ii. 42.) Eckel supposes him to have been a son of Tarconditemus II., but it does not seem quite clear that he is distinct from the preceding, who may have been allowed to resume the sovereignty after his brother's death. (See, concerning these obscure princes of Cilicia, Eckel, vol. iii. p. 83; Walther, ad Tac. l. c.) [E. H. B.]

COIN OF PHILO'PATER.

PHILOPHRON (Φιλόφρον), a Rhodian, who was sent ambassador together with Thestetus to the ten Roman deputies appointed to settle the affairs of Asia after the defeat of Antiochus, n. c. 189. They succeeded in obtaining the assignment of Lycia to the Rhodians as a reward for their services in the late contest (Polyb. xxiii. 3). At the commencement of the war between Rome and Persia, the Rhodians were divided into two parties, the one disposed to favour the Macedonian king, the other to adhere closely to the Roman alliance. Philophrus was one of the principal leaders of the latter; and we find him (together with Thestetus) taking a prominent part in opposing all concessions to Persia. But though in n. c. 165 Cnemon and Philophrus were still able to send ambassadors to the Senate at Rome, as well as to the consul Q. Marcini, to renew and strengthen the friendly relations between the two powers, the ill success of the Roman arms in the ensuing campaign gave the preponderance to the Macedonian party, and the following year (n. c. 168) Philopon and Thesetetus were unable to prevent the favourable reception given to the ambassadors of Perseus and Gentius (Id. xxvii. 14, xxviii. 2, 14, xxix. 5). Embassies were then despatched by the Rhodians to the belligerent parties to endeavour to bring about a peace between them, a step which gave great offence to the Romans; and after the victory of Aemilius Paulus, Philopon was despatched in all haste to Rome, together with Astymedes, to deprecate the wrath of the senate. The ambassadors themselves were received with favour, but the delay was disastrous to the hopes of the succession of Caesari and Lycia, and compelled to withdraw their garrisons from Caria and Stratonicea. (Id. xxx. 4, 5, 19.)

PHILOPOEMEN (ΦΙΛΟΠΟΙΜΗΝ). I. Son of Craugas, of Megalopolis in Arcadia, was one of the few great men that Greece produced in the decline of her political independence. His contemporaries looked up to him as the greatest man of their day, and succeeding ages cherished his memory with deep veneration and love. Thus we find Pausanias saying (viii. 52. § 1), that Miltiades was the first, and Philopon the last benefactor to the whole of Greece, and an admiring Roman exclaimed, "that he was the last of the Greeks." (Plut. Philipp. 1). The great object of Philopon's life was to infuse among the Achaean a military spirit, and thereby to establish their independence on a firm and lasting basis. To this object he devoted all the energies of his mind; and he pursued it throughout his life with an enthusiasm and perseverance, which were crowned with far greater success than could have been anticipated, considering the times in which he lived. His predecessor Aratus, who was the founder of the Achaean league, was a man of little military ability, and had chiefly relied on negotiation and intrigue for the accomplishment of his objects and the extension of the power of the league. He had accordingly not cared to train a nation of soldiers, and had in consequence been more or less dependent upon Macedonian troops in his wars with Sparta and other enemies, thereby making himself and his nation to a great extent the subjects of a foreign power. Philopon, on the contrary, was both a brave soldier and a good general; and the possession of these qualities enabled him to make the Achaean league a really independent power in Greece.

Philopon was born about B. C. 252, since he was in his seventieth year at the time of his death in B. C. 183 (Plut. Philipp. 18). His family was one of the noblest in all Arcadia, but he lost his father, who was one of the most distinguished men at Megalopolis, at an early age, and was brought up by Cleander, an illustrious citizen of Mantinea, who had been obliged to leave his native city, and had taken refuge at Megalopolis, where he contracted an intimate friendship with Craugas. As Philopon grew up, he received instruction from Eclemus and Demophanes (called Eclemus and Megalophanes in Pausanias, viii. 49. § 2), both of whom had studied the Academic philosophy under Arcesilaus, and had taken an active part in expelling the tyrants from Megalopolis and Sicyon, as well as in other political events of their time. Under their teaching and guidance Philopon became a brave, virtuous, and energetic youth. He early proposed to himself Epaminondas as his model; but though he succeeded in imitating the activity and contempt of riches of his great model, his veneration of temper prevented him from obtaining the amiable manners and winning temper which characterised the Theban. From his earliest years Philopon showed a great fondness for the use of arms, and took great pleasure in all warlike exercises. As soon as he had reached the age of military service, he eagerly engaged in the incursions into Laconis, which were then frequently made, and in these he greatly distinguished himself, being the first to march out and the last to return. When employed in war, he divided his time between the cultivation of public business, the cultivation of his estate, and the study of philosophy and literature. After spending part of the day in the city, he usually walked to an estate which he had about two or three miles from Megalopolis, where he slept, and rose early to work at the farm, after which he returned again to the city. His studies were chiefly directed to the art of war, and his favourite books were the Tactics of Evangelus, and the History of Alexander's campaigns.

The name of Philopon first occurs in history in B. C. 222, when he was thirty years of age. In that year Cleomenes, king of Sparta, the great enemy of the Achaean league, seized Megalopolis, and laid it in ruins. The Spartans surprised Megalopolis in the night, and took possession of the market-place before the alarm had become general among the inhabitants. As soon as it became known that the Spartans were in the vicinity, the citizens fled towards Messene; but Philopon and a few kindred spirits offered a gallant resistance to the enemy, and their determined and desperate valor gave such employment to the Spartans, as to enable the citizens to escape in safety. Early in the following spring, B. C. 221, Antigonus, the Macedonian king, came down into the Peloponnesus to the assistance of the Achaeans. Eager to revenge his country, Philopon joined him with a thousand foot and a body of horse, which Megalopolis placed under his command, and at the head of which he fought in the celebrated battle of Sellasia, in which Cleomenes was utterly defeated, and by which peace was for a time restored to Greece. The successful issue of this battle was mainly owing to the courage and abilities of Philopon, who had charged at the head of the Megapolitan cavalry without orders, and had thus saved one wing of the enemy from defeat. The horse of Philopon was killed under him, but he continued to fight on foot, and did not leave the field even when both his sides had been struck through with a javelin. His conduct in this battle at once conferred upon Philopon the greatest reputation. Antigonus was anxious to take him into his service, and offered him a considerable command; but this he declined, as he still hoped to secure the independence of his country, and was unwilling to become the servant of a foreign power. But as there was no longer any war in Greece, and he was desirous of acquiring additional military experience, he set sail for Crete, where war was then raging between the cities of Nisos and Lyttus. Nisos was supported by the Aetolians, and Philopon accordingly espoused the side of Lyttus, and accessed in securing the supremacy for the latter city. Of the history of his exploits in Crete, we are not informed; but we know that he added to his military reputation by his foreign campaigns, and accordingly on his return to his native country, in B.C. 210, he was at once appointed commander of the Achaean cavalry. He immediately introduced great reforms into this branch of the service, which, as well as the rest of the Achaean army, was in a miserable condition. Instead of allowing the wealthy citizens to send ineffective substitutes, he induced the young men of the higher class to serve in person, and by his personal influence and his judicious training soon formed them into an effective and well-disciplined body. At the head of his cavalry, Philopoemen accompanied Philip in his expedition against Elis, and, as usual, distinguished himself by his bravery. In an engagement near the borders of Elis and Achaea, he slew the Elean commander Demophonatus with his own hand.

In B.C. 208, Philopoemen was elected strategist, or general of the Achaean league. The reforms which he had introduced with so much success in the cavalry, encouraged him to make still greater changes in the main body of the Achaean army. He discontinued the use of the light arms which the Achaean soldiers had hitherto used, and substituted in their place heavy armour, long spears, and large shields; at the same time he trained them in the Macedonian tactics, and accustomed them to the close array of the phalanx. The influence which he had acquired over his countrymen was now so great that he infused into them all a martial spirit, and led them to display in their arms and military equipments that love of pomp and splendour, which had been formerly exhibited in their furniture and private dwellings. There never was seen a more striking instance of the power of a master mind; in the course of a few months he transformed a luxurious people into a nation of soldiers, confident in their general, and eager to meet the foe. The Achaean were at that time at war with Machanidas, tyrant of Lacedaemon; and after eight months' careful training Philopoemen advanced against the enemy. Machanidas entered Aetolia, expecting to ravage it, as usual, without opposition; but upon reaching Tegae he was equally pleased and surprised to hear that the Achaean army was drawn up at Mantinea. He accordingly hastened forward, in full expectation of a complete victory. The battle was fought in the neighbourhood of Mantinea; the Spartans were utterly defeated, and Machanidas fell by the hand of Philopoemen himself. [MACHANIDAS.] This last victory raised the fame of Philopoemen to its highest point; and in the Nemean festival, which next followed, being a second time general of the league, he was hailed by the assembled Greeks as the liberator of their country. He had now to a great extent rendered the Achaean independent of Macedon, and had therefore incurred the displeasure of Philip; but upon reaching Aenus he attempted to remove him by assassination, as he had Aratus; but his treachery was discovered in time, and brought down upon him the hatred and contempt of the Greeks.

The battle of Mantinea secured peace to the Peloponnesus for a few years, and accordingly Philopoemen disappears from history for a short time. Meantime Nabis, who succeeded Machani-PHILOPOEMEN.

After ravaging Laconia un molested for thirty days, Philopoemen returned home covered with glory, and was received by his countrymen with so much applause and distinction as to give umbrage to Flamininus, who did not feel flattered by the par- allels that were drawn between him and Philo- poemen. Shortly after these events Nabis was slain by the Aetolians. Philopoemen thereupon hastened to Sparta, which he found in a state of great confusion, and partly by force, partly by persuasion, made the city join the Achaean league.

The state of Greece did not afford Philopoemen much further opportunity for the display of his military abilities. He had been obliged to relinquish his fond dream of making the Achaean a really independent power; for the Romans were now in fact the masters of Greece, and Philopoemen clearly saw that it would be an act of madness to offer open resistance to their authority. At the same time he perceived that there was a mean be- tween servile submission and actual war; and as the Romans still recognised in words the inde- pendence of the league, Philopoemen offered a re- solute resistance to all their encroachments upon the liberties of his country, whenever he could do so without affording the Romans any pretext for war. The remainder of Philopoemen's life was chiefly spent in endeavours of this kind, and he accordingly became an object of suspicion to the Roman senate. It was in pursuance of this policy that we find Philopoemen advising the Achaeeans to remain quiet during the war between Antiochus and the Romans in Greece; and when Diophanes, who was general of the league in B.C. 191, eagerly and unreasonably engaged in some disturbances in Sparta to make war upon the city, and was encouraged in his purpose by Flamininus, Philopoemen, after he had in vain endeavoured to persuade him to con- tinue quiet, hastened to Sparta, and by his private influence healed the divisions that had broken out there; so that when the Achaean army arrived before the gates, Diophanes found no pretext for interfering. The Spartans were so grateful for the services which he had rendered them on this oc- casion, that they offered him a present of a hundred and twenty talents, which he at once declined, bidding them keep it for the purpose of gaining over bad men to their side, and not attempt to corrupt with money good men who were already their friends.

In B.C. 189 Philopoemen was again elected general of the league. He introduced in this year a change of some importance in the constitution of the league, by transferring the place of assembly from Aegium, which had hitherto possessed this privilege exclusively, to the other cities of the league in rotation. This innovation was intended to deprive the old Achaean towns of their exclusive privileges, and to diffuse the power more equally among the other cities of the league. Meantime, fresh disturbances had broken out at Sparta. The party there which had shown itself so grateful to Philopoemen was probably the one which he had placed at the head of affairs when he annexed Sparta to the league; but the great body of the inhabitants, who had been established in the place by Nabis and the other tyrants, were opposed to Philopoemen and the league. They especially dreaded lest by Philopoemen's influence the tyrants should be restored, who had been expelled by the tyrants, and whose property they held at present. This party now obtained the upper hand, put to death thirty of Philopoemen's friends, and re- nounced their connection with the league. As soon as the Achaeanas heard of these proceedings, they declared war against Sparta; and both Achaeanas and Spartans laid their case before the Roman consul Fulvius Nobilior, who was then at Elia. Fulvius commanded them to send an emb- assy to Rome, and to abstain from war till they should learn the pleasure of the senate. The senate gave them an evasive answer, which the Achaeanas interpreted as a permission to prosecute the war. They accordingly re-elected Philopoemen general in B.C. 188. He forthwith marched against Sparta, which was unable to resist his forces, and took the city by a sudden sally. The way in which he treated the unhappy city is a blot upon the memory of Philopoemen, and was a vi- olation of those prudent principles which he had hitherto recommended, and had always acted upon himself; since his conduct gave the Romans a further pretext for interfering in the affairs of Greece. But his passions were roused by the recent execution of his friends, and he could not resist the opportunity of exacting from Sparta ample vengeance for all the wrongs she had for- merly inflicted upon Megalopolis. He put to death eighty of the leading men in Sparta, commanded all the inhabitants who had received the franchise from the tyrants to leave the country by a certain day, razed the walls and fortifications of the city, abolished the institutions of Lyceurgus, and com- pelled the citizens to adopt the Achaean laws in their stead. The exiles were likewise restored; and those whom citizens, whom and not left in the city by the day specified, were apprehended and sold as slaves, and the money arising from their sale was employed in building a colonnade at Megalopolis, which had been in ruins since the destruction of the city by Cleomenes. Philopoemen despatched Nicodemus to Rome to justify his con- duct, but the senate expressed their disapprobation of his measures; and Q. Caecilius Metellus, who was sent on a mission into Greece in B.C. 183, cen- sured still more strongly the treatment which Sparta had experienced.

In B.C. 183 Philopoemen was elected general of the league for the eighth time; it is probable that he held the office for the seventh time in B.C. 187, though it is not expressly mentioned (comp. Clini- ton, F. H. ad ann. 187). Philopoemen was now seventy years of age, and was lying sick of a fever at Argos, when he heard that Deinocrates, who was a personal enemy of his, and who was secretly supported by Flamininus, had induced Messene to dissolve its connection with the league. Notwithstanding his illness, he immediately has- tened to Megalopolis, hastily collected a body of cavalry, and pressed forward to Messene. He fell in with Deinocrates, whom he attacked and put to flight; but a fresh body of Messenian troops having come up, he was obliged to retire, and while he was keeping in the rear in order to protect the retreat of his troops, he was stunned by a fall from his horse, and fell into the hands of the Messenians. Deinocrates had him dragged into Messene with his hands tied behind his back, and afterwards exposed him to the public gaze in the theatre; but perceiving that the people began to feel sympathy at his misfortunes, he hurried him into a narrow dungeon, and on the second night after his capture, sent an executioner to him with a cup of poison, which Philoponos drank off calmly, after inquiring whether Lycortas and the cavalry had reached Megalopolis in safety.

Such was the unworthy end of this great man, who died in the same year as his great contemporaries Hannibal and Scipio. The news of his death filled the whole of Peloponnesus with grief and rage. An assembly was immediately held at Megalopolis; Lycortas was chosen general, and invaded Messenia in the following year with the flower of the Achaean troops burning for revenge. Messenia was laid waste far and wide, and Deinocrates and the chiefs of his party were obliged to put an end to their lives. The body of Philoponos was burnt with great pomp, and his remains were conveyed to Megalopolis in solemn procession. The urn which contained the ashes was carried by the historian Polybius, and was received by his grateful fellow-citizens with the bitterest sorrow. His remains were then interred at Megalopolis with heroic honours; and soon afterwards statues of him were erected in most of the towns belonging to the Achaean league. (Plutarch, Life of Philoponos; Polyb. ii. 40, x. 24, 25, xi. 8—10, xvi. 30, xxii. 23, xxiii. i, 2, 9, 10, xxxv. 5, 9, 12; Liv. xxxvi. 25, 29, 36, xxxviii. 31—34, xxxix. 49—52, fol. 49, 51; these four chapters are the most important; see also iv. 29, vii. 9, viii. 27, § 15; Thirwall, History of Greece, vol. viii. pp. 191, &c., 263, &c.)

2. The father of Monima, whom Mithridates the Great married. [Monima.]

3. A freedman of T. Vinius, and consequently called T. Vinius Philoponos, assisted Tusnus, the wife of Vinius, in saving the life of her husband when he was proscribed by the triumvirs. As a reward for his fidelity, Augustus afterwards raised Philoponos to the equestrian rank. In Appian he is erroneously called Philemon (Suet. Aug. 27; Dion Cass. xlvii. 7; Appian, B. C. iv. 44).

PHILOPONUS, JOANNES (Ἰωάννης ὁ Φιλόπων), or JOANNES GRAMMATICOΣ (Ἰωάννης Γραμματίκος), an Alexandrine scholar of great renown, which he deserved but little on account of his extreme dullness; yet of good sense, was called Φιλόπων because he was one of the most laborious and studious men of his age. He lived in the seventh century of our era; one of his writings, Physica, is dated the 10th of May, a.D. 617. He calls himself γραμματικός, undoubtedly because he taught grammar in his native town, Alexandria, and would in earlier times have been called rhetor. He was a disciple of the philosopher Ammonius. Although his renown is more based upon the number of his learned productions, and the estimation in which they were held by his contemporaries, than upon the intrinsic value of those works, he is yet so strangely connected with one of the most important events of his time, though only through subsequent tradition, that his name is extant. He handed down to future generations. We allude to the capture of Alexandria by Amru in a.d. 639, and the pretended confiscation of the famous Alexandrine library. It is in the first instance said that Philoponos adopted the Mohammedan religion on the city being taken by Amru, whence he may justly be called the last of the pure Alexandrian grammarians. Upon this, so the story goes, he requested Amru to grant him the possession of the celebrated library of Alexandria. Having informed the absent khalif Omar of the philosopher's wishes, Amru received for answer that if the books were in conformity with the Koran, they were useless, and if they did not agree with it, they were to be condemned, and sought in both cases to be destroyed. Thus the library was burnt. We now know, however, that this story is most likely only an invention of Abu-l-faraj, the great Arabic writer of the 13th century, who was however a Christian, and who, at any rate, was the first who ever mentioned such a thing as the burning of the Alexandrine library. We consequently dismiss the matter, referring the reader to the 51st chapter of Gibbon's "Decline and Fall." It is extremely doubtful that Philoponos became a Mohammedan. His favourite authors were Plato and Aristotle, whence his tendency to heresy, and he was either the founder or one of the first and principal promoters of the sect of the Triteists, which was condemned by the council of Constantinople of 681. The time of the death of Philoponos is not known. The following is a list of his works: — 1. Τῶν εἰς τὴν Μυσίαν κοσμωγονῶν ἐξήγησις λόγου Σ. Commentarii in Moseos Cosmogonioum, lib. viii., dedicated to Sergius, patriarch of Constantinople, who held that see from 610 to 639, and perhaps from 639 to 641, as well as when bishop of Latine by Balthasar Corderius, Venice, 1630, 4to. The editor was deficient in scholarship, and Lambecius promised a better edition, which, however, has not appeared. Photius (Bibl. cod. 75) compares the Cosmogonia with its author, and forms no good opinion of either. 2. Disputatio de Paschale, "ad alem Cosmogoniae," by the same editor. 3. 2. Of Cyrene, an Alexandrian writer of history and geography, the friend or disciple of Callimachus, flourished under Ptolemy II. Philadelphus, about n. c. 249 (Ath. viii. p. 351, d.). We have quotations from the following works of his: Περὶ παραδόχον ποιησιων (Ath. l. c.), Περὶ τῶν ἐν τῇ Ἀσίᾳ πόλεων (Ath. vii. p. 297, c.), Περὶ νήσων (Harpor. s. v. Στράβων; Schol. ad Apollon. Ithol. i. 1242; Schol. ad Lycophr. 447, 566), of which work a history of Cyprus formed a part (Clem. Alex. Prototyp. p. 17; Siebelis, Phanomedi Frag. p. 70); τὰ ιερουσαικά (Harpor. s. v. Βούχερα); Περὶ εὐριμάχων (Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 133. s. 308; Plin. ii. N. vii. 56. s. 57); and an historical work, the title of which is not specified. (Plut. Lyce. 25.)

To the above citations several others might be added, but all the extant titles of the writings of Philostephanus have been mentioned. Some writers identify him with the comic poet; whether rightly or not can hardly be determined (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 130, n.; vol. iii. p. 314; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 129, ed. Westermann; Clinton, F. H. s. a. 249.)

3. A poet of Mantinea, whose hymns are quoted by Ptolemy, the son of Hephaestion, but of whom nothing further is known. (Phot. Bibl. Cod. 190, p. 148. 41, ed. Bekker.) [P. S.] PHILOSTORGIUS (Φιλοστόργιος), an ecclesiastical historian. He was a native of Borissus in Cappadocia, the son of Carterius and Eulampia. He was born in the reign of Valentinian and Valens in A. D. 353, according to Godefredus (Prolog. ad Philost. p. 5, &c.), according to A. d. 367, according to Vossius (de Hist. Gr. p. 314). He was 20 years old when Eunomus was expelled from Cesarea (Eunomius). Like his father Caronius, he warmly embraced the doctrines of Eunomius. He wrote an ecclesiastical history, from the heresy of Arius in A. D. 300, down to the period when Theodosius the Younger conferred the empire of the West on Valentinian the Younger (A. D. 425).

The work was composed in twelve books, which began respectively with the twelve letters of his name, so as to form a sort of acrostic. In this history he lost no opportunity of extolling the Arians and Eunomians, while he overwhelmed the orthodox party with abuse, with the single exception of Gregorius of Nazianzus. Photius charges him with introducing gross misrepresentations and unfounded statements, and says that his work is not a history, but a panegyric upon the heretics. Philostorgius nevertheless was a man of learning, and was possessed of considerable geographical and astronomical knowledge. Being a heretic, it is not to be wondered at that this work has not come down to us. A few fragments of it, however, were made by Photius in a separate work, which has been preserved. Photius characterizes him as being elegant in his style, making use of figurative expressions, though not in excess. His figures were, however, sometimes harsh and far-fetched, and his narrative involved and indistinct. (Phot. Bibl. cod. x.) The abstract of Photius was published at Geneva in 1643 by Jac. Godefoi, or Godefreus, and in a somewhat corrected form, with a new Latin translation by H. Valesius (Paris, 1673), together with the ecclesiastical history of Theodoritus, Evagrius and Theodorus; also by Reading, Cantab. 1720. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vii. p. 420, &c.; Voss. de Hist. Gr. p. 313, &c.; Scholl, Gesch. der Griech. Lit. vol. iii. p. 313.) [C. P. M.] PHILOSTORGIUS (Φιλοστόργιος), a physician in the time of Valentinian and Valens, in the latter half of the fourth century after Christ. He was the father of Philagrius and Posidonius, and is said to have been the chief physician of his name. (Philostorg. Hist. Eccles. viii. 10.) [W. A. G.] PHILOSTRATUS (Φιλόστρατος) historical. 1. An Athenian, who seems to have followed the infamous trade of a brothel-keeper. He is satirized by Aristophanes, who calls him κυκλωμάτης, a cross between a dog and a fox. (Arist. Eq. 1064, Lys. 957.)

2. Of Colonus, is mentioned by Demosthenes (c. Meid. p. 535) as the bitterest accuser of Chabrias, in the famous trial about the loss of Oropus, b. c. 366. [Callistratus, No. 3; Chabrias.] He appears to have been the same person who is spoken of in the oration against Neaira (p. 1332) as a friend, when a young unmarried man, of Lyssias the sophist, who probably should not be identified with the celebrated orator of the same name.
Whether the accuser of Chabrias was also the maternal grandfather and adoptive father of Phae-nippas is a doubtful point. (Dein. c. Phaeon. pp. 1045, 1047.)

3. The father of Polemon the philosopher. (Diog.
Lier. iv. 16.)

4. A Rhodian, who commanded a quinquereme with great bravery and distinction in the battle of Chios, in which Attalus I. and the Rhodians defeated Philip V. of Macedon in b. c. 201.
(Polyb. xvi. 5.)

5. An Epeiroit, who in b. c. 170 engaged in a plot for seizing A. Hostilius, the Roman consul, on his way through Epeirus into Thessaly, and delivering him up to Persians. The design would probably have succeeded, had not Hostilius changed his route, and, having sailed to Anticyra, made his way thence into Thessaly. In the following year we find Philostratus co-operating successfully in Epeirus with Clevas, the Macedonian general, against Appius Claudius. (Polyb. xxvii. 14; Liv. xliii. 23.)

6. A Rhodian athlete, who in b. c. 68 bribed his competitor at the Olympic games to allow him the opportunity to win, and was punished for it by a fine. (Paus. v. 21.)

PHILOSTRATUS. (Φιλόστρατος), literary.
Suidas (a. e.) mentions three of this name. 1. According to him the first was the son of Verus, and lived in the time of Nero. He practised rhetoric at Athens, and in addition to several rhetorical works, wrote forty-three tragedies and thirteen comedies, besides treatises entitled Γυναικοτοι, Νέρωνα, Σελένη (which Menius thinks should be written Νέρωνα Σελένη), περὶ ῥαγιδίων, λατογνωμικών, Πρωτάκα. We shall reserve further notice of him till we come to speak of the third Philostratus.

2. The most celebrated of the Philostratii is the biographer of Apollonius. The distribution of the various works that bear the name has occupied the attention and divided the opinions of the ablest critics, as may be seen by consulting Vossius (de Hist. Graec. p. 279, ed. Westermann), Meursius (Dissert. de Philostrato, apud Philostrato, ed. Olearius,
v. xxv. &c.), Donius (de Script. Hist. Phil. iii. 14.
3), Filileth (Histoire des Empereurs, vol. i.
86, &c.), Fabricius (Bibb. Graec. vol. pp. 540, &c.), and theprefaces of Olearius and Kayser to their editions of the works of the Philostrati.
At the very outset there is a difference regarding the name. The Φίλοστρατος of Plutarch, the praenomen of Plutarch, which we find nowhere else except in Tzetzes. In the title to his letters he is called an Athenian. Eunapius (Vit. Soph. proem.) calls him a Lemnian, so does Synesius (Vit. Dion.). Photius (Bibl. Cod. 44.) calls him a Tyrian. Tzetzes
(Ch. vi. Hist. 45). has these words—

Φιλόστρατος ὁ Φιλόστρατος ὁ Τύραννος ὁ Θεοφανός, ἂν ἠγείρῃ, ἂλλος ἐστὶν ὁ Ἀττικός, where by reading ἂλλος, we might lessen the difficulty. The best means of settling the point is by consulting the author himself; and here we find no difficulty. He spent his youth, and was probably born in Lemnos (Vit. Ap. vi. 27), hence the surname of Lemnus. He studied rhetoric tounder Proclus, whose school was at Athens (V. S.

ii. 21), and had opportunities of hearing, if he was not actually the pupil of some of the foremost rhetoricians and sophists of his time (V. S. ii. 23.
§§ 2, 3, 27. § 3.) If we may believe Suidas (a. e.
Φιλόστρατος), Fronton was his rival at Athens, and probably Apsines, who also was opposed to Fronton, and of whom Philostratus speaks (V. S. ii.
33, § 4) as his intimate friend, was his colleague.
It is true that Suidas speaks of this Philostratus as τὸ πρώτος, but the time, that of Severus, fixes it to be Philostratus the biographer. As he was listed Lemnus from his birth-place, so on his arrival from Rome at Athens, or while teaching there, he was called Atheniensis, to distinguish him from his younger namesake. The account given by Suidas of his having been alive in the time of the emperor Philip (A. D. 244—249), tallies precisely with what we find written in his own works. Clinton conjectures the time of his birth to be A. D. 182 (Fast. Rom. p. 257), but this seems too late a period, and we may fix on A. D. 172 as not improbable. We have no notice of the time of his removal from Athens to Rome, but we find him
a member of the circle (ἐκθλον) of literary men, rhetoricians especially, whom the philosophic Julia Domna, the wife of Severus, had drawn around her. (V. Ap. i. 3.) It was at her desire that he was called the life of Apollonius. From the manner in which he speaks of her, τοὺς βραχυκότας πάνω λόγους άπεριεῖ, καὶ προκάλεσε, and the fact that he do not dedicate the work to his patroness, it may safely be inferred that she was dead when he finished the life; she died A. D. 217. That the work was written in Rome is rendered probable, from his contrasting the sudden descent of night in the south of Spain, with its gradual approach in Gaul, and in the place where he is writing, ἐσταθεία. (V. Ap. v. 3.) That the same person was the author of Apollonius and the lives of the sophists, a fact which we have hitherto assumed, appears from the following facts. He distinctly affirms (V. Ap. v. 2) that he had been in Gaul.
The writer of the lives of the sophists had also been in Gaul; for he mentions the mirth which the language of the sophist Heliodorus to the emperor Caracalla, while in Gaul (A. D. 213), had occasioned him. (V. S. ii. 52.) This is confirmed when (V. S.
ii. 5) he refers his reader to his work on Apolonius as well known. (V. S. ii. 5.) He states that he wrote these lives while Aspasius was still Teaching in Rome, being far advanced in years.
(V. S. ii. 33, § 4.) Besides, he dedicates them to a consul named Antonius Gordianus, a descendant of Herodes Atticus, with whom he had conduced to Antioch concerning the sophists. This Gordianus, Fabricius supposes to have been Gordianus III. who was consul A. D. 239 and 241.
(Bibl. Graec. vol. p. 532.) But to this Clinton justly objects, that not only would the dedication in that case have borne the title αὐθαναμένωρ instead of άπεριεῖ, but Gordian, who in A. D. 239 was only in his 14th year, was too young to have had any such conversation as that referred to. (Fast. Rom.
p. 255.) It may have been one of the other Gordianus, who were conspicuous for their consuls.
(Jul. Capit. Corin. c. 4.) As they were slain
A. D. 238, the lives must have been written prior to this event. And as Aspasius did not settle in Rome till A. D. 255 (Clinton, F. R. P. 245) the lives of the sophists were probably written about A. D. 237.

Before proceeding to particularize those of his works which have come down to us, it may be more convenient to speak of their general object

v 2

and style. In all of them, except the lives of the sophists, Philostratus seems to have intended to illustrate the peculiar manner in which the teachers of rhetoric were in the habit of treating the various subjects that came before them. They amplified, ornamented, and imitated without regard to historical truth, but solely as a species of gymnastics, which trained the mental athlete to be ready for any exertion in disputation or speaking, to which he might be called. In the time of Philostratus, the sphere was circumscribed enough in which sophists and rhetoricians (and it is to be observed that he makes no distinction between them) could dispute with safety; and hence arises his choice of themes which have no reference to public events or the principles of political action. That he was intimately acquainted with the requirements of style as suited to different subjects, is proved by his critical remarks on the writings of his brother sophists. One illustration will suffice. While writing of the younger Philostratus, he says (V. S. ii. 33. § 5), "The letter written by Philostratus on the art of epistolary correspondence is aimed at Aspasius; for having been appointed secretary to the emperor (Maximin), some of his letters were more declamatory and controversial (ἀγωνιστικάτε- ποιον) than was becoming, and others were deficient in perspicuity. Both these characteristics were unbecoming a prince; for whenever an emperor writes, on the one hand the mere expression of his will is all that is required, and not elaborate reasoning (ἐνθυμημάτων αὐτος ἐπιχειρήσεων), and on the other perspicuity is absolutely necessary; for he pronounces the law, and perspicuity is the law's interpreter." And in the introduction to his Elæus, he makes an express distinction between the man who "σοφίζεσθαι, and him who inquires seriously regarding the origin of the art of painting.

We may infer besides, from an expression in this introduction, where, speaking of painting, he says of it, παπάσιος σοφίζεσθαι, that in his view the profession of a sophist extended to all kinds of embellishment that required and exhibited invention and the power of pleasing by mere manner. The idea ingeniously stated by Kayser (Proef. ad Oper. Phil. p. vi.), that it was also his aim to restore to Greece her ancient vigour, by holding up bright examples of her past glories, does not seem to be borne out by his works. As to his style, it is characterized by exuberance and great variety of expression. It is sufficiently clear except when he has recourse to irregularities of construction, to which he is somewhat prone, in addition to semi-poetical phrases and archaisms, which he employs without scruple. And as he undoubtedly intended to exemplify various modes of writing, we have in his Histories representations of every species of anomaly, which are apt to perplex, till this peculiarity be understood. He is at the same time well versed in the works of the orators, philosophers, historians, and poets of Greece, many of whose expressions he incorporates with his own, especially Homer, Herodotus, Xenophon, Euripides, Pindar, and Demosthenes.

The following is a list of the works of Philostratus:

1. The Life of Apollonius of Tyana. A full account of this work, which has principally rendered Philostratus distinguished, is given under Apollonius. [Vol. I. p. 242, &c.] It is divided into eight books, and bears the title Τὰ ἐς τῷ

Τωνικὰ Ἀπολλώνων. In composing it, he seems at first to have followed Herodotus as his model, though however he forsakes as he gets into those parts where he finds an opportunity to be more rhetorical, as in the appearance of Philostratus before Domitian (vii. 7). Kayser (ibid. p. viii.) thinks that in the latter part he had Thucydidies in his eye, but Xenophont seems rather to have been his model.

It would be endless to enumerate all the works that have been written in whole or in part regarding this life of Apollonius. An examination or notice of them will be found in the prefaces of Olaricius and of Kayser. The work itself was first published by Aldus, 1502, Venice, fol., with a Latin translation by Alemannus Htinuccianus, and along with it a life of the Contide, Eutychius, contr. Hieroclem. The other editions having this work contain the whole works of Philostratus, as will be mentioned afterwards.

The life of Apollonius (with a commentary by Artus Thomas) was translated into French by Blaise de Vigenere, 1596, 2 vols. 4to., and repeatedly republished, the translation being revised and corrected by Fed. Morel, one of the editors of Philostratus (Baye, art. Apo-lonius Tyanaeus). A translation of the two first books, with notes professedly philological, but only partly so, and partly containing a commentary of bitter infidelity, was published in London, 1680, fol. The translation, and probably the philological notes, both of which evince much reading but not accurate scholarship, are by Charles Blount, whose treacly end is told by Bayle (l. c.). The other notes were partly derived, it is said, from a manuscript of Lord Herbert. This translation was prohibited with severe penalties, in 1693, but was twice reprinted on the Continent, and at length, probably considered as a "treasonable" book, was given to the public by the Duke of Berwick, 1725, 2 vols. 8vo. The authorized translation was that of Benger, published in London, 1690, fol. II. The Lives of the Sophists (Bía Σοφίτων). This work bears the following title in its dedication in the best MSS. — τῶν λαμπρῶτα τῶν ἀντώνος Γρονισίων Φιλόστρατον. Of Antonius Gordianus mention has been already made. The author states the object of his book to be two-fold—to write the history of philosophers who had the character of being sophists, and of those who were par excellence (εὐπλοῖος) sophists. This distinction, which is well marked by Synesius (in Vita Dionis.), was first pointed out in more recent times by the acute Perizonius (in his preface to Aelian, V. H. ed. Gronov. 1731, p. 48, &c.), and is essential to elucidate the chronology of the Lives. In his Proemion Philostratus makes an instructive distinction between the philosophers and the sophists. Philostratus' art takes its grounds for granted, and embellishes without investigation. The former he compares to the knowledge of the former, and the second, as the books and the characters carved from the observation of the stars, the latter to the divine afflictus of the oscular tripods. Again, in the history of this art, he has two periods, characterized by their subjects. The sophists of the first period discussed such subjects as courage, justice, divine and human, and cosmogony; the second presented lively representations of the rich and the poor, and in general individualized more the subjects presented by history. In this respect the sophists seem to have borne to philosophers much the same relation that, in modern times, historical fiction does to history. He also states that the main distinction of a sophist was the power which he had over language, and discusses, in conne-with this, the introduction of extemporaneous eloquence. Suidas states that this work is composed of four books, but this must be a mistake, as we have only two. Nor have two books been lost, for not only does Philostratus bring down the history to his own times, but in the dedication he expressly mentions two books, as comprising the whole work. Of course, we have not, in a biography expressly authentic, the embellishments which we find in the life of Apollonius. The best description that can be given of them is that of Eunapius (Vit. Soph. p. 5), that Philostratus has written the lives of the most distinguished sophists, without minuteness and gracefulness (θεία οἰκίας μετὰ χάρτου). Olearius, following the suggestion of Perizonius, and attending to the distinction made by Philostratus between the oldest and the more recent schools of rhetoric, with great propriety divides the Lives into three parts, of which the first is the shortest, and contains mere notices, in most cases, of the sophistic philosophers, beginning with Endooxus of Cnidus, b. c. 366, and ending with Dion Chrysostom and Favorinus, a contemporary of Herodes Atticus, on whom he dwells a little more fully—eight lives in all. He then begins with the sophists proper of the old school, commencing with Gorgias (born about b. c. 480), and ending with Isocrates (born b. c. 439), who (eight in all) may be said to belong to the school of Gorgias. He begins the newer school of sophists with Aesches (who was born b. c. 389), which seems mainly introductory, and to prove his position that the modern school was not entirely new, but had its origin so far back as the time of Aeschines. He passes immediately thereafter to the time of Nicoctes, about A. D. 97, and the first book ends with Secundus, who was one of the inceptors of Herodes Atticus, bringing the sophists in ten lives down to the same period as the sophistic philosophers. The second book begins with Herodes Atticus, about A. D. 143, and continues with the lives of his contemporaries and of their disciples, till the reign of Philip, about A. D. 247, as has been already stated. It consists of thirty-three lives, and ends with Aspasius. The principal value of this work is the opinion which it enables us to form of the merits of the parties treated of; as the taste of Philostratus, making allowance for his prepossessions as a rhetorician, is pure, and is confirmed by the remains we have of some of the productions to which he refers, as in the case of Aesches. The work is tinted with rhetorical amplification, from which, probably, he could not wholly free his style. His opportunities of the matter in hand, and his intimate acquaintance with the lives and works of the men whom he writes of, naturally heighten his presentation and embellish his book, stamp it strongly with genuineness. Beginning with Herodes Atticus, he had conversed with parties that knew him (ii. 1 § 5), and so of Aristocles (ii. 3), Philagor (ii. 8 § 2), and Adrianus (ii. 23 § 2). He was personally acquainted with Dauniones (ii. 9 § 3), and had received instruction from, or was intimate with Proclus (ii. 21 § 1) and Antipater (ii. 24 § 2); he had heard Hippomodorus (ii. 27 § 3) and Heliodorus (ii. 32), and, in all probability, Aspasius. Hence, another valuable characteristic of these Lives is the incidental glimpses they give us of the mode of training rhetoricians; and of this Kayser has made a judicious use in his preface to the works of Philostratus. This treatise first appeared, along with the works of Lucian, the Epitomae of Callistratus, our author's Ποιησις and Εικόνες, at Florence, in 1496; the Aldine edition at Venice, in 1503; and, by itself, in 1516, ex Eaditibus Schuarerianis, in a Latin translation by Antonius Bonfinius. Then in Greek, again, with the Ποιησις και Εικόνες, and the same translation, at Venice, in 1550 (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. v. p. 533). Kayser, in 1831, published at Heidelberg critical notes on these Lives. In 1837, Jahn contributed at Berne Symbolsae to their emendation and illustration; and Kayser published at Heidelberg, in 1838, an elaborate edition, with Notae Variorum, edited and inedited, and two treatises, commonly ascribed to Lucian, one of which he claims for Galen, and another, to be hereafter noticed, for Philostratus. 111. Heroica or Heroicai (Ποιησις, Ολειρ; 'HpoaiKai, Kayser). The plan which Philostratus has followed in this work is to introduce a Phoenician merchant conversing with a Thracian vintager, near the town of Elysus (Ποιησις, iii. 1). The latter invites the merchant to his vineyard, and when seated, they discourse concerning the heroes engaged in the Trojan war. This treatise is under the especial patronage of the hero Protesilaus, with whom he is intimately acquainted, and who spends his time partly with him (Elysus was sacred to Protesilaus), and partly with the shades below, or at Phthia, or at the Troad. He then proceeds to discuss many points connected with the Trojan war, on the authority of Protesilaus, to the great astonishment and delight of his guest, dwelling longest on the great merits of Palamedes, and the wrong done to him by Homer, in concealing his fame and exalting that of his enemy Ulysses. He introduces numerous incidents from the cyclic poets, from the tragedians, and of his own invention. It is on the whole a pleasing work, and the source of the unpleasant feeling is rightly traced by Güth as quoted by Kayser (p. iv. of the Prooemium to the Ποιησις in his edition of the whole works of Philostratus). Various conjectures have been formed as to the object which Philostratus had in view in writing this treatise. Olearius thinks that his object was to expose the faults of Homer. Kayser thinks it was written partly to please Caracalla, who desired himself another Achilles,—and hence he conjectures that it was composed between A. D. 211—217,—and partly to furnish an antidote against the false morality of Homer. In the last notion he may be correct enough; but there is nothing to support the first, as there is not a sentence that can be strained to have any allusion to Caracalla, and Palamedes is the great object of the vintager's inquiries. If one must hazard a conjecture as to the main object that Philostratus had in view, if he actually intended anything more than a mere rhetorical description of mythological incidents, collected from various sources, it is that he wrote this work to illustrate a collection of pictures having mythological subjects,—perhaps in the palace of Julia Domna. It is certain that a great part of it is written much as the letterpress description of engravings is often composed in our own day. The vineyard in the introduction might be suggested by a landscape. Then, throughout he dwells on the personal appearance of the heroes. Hence Grote (History of Greece, vol. i. p. 611) draws the inference that the real presence of the hero was identified with his statue. The truth seems to be that the statue or picture furnished the portrait of the hero. Every page of the v 3 PHILOSTRATUS.

Heroicus furnishes instances of this: one will suffice. In the fifth year of the war Antiochus requests Achilles to intercede for him with Nestor, that he may be allowed to take a share in the enterprise. Achilles obtains permission for him, and Nestor, proud of his son, introduces him to Agamemnon. Then occurs the following picture:—

"Antiochus stood close beside and lower than his father (υψώτερος πατρι), blushing and looking down on the ground, and gazing... by the Greeks, with no less admiration than that which Achilles himself inspired. The godlike appearance of the one overawed, that of the other was pleasing and gentle" (iii. 2).

The first edition of this work was that already stated under the Βιοι σοφίων. It was translated into Latin by Stephanus Niger, Milan, 1517. There is an edition by Boissoneade, Paris, 1806.

IV. Imagines (εἰκόνες). This is certainly the author's most pleasing work, exhibiting great richness of fancy, power and variety of description, and a rich exuberance of style. The subject was suited to him, and he to the subject. He has escaped from the trammels of an artificial criticism by which he is fettered in the Heroicus. Alike in grouping and in depicting single objects, hemanifests a complete mastery of what a picture ought to be. The frame-work of the dissertation, which consists of four books (Suicidas, says four), is briefly as follows. After an introduction in which he compares poetry to painting and statutory, he represents himself as having gone to Naples, with no intention of practising his art as a rhetorician. He lived in a villa out of the city, where there was an excellent collection of paintings. His host had a son who used to watch him while examining the pictures. At once to gratify him, and to free himself from the importunities of some youths that had besought him to exercise his art, he employed himself in explaining the subjects of the pictures; and this explanation forms the work. The paintings present various subjects in which he can display his acquaintance both with poets and historians,—they are mythological, historical, biographical, landscapes with figures, and allegorical. They consist of thirty-one in the first, and thirty-three in the second book. Though Soileg (s. e. Εὐπληθος ἔργων) gives an unfavourable view of Philostratus as a judge of paintings, the opinion of critics seems to be all but unanimous in his favour. He is fond of referring to works of art, and his writings abound with proofs that he had studied the subject carefully. It is less certain whether his description refers to an actual collection, or whether he had not invented the subjects. The question is a difficult one to decide. On the one hand is the great distinctness and vividness of the details; on the other he mentions no artist's name— he alludes to no picture which is certainly known or described by any other, and in his description of Pantheia (iii. 9) he shows how any man may follow out the mere statement of an historical fact (in this case made by Xenophon), so as to draw a picture of each incident. We may therefore expect that his object was to rival the painter's art by the rhetorical, as he rivals the poet's by the painter's. On the other hand, it has been properly remarked by Kayser that no objection to the reality of the pictures can be drawn from the fact that a few of the descriptions contain two or more simultaneous actions, for that was not unknown to the ancient artists.
